

DELPHI CLASSICS

M. P. Shiel

Collected Works

Series Eleven

The Collected Works of

M. P. SHIEL

(1865-1947)

Contents

The Novels

The Rajah's Sapphire (1896)

The Yellow Danger (1898)

Contraband of War (1899)

Cold Steel (1899)

The Man-Stealers (1900)

The Lord of the Sea (1901)

The Purple Cloud (1901)

The Evil That Men Do (1904)

The Lost Viol (1905)

The Yellow Wave (1905)

The Last Miracle (1906)

The White Wedding (1908)

The Isle of Lies (1909)

The Dragon (1913)

Children of the Wind (1923)

The Young Men Are Coming! (1937)

The Short Story Collections

Prince Zaleski (1895)
Shapes in the Fire (1896)
Miscellaneous Short Stories

The Non-Fiction

Science, Life and Literature (1950)

The Delphi Classics Catalogue

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "M.P. Shiel". The script is fluid and cursive, with the first letters of each word being capitalized and prominent.

© Delphi Classics 2021

Version 1

Explore the catalogue...

MAIN SERIES 1 TO 12

Browse our Main Series

ANCIENT CLASSICS

Browse our Ancient Classics

DELPHI POETS SERIES

Browse our Poets

Masters of Art Series

Browse our Art eBooks

DELPHI GREAT COMPOSERS

Browse our Classical Music series

The Collected Works of
M. P. SHIEL

By Delphi Classics, 2021

COPYRIGHT

Collected Works of M. P. Shiel

First published in the United Kingdom in 2021 by Delphi Classics.

© Delphi Classics, 2021.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of the publisher, nor be otherwise circulated in any form other than that in which it is published.

ISBN: 978 1 91348 745 4

Delphi Classics

is an imprint of

Delphi Publishing Ltd

Hastings, East Sussex

United Kingdom

Contact: sales@delphiclassics.com

www.delphiclassics.com

CLASSIC FANTASY

Rediscover the magic of these pioneering fantasy authors on your eReader!

Explore Classic Fantasy at Delphi Classics...

The Novels

Matthew Phipps Shiell was born on the island of Montserrat in the West Indies in 1865.

Victorian drawing of Montserrat executed five years before the author's birth

The Rajah's Sapphire (1896)

Written in collaboration with W. T. Stead

M. P. Shiel was born and brought up in Montserrat, a British colony with a long history of slavery and exploitation. Shiel's father was an Irish ship-owner, shopkeeper and lay preacher, while his mother was biracial and claimed Andalusian and North African heritage. Young Shiel received a good education in Barbados at the prestigious Harrison College, before he moved to London to pursue his career. His earliest literary works were two collections of short stories, Prince Zaleski (1895) and Shapes in the Fire (1896); they were minor successes, helping him to establish his reputation as a writer.

The Rajah's Sapphire was Shiel's first novel, published in 1896 by Ward, Lock and Bowden in London. The idea of writing the book began when the journalist and editor, W. T. Stead, approached Shiel in 1893, asking him to write for his new magazine, The Daily Paper. It was intended as a spin-off from the successful and prestigious Review of Reviews journal. Stead asked Shiel to contribute work for a series that aimed to recount historical events through the medium of fictional stories. It is not known precisely how much Stead contributed to the outline of Shiel's novel, but after only one edition, The Daily Paper failed and the novel remained unreleased for another three years.

It is an action adventure story centred on the crossing of paths between Stefan Von Reutlingen, a conscientious German diplomat and the dangerous, grotesquely wealthy and reckless American, Ralph Ralloner.

The first edition

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.

CHAPTER II.

CHAPTER III.

CHAPTER IV.

CHAPTER V.

CHAPTER VI.

CHAPTER VII.

CHAPTER VIII.

CHAPTER IX.

Shiel as a young man

CHAPTER I.

THE MARKGRAF STEFAN von Reutlingen, that rising son of the corps diplomatique, was not in the best of spirits. He felt as if he lacked part of himself, like an animal whose tail has been decapitated; for, while his handsome, knit body was in close attendance on the Kaiser at the Zeughaus, in Berlin, on the particular Sunday afternoon in question, the most important organ of that same handsome body was away truant in a certain western English county. Now, a frame without a heart is like an egg without salt; and thus it was that the Kaiser frowned more than once during the day to find his brilliant protege insipid to his taste, wearing an absent look, and giving spiritless answers to the spirited questions of his volcanic sovereign.

It was the 27th of January, in this year of grace 1895, and so, of course, the birthday of Wilhelm. Stefan's first task for the day had been to attend in the train of his young master at the Palast-kapelle to hear divine service. The soldier-emperor is nothing if not devout, and the days wound up with wine-libations to Mars are usually begun by him with the payment of his respects to the Nazarene carpenter. Stefan, too, like most sons of noble, old German races, had a tincture of a certain haughty piety in his composition. He rose early, full of the great day and all its details, sighed the name of a certain Ada Macdonald, called down with genuine feeling a blessing on the turbulent head of his young master, and, having ensconced his feet in the fur of a pair of wrought slippers and his back in the fur of a dressing-gown of scarlet velvet, sat down to the white napery and the silver service of a dainty private breakfast.

Fritz, the trusty, his right-hand man, the only living being who could satisfactorily wax the sweeping, diplomatic semi-circles of the young Markgraf's radiant moustache, placed gingerly by his right hand the privileged letters of the morning, and it was the very first of these which the Markgraf opened that sealed the fate of his good spirits for the rest of that day. Stefan had a trick of tapping lightly with his knuckles on the nearest convenient surface in moments of high impatience, and for a full quarter of an hour after reading this letter he gazed vaguely before him, and the table sounded forth a gentle, mechanical tattoo under his tapping hand. The note was short, and ran:

“Dearest, — All is fixed. The ball will be, after all, on the 6th. and you are going to be there. Do not tell me about diplomacy, do not tell me about your too absurd, little Kaiser! If trifles such as these keep you from me at a time when I specially require, and demand, your presence — what am I to think? No, no, you must come. It will be no ball to your Ada if you are not there; I think you appreciate the compliment. And there is danger in your absence, mon ami, at a function such as that. Can you not conceive how poor little me will be nibbled at, fished for, hunted like a stag by the hunters? And how can I save myself? Not mine the fault if the rats prefer Gorgonzola to Cheshire. I did not make the golden vermilion flashings which lure the fishers to linger above my waters. If my hoofs are slender, and the coating of my haunches sleek, I am no more responsible for that than I am for the fact that the hunters persist in preferring sleek and slender quarry. Come, come, and rescue me. And here is some news for you which should spur you: I have had another, my dear; yes, yet another. Think of it! Is this the twenty-ninth or the thirtieth? I forget. I have them all noted down in my diary with the records of my new gowns. And only guess from whom this last comes? Oh, it fills the cup of your Ada's bitterness to the brim! From whom but from the 'High-flyer.' Know you in the Fatherland the fame and prowess of that knight? The 'High-flyer,' my dear. He went down upon one of his little nervous knees and implored me to be his! Art jealous? Don't! Still, I assure you, he did it very prettily, and I was far from really degoute. The man has a certain charm, though he is undoubtedly madder than any March hare that ever scampered over a hill. He called me the Virgin Mary: said that then, for the first time in his life, he bent the knee before the unsullied soul of a virgin. And when I recommended him to rise from his too-absurd position he seemed to forget all about the matter at once, and coolly commenced to talk of — something else. Not one single word of it all did that man really mean! He is simply the creature of sheer, headlong, momentary impulse, and rather a ruffian into the bargain. And yet I like him — and, oh, he is so rich! He is to be at the ball, if he can remember so small a matter for so long a time as a week.

"I am now staying at Lord Darley's, in Somersetshire; but shall be in London with the St. John-Heygates in two days: we return west together for the ball. I shall meet you in London without fail, remember.

"Yours, yours!

"Ada."

"P.S. — I have, or had, something — a favor — to ask you. Dare I? But no, I am superstitious — and I love you! No, no. And yet I dearly wish it, too."

The Markgraf Stefan's immediate reply to this letter was the tattoo with his knuckles on the table. He frowned, he ran his fingers through his hair, he made slender as his toothpick the ends of his moustache. "And — who —

the devil.” he slowly asked himself, “is the High-flyer?” The one thing he disliked in that perfection, his beloved, was a certain too high respect he had noticed in her for wealth — wealth for wealth’s sake. Ada Macdonald “loved” him, and he was not rich: she did not love the High-flyer, but she loved money, and the High-flyer had what she loved. Small things trouble the lover, and Stefan was an intense member of that sect. “Donner and Blitz!” — he was still old-fashioned Teuton enough to swear by the elements in his hour of oaths— “who — the devil — is the High-flyer?” And with this second repetition of the question, a certain reputation flashed across his memory. “Ralloner, perhaps?” Yes, surely, that must be the man who had received this nickname in England; Ralloner, the incarnate whirlwind, that genius of the hurricane, the typhoon of flesh. The rumor of him had filled Europe, the dollar-compeller, the madcap, the dispenser of palaces, the keeper of zenanas whose inmates were countesses and prima donnas. And this ghoul had been on a knee before his betrothed — a dangerous man, not to be baulked in his impulses! Stefan shivered; he pushed the plate from him. And when Ada had refused him, the High-flyer seemed to forget all about the matter at once. How patent a pretence! Such a man must have meant all he said. Why did he think of going to the ball, where she was to be the brightest, most particular star of all? Fashionable functions of that kind were surely not the kind of places to which a wild spirit like Ralloner devoted his time. The ruse was patent. And to think that he, the Markgraf von Reutlingen, was tied here to Berlin, tied for a month at least, by the exigencies of diplomacy, to the heels of the Kaiser, without hope or respite! He cursed fate, and the Chancellor, and the great lady whose ball was to out-dazzle Solomon and the gems of Golconda; and when, by 11 o’clock, he sat on the blue velvet-cushioned pew immediately behind his Imperial Majesty in the Palast-kapelle, out of the same mouth proceeded blessings and verdaments.

“To-night — at 10 — in my private room, behind the Ballzimmer,” said the Chancellor in his ear in low, mysterious tones, as the procession of the Court was passing out of the chapel.

He turned, in wonder, to question, but the Minister had already retired a few steps, and was lending ear to some close words of the Emperor.

After a somewhat hurried lunch, Wilhelm, followed by his staff-officers, the chief of the Civil Cabinet, the Chancellor, and the principal Ministers, drove to the Zeughaus to attend the ceremony of giving the password. Berlin was en fete. Huzzas and flags made a double hedge about him as he sailed through the palisade of the jubilant people. As he passed the University a band sent forth from its deep throat the patriotic song, “Heil dir in Siegeskranz.” Stefan, with his back to the horses, in company with some of his superiors in diplomacy, began to give rein to generous enthusiasms, until the sudden curb-bit of the thought of “the High-flyer” ripped his mouth, and instantly he was in the glums again. A salvo of cannon greeted the Emperor at the Zeughaus. The party drew up in the great quadrangle, lined with its glittering array of warriors under arms; then followed the salute and manoeuvrings under the proud eye of the modern Alexander of the Germans; and then, for the first time, an army corps commander stood forth and read, as with the mouth of the trumpet, the famous manifesto of the “Birthday.” After referring to the military victories, which were crowned by the foundation of the German Empire, and thanking the army, the manifesto ordered that for a year the banners and standards which received distinction from the late Emperor William during the war should, on public occasions, be adorned with oak leaves. The guns and batteries engaged in the Franco-German War were to be decorated in the same way. Almost immediately on the reading of this document, the Imperial cortege moved off to return to the Palace. A mighty cheer burst as from one throat from the quadrangle of the Zeughaus.

It was now late. The scene in the streets was one of medley, luridness, and grandeur. Only seat strutting young Crudity on an old throne; clap a crown upon its head; stick a sceptre into its hand; fill its blatant mouth with high-sounding words about God and kingship; and now call down the mantle of night on a great city, illuminated; jumble the hot populace, empty of comfort and thought, in the streets, and bid them howl and roar the agony of their vacuum in wild huzzas; over all the noise let bands brazen out their jubilees and the tongues of a hundred bells talk; and you have a measure of the scene in Berlin on the evening of Sunday, the 27th of January.

After the highly ceremonial State dinner in the Palace, at which sat the Royal guests of Saxony and Wurtemberg, our own Duke of Coburg, and the Prince of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen, the Imperial party adjourned to the brilliant performance at the Royal Opera. Berlin through all its width was a city of feasts. Private houses were decorated. Dinners ministerial, dinners official, club, military, were popping loud with corks; and tongues, venting to heaven his Majesty's health, drunk three times three according to time-honored custom. Wilhelm sat in his box at the opera, the high flush and the pride of life on his brow. He was beating time with his forefinger to an overture — for little Willie is a very great musician, and woe to those who deny it! As he sat thus, Prince Hohenlohe entered the box, and instantly the Kaiser's face changed to gravity, and the two leant their heads together in earnest talk. Both glanced simultaneously at Stefan sitting in the stalls near by, and Stefan, looking up, was certain of this singular glance, and with beating heart wondered what it could mean. He had not passed the age at which one blushes at an Emperor's notice, and he blushed. Till near 10 his head was in a whirl, and then he slipped from the theatre, crossed two corridors, traversed the Ballzimmer, and tapped at a tapestry-shrouded door. Hohenlohe had anticipated him there. A voice called, "Come in."

He found himself separated from the Prince by a table littered with documents, under a rather vague red light which swung from a vaulted roof. He made his lowest official bow, his high-bred face telling no secrets of the beating of his heart.

Prince Hohenlohe was buried deep in the perusal of official papers. Presently he looked up, and piercing the young man with his eye said —

"Ah! von Reutlingen, so that is you. Allow me to congratulate you. By the way, how old are you?"

"Twenty-five," gasped Stefan.

"Only twenty-five. Hum!"

There was an awkward silence. Stefan resented it.

"I take it, of course," resumed the Prince, "that you are tolerably well acquainted with the minutiae of the Chino-Japanese affair so far?"

"That is so, your Highness."

"And you know the general tenor of the secret proposals made by England to the Powers on that subject some little time since?"

"Certainly, your Highness."

"It was not at the time deemed prudent that Germany should show any undue desire to interfere between the contending parties. But now the Emperor agrees with me in thinking that the time has come—"

"Really!"

"Listen. You owe it to your known tact and knowledge of affairs that you have been selected to undertake a task of the very gravest responsibility. On your acts and words, and even thoughts, will depend tremendous issues.

And I feel certain you will enter on this mission with a due sense of its supreme importance.”

Stefan bowed.

“By the way,” resumed the Prince, “are you already personally acquainted with the Chinese Ambassador in London?”

“Certainly, your Highness.”

“And, of course, with Lords Rosebery and Spencer?”

“Certainly, your Highness.”

“The siege of Wei-hia-wei, as you know, is now proceeding. The idea is that you should reach the seat of action before it falls. That will mean quick work. You are, of course, aware of that. By the way, I forget for the moment, how many guns has the Tien Shen?”

“Six, your Highness.”

“And the Chen-Yuen?”

“Eight.”

“Well, well. You proceed straight to London to arrange preliminaries with the English Government and the Chinese ambassador. Your utmost time in London will be ten days. You will reach England by the Calais-Dover route — I have my own reasons for specifying this route; these you will learn from this packet. All these three packets I commend to your earnest perusal; in them you will find your whole conduct and policy clearly outlined. I dare say you will wish to start early on the morrow, and as you have had a fatiguing day I will now bid you my adieux and convey at the same time an expression of the Kaiser’s approval, confidence, and thanks.”

Stefan, with overflowing bosom, took the Prince’s hand and the documents, bowed, and retired backward like a crab, only with rather more grace and dignity. He walked home on air, thinking in his swimming brain two things. The first, that he was a made man and diplomat; the second, that if Ada Macdonald did not know before with what a whirlwind swing a happy man can waltz, she would know it for very certain on the great night of the Countess of Yorrick's ball, till she begged for breath and mercy.

As he entered the door of his Residenz, his man Fritz put a telegram into his hand. He knew not why, but for a second he hesitated to open it. A presentiment, a fear seized him, that the gods were jealous, as in their wont, of his perfect happiness. Then he tore it open. It ran:

“Before coming over you must go to Friedrich, the pawnbroker, at 13 Canalstrasse, Bremen, and get for me the Rajah's Sapphire. Don't let any absurd superstition about the luck of the stone prevent you. I must have it for the ball. — Ada.”

He paled under the hall lamp, and slowly drew once more from his pocket Ada's letter of that morning. Looking at the postscript, he read:

“P.S. — I have, or had, something — a favor — to ask you. Dare I? But, no; I am superstitious, and I love you! No, no! And yet I dearly wish it, too!”

“So, this,” he groaned, “was the favor. That cursed stone! This — this — this — was the favor!”

He tottered limp to his bed.

CHAPTER II.

TO GO TO Bremen. Not to go to Bremen? That was the thought which racked him all the night. He had special instructions to proceed at once to Calais; the fate of empires, the lives perhaps of millions, depended on his prompt, his implicit obedience; and, he added to himself, his own advancement, honor; and then he immediately fell to cursing himself for thinking of his own small interests at all when so much else was at stake. To go to Bremen? It could not be. He decided that definitely Bremen meant the North-German Lloyd, and so, a voyage not merely of a few hours to the opposite coast of England, as that from Calais to Dover, but a voyage down the length of the North Sea, down half the length of the English Channel — to Southampton! Then from Southampton the railway journey to London — delay, delay, every where. Lying on the left shoulder he decided sharply and angrily against Bremen. He turned on the right, and the right brought him thoughts of Ada Macdonald; she rose before him, tall, flashing scorn at him from her black diamond eyes, imperious as Queen Boadicea. He knew what fires slept in Ada; and he knew what fires slept in Wilhelm and Hohenlohe, but when it came to a question of real downright fire, he said to himself with a shiver that he would rather a thousand times over be scorched by the fires of Wilhelm than the fires of Ada Macdonald. How could he refuse her — how could he dare? She might not understand his excuses about the exigencies of diplomatic business; she would say that his motive for not doing her bidding was his dread of travelling in company with that vile stone which had proved so fatal to how many others! She would call him a coward — him! “I must go!” he cried. “I must go, come what will!” This was the decision of right shoulder. He turned again on his left. As a door on its hinges, so he turned on his bed; and in ten minutes left shoulder had brought him to the conclusion that on no possible consideration could he venture, could he dare, could he dream of, going to Bremen. The morning was near, and he fell into a nightmare sleep.

By ten o’clock he was in a private compartment of a train. Fritz sat before him, wondering at his master’s pallor. The train steamed away. It was bound for — Bremen. Stefan spent the hours of the morning in thinking over the details of the awful history of the stone which he was about to take into his possession. It was a great sapphire, massive as a hen’s egg, pure as the bubbling water of a mountain brook, the very playhouse and home of light. The tradition was that since the Indian Prince, Kashmiri Khan, had murdered his father in the sixth century before Christ for the possession of the wondrous jewel it had never been the property of anyone, never even been, in the temporary custody of anyone, without bringing on them disaster of some kind, mischief in some shape; and, as a matter of historical fact, there can be no doubt that Kashmiri Khan himself, immediately after committing the murder, was devoured by a lion as he fled through the jungle: and, it is added, by the somewhat fantastic Indian history books, that the lion consumed the entire body of the man except only the hand in which the jewel was grasped, which hand was found lying on the ground by the servants of the late king two days after. It was taken back to the Palace, and, within three months, the town was invaded, the Palace burned, and the stone carried away to Northern Hindoostan by a band of roving disciples of Zoroaster. The Rajah’s sapphire, during the course of many centuries, passed through a multitude of hands, and always with the same history; the greedy eye blazed over it; the frenzied brain schemed and plotted to possess it; then came the chuckle of victory; the secret hugging of it, as of the water of life, to the ardent bosom; then, in a day — in an hour — a doubt, a sideward glance of distrust; then disaster, swift, sure, recurrent; then, ah then, the burning lust to be rid of it, the agonised cry — at any cost — at the price of life — to pluck this viper's tooth from the gnawed breast. The same history everywhere.

At the beginning of this century Sir James Macdonald, travelling through Central Hindoostan, came to a State, isolated from the world, in the centre of vast mountains. Here he was the guest of a great Indian potentate, into whose hand the stone had lately passed; the monarch, not at first knowing the history of the jewel, had purchased it at a fabulous price. A week later he chanced to call a meeting of his dewan (council), over which his heir was to preside. At the appointed moment the young man entered the chamber where were congregated the Ministers of State, the jewel glittering, like a constellation of radiance on his forehead. He entered the hall, ascended the steps of the throne, and — dropped dead. Soon after this the old Rajah heard the history of the stone, and the same day received the visit of Sir James Macdonald. Sir James, a man of haughty disposition, and, little careful of observing the customs and prejudices of his host, inflicted, in the course of a day or two, some deadly insult on the Rajah, which, however, the monarch appeared to make light of, and, on receiving an apology, promised to forget. On the third day Sir James departed, but he had not travelled far into the forest when he was overtaken by a hot messenger on horseback, who presented him with the transcendent gem as a token from the Rajah of goodwill and perfect reconciliation. Sir James, in a transport of gratitude, sent back the thing he prized most on earth — a small silver brooch containing a lock of his dead wife's hair. He reached England in perfect safety — to find his credit gone, his character besmirched, and an only brother dead. It was thus that after nearly a century the sapphire had come to be the property of Ada Macdonald.

During that century it had passed from the hand of one banker to another, one pawn broker to another. The immense value of the stone had, of itself, conferred a distinction on the Macdonald family; they were called “the Macdonalds of the Sapphire,” and hence they had never had the courage to part altogether with it. But the stone had a strange, strong genius for inspiring panic, and hence it was hardly ever to be found in the actual possession of a Macdonald, for by this time its history had come to be known. Even the pawnbrokers had acquired a strange trick of growing tired of its company; hence its career had been a rather migratory one; and hence, too, it was that on this 28th January an express was sweeping the Markgraf Stefan in the direction of No. 13 Canalstrasse, Bremen.

In the evening of the same day he was closeted in a small dark room in a dirty back street of dingy Bremen, with Melchizedek Friedrich, an old, bent German Hebrew, with fish-hook nose, and torrent white beard. Stefan produced documentary evidence of his identity and position, and his connection with the owner of the stone. He showed the telegram.

Friedrich sat bent, muttering guttural Hebrew and Yiddish to his knowing beard. Presently he looked up, shot a keen cunning ray from his eyes into Stefan, and said —

“And so you come for the sapphire, sir?”

“Yes.”

“I cannot part with it.”

“Thank God!” said Stefan to himself, and then added aloud, “You surprise me.”

“The history of this stone I have now learned,” said old Friedrich, leering craftily. “Six months ago it was pledged with me for the merely nominal sum of 200 gulden, and I claim that at the time I should have been told by the pledger what risks I ran by taking the gem into my house.”

“But that is an absurd claim,” answered Stefan; “it would be laughed at in a court of law.”

“I know that,” said Friedrich, “but on the other hand, you come to me without the legal document, on the production of which alone I am bound to deliver the stone; and I decline to do so unless — ?”

“What?”

“Unless the numerous losses — the very numerous and unaccountable losses,” he repeated, “which I have recently suffered be first made good by you.”

“This is mere superstition,” said Stefan, pleased in his heart at this turn of events— “mere superstition. Miss Macdonald has not instructed me to meet any such preposterous claim, nor am I at all prepared to do so.”

The old man’s hand was visibly trembling. “You will, therefore,” went on Stefan, “greatly oblige me by sending me to-night a written refusal to deliver the stone. And meantime — good evening.”

He walked towards the door.

“Stay, stay,” cried old Friedrich, hobbling after him. “In mercy, stay! Your excellency is hasty; your excellency misunderstood.”

“What now?” asked Stefan.

“The stone is yours; take it. Yehovah help me! Old Friedrich is a poor man; take it dear sir, it is yours.”

That night the Rajah’s sapphire slept on Stefan’s dressing-table — a spirit of evil in the garb of an angel of light.

The next evening he stood looking over the taffrail of the great steamer as she rode by the quay of the Bremerhafen. The Nelf presented the appearance of an ant-nest or a bee-hive. Stewards ran hither and thither, two great plumed columns of black smoke rose from the chimneys, whistles shrilled, on one side of the ship a chain of boats still lay round her; the air hummed with the adieux and aufwiedersehens of parting friends. Near to where Stefan stood sat a mother, and on her knee a great boy of 14 or 15. He garnered from their talk that the youngster was going to London to be a clerk in his uncle's business, and he calculated that for half an hour the mother had not once ceased to kiss him. He did not know why, but the sight made, him feel with his fingers for the sapphire in his breast-pocket Fritz and he seemed the only persons unoccupied on the swarming ship. Gott behut! Gott behut! rose the cry on every hand. He wondered at the shamelessness of German lovers as he saw a young man and lady passionately welded together in the midst of the press and throng of the after-deck; but none seemed to notice them save him. Again through his ulster he felt the bulge of the stone, and sighed. Forward there was a rattle and clash of chains. The ring of boats began to break up and grow thin. Suddenly there fell a sharp shower of sleet, and through it like a shriek of defiance, the steamer uttered a shrill whistle. There was a shoreward scamper, and the defeat of lingering kisses and hand-wringers was turned into a rout when the heart of the great mammoth of the sea suddenly wakened and began its awful beat. Pulse, pulse! "And mind your bedside prayer every night," said the wet-faced mother, "and — and — Gott Behut!" — Stefan touched Ada Macdonald's stone beneath his ulster. It was too late — the panting seahorse was away.

The Nelf left Bremerhafen at about 5 p.m. For about half an hour she stopped, on her way, at Nordenhamm, then turned her bows over the open sea bound for South Hampton and New York.

The night fell deadly dark. She had not been cuffing and butting at the piled billows of the open Atlantic an hour before the engineers were down in the depths of the engine room mending broken gear. The gusts drew deeper-mouthed, roaring like hungry lions, and Stefan, summoning his sea-legs on the poop, touched with his forefinger the Rajah's sapphire beneath his ulster.

CHAPTER III.

RALPH RALLONER WAS a person of “no occupation” and “no fixed abode.” He was a vagabond; he was as much without anything in the nature of a character as the outside of an egg is without hair. And yet he was highly respected, too; he was even feared. If he had condescended to put his arm around the neck of you or me, we should have been highly flattered and pleased; we should have gone and straightway told our mother and our pet enemy that good old Ralph Ralloner had put his arm around our neck. The fact is he was a millionaire. “Charity covereth a multitude of sins,” but that is only in heaven, where they have queer ways of looking at things. On earth, where people have got to be practical if you want anything covered, from the roof of your house to your sins, you must have what the Yankees call “the shingles,” or what we call “the tin.”

Ralph was a Yankee, and he had “the shingles” with a vengeance. The shingles roofed in the sins from the rain of the world’s censure — not entirely, for the sins were really quite too huge for that, but to this extent, that they didn’t have the look of sins at all and seemed to be mere unpleasant peculiarities, or, as people called them, “idiosyncrasies.”

For example, Ralloner, the High-flyer, was a great sportsman, and one of the sports which he liked best was that of tandem-driving. And he never drove a tandem but he drove it furiously, so that when he held the reins of his glittering turnout it became, under his hand, not a tandem at all, but a Juggernaut. Everything flew and sprayed before it like the foam from a ship’s bows, or else rolled and writhed under it like the clay under an advancing plough. Woe to an old tippie, or a blind man, or a woman with child when the High-flyer in all his bravery came Juggernauting along! The report was that in Chicago he had sacrificed ten human lives to the divinity of his tandem. The magistrates were, of course, compelled to fine him, but they did it lovingly; their sympathies were mostly on the side of the tandem. They thought it such a pity to check the enthusiasm of headlong, generous sportsman-like youth! And, besides, as they said, the thing was common enough. In Chicago not a day passes but an electric car rolls over the agony of some crushed human being; the ear has become accustomed to the shriek of death, and the eye to the squirt of the blood of men. Ralloner, bless you! was not the only Juggernaut about. Juggernauts have grown common and multiplied in the earth till they are past counting; and though they do say that there is an Eye which sees and reckons up these things, the fact of the matter is, that though the Eye sees, it is not seen, and so counts for precious little. The ostrich which pokes its head into the bushes knows that the hunter can see its great awkward body, but so long as it can't see the hunter it cares not a button for him; and Chicago, which is the most perfect embodiment of the whole spirit of the world as it exists to-day, is as much like an ostrich in nearly every respect as two little twinkling stars are like each other.

Ralloner was a tandem driver; he was a steeplechase man; horses of his magnificent stud had twice won the Grande Nationale in Paris. His brain was made of burning lava. The two engines of his great and splendid steam yacht had once broken down on the high seas because he would insist on driving the overworked ship twice as fast as any other ship had ever gone. He could not write a letter — hardly even a word. If he attempted to write, the pen made a thick stroke, or else broke to splinters under his hand. The mad fire in him would not permit him to form the letters. His eyes never rested; they shifted, and shifted, and shifted, like those singular electric eyes one sees in some advertisements at railway stations. What was he looking for? What did he hunt? He did not know. Only the necessity was strong on him to be in motion — to burst the bands of space — to pass like a fiend over the warm entrails of some poor old beggar-woman — to plough his frenzied way through obstacles towards impossible goals. It was the madness which comes of the possession of great wealth — the same which took hold of Nebuchadnezzar, and Nero, and many of the old Roman emperors. Some people call it “Caesarism,” and make of it a special and separate disease. Little Wilhelm, across the water, is perhaps affected in that way. But Ralloner had a particular tendency to this form of frenzy; his enormously rich father had died in an asylum; and in the blood of the High-flyer had taken root diseases of various obscure and insidious kinds.

In figure he was very slight and short, and wore in all weathers loose thin jackets, much too long for him, which sailed out behind, giving him an appearance of eager swiftness even on the rare occasions when he was not over-hurried. A great red scar traversed one side of his forehead and face, and one eye squinted much smaller than the other.

On the evening of the day following that on which he had gone on his little nervous knee before Ada Macdonald, he rushed into the smoking-room of the Hotel Victoria, sat down at one of the small marble tables, and in an almost illegible hand dashed off on a telegraph form the words:

“To Anderson, captain, the Treaty, Solent I. W. — Have Treaty ready day after tomorrow for trip to Norway. Want to do distance at rattling rate. Make water know we’re there. See to everything. — Ralloner.”

He had promised to be at the Yorrick Ball, but had clean forgotten all about it.

“Hullo!” he cried, taking, in the corridor, the hand of Lord Pierrepont without stopping in his headlong walk. “Hullo, Charlie, that you? Like see sea-water boil like kettle? Come ‘long with me, if like; going coast Norway.”

“Stop a bit Where are you dragging me to — ?”

“Come ‘long. Nice little supper — John’s Wood-road. Tandem waiting door. Like see sea-water skip like mad?”

“Skip? I? No, thanks; I am not passionately attached to it even in its more serious moods.”

“Ah, dry land man! Like to see it swirl and sing for mercy. Everything on deck wet, beds in cabin wet, foam hissing past frightened like, like woman with white face; ship nearly done up, groaning like the deuce, begad! Cap’n frightened; down on his knees— ‘For God’s sake ease her, sir!’ That’s kind of man I am.”

“Well, ta-ta; I am going into the smoke room.”

“Not going — John’s Wood? Tandem waiting, know.”

“Not to-night, thank you. Bye-bye.”

CHAPTER IV.

THE NIGHT WAS utterly black. The Nelf was in the middle of the raging German Ocean.

The 370 odd passengers of the great liner were in their berths below. One only kept watch on deck — Stefan von Reutlingen. It was near morning; but it seemed as though morning would never come. There was a coating of ice on the back and front of Stefan's ulster as he now paced, now clung to the railing of the bulwark. The light-colored funnels before him, the characteristic feature of the Nord-deutscher Lloyd boats, were invisible to him in the thick gloom. He heard the throb of the engines, heard the whish of the sea, saw the glare of the engine-room, and looked again and again at the heavens, praying for morning — but for morning.

The third officer, who, with the first was in charge, passed near him in his peregrinations.

"How is she now, Mr. Hollberg?" he asked.

"She goes S.S.W., your excellence."

"No; as to the position and speed I mean?"

"She is about thirty miles from the Hook of Holland and forty from Lowestoft. Her speed is fifteen knots. Don't you think of turning in to-night?"

"Fifteen, eh? That's pretty well for a sea like this, isn't it?"

"Not more than so-so, I think."

"Won't the morning ever come?"

Mr. Hollberg laughed.

“Yes, it will come; It always comes. You are not nervous; I hope?”

“I? No, not nervous. What light is that? You see it away yonder, don’t you, a green light?”

“On the port bows? some steamer. I have noticed her for some little time. She is rapidly approaching us.”

“Does her course lie across ours?”

“Seemingly not quite at right angles.”

“We are showing our lights, of course?”

“Oh, yes, red and blue, as usual.”

The officer moved away. Stefan looked toward the sky as they that watch for the morning. And then his eye fell on the green light, small and clear in the blackness, coming nearer, nearer, mysterious as life, certain as death. He thought of the mother and the boy; and how indecently the two lovers had kissed on the deck.

Below, the 370 slept — mostly slept. Of those that waked some were thinking of Southampton and the things they had to do there, the words to say, and the others spoke in this way to their own minds: “Well, of all the ills which may possibly befall a man in his course through life, the ill of seasickness is certainly the worst!”

* * * * *

The soul of Ralph Ralloner, the High-flyer, danced. It was a death dance, but a dance for all that. Like the fling of the man in the ballad —

Sae wantonly, sae rantingly, sae dantingly gaed he,
He played a tune, and cut a jig beneath the gallows tree!

He stood crouching close to the helmsman, clinging to the railing near him like a barnacle. He had a cloth cap on his head, and on his back the rags of one of his thin loose jackets which the wind had torn to shreds; the shreds whistled and flapped out behind him like an old flag in a hurricane. He looked like a mad beggar. The winds were shrieking awful music into his inmost ears. The wide lake of foam that whitened and whirled and curdled round the frightened Treaty seemed to yell to him “hurrah! hurrah!” His dark soul danced as the shadows of a shaded light dance, flickering upon a wall on a gusty night. The Treaty was stabbing and butting at the heaped-up waves of the storm, as they came to meet her. A continual rain of spray hissed over her from fore to aft; she, and all aboard her, were as wet as though she sailed beneath the surface of the water. Had it been possible to increase the speed of her toiling engines by the fraction of a point she would have burst into sky-high atoms, or plunged to the bottom of the German Ocean like a piece of lead shot from a cannon. There was no one on deck but Ralloner, the man at the wheel amidships, and the lookout man doing his watch for’ard. This last was clinging to the fore mast, with one leg lashed to it. He was coated with an inch of ice and near to death. The desertion of the decks was Ralloner’s arrangement. He liked to fancy himself alone on the ship in some dim frozen sea of a far-off world, racing for life with some hunting destiny. The captain, after praying him almost with tears to stay the horrid flight of the vessel, had given warning that after this voyage he must leave, the ship, and had retired to his cabin. The hearts, of all were in their mouths. But Ralloner drank in the champagne of the battling elements till his wild eyes flashed a sulphurous light of their own, and he trembled with the impulse to fly, to fly faster than the ship would go, with the flaming forked wings of a demon, madder than the sea, intenser than the cold, swifter than the blast.

“Ship coming right across our course, sir,” chattered the man at the wheel.

“Let come,” he said.

A fiercer squall followed his words, seeming to howl a menace to his ears, battering him against the railing to which he clung. An avalanche of solid sea thundered down upon the two men, half drowning them. To Ralloner it was sweet as the embrace of a lover.

“Great Jericho! we’re getting rather near that ship, sir!” said the wheelman, after three minutes.

“What ship she?”

“Looks a great big monster of a thing; p’raps one of the North-German Lloyd.”

“How we going?”

“Nothe half-west, sir.”

“How she going?”

“‘Bout south-west, seems to me.”

“A’ right I want to hug coast England. Keep her so.”

There was silence for half a minute.

“Shall I prick her off to nothe, sir?” said the man at the wheel.

“No man! No! Keep her nose to it. Let fly, begad!”

“But that ship, sir—”

“Hang ship! Sea-water b’longs to me as well as them, s’pose. Let fly.”

And there was silence for yet another half minute, filled by the trumpets and penny whistles of the wind.

“Oh, I’m agoing to prick this ship off to nothe, sir!” cried the helmsman.

“Going do what!” shrieked Ralloner. “Going do what! Disobey my orders?”

“I’m just going to prick her off to nothe, that’s all,” answered James Ray, a thick-set Cockney seaman; “or we bash smack into that ship, and I’ve got a fam’ly.”

“Hang self and fam’ly! White-livered, ‘long-shore fish’man! Discharge you from this minute — discharge you! Give me wheel!”

Ralloner lurched and rolled across to the wheel and seized on two of the spokes. Ray still persisted. Ralloner planted a blow on his chest with the force of high passion, and just then a deep dive of the Treaty into the sea upset the man’s balance, his hold on the wheel relaxed, and he surged and butted forward. The High-flyer was in possession.

He put his mouth to a speaking-tube communicating with the engine-room, whistled, and cried through it— “See if can’t get her go half a knot faster!”

“Can’t!” came the reply.

“Quarter knot, then.”

“Can’t!”

And the Treaty sped away “nothe” and by west making “sea-water boil like, kettle,” making “sea-water skip like mad.”

The two ships drew near; for so, from the foundations of the world, it was appointed. The binnacle light shone full on the face of Ralloner, as he half stood, half crouched, steering — ragged, wild, a creature of the storm, bent on ruin and overthrow. To the great ship, laden with life, he showed a green light; she to him a blue. They came very near — two cables’ length divided them, but in the dense blackness of the morning looked like ten. “Sea-water b’longs to me as much as to them, s’pose,” said the High-flyer to himself. “I’m as good a man as North German Lloyd, s’pose.”

“That ship, sir!” cried James Ray, crouching near. “That ship!”

Juggernaut, earless, eyeless, was abroad.

* * * * *

“I fancy she’s only a small ship, your excellency, of about 400 or 500 tonnage,” said the third officer to Stefan; “and she sees our light. She is sure to prick off a point when she comes near enough.”

Stefan touched the Rajah’s Sapphire beneath his ulster.

“You notice,” continued the officer, “that she shows her green starboard light, and a white mast-head light. She is approaching about two and a half points off our port bow, and she is steering about north by west; you will see that when we come a couple of cable lengths nearer she will, according to the rule of the road, port her helm to about north, and pass close under our stern.”

The officer moved away bowward, and Stefan, clinging with his now numbed hands to the rail of the poop, leant forward, waiting, his heart strangely beating. Suddenly — as it were in a moment — the Treaty loomed on him, immense, terrible — no longer a light curving and hovering unreal above the water-but a ship, big, tangible, monstrous, the swift unswerving messenger of doom and horror. For a second he all but swooned; in the next, as the huge death swept nearer, he saw — distinctly saw — the face of the man raised high on the bridge where the wheel stood; he saw the face, the great red scar across forehead and jaw, the face of a rabid fiend, played upon in the darkness by the lurid light from the binnacle, and lit, as by a second fire of the lake of brimstone, by the mad hilarity of the insensate eyes.

“Port your helm!” shrieked Stefan, his whole agonised soul yelling in his throat; “port your helm, you devil! don’t you see—”

But at that moment the Treaty had rammed the Nelf. Stefan, leaning wildly over the side, was hurled into the sea by the concussion. Sense failed, and he began to sink.

The bows of the Treaty entered the Nelf just abaft the engine-room, penetrating two sleeping berths, near the mail-room. The ships were not in contact a minute; the poop of the Nelf swung round; the yacht, broken in the bows, recoiled; in a moment she had disappeared into the darkness. And the only man in the liner who, for one single instant, had seen the wild face of Ralph Ralloner was the Markgraf Stefan.

Instantly the Nelf began to settle down sternwards. Her bows rose in air. The captain had rushed up, and flew to the bridge. Then followed a mad stampede of half-naked passengers to the deck.

“Boats out,” sang out the captain; “but don’t lower.”

The sea ran almost mountain high; there was a driving wind from the E.S.E., bitterly cold. A swell rolled over the poop, and two ladies, slipping on the ice of the deck, flew down the inclined plane of the fast sinking stern, and were washed away by the surge. “Everybody on deck; crew to stations,” rang the clarion of the captain’s voice.

At that moment a prolonged shriek swelled from the cabin, in which hundreds of the passengers were still cooped. The berths on the port side had suddenly flooded, many drowning where they stood. A group of men amidships, without orders, took to firing rockets. The Treaty, as if mad with the taste of blood and havoc, was flying away, away to the north. The bows of the Nelf rose up wards like two hands clasped, and raised appealing to heaven. The seamen, wild with panic, but yet quite obedient to orders, rushed forward to loose the boats, but slipped down the iced incline of the deck, and were battered against the masts and hatches, or else fell broken into the engine-rooms.

There were ten boats. The lanyards and gripes of all were frozen; but amidships on the port side the men succeeded in chopping away two. The ship was careening heavily over to the port side, and here the sea broke furiously over her, half swamping the boats. This, perhaps, was why the captain bellowed forth: "Women and children to the starboard side to be saved first;" but on the starboard side, there were no boats lowered! And the end was near. The German pilot standing close to the poop was suddenly aware of a singular swirling and gurgling sound made by the water. He rushed instantly towards the port bows, and-stumbling over a prostrate lady on the way seized her in his arms, and plunged with her into one of the boats. All this while, through the din and the thousandfold shrieking of the passengers, the engines kept up their throbbing travail, and the Nelf was moving painfully forward with the fore part of her keel above the wash of the swell.

Stefan, at the first shock, had been projected into the water. He was a stout swimmer, but this was of no value to him, for whilst he was being hurled from the ship, he had received a stunning blow across the forehead from a spike, and, at the moment when the waves caught him like a flung ball, he was utterly unconscious. He floated for a minute on the heave of the billows like a washed seaweed, buoyed by his bagged, ulster. Then he began to sink like so much lead. All hope seemed gone for him; no power under heaven, a man or an angel looking at him would have said, could now save him. He began to sink. The jaws of ocean opened expectant to swallow him.

Without pain, without consciousness, he commenced to drown, quiet as a child on its mother's bosom. But the Nelf, having vomited him, turned again to the vomit. The shock of the collision had, in stopping the speed of the liner, thrown him forward; as both ships were moving at great speed at the moment, it had been a great shock, and so it had thrown him far forward. But the engines of the Nelf still continued to work; she therefore moved onward, a prey to the sea-wash on her starboard quarter; and it was thus that as Stefan began to descend to his deep resting-place, she swerved near him, stooped deeply to port, on which side he lay, and caught him by a hook which projected from her side a little above the line of her coppering near the bow. The hook passed through the neck of Stefan's ulster at two points, and he hung limp, like a rag on a rock, ducking deep into the water with every downward swoop of the vessel, and again rising high into the air.

It was these alternate immersions and breathings of the fresh wind that brought him back to consciousness. His eyes opened; the turmoil and screechings of the deck fell on his ears; he recognised his position. Presently the Nelf dipped and plunged him afresh into the depths. On rising he roared for help. Could they hear him? Was the ship sinking? He did not know. Once more he was sunk into the black and bitter water. "Not thus, not thus will I die, like a hung rat," he groaned. He tugged at the rubber cloth, but it was stout. And then he thought that he had but to loosen a few buttons, and he was free. But even then he recollected that in an inner pocket of the coat lay the Sapphire of the Rajah; and even then his loyalty to Ada Macdonald was proof against any other motive. Only with life would he part with what she prized. All at once, after another dive into the denser gloom of the sea, he remembered that there was a knife in his pocket. He felt for it and drew it forth, but his fingers were frozen hard; he could not open it. Again and again he tried with all his force; then, with a curse, flung it far into the sea. In the next moment he breathed a prayer and resigned himself to die.

The agony and clamor on the deck had now become a high continuous wail.

All this time the lower part of his body had hung in the water, except for instants when the ship swung specially far over to starboard; but the bow now suddenly kicked high up in the air, and he was lifted clean out of the reach of the waves. His whole weight hung by the hook; he heard the cloth crack; he tore at it with all his force, and tumbled with a splash, free, into the sea. The Nelf, with the upper rim of the stern under the water, forged past him, and he was left alone in the silence and darkness of the ocean.

Immediately afterwards, the ship jerked her bows straight up into the air and shot stern downwards into the depths. Stefan did not see, but he heard the last long wail of unisoned despair from the decks, and he felt, as the ship sank, a gentle sucking sensation round his legs. It was the cajolery of the deep — the fawning lick of the beast before it springs. Some such thought passed through his mind. Ever and anon a yell still reached him; separate, vague with the gurgles of the flood and the rales of death— “the bubbling cry of some strong swimmer.” He was well without the sphere of the ship’s suction; but his strength was going, almost gone, and with every cuff of the swift-succeeding rollers he thought his hour had come. Suddenly he was aware of voices — speaking — floating low in the air around him like tones from another world. With his last breath he gasped a shout; a boat, dim and vast to his failing sight, loaded with people, drifted near; instinct urged him to one last superhuman effort to reach her; hands of men reached out to draw him in, and he tumbled, without consciousness, into the bottom of the cutter.

This was one of the only two boats which had put off from the ship. The other, having a sail, sailed away and soon foundered in the heaving sea. In Stefan’s boat was a mast, but no sail. He lay, with the lady saved by the pilot, half immersed in water. At last the day broke. No sail in sight. The spray from the sea froze on the sides of the boat, while now and again a wave broke over the tiny craft and drenched its occupants. The sea ran hill-high, and the efforts of the officers and men were less directed towards making land in the shortest time than to the urgent need of keeping the boat’s head to the sea. With constant vigilance there was hope, for the spot where they found themselves is a frequented one — the haunt of the “Blue Fishing Fleet” from the English coast.

Several vessels were sighted at a distance; but all efforts to attract their attention failed, for the boat, if seen at all, must have appeared the merest speck on the sea. At 9 someone drew attention to a ship which appeared to be coming toward them. She was anxiously watched for a long time, and hope burst into flower when she was ascertained in very truth to come nearer. The officers made her out to be a trawler at work. From that moment someone or other of the castaways was constantly waving signals; but it seemed an eternity before they were noticed. By this time it was 12 o’clock. The sea had risen still higher, and the boat could make no headway with the oars.

Stefan stirred in his long swoon; but the lower part of his body seemed already dead. At last some of the men in the smack were seen to go up the rigging a little way and wave their hats. A shout went up from the boat as the smack began to bear down upon them. She was soon within hailing distance, and one of the fishermen shouted something which could not be heard in the boat. In a few minutes a rope was thrown out, and caught as well as the benumbed hands of the men would allow; but it was no easy matter to make fast the rope, so slippery was everything with ice, and boat and smack rose and fell, see-sawing on the waves. At last, however, the rope was secured and the boat pulled round to the side of the smack. But in this effort the rope parted under the tug and stress of the billows. The smack captain at once put the tiller down, let go the jib, and brought her up to the wind; and, having got near enough to the drifting boat, a stouter line was thrown out and made fast. Four of the men were quickly got on board the smack. The lady still lay in coma in the bottom of the boat without boots or dress, but wrapped in a cloak. She, with Stefan, were lifted by those who still remained in the boat, and received into the smack. When the last man was on board a sea lifted the boat, the rope once more parted, and she drifted away. Hot blankets and rugs brought back something of life to the buffeted seafarers. That night they landed safe in Lowestoft.

CHAPTER V.

NINETY-FIVE HAD BEGUN to win fame in her youth. Nature, as if trying to resemble man, had turned her heart to ice. The great frost had set in in earnest. Groups of shivering, ill-clad men and women were crowding round the water companies, missionaries who came to open up in the middle of the streets wells as of living water; for the famine was sore in the houses, and pitchers, jugs, beer-cans poured forth from the doorways to celebrate the advent of the great Moses of the companies, when he came with his magic wand to strike floods from the rock. The parks flitted and twinkled with flying skaters. In the veins of active and healthy and well-to-do folk ran and caroled the vivid blood. But the poor shivered, and moaned, and starved under the inhumanity of heaven, and the unwisdom and pitilessness of earth.

In a low tap-room in Southampton sat two men before a roaring fire, a small table between them bearing glasses and brandy. The room, but for them, was deserted.

“Now, what you mean, hey?” said Ralph Ralloner to the other. “You know it’s — what they call it?— ‘blackmail,’ hey?”

“Yes, yes, guv’nor, I know all about that. But you know it’s murder, hey?” said James Ray, winking brazen-faced at the other man.

“Murder, if you like. Sea-water belongs everybody, s’pose. Drive my own ship on sea, and you call that murder. Call it what like. Well, how much you want?”

“A cool two thousand, per hannum,” said Hay, bringing down a sledgehammer fist on the table.

“Playing jokes, ain’t you?” cried the High-flyer, looking dangerous.

“If you thinks I’m playing jokes, as you call it, you just keep yer two thousand, and I’ll please myself by walking round to the nearest police station. Murdering four hundred people ain’t no jokes, I can tell ye.”

“And you think I am going pay whole rowsing crew o’ you two thousand a year each, do you? Not if my name’s Ralloner.”

“That’s all fudge,” said Ray. “You know as well as I do not a bloomin’ man of them knows anything about it. The lookout man was washed clean overboard by the collision; the cap’n, expecting to be drowned, was lying drunk below decks; the others felt the shock, but when they saw the jibboom and bows stove in, you know very well you told ’em we had run foul of a wreck. So us two are the only ones as knows anythink about it.”

“Dangerous for you!”

“How so?” asked Ray.

Ralloner whipped a small revolver from an inner pocket and pointed it at the seaman’s head. Had James Ray been a coward, had he so much as winced or winked, he would at that moment have been a dead man. He looked, like a bulldog, straight and stout into the eye of the millionaire, and quite coolly said —

“Why don’t you fire, master? Fire away! And I promise you on my Bible oath that within two months from to-night you swing for it.”

The revolver and the hand that held it dropped. At the word “swing” Ralloner turned as pale as paper. The High-flyer was a coward.

“Didn’t mean shoot you, know,” he stammered. “Only want show you I carry revolver, case of need. Always do — here in this inner pocket Always do — all companies. Brave fellow, Ray — must say that — brave; but I’ll do for you yet. Dig your grave yet; see if I don't. Two-thousand, hey? What going to do with it, hey?"

"Just you leave that to me. I've got a fam'ly — two little gels and a mate. And there's a special kind o' Highland whisky which I always said, if I was a rich man, I'd be drunk on all day and every day. Every year one o' them two thousand'll go to keep my gels and their mother at the height o' the fashion, and t'other thousand'll vanish on that whisky. Don't you trouble your head 'bout that!"

"Well, look here, s'pose I say yes?"

"Suppose! there ain't no supposing about the matter. You're goin' to say yes — or swing."

Ralloner shuddered.

"All right — say yes. Drive my own ship on sea-water — still, say yes. And, look here, you know my house in London? Grosvenor Place, know. Well, you come there. Come often as you like. Plenty whisky there. And I make friend of you, Ray. Brave fellow — thought I meant shoot you? Ha! ha! Not a bit. You come to my house; one of my friends; bring wife and children. When a man's got money, like me, does what he likes; don't care what people think. You come to my house; introduce you to lords and dukes. Strike hands!"

Their hands met.

The High-flyer was cunning as well as cowardly.

* * * * *

The next afternoon the Markgraf Stefan was tapping at the door of the St. John-Heygates in Hyde Park Gardens.

As he stood, soon after, in the drawing-room alone, in tripped Ada Macdonald, all whiteness, like a new-risen moon, her black eyes two flames of soft fire, her rich brown face a-tint with the bloom of peaches, and the surging blood of perfect health.

“Ah, pale! pale!” she said, as she held out both her hands to him, and sweetly bore his kiss.

“Pale, am I? I thought by this time I had conquered that weakness.”

“No! Sit down straight away and tell me all about it.” She took his hand. “Ah, my hero! my hero! what a terrible experience it must have been!”

“It is like a dream now that it is over,” he said.

“Tell me about it! Every detail, every point from first to last. I long to hear from your own lips.”

He drew her arm close to his, twining round it, and told her of the collision, and the mystery of his sojourn in the deep, and all the long eternity of the tossing in the boat on the deserted sea, and of his waking up to the bitter-sweet of living, and of the salvation of the trawler.

The dusk fell upon them, and wrapped them round in the dim drawing-room. They were locked together.

“What an ordeal!” she said; “but you say you saw the face of the man who steered the other ship?”

“Yes; I saw him — far more distinctly than I now see you.”

“Then you can describe him to the authorities. I understand that all efforts to trace him have failed, and that large rewards are about to be offered for his arrest. You, my Stefan, can describe him.”

Stefan knit his brows, passing his hand across his hair with a troubled look.

“A most strange thing,” he said, “has happened to me in reference to that man. No! I cannot — I cannot describe him. I tell you I saw the fiend’s face as clearly as the sun — the light of a lamp shone full upon it. But I have ever since been racking my brain in vain to recall his features, his general appearance. It is just as if the swirl of the sea had washed clean out of my brain the compartment in which the memory of the man was stored. It is one of those mysterious tricks of memory for which there is no accounting. I cannot describe him.”

“If you saw him again perhaps—” suggested Ada.

“Ah! then, perhaps.”

“And you can remember nothing whatever definite about him?”

“Nothing — except this, only, that a great red scar ran zig-zag across his face, as when the lightning shoots across a dark sky.”

Ada broke into a ripple of laughter.

“What are you laughing at?” he asked.

Ada threw back her head, and shook with merriment.

“Tell me, what are—”

“Oh,” she cried, “this is too good! Suppose — suppose it was the — High-flyer!”

Stefan, too, began to laugh.

“What makes you say that?” he asked. “Have you never seen him, then? He has just such a scar as you describe.”

“I wish it were he, as punishment to him for daring to be my rival.”

Her fingers tightened in a pressure round his.

“But in this case I fear I shall miss my revenge; for is not the man called High flyer to be at the Yorricks ball? He must very likely be in England, then.”

“Yes,” said Ada; “I believe he is.”

“And, besides, the man with the scar was, as I told you, actually steering the ship. Now, millionaires hardly steer their own yachts, in a storm, in the dark of the morning, do they?”

“And about the stone?” said Ada suddenly.

“Oh! the stone — here it is.”

“Do you think—”

“What?”

“Do you really think now—”

“Tell me?”

“That the stone had anything to do with the loss of the Nelf?”

“My love — no!”

“Oh, if I thought so, Stefan, I should never forgive myself! And yet it is strange, too.”

“It is a little singular, certainly, but—”

“How it laughs and wantons even in the faint light of the dusk!” she said, toying with the great blue egg in her hand. “It will make of me a flitting bit of sky as I dance with it at the ball.”

Stefan sighed and wondered why.

“But,” cried Ada, glancing like a flash of light to ever fresh themes, “what a frost have we! And the whole world is gone a-skating.”

“Is that so?”

“The very royalties on the lake in Buckingham Palace Gardens. The Princess does it with an exquisite finish, you know; it is one of her manifold accomplishments. Yesterday we were at Hendon — such a scene! But the lady ice-gliders mostly lacked a certain — something — which I cannot define. It is an art which few English women attain to the perfection of gracefulness seen, for example, in the Princess, probably on account of the rarity of very hard winters among us. But I understand that your Ada was rather—”

“Admired? Of course you were! It is your destiny.”

“And would you care to skate now? Yes? I love it. You are not too knocked up? Then I’ll go dress!” and she ran from the room.

She returned furred — not too deeply, but just to the annihilating point of wintry suggestiveness. They descended and entered a cab; dined en famille in a private room at a restaurant; and set forth for the Wimbledon Rink.

The night-lights of the streets had long begun to glow in the wintry air, themselves wearing a frigid look. The parched air burned “frore.” People were dying of it. All you had to do was to lie down in it — and you died. Old Thames, casting back his mind to high old bygone jinks, was hardening his bosom for the roasting of yet another ox; the very gulls that haunted the little icebergs on the river seemed to suffer from cold in the head.

“And have you heard the legend of a British jury?” asked Ada in the cab, flowing with animation. “It is wonderful! The cold is breaking up our free institutions! They met for deliberation over a starved old woman, and almost at once discovered that the room was fireless, unbearable. The only thing that did not shiver among them was the corpse, which had done its shivering — previously. They protested. Even coroners, it seems, are human beings, and the coroner admitted a brumal unease. The upshot was that these seekers of truth disbanded, homewards to their babes, leaving the truth to the company of the cold.”

Then, flitting to another subject, “And, oh! Stefan, just think, a million of them out of work. ‘Workless workers,’ we call them. You perceive the ingenuity of the phrase; it is our very own, and of quite modern invention. But for a nation, by its united wisdom and activities, to invent a million of the actual products; ah, that is not well — not well. Just fancy — quite the largest army in Europe, only waiting for its Napoleon to come along, get into communication with them, collect them, drill them, and lead them upon London; and, hey — presto! in the blinking of a cat’s eye you have a despotism in England, or a socialistic republic — and no more private grandeurs — no big-B balls. — no High-flyers—”

She sighed and laughed at the same time.

“And how would you like these changes?”

“I should rather like the Socialism, I think. You know I am a very bad Radical. And I quite intend to convert you when we—”

“Say it.”

“When we are — No! bad luck!”

“And the despotism?”

“Oh! I think I should like that, too — provided I was the Emperor’s Queen.”

He frowned. He had touched on a discord in his Ada’s nature.

They reached the rink, and in five minutes were among the throng of skating couples. Stefan from of old was a skilled ranger, and Ada had acquired all the arts and graces since her school-girl days in far Pomerania. All was motion. The lights of the rink flashed, multiplied a thousandfold in their hurrying eyes, as they forged, and swerved, and skimmed, in delicious harmony of motion, like gulls that sweep, slanting, over the central ocean, wetting an alternate wing in the brine. Ada was all eyes, pointing out, in whispers, anything specially fine in the figure-skating.

“But look at him!” she said suddenly, jerking her head.

A man had appeared among them, thick cloaked, muffled, his face burled in the collar flaps of a great involving coat; a soft wide-brimmed hat over-shading his forehead.

“Only look at him!” she said again.

She seemed to know something about him, something in his figure. His face she could not see.

“But that is the frenzy of skating!” she whispered to Stefan.

The man threw athwart the ice as if ruin and despair were barking at his heels; he went straight; he did not swerve to right or left; fro and to, to and fro, from end to end. The skaters watched for his coming, marked his going, fled when he was near, seized their chance to cross when he was far. Some laughed, others scowled, some stood still, amazed, to look. He was like the spirit of swiftness, the demon of unrest.

“What a strange frenzy—” Ada was just saying, crossing his path as he came, when, with incredible speed and force, the blind Juggernaut collided on them. They fell in a mass, sliding far over the ice. Stefan was instantly on his feet again.

“Oh, my love!” he cried. “I shall break the lunatic’s head—”

But looking about he could see no sign of the man. Other skaters had crowded round and blocked his view; and, in fact, the headlong career of Ralloner once broken, the spell of his furious excitement had also been broken, and he had left the rink. Stefan turned to Ada, and took her hand to raise her. A look of agony was on her face.

“My ankle—” was all she could gasp.

“Not sprained? Oh, do not say sprained!” he cried.

“I will try.” she said bravely, biting her lip and struggling to rise. But she fell again. As he lifted her in his arms and bore her away —

“Ada.” he whispered, “have you — have you — that thing — that stone — on you?”

“In my bosom — hidden — for safety,” she sighed, and fainted.

CHAPTER VI.

THE NIGHT OF the great ball had come, and in the middle of the common world uprose fairyland.

“I will go,” Ada Macdonald had said to Stefan, “if my ankle turn to brittle glass under my weight; and I will wear that stone, if it prove my ruin.”

But it was as a penance that she endured it, not as a pleasure. She sat in the centre state drawing-room till at midnight, three trumpeters, attired in white and scarlet with much gold, blew a fanfare on trumpets, and then she painfully, but with an infinite sad pace, hopped on the arm of Stefan in the long procession to the supper-room.

“You will be certain,” she said to him, “on no account to let my misfortune keep you from the full pleasure you may be able to obtain.”

Her words were stiff and formal, spoken from her throat. They were sitting at one of the many little round and oval tables of which the room was full. In the centre of all, at a larger square table, surrounded by her court, sat the hostess, attired as Marie Antoinette, in rich brocade, and wearing the Yorrick family jewels round her neck as a superb collar, a turquoise velvet cap clasped with jewels on her white coiffure, and a bandeau of family jewels under her cap. Her court mantle was fastened at the shoulders with a tiara of diamonds, widened out so as to clasp the cloak from shoulder to shoulder — a presence so really queenly that, on their first entrance, many of the guests greeted her with an obeisance. All the tables were decorated with flowers, some from the South of France — magnificent orchids; while dishes of strawberries, apricots, grapes and pineapples were in luxurious contrast to the falling snow outside. The room was illuminated with silver candelabra containing wax candles. At every arched door were immense screens of magnificent Beauvais tapestry, while here and there, throughout the room, were huge church-candles in gilded stands, five feet high.

“Who was that girl,” asked Ada, “with whom you danced the last mazurka?”

“The Hon. Lillian Harley. Is she not very, very pretty?”

“Very, very! She was jilted last summer by a guardsman. I hear she is only one remove from a mental imbecile. But perhaps you do not object to that in your partners, provided they are very pretty.”

“You are cross to-night; I can well excuse you. And I left you lonely too long, did I not?”

“Did you? I did not notice.”

Silence fell upon them. They felt as if something, a discrepancy, a cloud, had come between them.

Stefan, to fill an awkward gap, fell to making remarks on the glittering fancy dresses of the guests, all attired in the style of Louis XV. and XVI. He himself wore a rich court dress; the coat of mauve brocade, full skirted and embroidered with gold, the waistcoat of mauve satin embroidered in floral design, knee-breeches of shot mauve and gold, silk stockings, court shoes, powdered hair, lace ruffles, jabot and sword, made up a costume, correct in every particular, of one of Louis XVI.’s courtiers. The whole room glittered like one great sun-illuminated gem, myriad lit.

“There was an old man,” said Ada suddenly, “named Foulon, who said at the beginning of the French Revolution that the people might eat grass when they were hungry. After he was hanged they stuffed his mouth with grass.”

“But apropos of what?” asked Stefan.

“Grass, alas!” she went on, not heeding his question, “was in no way to be got at. The dancing nobles had all the land, and with it the grass. No wonder they danced!”

“You govern your moods badly, Ada.”

“And they danced to the end — only, at the finish it was to a changed tune.”

“But why in heaven’s name all this?” cried Stefan, now thoroughly angry. “Why these irrelevant and unpleasant remarks? Would you not have danced if that ruffian had not sprained your foot?”

“I should, at any rate, not have danced with imbeciles!”

They rose from table, and the guests streamed back to the dancing halls. The suite of rooms led one into the other, so that the vista of magnificent and brilliantly-lighted apartments was superb. Over three thousand wax candles were used, in addition to the electric light, which was made to simulate wax candles. The candles were unshaded, in imitation of the style of the French in the last century.

The great Cedar Drawing-room was used as the central ballroom. It is so called because panelled in cedar, a perfect background for the fine Vandyke family portraits hung around it. The ceiling was white and gold, and there were two large arched windows, in one of which the band was stationed, and they, too, wore a white and gold dress of the period. The room was lighted with five great crystal chandeliers with wax candles, suspended from the ceiling, a high candelabra in each corner of the room, and two smaller ones on each side of the great marble and alabaster mantelpiece. Palms were placed about, and flowers, forming Louis Quinze garlands, were festooned from one point to the other. The principal feature of all was the unshrouded light — it was day at midnight, but a chaster, holier day — the noon of the fairies.

The cloud had grown thick and threatening between Stefan and Ada.

“By the way,” he said, as they passed out from supper, “how of — what’s his name — Ralloner, the High-flyer? He was to have been here.”

“I am sorry to say he is not,” she answered.

“You — sorry!”

“Yes, even very sorry. He would at least have had patience with a poor cripple.”

“I can hardly guess for whom your reproach is intended,” he said haughtily.

He deposited her on a couch in the shadow of the recess of the great arch window, the fellow to the one in which the band was just finishing the waltz they had played all through the supper.

“But, talking of this man Ralloner,” said Stefan, standing beside her, “do you know, I have had a thought? From his character, as I have heard it, I should not be surprised if he were the man to whom you owe your inability to dance to-night.”

“You mistake the man,” she said. “He is wild — but, at any rate, a gentleman.”

“He! why, you called him a ruffian yourself a few days since!”

“I like him very, very much indeed!”

He bowed low.

“I know your tastes are always excellent.”

“Hence my connection with you,” she said venomously.

He bowed, and added —

“You are very kind.”

“I may tell you, however,” she went on, noticing his pique, and seeking to increase it, “that I quite certainly do not owe my sprain to the gentleman you allude to. Mr. Ralloner, I have heard, on all occasions chooses to wear a thin coat of a peculiar pattern, and has never at any time been known to put on an overcoat. It is his whim, an outcome of his individuality. But the man who collided with me at the rink was, as you saw, closely muffled up.”

“Then I was wrong. But now I must leave you—”

“Oh, certainly!”

“I really mean ‘must!’ you know. You see the Chinese Ambassador yonder talking to the Austro-Hungarian Minister? Does he not look wonderfully out of place at a Louis XVI. function? Well, the ball to-night was a rendezvous between us for a long talk. You know I leave for China in a few days—”

“Oh, pray, no excuses. Go, go. Someone will come and talk to me.”

But, somehow, she sat long solitary in the shade. The wonderful gem she wore shone at her forehead enclosed in a chaplet of gold. It shed all over her a blue shimmering light. The Yorrick ball was an incrustation of jewels, galaxy flashing to galaxy, but among them all was not one that compared in massiveness and limpid glory with the Rajah’s Sapphire. And yet the wearer sat lonely, sad, crippled, washed in her blue bath of light, regretting her presence. She was dressed as the Duchess of Polignac, the friend of Marie Antoinette, in a gown of white satin, the under-skirt full, and embroidered, all round with gold, turquoise, amethyst, topaz, and brilliant jewellery. The upper skirt was caught back with pale blue, similarly embroidered. She wore her hair high and poudree, and, besides the Rajah’s stone, had magnificent diamond and turquoise ornaments. She was loveliness itself to see, and her nightly eyes, flashing scorn and anger, outshone all jewels whatever. But it was a long hour before a young attache of the French Embassy, noticing her loneliness, came and sat by her.

Stefan, as he moved away, was met by an old friend, Lord Pierrepont, with whom for a moment he stood conversing.

“I hear you are off to China,” said Lord Pierrepont.

“In a few days, as ill luck would have it.”

“A bad ducking that of yours in the North Sea. Whatever made you come by that route?”

“Ill-luck again. The same luck that drove a mad captain to cross my path just in the nick of time.”

“He must be as great a Juggernaut,” said Lord Pierrepont, laughing, “as my friend — what’s his name? — Ralloner.”

“You know him, then?”

“Don’t you? Ah, you should, You nave not seen humanity in its sublimity till you have seen Ralloner. The last I heard from him was a pressing invitation to ‘see sea water boil like kettle, see sea-water skip like mad.’ But I didn’t, as we say, tumble to the idea.”

“Indeed! Where was he going?”

“To Norway. I think he was to touch at Aberdeen, by the way.”

Stefan turned pale.

“By heaven!—” He stopped; then he eagerly asked —

“When — when was that?”

“That was — let me see — about the 29th or 30th Of January.”

Stefan’s heart throbbed. The Nelf had foundered just three or four days later.

“Are you sure?” he asked. “Did he really sail?”

“Yes; I am sure. But for some reason or other, he never completed his voyage, for he is now, I believe, in London. But why so much interest?”

“Oh! nothing, nothing,” said Stefan. But as he turned away to seek the Chinese Ambassador, he said to himself —

“My first business when I return to London to-morrow will be to seek out that man and, at any price — by hook or by crook — to see his face.”

CHAPTER VII.

THE CHINESE AMBASSADOR, who looked like a saffron-flower in the middle of a garden of roses, had taken his seat in the recess of an alcove with Stefan. Here the white glamor of the candle-light came more subdued. At every second, as they talked, the whiz and wind of a waltzing couple swept dose by them.

“You see my position,” Stefan was saying; “I go to China with the avowed object of peace-making. And, of course, if I have your representations of the view taken by the European Powers of the situation, my influence at headquarters in China will be by so much increased.”

“And what is that view, sir?” asked the Ambassador.

“Oh, that you know as well as I. It is that the struggle is a hopeless one for China.”

“That is not my view, however.”

“Quite so, quite so. I only say it is the view of Europe, and it is, further, our view that if Wei-hai-wei falls — as fall it must, sooner or later — the difficulty of keeping the conquerors from the gates of Peking will be enormously increased, and the partition of the Chinese Empire heave in sight.”

“Poh! Poh! but Wei-hai-wei won’t fall.”

“Port Arthur fell.”

“Ah! another matter if it be true. Here you have strong land garrisons, splendid fleet in Wei-hai-wei Harbor, Admiral Ting commanding, great man, grand man, soon drive the Wojin back to their own country. Don't you believe newspaper talk."

"Still, facts are facts, and the men of the peaked caps are quite certainly no imbeciles. Allow me to recall to you in outline the course of events so far. By a really masterly strategy the Japanese have contrived to hem in the greater part of your fleet in the port, and are now keeping watch at the harbor mouths — as you are aware, there are two — cutting off escape from the entrapped ships. With consummate skill they had already manoeuvred a land force to the neighborhood of Wei-hai-wei, and, when all was ready, drew a cordon of men and guns landward of the place and commenced a cannonade, having, with infinite toil, dragged the siege pieces into position over the wintry roads. Their land batteries thereupon, uniting efforts with the fleet, shelled the Chinese out of every open spot, and have already captured three large forts; nor is the fate of the Island Lin-Kung-Tan, at the mouth of the harbor, any longer in doubt. All this is real fact; and I mean to say that the men who have done it are not very easily driven back."

The Chinese Minister first sighed, then immediately looked at Stefan with a light hearted smile.

"Poh! we think nothing of them over yonder. They are what you call savages; but what terms of peace will you propose in Germany's name?"

"Well, you know," said Stefan, "Count Ito, the Japanese Prime Minister, is on the point of receiving a peace embassy from Peking, and the terms he then dictates will be a basis on which future negotiations may go forward. Of course, if Wei-hai-wei falls, that practically finishes the war, for even if any of the imprisoned Chinese ironclads escape, there is no longer any refuge whither they can betake themselves. Mukden can be seized almost with the trouble of marching upon it, and with the first warmth of spring the united land and sea forces can move on to the end of the Gulf of Pe-chi-li, and occupy Peking itself. This being so, it is clear that any terms of peace must involve compensation for the prodigious exertions put forth by the victor. Japan will demand, too, the undisturbed protectorate of Corea, the cause of the war; a commercial treaty giving freedom and favor to her goods, payment for the expenses of the war, as well as an indemnity of, say, fifty or sixty millions in money; and Port Arthur and Wei-hai-wei will doubtless be held as security, as well as the Island of Formosa. These, I think, will be the minimum demands of the peaked caps."

"Peaked caps!" laughed the Minister. "He! he! he! Peaked caps!"

But at that moment a Louis XVI liveryman, attired in cream and crimson satin, was seen to dodge his way among the now hushed and fast-hurrying dancers. He bore in his hand a golden plate, and having spied the recess in which the two diplomats conversed, steered his way skilfully towards it, and presented to them the plate. On it were two dispatches — one for Stefan; one for the Ambassador. They tore them open.

"These have come by special train, I am told," said the waiter.

"Wei-hai-wei fallen! Wei-hai-wei fallen!" screamed the Chinaman. "Oh, it can't be true! Don't believe! don't believe!"

"It is too true!" said Stefan. "This of mine is from headquarters in London. I am ordered to hurry instantly to Brindisi to catch the P. and O. boat which has already left England. 'Peace at any price' are my instructions. I must leave instantly."

He hurried straight to Ada Macdonald. She still sat with the young attache, flirting desperately, an ill-humor raging in her, her eyes a-flame with animation.

"Ada — excuse me, please — I am ordered instantly to China. Can you give me five — ?"

"Really? So sorry! Good-bye." She held out her hand with a smile.

“But — we cannot part like — this! — for many months — Ada!”

“Don’t you see I am engaged?” she asked, arching high her black brows.

He took her hand. His eye fell on the sapphire blazing on her lit brow. He was gone. It was the virtual breaking-off of their engagement.

As he stood on the departure platform at Victoria the next day, he saw the placard offering an immense reward for the capture of the ship which had run down the Nelf and for the arrest of her unknown captain; and he thought with bitterness that his chance of seeing the face of Ralloner was gone — perhaps for ever.

CHAPTER VIII.

SOME MONTHS PASSED. At the moment when Stefan von Reutlingen was stepping on board the steamer at Dover, en route for China, Ada Macdonald was lying half-way across a bed in London, sobbing, tearing to pieces her headlong humor at the ball, cursing her childish caprice. Surely some power outside of herself had possessed her! But through all those months pride kept her from writing a line to Stefan; and he, busied with many things in China, waited and waited, I hoping against hope, for a letter, thinking that she would repent and relent, and write him. The first step, he thought, was surely due from her, and he had been careful to leave an address at the St. John-Heygates. But he waited in vain. Fate had come between them.

One night, about a couple of months after the ball, two men stepped from a house in Grosvenor Place. One was drunk — tottering and blind; he leaned heavily on the other, who led and supported him. That special brand of Highland whisky which James Bay loved had lately flowed like a river for him; he had but to stoop and drink freely of that water of life. (Is not brandy, of all things, I an eau de vie across the Channel? Monsieur's views of "life" not being altogether identical with those of St. John.) Ray had freely accepted Ralloner's invitation to visit him often. The two formed excellent companions. Ralloner opened the sluices of the river of life; Ray stooped and drank. They sat together in a small high room of the great mansion, and drank till the cock crew or till Ray slipped in a heap beneath the table. Ray could tell excellent sea stories when he had the use of his tongue. Ralloner liked to sit and hear sea stories.

“Brave f’low, Ray — must say,” he said of ten.

“I likes you, Mis’r Ral’ner, likes you!” hiccoughed Ray. “No hang’d psalm singing ‘bout you.”

One day, after a month, Ray discovered that two thousand a year would be altogether insufficient for his growing needs, and mildly hinted as much. Ralloner looked hard at him for a minute, and then said —

“All right — make it three thousand. That suit you?”

Ray was delighted. That night, as they drank together, he kept repeating —

“Likes you, Mis’r Ral’ner, likes you.” Soon after this Ralloner did a singular thing. A tumble-down house in one of the vilest slums of Whitechapel was for sale, and Ralloner bought it. Through all his life he had hardly ever glanced at a newspaper; quite lately he had taken to rushing through every newspaper he came across, and, in one of these, he had come at last upon what he sought: At No. 11 Fry Alley, Whitechapel, said the paper, a family had died within two days — a whole family — of galloping small pox. The house had been cleaned out by the scourge; it lay empty, condemned, infected — a death-trap. Ralloner read no more papers after this; he made inquiries, dived into the office of an estate agent, saw that the vile property was for sale at any price, and bought it on the spot. He went about with the front door key in his pocket, and sat and heard James Ray say, “I likes you, Mis’r Ral’ner — likes you.”

It was a dark windy night and verging on towards morning. The two men jerked and stumbled a little way from the house in Grosvenor Place, and then, a lucky cab coming within hailing distance, Ralloner plumped Ray into it and followed. He gave the address of the alley in Whitechapel, and told the man to drive like mad.

Ray lay back on the cushions of the cab helpless, paralysed. Presently he woke up for a moment and grunted in his throat, feeling the motion.

“Where ‘m I?”

“Going home.” said Ralloner.

“Home. Ha! Ha! Tha’as goot!” spluttered Ray. “Pass whisky.”

The cab dashed through the city. “Where ‘m I?” asked Ray, waking up again. “Near home,” said Ralloner. The cab drew up at the entrance of an extremely foul and narrow and dark alley. Ralloner dragged out Ray and paid the man. In a few minutes the two stood before the door of No. 11.

“This not my home,” said Ray. “Wha’a’s this?”

“In you tumble,” answered Ralloner.

“No tricks, mas’r, I hope?”

“In you jump. There’s a truckle-bed on second floor.”

He pushed the drunkard in, slammed the door, and locked it. Then turned and walked with the swiftness of an ostrich westward.

When James Ray next passed from that house he was borne in a plain board coffin, and his corruption was already many days old. The name of the mysterious victim of smallpox was unknown, for his face was unrecognisable.

* * * * *

Time passed, and found the High-flyer in agitation. If you are one of those who hunt for “new sensations,” go and murder 400 people and see, how you feel after it. That is very “new” indeed when you are unaccustomed to it. It tends to agitate the mind, and if your mind was in a high state of agitation beforehand, as was the bubbling mind of the High-flyer, then, after the incident of the 400, you get a perfect tornado of agitation, agitation in the frantic spinning-top state — the maelstrom state. As the months went on,

Ralloner was certainly mad. The hereditary diseases in his blood took deeper root. The “Caecarism,” arising from his unlimited wealth, broke all bounds within him. While James Ray lived there had been a fetter on him, and this had acted as a healthy check upon the development of the peculiar kind of insanity which his millions had produced in him. But now he was free. Ray was dead, and his fears of “swinging” were gone; the only eyes whose evidence could convict him of any connection with the collision were shut. The cheek was removed. His free limbs ran, and leapt, and danced. He could defy everything. His little, strange, diseased mind was by nature profoundly superstitious; nobody had been enabled to induce Ralloner to pass under a ladder or sit thirteenth at table. But now, if he spied a ladder in the distance, he made a rush for it and passed under it again and again, till a crowd gathered round him. He began giving small dinners, and always invited twelve others, so that he might be the thirteenth.

“Charlie,” he said to Lord Pierrepont, “I kill superstition out of this world for good and all, see if don’t!”

“That’s right, Ralloner,” said Lord Pierre point; “go for it! kill it! Only what is superstition?”

“What is?” answered the High-flyer. “Why, thirteenth at table, conscience — that’s superstition. No more of that! Don’t leave it a leg to stand on — kill it dead as nail!”

Someone told him of an old palace among the mountains of Bohemia in which it was said no person had ever lived for more than three weeks, because, at the end of that time, a figure clothed in black appeared before him, lifted its veil, and the sight of the horror of that face was such that no mortal could live an hour after beholding it. The High-flyer raced across Europe, purchased the palace for many thousands of pounds, and, with a heart racked with terrors, slept in the house for just four weeks. He returned to England mad with his triumph. Superstition was dead as nail.

But — how had he forgotten the Rajah's Sapphire? That, that he must have, if it cost him his fortune. Superstition was not quite dead until that had been tried and tested. He had heard the fame of the stone, but had clean forgotten it. Now he remembered with a vengeance. Madness seized strongly upon him. He had just returned from his victory among the mountains of Bohemia. The Rajah's Sapphire! All his labors were useless without the possession of that. And Caesar swore that he would possess it, or burn Rome and the world.

The next day an agent waited upon Ada Macdonald, who was then in London. He made a fabulous offer for the jewel, but did not mention the name of Ralloner. Gladly would Ada have been rid of it, quite apart from her love for money. But family pride restrained her; the sapphire was a Macdonald heirloom. Her answer was that on no possible consideration would she part with the gem.

"I'll have it! I'll have it!" cried Ralloner, when the agent brought him the answer, "if I have to marry the girl for it!" And then he remembered with joy that he had once before, in a mad whim, gone on his knee before her. Good! That was all in his favor. She would take it as a proof that he was really fond of her.

He visited Ada, put on extraordinary society manners, and passionately proposed. She smiled on him, not unkindly, and refused. How she hoped and hoped but for one line from Stefan — one line to help her pride to write for his forgiveness! The line did not come. Caesar, not to be balked, invested the not very strong fortress with all his fiery forces, battering-ram, and catapult, and Ada yielded.

CHAPTER IX.

THE MARKGRAF STEFAN returned to Berlin in about a year to receive high promotion in the diplomatic service, and distinguished compliments from the Emperor William. He was immediately dispatched on a new and important mission to Washington, and having accomplished this, he travelled to New York, and prepared to return to Europe.

It was two days before his intended departure that, as he was leaving the offices of the Consul, that gentleman said to him: "Oh, by the way, I suppose you have not many engagements in this strange city, and there is to be a great social function to-night given by a new married couple, at which you may care to be present. I am au courant at the house, and can invite you. Will you come? It is at No. 215 Fifth Avenue."

Stefan had many matters of business to see to that day, and was rather pressed for time. So he hurriedly said —

"Thank you; I shall be delighted, if I can come;" and at once went out into the street.

Thus it was that when he reached the brilliantly-lit mansion at about 10 o'clock, he remembered that he had forgotten to inquire the name of his newly-wed host and hostess. The alabaster stairs up which he struggled were crowded with decollette ladies burning with the diamonds with which the Americans load their woman-kind, and with black coated gentlemen, all shirt-front and watch-chain. The balustrades of the wide white steps were of porphyry; and pink-shaded lamps threw a halo, as of soft moons, round the palms and tree-ferns of the hall and conservatory. Some of the guests wore plain evening-dress, but most were in fancy-ball costume. Exclamations, laughter, and waltz-music floated through the air. The crush of fashionable humanity was really alarming. Above, a series of lofty-lit halls opened one into the other, giving a panorama of the assembly from end to end. Heads, heads, half-bare bosoms, black coats every where! The rooms received upon their bright delicate summer hangings and curtains of fine gauze the strange variegated illumination of innumerable Chinese, Moorish, Persian, and Japanese lanterns, some made of perforated tin, cut into ogives like mosque doors, others of colored paper resembling fruits; and great, swift-darting, bluish jets of electric light would, all in a moment, cast pallor over these thousands of other lights and, as it were, the full moon's frosty radiance over faces and bare shoulders, over the whole phantasmagoria of feathers, fabrics, bows, and ribbons, crushing each other in the dance or ranked tier upon tier on the broad staircase. From where Stefan managed to squeeze to a seat under a verandah-like gallery he was able to gaze out upon this sight through a network of green bushes and flowering creepers, which blended with the gay scene and formed a frame for it.

He sat lonely among the greenery for a long time before he was joined by a stranger in the dress of Russian monk. Being alone together they entered into friendly conversation.

"This is surely a very splendid function," said Stefan.

"All the elite of New York society are here. MacAlister himself, I understand."

"Ah! I have heard of him; he is the acknowledged pacemaker and lookout society man in New York, is he not?"

"He is. When he dies nothing will be left worth living for. After him, in fact, the deluge."

“I have for some time,” said Stefan suddenly, “been noticing a peculiar movement in the crowd. It is like the setting in of a current in the sea. They seem to be all moving and pressing in one direction.”

“I can explain that,” said the other, “it has been announced that the host is going to make a speech in the hall at the far end of the suite of rooms, and the crowd is moving forward to that end.”

“A speech!” cried Stefan. “A speech! Is this, then, a ball or a lecture hall?”

“It is very absurd, certainly,” said the stranger; “but our host, as you may know, is no ordinary mortal. He has his little whims, and nobody resents the whims of a millionaire. Besides, in this country, we are never very much opposed to novelties. He has, it seems, some announcement to make to his guests.”

“Of what nature?”

“Ah! that I do not know. Something strange, you may bet.”

“At what hour is the ceremony of the speech to come off?”

“Sharp at midnight, before supper.”

“It is close on that now,” said Stefan. “Shall not we, too, join the procession?”

“Certainly, if you will.”

They rose, passed through the shrubbery, and walked together into the ballroom. The tide of moving humanity was very slow. The rooms behind them were already nearly deserted, and those in front were well thronged with the advancing phalanx of the company. Laughter, too loud to partake of Vere de Vere repose, cries of every cadence, remarks on the novelty of the occasion, rose like a mist of sound above the sea of heads. Fans were flung out, and began to flutter like a hundred butterfly wings. Gradually the press became uncomfortable, and some few of the ladies only saved themselves from fainting by beating a difficult retreat, and thus momentarily checking the flow of the progressive current. Herded in this way into a compact mass of life, all covered with brilliant jewels, the company presented the appearance, under the myriad lanterns and the occasional blue flash of the electric light, of a wide coruscation of dazzling refulgence.

Stefan found himself at last in the middle of the last hall. At its end was a raised dais, on which stood two thrones of what looked like solid gold. The speaker had already begun, but Stefan had no ears, no eyes for him. His whole wild gaze was fixed with infinite surprise on the woman who sat on one of the thrones. The other was empty, for the speaker had risen and was talking, standing on the dais.

Stefan gazed — his eyes starting from their sockets. There she sat — Ada — his own — in the very dress she had worn at the Yorrick Ball a year before. A dream — and yet no dream. There she sat, lovely as light, glorious as dawn, before him, throned a queen — but the queen of another king. And who was he? He had not long to wait for the answer, for the speaker, lifting his voice to a high falsetto pitch, at that moment compelled him to tear his eyes from the dear dark face they had been resting upon. Stefan looked at the man and saw him holding up to the light, between his finger and thumb, a vast blue jewel, which winked and rayed under the light, like one of the gems from the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem.

“Yes, friends,” cried the speaker in the shrill eager voice of a man frantic with excitement. “Yes, friends — here it is — the Rajah’s Sapphire. This is stone that brings bad luck everybody soon as they touch it. Why don’t it bring bad luck me? Can’t! that’s truth of matter. I get married, have it in my pocket — nothing happens; ring not lost, parson there with white surplice, everything right as beans; cross Atlantic with my wife, have it in my pocket; there's a chance for stone! nothing happens! — sea-water calm as water in a bath. Stone can't — that's what's the matter! Superstition's dead as nail. Stone's a sham — a sham, tell you! I have digged grave of superstition, I, Ralph Ralloner — not left it leg stand on. And with superstition dead 'n' buried, away goes everything. Some of you p'raps inclined to b'lieve in Bible; well, look up at this stone, this sham—”

But the lecturer got no farther. There was a commotion in the crowd. A man was urging, and forcing, and elbowing his way forward with a pallid face and wild eyes through the serried ranks. It was Stefan. At the moment when he had turned his eyes on Ralloner for the first time, a spasm seemed to convulse his breast. He had staggered, and passed his hand slowly across his brow; and with the action, it seemed as if he had drawn a film away from before the eyes of memory. Once more, with utter distinctness, he saw the lurid-lit face of the man who steered the Treaty into the vitals of the Nelf; and with the sight, reason forsook him, and a horrid impulse to fly at the throat of the fiend and tug and tear at the life in his windpipe possessed him. He dashed forward, wild rage urging him rapidly through the crowd: a buzz arose, a turmoil, stifled cries from all sides; but when Stefan had reached a point of some few paces from the dais, he raised his right arm, pointing with his forefinger straight at Ralloner, and his voice rang out thrilling as a clarion, silencing the tumult of the crowd:

“I charge that man with being the murderer of four hundred people; the wrecker of the Nelf; and the man for whose arrest a reward is now offered throughout Europe.” There was a dead silence. Ralloner had staggered backward. His face worked horribly like the face of a man in a fit; he was trying to speak, but the struggling words stuck rasping in his throat. The Rajah's Sapphire was still in his hand.

Suddenly he stiffened straight with a jerk, and took a step forward. At last words came.

“So,” he hissed, “so I swing, do I? But you die with me, tell you!”

And so saying, he whipped out a revolver, which, as he had once told James Ray, he always carried with him, and pointed it at the head of Stefan. But at the moment when he fired Ada Macdonald had leapt from her seat on the throne, and struck his hand a blow; the shot swerved and entered the breast of a lady, who instantly fell. A yell of rage and execration rose from the whole company. But Ralloner heard it with ears already half dead; for on realising this fresh, crime of his hand, he had turned the weapon against himself. Simultaneously with the crack of the report, and the thud of his fall, there rang forth a solitary scream above the tumult of the shouting company. It came from the throat of Ada. Then she fell fainting on the bosom of Stefan. In the dead hand of Ralloner was still grasped the Rajah’s Sapphire.

* * * * *

Yet a year, and they meet once — Ada and Stefan. It was on board a dainty little steamer that plies her brisk way between Naples and Syracuse. It was only necessary for them to be near in order to flow together again like two dewdrops on the same petal. Ada had saved his life, and he did, not require this proof of her love for him to make him love her. To her he had never wavered, nor, at bottom, had she to him. And now sadness had made her wiser, firmer, clearer. Their coming together was quite simple. They sat in a deserted nook of the cabin as the little vessel neared Naples Harbor. Her hand fell to his; their lips met. And with this there flashed upon her the full realisation of how much more precious is the gold of a little vein of simple love in a human heart than millions of rubies, heaped in a casket of pearl.

“But, darling,” he said, “that stone. We must not keep it. Where is it now?”

“The sapphire? It has been cut up by the jewellers into at least fifty small bits, which are being sold to the London public one by one.”

THE END

The Yellow Danger (1898)

The Yellow Danger was first published in serial form under the title The Empress of the Earth: The Tale of the Yellow War, in the magazine Short Stories between 5 February and 18 June 1898. Shiel had been contracted to write the novel by Peter Keary at the behest of Sir Cyril Arthur Pearson, the publisher and founder of The Express newspaper. The version of the novel that would appear in book form was highly edited and much shorter than the one hundred and fifty thousand word magazine copy. It was released in July 1898 and proved to be a huge commercial success, running to multiple editions during the author's lifetime.

The Yellow Danger is reflective of the late nineteenth century racially prejudiced ideology of the European imperial powers towards China, Japan and other East Asian countries. France, Germany, Russia and Britain were embroiled in an increasingly intensified fight for imperial influence and dominance in China. They feared a formidable Sino-Japanese military alliance might arise, threatening their power. A recurring theme of this period, which would be deemed as racist and xenophobic today, explored the concept of Western white-majority countries being overrun by the racial 'Other'; Shiel was quick to capitalise on the market for such scaremongering literature. In The Yellow Danger, he plays upon British fears, reflecting on their declining influence in China, while crafting a narrative that draws on the racist discourse of rampaging hordes, overthrowing and subjugating European countries.

The Yellow Danger was Shiel's most successful book during his lifetime, going through numerous editions, particularly when the Boxer Rebellion of 1899-1901 seemed to confirm his fictional portrayal of Chinese hostility to the West. In truth, Shiel himself considered the novel hackwork and was even embarrassed by its success. Nonetheless, it was an influential work with other prominent authors, most notably with H. G. Wells in The War in the Air (1908) and with Jack London in The Unparalleled Invasion (1910).

The first edition

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I. THE NATIONS AND A MAN

CHAPTER II. THE HEATHEN CHINEE

CHAPTER III. RUMOURS OF WAR

CHAPTER IV. FIRST BLOOD

CHAPTER V. HOW ENGLAND TOOK THE NEWS

CHAPTER VI. HARDY

CHAPTER VII. IN THE CHANNEL

CHAPTER VIII. THE BATTLE

CHAPTER IX. JOHN HARDY GIVES AN ORDER

CHAPTER X. JOHN HARDY AMONG WOMEN

CHAPTER XI. JOHN HARDY AMONG THE NATIONS

CHAPTER XII. THE AWAKENING

CHAPTER XIII. JOHN AND YEN

CHAPTER XIV. THE VANISHED FLEET

CHAPTER XV. THE SUICIDE OF EUROPE

CHAPTER XVI. THE LOVE WHICH FOO-CHEE BORE TO AH-LIN

CHAPTER XVII. THE CHINESE IRON

CHAPTER XVIII. SIN-WAN

CHAPTER XIX. 'THE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY'

CHAPTER XX. 'WHAT A FACE!'

CHAPTER XXI. MURRAY'S DIARY

CHAPTER XXII. MURRAY'S DIARY (CONTINUED)

CHAPTER XXIII. THE FROWN OF ENGLAND

CHAPTER XXIV. BEFORE THE BATTLE

CHAPTER XXV. THE GREATER WATERLOO

CHAPTER XXVI. THE YELLOW DANGER

CHAPTER XXVII. THE THREE GOSPELS

CHAPTER XXVIII. THE YELLOW TERROR

CHAPTER XXIX. THE WEAK POINT

CHAPTER XXX. THE CHINESE SCREAM

CHAPTER XXXI. THE MEETING

CHAPTER XXXII. 'TO-DAY'

CHAPTER XXXIII. THE 'CRIME' OF HARDY

CHAPTER XXXIV. THE BLACK SPOT

THE YELLOW DANGER

BY

M. P. SHIEL

AUTHOR OF 'THE MAN-STEALERS,' 'PRINCE ZALESKI,' ETC.

BREVIS ESSE LABORE !

Menius, Horace and Gibbon.

London

GRANT RICHARDS

9 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

1898

The first edition's title page

CHAPTER I. THE NATIONS AND A MAN

AS ALL THE world knows, the Children's Ball of the Lady Mayoress takes place yearly on the night of 'Twelfth Day,' 6th January. In the year '98 the function was even more successful than usual, owing to Sir Henry Burdett's fine idea that the children should be photographed in support of the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund. The little Walter Raleighs, Amy Robsarts, flocked in throngs to the photographer's studio adjoining the grand salon of the Mansion House; while all that space outside between the Mansion House, the Bank, and the Stock Exchange was a mere mass of waiting, arriving, and departing vehicles.

If anything tended to take a little of their exuberance from this and other New Year jublations, it was a certain cloudiness in the political sky; nothing very terrifying; yet something so real, that nearly every one felt it with disquiet. An Irish member, celebrated for his 'bulls,' was heard to say: 'Take my word for it, there's going to be a sunset in the East.' Men strolled into their clubs, and, with or without a yawn, said: 'Is there going to be a row, then?' Some one might answer: 'Not a bit of it; it'll pass off presently, you'll see.' But another would be sure to add: 'Things are looking black enough, all the same.'

It was just as when, on a clear day at sea, low and jagged edges of disconnected clouds appear inkily on the horizon-edge, and no one is quite certain whether or not they will meet, and overwhelm the sky, and sink the ship.

But the horizon had hardly darkened, when, again, it cleared.

The principal cause of fear had been what had looked uncommonly like a conspiracy of the three great Continental Powers to oust England from predominance in the East. First there was the seizure of Kiao-Chau, the bombastic farewells of the German Royal brothers; then immediately, the aggressive attitude of Russia at Port Arthur; then immediately, the rumour that France had seized Hainan, was sending an expedition to Yun-nan, and had ships in Hoi-How harbour.

All this had the look of concert; for within the last few years it had got to be more and more recognised by the British public that centuries of neighbourhood had fostered among the Continental nations a certain spirit of kinship, in which the Island-Kingdom was no sharer.

In the course of years the Straits of Dover had widened into an ocean. Europe had receded from Britain, and Britain, in her pride, had drawn back from Europe. From the curl of the moustache, to the colour and cut of the evening-dress, to the manner in which women held up their skirts, there was similarity between French and German, between German and Russian and Austrian, and dissimilarity between all these and English.

It is true that the Russian hated the German, and the German the Russian and the French; but their hatred was the hatred of brothers, always ready to combine against the outsider. This had been begun to be suspected, then recognised, by the British nation. Alone and friendless must England tread the wine-press of modern history, solitary in her majesty; and if ever an attempt were made to stop her stately progress, she was prepared to find that her foe was the rest of Europe.

But very soon after the unrest had arisen, it began to subside. France denied the annexation of Hainan; the semiofficial Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, inspired by Wilhelm, painted Germany as the patron of commerce, with an amiable weakness for theatrical displays; Russia was defeated in the matter of the removal of Mr. MacLeavy Brown, and seemed sufficiently limp after it; while spirits were raised by the probable guarantee of a Chinese loan by the British Government.

But meanwhile, at the children's ball at the Mansion House, events were working in a quite different direction from that of peaceful settlement.

Ada Seward was the presiding deity in the nursery of Mrs. Pattison of Fulham. On the night of the 6th, Dr. and Mrs. Pattison had to be present at a ball in the West End, and Ada on that night was busy; for it was necessary for her, first of all, to convey Master Johnnie Pattison, costumed as Francis I., to the Mansion House; and then to hurry homeward again to take Miss Nellie Pattison to a children's evening with charades in South Kensington.

The fact that it was wet when she reached the Mansion House may have had something to do with her troubles. The landing-place was occupied by some other carriages, and dismounting with her charge, an umbrella over him, she cried to the coachman in a hurried manner through the drizzle:

‘Wait till I come back.’

The man afterwards declared that he understood her to say:

‘Go away, and come back.’

At any rate, when Ada again came forth into the crush to look for the Pattison brougham, it was nowhere to be found.

And now her lips went up in a pout of vexation. ‘What on earth is any one to do now?’ she said. She was pressed for time, and yet at a loss.

The throng of private carriages seemed to have banished all cabs from the region of the Mansion House. She looked and saw none; then into her pocket, and found only sixpence. These two circumstances decided her against the cab. Instead, she ran a few yards, dodging among the carriages, and at the entrance to Poultry, skipped into a moving ‘bus.

She sat in a corner for five minutes, with agonised glances out of the door at the slowly receding clocks. Then some one — a man sitting nearly opposite, whom she had not noticed — addressed her:

‘Why, Miss Ada, is that you?’

‘Oh!’ she cried, ‘Mr. Brabant, is that you? It’s a long time since — how are you?’

‘Well, I’m pretty fair, Miss Ada, as times go, you know. Hope you are the same.’

‘Still in the army?’

‘Oh yes — the Duke of Cambridge’s Own, you know. You living in London now?’

‘Yes — at Fulham.’

Here conversation flagged; and in that minute’s interval, Brabant, with a sudden half-turn to his left, said:

‘Just allow me to introduce you to my friend here — Miss Seward — Dr. Yen How.’

In the light of the ‘bus lamp Ada Seward saw a very small man, dressed in European clothes, yet a man whom she at once took to be Chinese. With a wrinkled grin, he put out his hand and shook hers.

He was a man of remarkable visage. When his hat was off, one saw that he was nearly bald, and that his expanse of brow was majestic. There was something brooding, meditative, in the meaning of his long eyes; and there was a brown, and dark, and specially dirty shade in the yellow tan of his skin.

He was not really a Chinaman — or rather, he was that, and more. He was the son of a Japanese father by a Chinese woman. He combined these antagonistic races in one man. In Dr. Yen How was the East.

He was of noble feudal descent, and at Tokio, but for his Chinese blood, would have been styled Count. Not that the admixture of blood was very visible in his appearance; in China he passed for a Chinese, and in Japan for a Jap.

If ever man was cosmopolitan, that man was Dr. Yen How. No European could be more familiar with the minutiae of Western civilisation. His degree of doctor he had obtained at the University of Heidelberg; for years he had practised as a specialist in the diseases of women and children at San Francisco.

He possessed an income of a thousand tael (about £300) from a tea-farm; but his life had been passed in the practice of the grinding industry of a slave. Nothing equalled his assiduity, his minuteness, his attention to detail. He had once written to the Royal Observatory at the Cape pointing out a trifling error in a long logarithmic calculation of the declension of one of the moons of Jupiter, originating from the observatory.

In the East he could have climbed at once to the very top of the tree — even in the West, had he chosen. But he chose to lie low, remaining unnoticed, studying, observing, making of himself an epitome of the West, as he was an embodiment of the East.

In whatever country he happened to be — and he was never for many years in any one — he was most often to be found in the company of people of the lower classes; and of these he had a very intimate knowledge. So great was his mental breadth, that he was unable to sympathise with either Eastern or Western distinctions of class and rank. He often struck up chance friendships with soldiers and sailors about the capitals of Europe; and these patronised and exhibited him here and there.

Yen How knew that he was being patronised, and submitted to it — and smiled meekly. In reality, he cherished a secret and bitter aversion to the white race.

He had two defects — his shortness of sight, which caused him to wear spectacles; and his inability, in speaking without effort, to pronounce the word ‘little.’ He still called it ‘lillee.’

On that date of 6th January, when he drove westward with Brabant and Ada Seward, he was perhaps forty years of age, but seemed anything between sixteen and sixty; a hard, omniscient, cosmopolitan little man, tough as oak, dry as chips.

Yet in that head were leavening some big thoughts; and his heart was capable of tremendous passions.

In reality, could one have known it, as he fared onward through the drizzle in the trundling ‘bus, smiling behind his spectacles, he was the most important personage in London, or perhaps in the world.

Dr. Yen How was capable of anything. In him was the Stoic, and the cynic, and the tiger; with a turn of the mind he could become a savant or a statesman, or a crossing-sweeper, or a general. He possessed this excellence: a clear brain.

By one of those extraordinary freaks of nature for which there is no accounting, this man wanted to see Ada Seward a second time after parting with her that night.

Brabant, who had known her in her native town of Cheltenham, accompanied her to the gate of the Pattison villa, Yen How with them.

As he was leaving her, the little doctor put his mouth to her ear, and whispered hurriedly:

‘I will wait here to-morrow night at eight for one lillee kiss.’

The girl was astounded.

‘Well, the idea!’ she just gasped.

Before she could proclaim her indignation, the two men turned off.

Till he reached his home in Portland Street, Yen How was engaged in one long, continuous, secret smile — a smile at his own expense. This outburst of his in the role of lover was new to him, absolutely. His relations with women hitherto had consisted in the business of curing their sicknesses. By what subtle physiological or psychological affinity this one particular English girl had been able to evoke from this particular dry Chino-Japanese a request for ‘one lillie kiss,’ he was unable to divine. Such an affinity there undoubtedly was; but its origin lay among reasons far too abstruse for the unravelling of Yen.

Yen How smiled that first night, but he presently found that this was no smiling matter.

At eight the next evening he was duly at the Pattison gate; but, alas, no Ada was to be seen. Ada, however, was there, though invisible. She, with the Pattison cook, whom she had brought out to enjoy the fun, was hiding behind a shrubbery, and peering through, shaking with laughter at the futile waiting of the little doctor.

And now Yen How, for the first time in his life, began to suffer on account of a woman.

He loved; and in his love was the concentrated passion of many other men. Melted rock is lava — and he suffered.

He used at night to hang about the house, which was lonely at that hour, waiting. To his patience there was no end — to his resolution to possess her, by fair means or foul, no end.

Even in the matter of love the Eastern is essentially different from the Western. It is impossible for us, in anything, to understand them, so foreign are they. With us love is frequent, a powerful mood; with them the whole man is involved, and love becomes a passion having all the characteristics of ordinary flame.

One night, as he lurked about, he met her returning from some shopping. By this time Yen How had become a standing joke for Ada in the kitchen and the servants' bedroom. He walked to her.

'Ah,' he said with sideward head, and a cajoling smile, 'you are here, then? You will give poor Yen How one lillee kiss?'

The whole idea of courtship possessed by this clownish and unpractised lover consisted in asking for one little kiss. Ada Seward's views of the matter were more elaborate. She despised his strong simplicity.

'Perhaps you are not aware whom it is you are talking to,' she said.

Yen was aware; he could have shut his eyes and drawn an exact picture of her face.

'Ah,' he said, 'not even one lillee—'

'I'll give you one lillee box of soap to wash your face, if you like!' she cried, running and looking back. The house was near; he could not overtake her.

Perhaps it would have been impossible for Miss Seward to utter words more calculated to drive Yen to madness than this reference to 'soap.' If his suit was hopeless, it was now borne in upon him that it was hopeless on account of his race. The girl did not listen to him, and reject him; she rejected him without taking him into consideration at all. It was as though a mule, or a cat, had asked her to be his.

But his persistence did not fail. He flung his other pursuits to the winds, and the Pattison villa became for him the centre of the world. Sometimes he caught bright glimpses of her. Once again he met her in the street, and once again she overwhelmed him with jeers. So passed January, February, and March.

To Yen How, the bourgeois, the thought never at all occurred that the girl was below bourgeois class. He was a great man, and merely saw in Ada the eternal woman. Dukes marry duchesses; but the Goethes, the Mahomets, wed cooks and water-carriers. On that very plan was built Yen How.

At the beginning of April he stood one night outside the Pattison gate, when he saw her. It was eleven o'clock; she was coming from the theatre, leaning on the arm of Private Brabant. Brabant, since their meeting in the 'bus, had several times been 'out' with her.

As the two approached, Ada saw the little doctor.

'There's that little Chinaman again, John,' she said, pressing Brabant's arm. 'It's getting too much of a good thing now, isn't it?'

'Confound the little rat,' said Brabant; 'he wants his nut cracked, I should think, doesn't he?'

The doctor tripped up to them, smiling nervously. Before he could speak, Brabant, who had had a glass, said:

'Come, come, Mr. Yen How, get out of this. Can't you see the young lady doesn't want you fooling round her?'

'Well — but — my soldier friend,' said Yen, 'there is no harm done—'

'Come, get out of it!' said Brabant more roughly.

'No, no, you go too fast, you see,' began Yen apologetically.

'Are you going — yes or no?' said Brabant, now flushing angrily.

'Go away, why don't you?' put in Ada.

'Ah! I — I am here to see my lillie girl,' hazarded Yen.

'Oh, don't be a stupid little goose of a Chinaman! Just fancy!' she said.

This was the most unkindest cut of all for Yen. He winced, touched with anger.

'Are you going or not?' said Brabant, an ultimatum in his tone.

'No!' said Yen; then, more decidedly, 'No, no!'

Brabant put out his arm and pushed him on the shoulder.

It was not a violent push, but in an instant the doctor's face was almost black with rage. He had in his hand a stout bamboo stick, which he at once lifted and slashed with terrible force across the soldier's cheek, leaving a bruised weal which Brabant bore with him to the grave.

In retaliation the soldier lifted his large and bony fist, and sent it into the doctor's face. Yen How dropped.

The street was deserted. Not knowing what to do, the girl and the soldier bent over him for five minutes, when, to their surprise, Yen How raised himself slowly, placed his handkerchief against his red and dripping face, and slowly limped away without a single word.

Once he stopped deliberately as he moved off, turned, and looked at them; and in the moonlight they distinctly saw him 'twice shake his forefinger warningly in their direction.

Then he went on his way.

Between that night and the beginning of May he never once stepped outside the house in which he lived. He had resumed his close and far-reaching studies.

At the beginning of May he was on board the Peninsular, bound for the East.

By the end of September he was a member of the Japanese Parliament.

In December we find him a leading spirit in the Tsung-li-Yamen, or Chinese Foreign Office, and making voyages between Tokio and Peking.

CHAPTER II. THE HEATHEN CHINEE

YEN HOW WAS nothing if not heathen. He was that first of all.

His intellect was like dry ice. Though often secretly engaged in making The Guess, on the whole, he despised all religions — the faiths of the West, the superstitions of the East, he despised them all alike. He was full of light, but without a hint of warmth; and so lacked the religious emotion.

It is not likely that ordinary ethical considerations would much influence the aims of such a man. He was like an avalanche, as cold, and as resistless.

What was Dr. Yen How's aim? Simply told, it was to possess one white woman, ultimately, and after all. He had also the subsidiary aim of doing an ill turn to all the other white women, and men, in the world.

If the earth had opened and swallowed him, then he would have renounced his hope; but for no lesser reason. He went coolly and patiently to work to secure his desire.

But no man, surely, ever employed means so huge to an end so small. A European, perhaps any other man, having once conceived the means, would quickly have forgotten the end in the tremendous interest of the means themselves. But in all that Yen did the face of Ada Seward was always consciously 'before his eyes.' The nature of this man was as simple as the elemental rock.

His career in the East, from the first hour of his return, was meteoric. He rose like a rocket. The order of the day in China, and especially in Japan, was Western modernity; and here was a man who simply breathed Western modernity, and who yet was an Eastern of the Easterns. His skin was more yellow than the yellow man's, and his brain was more white than the white man's. When the English Inspector-General of Roads and Bridges at Tokio asserted that the Imperial tax in Britain on railway passenger traffic was, he believed, Per cent> Yen How's face wrinkled into a chaos of smiles. 'No — two,' he said quietly; and no one doubted which was right. Yen introduced a new method of protecting bridges during the daily earthquakes of Japan, by means of articulated joists and sleepers. When the Naval Director at Pekin introduced a specification for a new battle-ship to be mounted with two 111-ton guns, Yen proved by statistics (which he quoted from memory) that the tendency of the most modern shipbuilding was rather in the direction of quick-firing guns than of heavy armaments. The 111-ton became 45-ton. He was soon invaluable.

At this time the people of Japan were strongly excited against the freebooting of Russia and Germany in China, and strongly animated in favour of England. England was, in fact, the beau-ideal, the Great Pattern, of Japan. It required no great force of imagination for her to call herself 'the Britain of the East'; this notion at once occurred, of itself, to every one; and, of course, the copyist sympathised with her original rather than with others. With England predominant in China, moreover, there would be an assurance of free trade; and Japan was a trader. So strong was the enthusiasm in favour of England, that the nation was even willing to put its fleet at the disposal of its Big Model in case of need.

The ulterior purposes of Japan, of course, remained in doubt. She was even then building in various parts of the world an additional fleet, which, when finished, would make her a sea Power far in advance of any nation in the whole earth, with the exception of England herself. What in the hour of her manhood, when she had cast her leading-strings, she would do with this vast force was a disturbing question to many; but, meanwhile, it was clearly her intention to use England as an ally — till the years ripened.

Under the Marquis Ito's Ministry Yen How was offered a post of Under-Secretary, but he refused it. He suggested that he should become Secretary to the Minister as his private servant; and this was arranged. He knew that high public rank in Japan would exclude him from high public rank in China, if his double personality should become known — and China was the chief field of his labours. Meanwhile, he was drawing large revenues as a mandarin, and lived, for his own purposes, in a style nearly princely.

'Poh!' he said to the Marquis Ito, sipping tea among rugs, 'there are no statesmen now. Statesmen! — there are no such things. Not here — not in Europe. An ordinary man is a man who thinks in days; a statesman proper thinks in thousands of years. The outlook and computations of a statesman should be as much vaster than those of a private person, as a country is vaster than a tea-house. Believe me, there are no statesmen.'

'Come, doctor, why do you say that?' asked the Marquis.

'Look forward five hundred, a thousand years, Marquis, and what do you see?' answered Yen How. 'Is it not this? — the white man and the yellow man in their death-grip, contending for the earth. The white and the yellow — there are no others. The black is the slave of both; the brown does not count. But there are those two; and when the day comes that they stand face to face in dreadful hate, saying, "One or other must quit this earth," shall I tell you which side will win?'

'Which do you think?'

'The white will win, Marquis.'

'Perhaps I differ from you,' said the Marquis Ito.

'Ah! you differ from me. But I am right all the same; and I mean, sooner or later, to prove it to you abundantly, abundantly! The white will win, I tell you! You great men in Japan are trying to copy them, straining your poor necks to come up with them; but I have passed my life in studying them — and I've got something to tell you; listen to it: you cannot, Marquis, you cannot, you cannot!

‘Our Navy already—’ began the Marquis.

‘Poh! your Navy! Who built it for you? It was they. Your Navy is like a razor in the hands of an ape which has seen its master use it. The brute may or may not cut its own throat with it. And as soon as they build a navy for you, they will build one twice as big for themselves, and twice as good. There is no reason why you should not follow them, and go on following them — only understand that you cannot catch them. And this is another thing that you should understand — that the longer you follow them, the farther they get away from you. Their rate of progress is continually increasing. Every day that passes over the world gives them an additional advantage over you. To-day their guns can mow you down by hundreds; in a hundred years they will mow you down by thousands; in five hundred years by millions. Can't you see? — you are losing time!’

‘What do you mean?’

‘Ah, I mean that there are no longer any statesmen, Marquis. The eye of the statesman ranges far, far into the tracts of the future, doesn't it? But we! Here are we now — we Japanese, we Chinese, we yellow men — playing about in little diplomatic mud-puddles with French, and Russian, and English, and German, as if all that mattered two sen! And all the time we know well, yet seem not to know, that French, and English, and the rest, are equally our foe, and tyrant, and vulture, one not more than the other! That if we do not eat them all now, at once, they all will swallow us whole some day, soon — soon. And to see China fighting with Japan in such a case, and Japan banging into China — is it not childish enough to make a donkey, or even a Grand Lama, laugh? There are no statesmen any longer, Marquis.’

‘Well, come, I see something in what you are driving at,’ said Ito. ‘We and China are like two birds’ pecking at each other on a bough, when suddenly they are both down the belly of a serpent, which has been calmly watching them. Well, but what are we to do? By your own showing, the birds can do nothing against the serpent.’

‘Did I say that?’ asked Yen, lifting his eyebrows in innocent surprise. ‘Oh, I didn’t mean it! There are many birds, you see, and few serpents. In the world to-day there are 408,000,000 Christians and — mark the figures — 1,004,000,000 non-Christians. I can see that you are startled.’

‘You think that by sheer force of numbers—’

‘Yes, if we had taken our opportunity in time — if we had struck two hundred — a hundred years ago. Even to-day I believe that it is hardly too late, if the yellow race can find a great leader. I am perfectly sure that in a hundred years time it will be too late.’

‘Why so?’

‘I have told you. By that time the white man will have something like a magician’s power over all nature. He will say to the mountains and the seas: “Be removed!” — and at his mere whisper they will obey him. We yellow men, too, will have advanced, but they will have vastly outstripped us. We cannot follow them, I tell you. The day will come when our mere numbers will no longer be of any importance in baulking and overthrowing them.’

‘You talk of big things, my friend,’ said Ito. ‘Are you serious?’

‘Yes, Marquis, I am serious.’

‘You advocate a League of the yellow races?’

‘I do.’

‘He! he! the idea tickles me; it is so very far from realisation — there are so many obstacles—’

‘No, really — I think not. I believe it is very near to realisation. Events are at this moment in progress at Peking which will force it to accomplishment — soon. Suppose I tell you that I, personally, have laid those events in train?’

‘You, doctor? What, are you going to lead us all, then, against Paris and London? He! he!’

‘Perhaps, Marquis.’

‘What, to face the Nordenfeldts, and the Maxims, and the Krupps? The Chinese will run from the first twelve-pounder!’

‘There may not be any twelve-pounders there when they get to Paris and London,’ said Yen How with absolute coolness, yet with an emphasis and an intonation of solemnity in his voice which held the Marquis from answer for a minute.

‘Really, I don’t understand you,’ he said at last.

‘Yet my meaning should be clear.’

‘No — do explain yourself.’

Yen How rose to his feet before he answered.

‘Marquis,’ he said, ‘is it possible you do not see that China has it in her power to turn Europe into an exhausted waste within, say, three months from to-night, without firing a single shot, or spending a single tael?’

CHAPTER III. RUMOURS OF WAR

AS THE YEAR wore on, some of the International difficulties centring round Kiao-Chau, Port Arthur, and Hainan reopened. In England more than all the old unrest revived.

What added to this unrest was the fact that some of the items of the rapidly-succeeding batches of news were quite inexplicable.

From the beginning of the year it had been known that Germany had not made so brilliant a bargain in the acquisition of Kiao-Chau as she had imagined. The territory placed under her 'sovereign rights' had been strictly limited by China, and granted only as a 'lease.' When Prince Henry of Prussia arrived with the Deutschland and Gefion, he found that there were no 'laurels' to win, and nobody at whom to strike out with his absurd mailed fist.

Moreover, on much the same terms as Germany obtained Kiao-Chau, and, later in the year, Russia obtained Port Arthur, Britain obtained Wei-hai-Wei and Mirs Bay.

What, then, was the surprise of the world, including the Germans themselves, when, in the middle of December, came the news that China had ceded a large additional region to the Kaiser, absolutely without conditions!

There was not a single brain in Europe which could divine the motive of this virtual gift.

At this time Li Hung Chang, recalled to power by the Emperor at the beginning of the year, was still at the head of affairs in Peking. But in the short space of two months he had acquired the habit of taking no step without the suggestion of the new element in Chinese politics, the far-seeing Oriental European, the much toiling member of the Tsung-li-Yamen, the omniscient Yen How. Already Yen had swung himself into the position of the virtual ruler of China.

Yen How seemed to Li Hung Chang, haunted as the old statesman had always been by the vision of dismemberment and downfall which overhung China, something like an angel of light. Here was another brain which saw as his had all along seen — only far more clearly, and with powers of invention far vaster to avert the catastrophe.

‘Let us be definite,’ Yen had said, in words which old Li long remembered, one night as they smoked together alone on a moonlit veranda. ‘Do let us be honest with ourselves, your Excellency! You agree with me that the yellow man is doomed — if the white man is not; in your heart you think it. Then let us say it in definite words; for as soon as ever we have said it, we have gone half-way toward grappling with our fate.’

‘Ah, I have said it often and often,’ answered Li, ‘but to what good?’

‘If you believe that now is the time for action, as I do, you have the matter in your own hand.’

‘How so?’

‘To me it is clearer than the moonlight there. The facts of the situation seem to stare me in the face.’

‘Speak, Yen How.’

‘I will speak, your Excellency. To me it seems that if we could supply a motive to the combined Japanese and Chinese nations to traverse Asia and the Caucasus, and then to overrun the Europe of to-day, there is no power on earth that could permanently check the overwhelming momentum of their progress.’

‘It is nonsense, my son,’ said Li, with a pull at his long pipe.

‘Note this,’ replied Yen—‘I only say that I believe — for who can be sure? The white man is strong and stern; his frown is dreadful. I only say that I believe — though a host of four hundred millions cannot be mown down in a day, your Excellency. The throats of the Maxims might grow hoarse and burst at this task. Still, perhaps you are right — perhaps I talk nonsense. I did not seriously mean to propose a march against the Maxim thunder. But I have a thought — a thought.

Suppose China and Japan can take away the Maxims first, and then march afterwards.’

‘Speak your meaning, Yen How,’ said Li; ‘all is dark to me.’

‘We wish the white races killed,’ answered Yen; ‘well, there are two ways, are there not? We might kill them ourselves — that, you say, is nonsense. The other way is to get, them to kill one another.’

Li’s lips came from his mouth, and the outer corners of his eyes screwed up into an expression of the most exquisite enjoyment.

‘What is left alive of them after their mutual slaughter,’ Yen How went on, ‘we can kill. Their lands will be weak with loss of blood, their treasuries will be exhausted — there will be no Maxims there any more.’

At these last words his own eyes, too, wrinkled up into delicious merriment.

‘The trump card is in the hand of China,’ he said.

How the white races were to be made to destroy one another Li never asked, though the conversation lasted far into the night. He knew well. That, at least, was simple.

‘England,’ said Yen as they parted, ‘she is the worst. All the others against her.’

A few weeks afterwards the cession of large additional territories in China to Germany was rumoured.

And now followed, in rapid succession, a series of the most startling, the most inexplicable reports.

It seemed as if China, was not waiting for dismemberment from abroad, but was dismembering herself wilfully, with precipitate frenzy.

First came the intelligence that France had been besought by the Chinese Government to assume the Protectorate, without conditions, of Hainan and Yun-nan.

These few lines of telegram threw Europe into a state of fever. It was decided by every one that, if the intelligence was true, no earthly consideration of risk would keep the rapacious hand of the Frenchman from grasping at this plum.

In a week or so it was definitely known that the news was true, and that France had accepted the offer. Rumours of war filled the air. The world was agog, and every spot was an arena for discussion. Only one man was silent — the British Foreign Secretary. The newspapers besought him for a word; he remained wrapped in taciturnity. A deputation of merchants waited upon the Under-Secretary; he answered only with a few strong words of hope.

At this time Yen How's name got into the papers. It was said that this mysterious man, whose dazzling rise in the Celestial Empire was sketched, had recently taken a fresh journey to Tokio. Then a vague telegram, printed in England in small nonpareil type, appeared, stating that the probable object of Yen How's renewed journey was to conclude a secret treaty between China and Japan. But the report was unsubstantiated.

The real bomb was yet to burst into the midst of Europe. It was hurled by the St Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News.

China had offered to Russia the protectorate of the Yangtse Valley.

It was now, for the first time, that it entered two or three of the shrewdest heads in Europe that China was deliberately seeking to plunge the world into war by working upon the rapacity and selfish greed of the nations.

One gentleman, living at a country-house in Hampshire, wrote to the Times to this effect. But his letter attracted no attention.

Yet, looking back now, it seems strange that the idea did not occur to others. For it must be remembered that the Yangtse Valley had been regarded as peculiarly the sphere of English power. More than this, England had now partly guaranteed a Chinese loan of twelve millions sterling, and it was agreed that the security for this should consist of the land-tax and the unpledged part of the Customs dues. Now, the chief source of both land-tax and Customs dues was the Yangtse Valley.

Yet the next day the Russian Novosti published an inspired article, stating that on no account could Russia withdraw from the prominent place into which events had forced her in the East.

The feeling in England was one of horror at the blind and criminal cupidity of the Continental nations. The word 'war' was on every tongue. Twice in one day there were hurried meetings of the Cabinet. Thousands of private letters poured in upon the Foreign Office, urging patience and firmness.

But the hand of the Government was forced in an unexpected manner.

Two items of news followed each other rapidly.

First, that on the 21st day of the 12th moon of the 24th year of Kuang Hsu — that is to say, on the 14th December 1898 — the Yellow Jacket had once more been taken from Li Hung Chang; and that the dominant talents of the man, Yen How, had triumphed over all obstacles, and raised him to the very head of affairs at the Court of Peking.

The next day a telegram from Sir C. M. Macdonald, the British Minister in China, reached the Foreign Office. This was at once made public.

It stated that China professed herself unable to meet the next accruing interest-instalment on the loan, though the Minister had information from Sir Robert Hart, the Controller of the Imperial Maritime Customs, which led him to doubt the avowal of inability.

Whatever else this might mean, it certainly seemed to mean war. The security for China's default, real or pretended, which was due to England, had already been placed under the control of Russia.

In the House of Commons the Under-Secretary stated that there was still a hope of peace — a hope that 'the Empire of Russia would act with that spirit of fairness and magnanimity in this crisis which alone could prove her worthy of her great traditions.' These words were borne at a run by dozens of excited members to interested individuals among the crowd which surrounded the House from Westminster Bridge round to the Aquarium.

London went to sleep with some degree of quietude that night, Mr. Curzon's reply having been published in an eagerly bought-up 10 o'clock edition.

But the next morning, Mr. Goschen being abroad at an early hour, it was suddenly discovered that, by some extraordinary means, Malta was telegraphically isolated from England; and a hurried telegram was at once despatched from the Admiralty to Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, the Flag-Officer in Commission at Portsmouth.

CHAPTER IV. FIRST BLOOD

BEFORE ELEVEN O'CLOCK the Majestic, the flag-ship of the Channel Squadron, was leaving Portsmouth harbour behind her at the rate of ten knots. She was under the command of the senior officer in command of the squadron, Vice-Admiral Sir Henry Stephenson, and with her went the little gunboat Halcyon.

The mystery underlying the sudden journey of this couple was not difficult to unravel. The truth was, the Government was greatly startled by the event of the morning. The Majestic was, in reality, a convoy to the Halcyon; the smaller vessel was acting as a despatch-boat to Malta, and the battle-ship was seeing her on her journey till she was deemed to be out of danger of molestation.

It had come to that already.

At the Government offices the words 'treachery' and 'war' had risen to more than one agitated lip. Europe, it was felt, was drifting, drifting — whither?

The task of the Halcyon was to warn the Governor of Malta, and to order the mobilisation of the Mediterranean Fleet near the Straits of Gibraltar. It might be necessary at a few hours' notice to block the entrance of the Mediterranean; it might even be necessary to hurl back a foreign invader from the shores of England, and the Channel Squadron was woefully limited in weight of metal.

During the day business in London came practically to a standstill. Wholesale withdrawals of foreign securities were reported from the City.

By 3 p.m. it was generally known that a military attaché to the Embassy at Paris had arrived by private yacht with a sealed despatch from Sir E. J. Monson, and had hurried to the Foreign Office.

A day of almost breathless tension reached its climax when, at 9 p.m., Mr. Curzon made the announcement to a full House that peaceful negotiations were still in progress with Russia, but that, late in the afternoon, Germany had made demands of England and China with respect to the recently-ceded territories, with which England, as he might say at once, would certainly be unable to comply.

The next morning, before break of day, England found herself telegraphically disconnected with the Continent.

About this precise hour, the Majestic, having her small companion some half a mile or more away on her starboard quarter, was butting her way about S. by W. through a rough Biscay sea. It was a cold and squally morning, still dark, though a chill hint of day now mingled bleakly with the East. The sea was handling both ships rudely, and the Majestics ponderous lurching through some six or seven degrees brought the acrid green sea washing about the base of her forward barbette, while from the bows of the Halcyon it went hissing aft in a continuous rain of spray.

It was just after five bells in the morning watch, at an hour when the gloomy gray of the morning had lightened a little, that the look-out man of the Majestic reported a big ship astern steaming leisurely south about seven miles away. The rate of the Majestic was ten knots, that of the stranger about six; but immediately after her coming into sight, a black cloud of redundant smoke revealed the stranger's will to improve her pace.

That she had been lurking about with some object of search was clear. That she was now getting up steam seemed to indicate, if anything, that she had found what she was looking for.

In a few minutes it was made out that she was La Gloire, a French battleship of about the weight and armature of the Majestic.

La Gloire's cloud of smoke was premature — it occasioned a suspicion of her motives. The first thing which Sir Henry Stephenson did was to order the Halcyon by trumpet-call to steam at full speed S.W. a distance of six miles. The Halcyon, at all events, had to be kept out of danger.

Yet he could hardly have expressed his reason for giving this order. Was any one at war with any one? He was ignorant of the fact, if so.

He was not long in doubt. La Gloire, even while getting up steam, had pricked off her course three points to starboard. It seemed as if she was about to give chase to the Halcyon.

‘What! Are we in for a fight then, Captain?’ said the Vice-Admiral with a smile of surprise, and a puckered brow.

‘It almost looks like it, certainly,’ replied Fleet-Captain Hardy.

‘Well, come now, we shall see,’ said the Vice-Admiral.

By this time La Gloire had not only hoisted her colours, but had extra colours on masts and stays. The Majestic wore the ordinary single ensign.

Captain Hardy had ordered steam for full speed. The next moment the Majestic swung round to starboard about six points. She was still ahead of La Gloire. At her present course and speed she would interpose between the English gunboat and the French ship.

For quite half an hour the two ships continued to approach each other slowly and obliquely, having started from a separating interval of about five miles. On this course the sea was more aft, and the rolling and sullen plunging of the ships less marked.

On board the Majestic, meanwhile, all was bustling action. Decks were cleared, magazines were opened, ammunition and projectiles got out; watertight doors were closed. The dawn lightened to a chill and drear twilight.

The real object of La Gloire was to intercept and capture any despatch-boat from the Channel, which might attempt to take intelligence through the Straits. The sending out of the battle-ship with such an object was, however, a breach of international law, and an act of treachery; for no one had declared war against England, though declarations of hostilities were already in the bureaux of more than one of the ambassadors at London.

That the despatch-boat should be convoyed, and by a first-class battle-ship, was unexpected. La Gloire found herself checkmated. There before her lay her prize; but between her and it was the thunder and lightning of England.

But, though checkmated, she showed no intention of being checked. She kept on her way with rising speed. The two ships, in malign silence, like two red-eyed planets rushing to jarring combat, drew nearer. When their speed had increased to thirteen knots, they were about two miles apart. Decks on both were cleared, collision-mats were ready, preparations were made for rigging torpedo-nets in an emergency. Nearer, in awful silence, they drew, two giants with limbs oiled for battle; and the bleak and raw sea-wind of the dawning made hoarse sounds above their funnels.

But one of the ships was still in doubt whether there was to be fighting, and, if so, why. There was a brief consultation on board the Majestic, and then she signalled: 'Are we combatants?' There was no reply.

To this silence the Majestic sent aloft the answer: 'Trafalgar.'

And now the baleful silence recommenced. Both commanders had stationed themselves in their conning-towers. On either ship not a soul was to be made out by the glasses save the crews of the quick-firing guns on the hurricane decks, and of the machine-guns on the tops. By five minutes past seven the fleet-engineer of the Majestic announced that he had steam enough to drive the vessel at her utmost trial speed.

The strategy of the French commander in riot answering the Majesties question was soon apparent, for Sir Henry Stephenson felt himself bound to wait for the first shot, being uncertain how matters stood on shore. And the first shot in modern naval warfare must often mean victory.

The two vessels slowly converged, La Gloire on the other's starboard side, steering S. by E.; the Majestic on the other's port bow, heading S. by W. Suddenly La Gloire sharply altered her course by several points to the eastward, and impetuously bore down upon the Majestic.

'Well,' said Sir Henry Stephenson to himself, 'that is uncommonly like an act of hostility. Well, then, Mr. Frenchman—'

Immediately the Majestic, too, pricked off eastward, her after-pair of 67-ton guns being kept trained on the enemy as she manoeuvred. The ships were now so well within effective range that the Majestic's thin smoke, blown into a wide hovering fog by the east wind, half concealed her movements from La Gloire.

For a time it seemed as if the British ship were in retreat, and the French giving chase; then suddenly both ships were hidden from each other. Sir Henry, taking advantage of his windward position, had thrown overboard some twenty casks of smoke-producing tow and naphtha and tar, which at once separated the two ships with a blackness of thick brown reek, mingled near the water with bickering tongues of flame. The commander of La Gloire, fearing that in this fog of fume the Majestic might suddenly turn about and ram him, at once changed his course south-west, and was immediately the retreating ship. The English admiral had guessed his thought, and when the region of the smoke-making composition was passed, the beam of the Majestic was abreast of La Gloire's poop.

It was the lieutenant in charge of the fore-barbette of the Majestic who first woke the thunder of this winter-morning tragedy.

Simultaneously, with one bang of wrath that shook the Majestic herself from stem to stern, both the 67-tonners of this barbette went crashing into La Gloire's quarters.

At this moment the ships were not much more than half a mile apart. When the smoke cleared it was at once seen that the whole stern armament of La Gloire was in ruins, her after-barbette shattered, the two heavy guns unshipped. One of the shells had penetrated abaft her after-armoured tube and there burst, killing fifty men, and rending into a chaos of debris all it met. From the poop of the French ship rose a wide hurry of white smoke. At the same time a steady bombardment of quick-firing guns was opened from both vessels. In three minutes all unarmoured or unsheltered spots in each ship were cleared of every living thing. Twelve-pounders, six-pounders, three-pounders mingled in swift-cracking uproar, punctuated by the brut growl of the Gardners and the more rasping detonation of the Nordenfeldts. All the air was war, and all the intervening sea a commotion of hissing foam.

But now the machine-guns in the tops were silent, their protecting shields had been shot away, and their crews annihilated. One of La Gloire's funnels was gone, and the other pierced, while three projectiles from her had burst their way through shields of six-inch nickel steel, and put three of the Majesties central battery guns out of action, striking them fairly on the chase. Within three minutes the two ships had belched forth a flaming hail of some twenty-two thousand rounds of shot, riddling all except the most heavily-armoured parts of each other, tearing to shreds all light gun-screens, and turning unarmoured ends and box-batteries into shambles.

Already it seemed improbable that either ship, unless the other were at once destroyed, could come out of this anarchy of thunder and live.

The starboard side of the Majestic was still presented to the port of La Gloire, but La Gloire's speed had been greatly reduced, owing to injuries to her funnels, and the Majestic had forged forward abreast, then somewhat ahead of the other.

Vice-Admiral Stephenson was every moment awaiting the second crash of his after-barbette into the French ship's beam, when La Gloire's two fore-barbette guns sent out their voices simultaneously.

One of the shots glanced against the centre armour-belt of the Majestic at the water-line, leapt, struck her fore-armoured tube, and went driving far forward into the sea, where it burst in a high water-lily of spouting foam.

The other wrought terrible havoc. It struck the Majestic's central battery at the height of the deck, burst inside, blew away the chief part of the hurricane deck, and turned all the guns in that battery into a mere heap of twisted and crumpled metal.

But as the British ship staggered at this blow, her bluejackets sent up a cheer, for the next instant the after-barbette in their own ship was talking, too; and a few seconds afterwards it was seen that La Gloire's forecastle was on fire, that she had gone down by the bows, and that her screws, half out of the water, were furiously revolving in a broad mound of wheeling spume.

Was she sinking, then? The British Vice - Admiral expected now to see her strike her flag. But even as he looked, he was undeceived.

Yonder, a hundred yards astern, somewhat to his port side, he saw a sight which might have made even the heart of a Nelson leap. It was a small object, looking like a cubical box; and even as he glanced at it, it disappeared utterly beneath the waves.

He knew this to be one of the ingenuities from the Forges et Chantiers de la Méditerranée. It was a submarine boat, and the object which he had seen for a moment was the top of her conning-tower as she rose for an observation of distances and directions.

The submarine boat had been secretly lowered into the water from La Gloire's starboard side. Her motor was electric, supplied from storage batteries, and her speed, even at some depth, considerable. Vice-Admiral Stephenson knew that her aim was to pass under his torpedo-nets, carrying an electrically-fired torpedo, to be attached to his already half-ruined ship.

At once he went circling at full speed to starboard, crossing the bows of the now slowly-progressive La Gloire, one of whose fore-barbette guns was useless, and the other unready to fire.

At the same time he had rapidly lowered from his port side a second-class torpedo boat which he then carried on deck. By means of hot water from the Majesties boilers, she was already under steam, and with careful handling, in spite of the parent ship's now headlong, wheeling flight, she touched the water in safety, and at once went fretting fussily through the billows, a mere cloud of hurrying spray, at a speed of fourteen knots. Like some buzzing bee with deadly sting, she drove straight upon La Gloire.

The alarm on the French ship at this hasting ruin resembled panic. Disregarding the movements of the Majestic, her commander at once put his helm a-port, and turning upon his small foe the comparatively uninjured armament of his starboard side, poured forth, in one continuous roll of artillery, a bombardment of some twelve thousand pounds per minute. La Gloire was now, however, well in the trough of the sea, which flowed in bulky swells from east to west; the greater portion of her huge outburst of fire failed to take effect; and still the puffing thing came near and yet nearer, overwhelmed, but steadfast, drowned, but headlong, tiny, but terrible.

The climax of the fight was near. It had lasted but a few minutes: it had seemed like an eternity in hell.

At about three hundred yards from La Gloire the little torpedo-boat launched a Whitehead.

As the oiled and gleaming needle of steel slid swiftly into the water, it passed straight through the body of a great swell, and came instantly out on the other side, making directly for La Gloire's quarter; but before it could reach her, the ship manoeuvred slightly to starboard, and the projectile slipped hurriedly under her stern, and exploded harmlessly some distance away.

But even as it did so, another torpedo came shooting through the waves from the little boat.

At the same time the crew of the torpedo-boat were seen to be wildly leaping at random over her sides into the waves. Seen — but dimly seen — for the whole craft from stem to stern, as well as all that region of the water into which she was now plunging on her last voyage, was enveloped in one hissing white cloud of stinging vapour. Two of her men instantly sank scalded to death. A twelve-pounder, shot upwards, had burst into her boiler.

It had not come from La Gloire. It had come from the unseen thing which was cruising darkly beneath the sea in search of the Majestic.

Immediately the submarine boat rose again, and the man in her conning-tower, looking a moment abroad, saw the Majestic — or rather he saw a vast mass of smoke which utterly concealed the Majestic and the direction of her bow. All he could note was that she was fearfully and wonderfully near to La Gloire; that she was approaching La Gloire — rapidly, rapidly — with horrid impetuosity.

He did not hesitate a moment, but, putting his fins into play, instantly sank, and made for a point at which he believed he would intercept the rushing ship.

The mass of smoke which he had seen around the Majestic had been intentionally caused by her commander. The Vice-Admiral had ordered every gun which still worked to be discharged, whether they bore upon the French ship or not, and enveloped in the mantle of ascending reek which poured from the hot weapons, he put his helm hard down, suddenly left the evolutionary curve of sixteen points through which he had been circling, and drove straight upon La Gloire. He was going to ram.

At that great moment expectation stood in horror. 'Prepare to ram!' went forth the command from the conning-tower, and every man on the Majestic fell flat to his face, as though at the sound of the trump of doom. And now, while the clock might tick, and tick again, the men on La Gloire became aware of what was coming. Up out of her envelope of vapour suddenly loomed the Majestic upon them, near and huge, like a monster rising from the deep. Just then the remaining fore-barbette gun of La Gloire was being discharged, and the ships being nearly bow to bow, the shell went forth with disastrous havoc, shattering the thickly armoured fore-barbette of the Majestic, battering the conning-tower, destroying the funnels, and shocking the Vice-Admiral into a state of insensibility.

But even as it did so, the crash came. The ram of the Majestic touched La Gloire on her starboard bow, glanced a little, then with a horrid z-z-zip-p! z-z-zip-p! then with a bursting and rending uproar like the cracking asunder of an arsenal, went tearing and smashing a shapeless hole 20 feet in length along her beam. The sea poured into the doomed ship; and at once she lurched bow-ward to starboard.

But the ram of the Majestic was not yet clear of La Gloire, when the most stupendous hubbub of the whole battle, drowning every other sound, rent the heavens. It was a double detonation, yet the two reports followed so closely one upon the other, that they seemed almost like one.

They were the sounds of two torpedoes.

The 28,000 tons of the two great ships half-leapt from the water, and started apart, shivering to their keels; and two immense pillars of white cloud, which soon were one, rose high, shutting them from each other.

One of these torpedoes had been affixed by the crew of the submarine boat beneath the bow of La Gloire, which they had mistaken for the Majestic; the other was the second of the two which had been despatched from the Majesties torpedo-boat before she had sunk. It had caught on to the keel of La Gloire aft, and its explosion had been delayed, perhaps half a minute, till now.

When the smoke cleared a little, the commander of La Gloire was seen, with blood-soaked clothes, and haggard face, and eyes staring with horror, standing on the wreck of his after-barbette, frantically hauling down his colours. He sent forth to the wreck which he had made of the Majestic this cry of terror —

Au nom de Dieu! — we are sinking — for God's sake ...'

The captain of the Majestic at once lowered his only boat which was capable of floating, though half of her port-side, too, was smashed away. The whole crew of the British vessel had hurried to deck, ready, even as they cheered in victory, to aid in the work of rescue.

But as the boat pushed off, men were seen leaping hurriedly from La Gloire, in a vain attempt to escape her suction as she went down. She gave them little time. The bursting of the two torpedoes fore and aft had simply turned her into a skeleton of disconnected ruin. She lurched a little aft — up went her bows like two hands laid together in prayer — then her whole length settled evenly lower; she lurched aft again, obliquely, clumsily; then, as if with sudden resolve, she skipped forward, dived her nose briskly into the sea, and disappeared.

Three of her crew of six hundred were saved.

Meantime, the captain of the Majestic was signalling to the Halcyon, waiting, eager for fight, five miles away:

‘We are sinking — make haste.’

The great ship was settling slowly down by the bows; for the torpedo which had burst beneath the bows of La Gloire had wrought great havoc upon the other’s forward bottom also; nor could the pumps produce much impression upon the intruding waters.

The Halcyon succeeded in taking off the hundred and fifty-two that were left of her crew, taking also on board the crew of the French submarine boat, who had escaped injury. They hardly stopped to watch the Majestic settle slowly down, before the gunboat’s bows were once more turned, to bear her momentous message, toward the Straits.

But if Dr. Yen How had been there to see that battle of the giants, and its result, the corners of his eyes would have wrinkled up into a very web of tickled merriment.

CHAPTER V. HOW ENGLAND TOOK THE NEWS

ON THE MORNING of the duel between La Gloire and the Majestic it was rumoured at an early hour in the neighbourhood of Fleet Street that China had dismissed Sir Robert Hart from the Controllershship of the Imperial Maritime Customs, and that a Russian was about to be appointed in his stead.

The announcement appeared in the morning papers, and its almost immediate consequence was a rise of threepence per quartern in the price of bread.

But though there were few who were not by this time in a state of excited expectancy, things on their outside wore much their usual appearance. In London the commonplace 'bus and cab went about the streets, and the occasional bicycle, with swift and silent feet, manoeuvred among them. Perhaps from Holborn and the Strand to the City the 'buses were fuller than ordinary, perhaps the cabs moved at a slight increase of pace. The pavements were rather crowded, as much, perhaps, as on a Christmas Eve night, not nearly so much as on a Lord Mayor's Day. In back streets the coalmen cried 'Coal,' and their faces were black with the grime of the ordinary workaday of life.

Yonder, the sun wore his usual broad-faced benignity. He seemed to have no suspicion that on this particular morning his old earth was in her death-throes, and a quite new earth in travail to be born.

It was a bright and sunshiny forenoon, the 16th of March 1899 — eighteen days and nine months before the dawn of the twentieth century.

The Evening News it was which, in a premature eleven o'clock fourth edition, applied the match to the latent mine of excitement which smouldered in the minds of the people. It declared in a little thunderbolt of breathless news, five lines of 'pica' type, that the Stock Exchange had been suddenly closed, and that it was rumoured that the Government was appointing private brokers for the transaction of only such business as might be essential.

A step so decisive, as every one saw, could only have for its object the prevention of a financial panic which might be disastrous. And for this prevention there must be a cause not as yet generally known.

Yet such a step should have been expected; for hardly any, except the peace-at-any-price party, any longer hoped that war could be averted — though with whom the war was to be, against what odds, it was not so easy to decide. At any rate, no one could suppose that the cessions of territory by China to the three Powers were spontaneous; it was shrewdly suspected that they were the result of a secret understanding arrived at between them and China at the time when the three had combined to save China from Japan, after the Chino-Japanese war. It had, therefore, the look of a conspiracy to oust England from her share in an empire four-fifths of whose commerce was being carried by British ships; and from end to end of the land the idea that England should submit to such a conspiracy was scouted with indignation.

The severance of telegraphic and telephonic communication, too, between the Continent and England looked like an act of war, whoever was responsible for it. It was reported, and then denied, that three army-corps of 120,000 men were being mobilised toward Brest. It was known that the War Office, the Admiralty, and the Foreign Office were in intensely active inter-communication; that there were frequent and hurried meetings of the Cabinet. But still, with that silence which precedes the storm, with that subdued excitement which a trifle will cause to burst into passion, England waited, still hoping against hope to be allowed to go on her way in peace.

The public were in blissful ignorance of the fact that the Majestic and La Gloire had already been lying four or five hours at the bottom of the Atlantic.

Then came the announcement of the Evening News, and the pent-up emotion broke suddenly out. In the City, even before this, the streets had become a mere sea, with currents and eddies, of thronging heads. Here the facts of the case were sooner known; when the rumour spread westward, London was awake. All pretence at traffic quickly ceased.

The general tendency and main current of this weltering human ocean was westward in that part of it which was east of Charing Cross, and eastward in that part of it which was west of Charing Cross. The House of Commons, as in all supreme moments of stress and danger, had become the cynosure and the magnet of the nation. Thither the throng pressed.

What was it all about? No one was certain. Was there war — at last? — in very truth? And with whom? No one knew.

For twenty-six years Europe had been practically at peace. The Graeco-Turkish war, the Spanish-American, were not wars — they were the bickering of naughty children. The Franco-German had been grim enough, but it had long since got to be recognised that the next, when it actually came — at last — would hardly resemble it; for the French and German nations had fought, and each still existed an integral nation, in spite of the squabble; but the struggle that was looked forward to when Europe, in the fullness of time, next brought forth her monstrous offspring of war, would, as men knew, be stupendous, worldwide, and final; the combatants would consist of mankind; the whole future of the world would be determined by it; and in the greatness of that day, war, the destroyer, would itself be destroyed.

This was the logical outcome of the conditions under which Europe, groaning under her weight of armour, waiting, watching, eager to end her foul disease of hatred, had for many years been living.

And now — at last — she was in travail — pang on pang, and shriek on shriek; and her birth-hour was at hand.

But in the London streets the crowd was worthy of the occasion — a crowd without violence, perfectly self-controlled — the meeting of a nation. There was a poor old Chinaman with a sore and swollen foot, on the heel of which he used to limp, begging, about the City and Holborn. By some chance he became involved in the crowd opposite the New Law Courts, where it was very thick; and he was soon at a loss what to do with his big, bandaged foot without boot. At that moment the name of China stank. But the old Canton beggar was no sooner seen to be in difficulties than the press opened before him; he hobbled forward; a murmur spread round him — half jeer, half cheer — and a rain of five or six pennies made him blessed. He hobbled through a lane which instantly closed behind him, thanking the gods for war.

The bells of St. Clement Danes burst out, telling the notes of a slow hymn-tune.

Eastward, in a window of the Daily News, there was a big sheet of paper, written over in large, blue-pencil letters with the words: War with Russia.’

Westward, in the facade of the National Liberal Club, there was a square, white space exhibited to the public inscribed with the words in charcoal: ‘War with France and Germany.’

‘I s’y,’ said a work-girl to her lover, ‘there’s a blooming Frenchman a-looking at the placard. Can’t you tell by the squint of him!’

‘Oh, don’t show him to me, or I’ll go straight for him,’ said Bill; ‘a Frenchman mykes me sick.’

But the girl’s remark was passed on; eyes were directed toward monsieur. He turned white, finding himself at the mercy of the crowd. But no harm was done to him; he was only quietly but persistently hustled, till he reached a comparatively empty by-street, dripping with the sweats of fear.

The exhibition of gratuitous notices in windows and at doors was the order of the day. Old habits of Stoic silence seemed for the moment to have disappeared — for the moment was ecstatic. Europe, it was felt, had drifted — drifted from the old moorings — into what new seas and latitudes? At Gatti’s place in the Strand was written up in huge letters: Italy to the Rescue!’ In the shop window of some foreign faddist in Soho appeared these words: ‘Russia is the Natural Ally of England’; and in Holborn, at the First Avenue Hotel, which was richly decorated with British and American flags, these words: ‘One Blood, One Race, One Speech.’

A little street arab in half an hour attained to sudden wealth; he was a newspaper boy, and had in his hand a bundle of three Stars. In a moment of inspiration, Harry Tibbies, jammed against one of the lions in Trafalgar Square, nimbly flung and twisted himself on to the pedestal, and held aloft his Stars. Thousands of eyes turned upon him. He took from his pocket a match, and deliberately applied the flame to the papers. Pointing to the smoke and flame, he cried in his shrillest Cockney:

‘That’s the French. So much for them!’

Thereupon he turned and pointed upward to the statue of Nelson. A shout of cheers at once filled the square, while the urchin was bombarded with a hail of pennies, sixpences, shillings, till he could no longer gather them up. When he had been lifted down, and coddled by the laughing crowd, ah old gentleman got from him his address, and promised to remember him 'if ...' but at 'if' he stopped.

Down by St. Stephen's some cheers were making themselves heard. It was three o'clock — a Thursday. The members were arriving in crawling carriages, one by one.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor stood up, leaning forward in his cab, bowing on each side, like Royalty. One man shouted: 'Strike hard, Tay Pay!' And another: 'Don't spare them!' Mr. O'Connor drove out his large fist, and shook it in fearful menace at the sun.

The round orb of Mr. Chamberlain's eye-glass was all that could be distinctly made out of him, but behind it, his face seemed Rhadamanthine in its sternness, ashen in its pallor. A profound silence fell upon the people as he passed.

Within the House itself the benches were soon crowded, all but the Treasury and front Opposition benches. Prayers were read. So far there was no sign of impatience or emotion. There were 'Questions,' though there was nobody to answer them; there was also a Light Railway Bill for somewhere to be reported, and the House calmly proceeded to the business in hand.

It was a place of stately traditions; the exhibition of emotion had always been foreign to it. Even when the elementary passions of humanity broke through, and swept like whirlwinds within its walls, it had known how to comport itself with a dignity impossible to the other senates of the world.

No one, observing its outward aspect during that half-hour, could have dreamed that the nation it had led so long from greatness to greatness stood on the very brink of swift and final ruin.

The Speaker put the question whether the Railway Bill should be reported. Only two Labour members rose to oppose it. The Speaker said presently:

‘I think the Ayes have it.’

The thing was done. All eyes cast furtive glances in the direction of the spot behind the Speaker’s chair. At that moment the form of Mr. Balfour was seen advancing slowly toward the Ministerial Bench.

Behind him, in a strange topsy-turvydom of party, came Sir William Harcourt talking to Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. Asquith whispering to Mr. Curzon. Others followed. Then it was seen with a thrill, born of the certainty now of calamity, that the Prince of Wales had just quietly walked into the Peers’ Gallery, immediately followed by Lords Salisbury, Rosebery, and the Duke of Devonshire. Peering through the gratings of the Ladies’ Gallery were Mrs. Gladstone, the Duchess of York, and others, while the Italian and American ambassadors sat in the places reserved for diplomats.

Below, in the body of the Chamber, was not a sound, except a faint scratching of the pen of the Clerk to the House. Yonder, in the Press Gallery, the alert pressmen held pencil or pen ready, eager to record for ever every word of the momentous utterance which was coming.

In the spirit of the House was deep commotion; on the surface calm.

Mr. Balfour rose to speak.

His face bore traces of some sort of suffering, like that of a man who has passed through the travail of a great ordeal. This was partly due to a want of sleep, occasioned by the stress of the last few days. Under his eyes were the semicircles of fatigue. But, apart from this, the face which he turned absently round the House before he spoke was changed: the dilettante politician, the charming literary amateur, the ennuyé loungeur — these familiar phases of his personality were no longer in evidence. Care sat on his faded cheek, a gravity heavy as the world.

He made a half-turn toward the Speaker, and as he said ‘Sir,’ and paused, his neck stiffened with dignity.

‘Sir,’ he repeated, ‘I need make no apology at the present time for interrupting the ordinary routine of the business of this House. Some adumbration of what I have to say must have already entered the mind of every one present. And yet, perhaps, not even the most far-seeing and the most prophetic of us may have been able to forecast the gravity of the announcement which it is now my duty to make to this House and to the people of Britain.

‘The recent course of affairs in China is known to all of us, and to all the world. It has not been suggested, even by our enemies, that our policy in that country, either originally or recently, was an aggressive one. The enterprise of our citizens, indeed, in the ordinary course of commerce, secured for them the greater part of the foreign trade of the land; but with that strong and large bounty of our race, which resembles nothing so much as the free air of heaven and the breadths of the ocean which it inhabits, we have left it open to every man on the face of the earth to go and do likewise, by engaging in free competition with ourselves. Later on we secured the appointment of an Englishman to the Controllershship of the Imperial Maritime Customs in China; in view of the fact that our trade with China amounted to a sum of ten millions sterling annually, this was a step dictated by ordinary caution. But what has been the consequence to other nations? This: that our nominee has impartially distributed all subordinate posts in his gift to French, German, Russian, and Englishman alike, regardless of nationality, regardful only of merit. Such has been our action in the past. With regard to recent events, we know, and our enemies know, that the Government of this country has, in its holy passion for the maintenance of the peace of the world, submitted to affronts, to wrongs, to insults even, which would, weeks ago, have driven any of the less restrained Ministries of continental empires into a declaration of war.

‘Even on points where undoubtedly many an Englishman would have considered that concession was derogatory to honour, we made concessions. We asked only of Germany that Tientsin should be a free port; of France, that Yun-nan should be open to British enterprise; of Russia, that the valley of the Yangtse river should remain neutral country. Without threats, with no exhibition of heat, we claimed these rights.

‘The reply of France, of Germany, and of Russia has been a declaration of hostilities.

‘Two hours ago their respective Ambassadors placed a notice of war in the hands of the Government.’

The House received this announcement with a perfect stillness, in which horror contended with indignation. Mr. Balfour continued:

‘It is impossible to doubt that this vast combination of power is the result of a wilful and wicked conspiracy, aimed primarily at the British Empire, but aimed, in the end, against the progress and happiness of the human race. It comes upon us, like a bolt from unclouded skies, at an hour when the democracies of the world, recovering from centuries of mutual bloodshed, begin to catch glimpses of the dawn of a better day, and look forward to the yet fairer fruits of the peace which they enjoy. Sir, the declaration of this war is a blasphemy against mankind, and can proceed only from those mysterious powers of evil which seem ever to stand ready to mar the blessedness of the earth. Away now, for many a day, with the fair aspects of our modern life, the quietude of homes, and the untroubled flow of things. With one thought, at least, every Englishman may console himself, as he goes forth to bear his part in this stupendous struggle: “Britain is not to blame.” Not to blame — and yet not all-unprepared, I think, sir, to comport herself with high valour, as of old, in this the greatest crisis of her august history. Nor is it probable that there lives a single Englishman, who, even in this hour of trial, can doubt that that same Providence which has led our race from small beginnings to the empire of half the earth, will, in its dark purposes, conduct it yet further upon its destiny of triumph and glory.’

Mr. Balfour sat down in the midst of a cheer which burst from every member of the House — English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh — in a very tempest of loyal passion. The assembly leapt to its feet, and volley on volley of enthusiasm filled the chamber with sound. Exultation, for the moment, took the place of dignity; and there ensued an exaggeration of one of those whirlwind ‘scenes’ which have occurred at intervals. Members bounded across the breadth of the House; in the midst of the tumult, Mr. Burns was seen at the Treasury .. Bench, shaking the hand of Mr. Chamberlain; two Irish members were sobbing in a kind of hysteria to each other; and Mr. Labouchère, forgetting, was shouting to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who happened to catch his eye: ‘Russia must be conquered first, and then France — Russia first!’

During this row and chaos, Sir William Harcourt rose, seeming to wish to speak. A Labour member, who had been talking at the Speaker’s chair, rushed away. ‘Order! Order!’ cried the Speaker, rising. Almost instantly the House resumed its quiet, and sat once more stern and impressive. In five minutes it had spent its exuberance. Now it was the Parliament of Britain again.

It was noticed now, with wonder, that Sir William was at the Treasury Bench instead of on the Opposition side. Mr. Balfour near him, was leaning his head on his hands in a pose of absolute weariness. Sir William said:

‘I am asked, sir, to say a few words by the Leader of the House. It was his intention to add a few brief words to what he has already said; but the mental strain put upon him during the last few days has left him in a state of practical collapse. The right hon. gentleman has asked me to supply his place. If it should seem strange to any honourable member that the Leader of the Opposition should be asked to supply the place of the Leader of the House, I can only reply that the Opposition now consists of the countries of Russia, France, and Germany; in this country, certainly, there is no longer an Opposition. (Loud cheers.) I believe it to be a fact, sir, that if the rulers of the Continental empires in question had had any kind of conception of the real temper of the nation which they have wantonly and cruelly attacked, they would have paused — they would have hesitated. It is a country hard to conquer, sir — a race hard to quell; at least, it will be a united race and country. Liberal and Radical and Tory shall henceforth lose their titles in the common appellation of Soldier; there shall be no more Orangeman, and no more Parnellite; these shall merge their names in the common name of Patriot. The moment is great; but England is great, too, and equal to the moment. (Prolonged cheering.) I have risen to announce, sir, that the chiefs of the former Opposition have this hour come from a meeting in Downing Street, which we were requested to attend by the Leader of the House with a view to the formation, between us, of a Permanent Committee of Public Safety. I wish also to state that an immediate reduction of the interest on Consols and Government Stock from two and three-quarters to one and a half per cent is proposed; that a tax on non-professional incomes exceeding £1000, considerably in excess of the present rate, has been agreed upon; and that the House will be asked to read three times and report to-day — for it is possible that hostilities have already commenced — a Bill granting to the Government a sum of seventy-five million pounds for war expenses.’

After this, with perfectly business-like calm and grasp of details, the House proceeded to the matter in hand, getting through a mass of work with a celerity which astonished itself. Near six it rose.

An hour previously the Serjeant-at-Arms, attended by a mass of city functionaries, had declared war against the three countries from the steps of the Royal Exchange.

Meanwhile, the news had gone like wild-fire through the country; and everywhere it met with the same indignation, scorn, and hard-headed pride. It was not, as Sir William Harcourt had shrewdly said, a particularly easy task which the nations of Europe had undertaken.

England might break; but it was already clear that she was not fashioned of the kind of steel which could be made to bend.

CHAPTER VI. HARDY

‘INVASION’ WAS THE word which more frequently than any other rose to the lips of Englishmen.

The muster of French, Russian, and German ships in the Northern Seas was eagerly criticised. It was found that their weight of metal was overpoweringly great compared with the small muster of the Channel Squadron. Away out in the China Seas the British fleet had been strengthened; it was cruising in force in the Mediterranean; it was at the Cape, at Australia, at North America, at the West Indies, in the Pacific; it was not in the English Channel.

Under these conditions the war-like activity in Britain itself went on with intensity. Even before the declarations of war the Adjutant-General had issued telegraphic orders all over the country for the calling out of the first-class army reserve, and the mobilisation of the militia and volunteers. With wondrous celerity commercial England turned herself into military England. What conscription did for foreign countries, that the manly mood of the race did for us. The women of England, especially, exhibited a spirit as war-like as the peril of their country was immense; and banishing fears and tears, they put on the sternly-proud brows of those heroic Roman matrons, who laughed when their sons were borne home dead with wounds in front. ‘Go along, boy, and give it ’em ’ot this time!’ said a Clerkenwell mother, handing his musket to her son. ‘And don’t be a-sparing o’ thot sword o’ thoine, Jock,’ was the admonition of a Lancashire wife as her husband, in premature haste, set out, like many another, to flock to the regimental centre, before receiving the intimation that his presence was requisitioned. ‘And you’ll give them a good taste of what old Devon men are like, won’t you, Steve?’ was the exhortation of a Bideford lass. This was the mood — heroic, nothing less. Night and day the regimental districts and all military centres were hard at work, calling rolls, drafting troops to their regiments, and making all necessary preparations. A sound of trumpets reechoed through the land.

On the night of the announcement in the House of Commons, at about ten o’clock, — suddenly, on the east balcony of Buckingham Palace, the Queen appeared.

It had been supposed that she was still at Windsor, and by what contrivance she came here without attracting attention was unknown; to the crowds, thirsting, as they were, for some outward symbol of the might of England to which they could vent their intolerable emotions of love and loyalty, she appeared like a god-send dropped from Heaven.

One involuntary far-reaching shout of joy, spreading by contagion far up Piccadilly, far along Pall Mall, and re-echoed in thousand-fold acclamations, even by those who could not see her, burst instantly forth. A strong limelight or electric-light arrangement had been contrived, which focussed a powerful beam of white concentrated luminosity around her, and shot in shimmering rays far out and down through the night. Grouped around her was a party of the Royal family. On the right, the Prince of Wales; on her left, Lord Salisbury. In her hand she held aloft an object, the significance of which the crowd for a moment failed to grasp. When it did, the enthusiasm intensified beyond all bounds. It was one of the faded and ragged old flags, brought that afternoon from St. Paul’s, which had served as ensigns in Wellington’s Peninsular campaign.

A scene similarly striking was being witnessed on the esplanade at Southsea at the same hour, where some seven thousand blue-jackets, and the marines from Gosport, were on parade, and were being reviewed by the Princess May. Hither she had hurried after witnessing the scene in the House, and by the side of her sailor-husband, and Sir Michael Culme-Seymour, rode from end to end of the improvised ranks. Prince George addressed the men with a message of confidence from the Queen, and hinted at the awful odds which they would probably soon be called upon to face. He and every one was conscious that he was talking to doomed men.

The Princess dismounted. She had a basket, which she opened, and from it took a strip of blue ribbon. A high flush of ardour mantled her face as she attached it to the bosom of a staff-captain near her. A touch of pathos was added to the ceremony through which she now deftly went by the fact that she wore a loose velvet mantle, the reason for which could not be concealed. To every officer, from fleet-captain and commodore to sub-lieutenant and cadet, she attached the little symbol of affection. So solemn was the rite that even the crowd was silent. It was her salute to the dying.

But even during the progress of this scene, one of a number of picket-boats which had been sent out from Portsmouth during the day was steaming into the harbour, fussy with news.

She and two companions, smart little steam-pinnaces which flitted through water like fish, had, earlier in the day, spied a fleet of cuirassés, canonnières, croiseurs, and bâtiments de transport about S. by E. from Newhaven, fifty miles out. They were mostly French, but there were some German also.

The three boats, at intervals of a few minutes, came panting into Portsmouth harbour, like fluttered birds. Each contained five men, and the fifteen, almost at the same time, stood grouped round the Commander-in-Chief on the Hard.

‘Could you make out what ships they were?’ he asked.

‘We were rather too far off for that, sir,’ answered a sub. near him.

There was silence for half a minute.

It was broken by a voice, which said:

‘The Amiral Baudin is among them, sir, the Hoche, the Massena, the Kaiser and the Deutschland

Sir Michael Culme - Seymour turned; he looked at the speaker; his eyebrows lifted a little. He did not know him.

Then, after a minute’s deliberation, the Admiral said:

‘How many ships all told?’

‘There are about seventeen battleships, sir,’ answered a midshipman eagerly, ‘about twenty to twenty-three cruisers, and a large fleet of liners — Messag ries Maritimes and Norddeutscher Lloyd — with an indefinite number of gun and torpedo boats, tenders, and composite small craft. They are making for Bognor, Littlehampton, or perhaps Worthing in a quadruple line of a good twenty or thirty cables’ interval.’

‘There can hardly be seventeen battleships,’ said the Admiral musingly. ‘Do you confirm that?’

He turned suddenly to the unknown person who had addressed him before — a mere stripling with a face highly flushed with excitement.

‘Well — not quite, sir,’ the young man replied; ‘I decided that there were fourteen battleships, twenty-four cruisers, thirty-eight troopships and liners, and a flotilla of 104 small fry.’

‘You seem pretty certain of your figures?’ the Admiral said, with a smile.

‘Middlingly certain, sir.’

‘May I ask — who are you?’

‘My name is John Hardy, sir.’

‘And your ship?’

‘The Powerful, sir.’

‘Then, what on earth are you doing here?’

(The Powerful was away out in the Yellow Sea, whither she had been commissioned since the previous year)

‘Looking about, sir,’ replied the young man, dropping his light-blue eyes.

‘But why are you not in China?’

‘I fell ill just as my ship was going to sail, sir,’ and as he said it, he gave one of those peculiar half-secret coughs, so indicative of the consumptive chest.

‘I see. Well — but how came you to be in the Jupiter’s picket-boat?’

‘I was on the Jupiter as a middy before joining the Powerful, sir. Captain MacLeod knows me, and has been kindly pleased to notice me. I am a bird without a roost. I came down from London, hoping for some of the trouble down here. Captain MacLeod allowed me to take—’

‘Ah, that explains it, then. Well, he seems to have done well.’

The Commander-in-Chief bestowed upon him a smile of passing approval, and turned away. In a moment he had forgotten the young seaman; but when, a little later, he was reading a telegram from the chief coastguardsman at Worthing, giving the sighted ships of the enemy, number for number, as Hardy had given them, then he thought once more of John Hardy.

‘Extraordinary genius for facts,’ he murmured.

The Admiral knew that the picket-boats must, in order to avoid being blown out of the water, have reconnoitred the advancing fleet at such a distance as to be themselves invisible, or nearly so, to the enemy. There could be no doubt that John Hardy's long-lashed, azure-blue eyes possessed the faculty of seeing.

It often happened that people who came into contact with this young sailor thought of him a second time at unexpected moments, as the Admiral now did.

In a previous chapter we said that Dr. Yen How, sitting in a London 'bus on a certain night, was 'perhaps' the most important person in the world. We should have stated the fact with quite absolute decision, if it were not that we were thinking of this particular sub-lieutenant, John Hardy.

They two — the little Chinese doctor, and this consumptive English lad — held in their hands the destinies of the world.

Each had his own idea of the shape which the future of the human race should take; each was determined that it should take the shape which he chose, and no other; and each was immensely strong.

It was fated that these two should meet — soon — and more than once.

It was now six o'clock, and the blue-jackets had already passed in a swarm of hurrying boats to their respective ships. As the telegrams arrived from the coastguardsmen on the south-east coast they were transmitted by semaphore to the fleet. The Magnificent, under Rear-Admiral John Fellowes, was the flagship of the second-in-command of the Channel Squadron, and now, in the absence of the Majestic, became the flagship of the fleet.

At the Horse Guards, meanwhile, Lord Wolseley was receiving and sending message after message, both telephonic and telegraphic, relating to the despatch of troops from Aldershot, Victoria, London Bridge, and Clapham Junction to the South. Every ten minutes a Brighton and South Coast train, packed with over a thousand regulars and volunteers carrying a day's cooked rations, dashed forth from each of these stations. Away in hasty flight swept the long strings of bristling carriages, the throttle-valves shrieking the dragon-cry of defiance and challenge which England sent out in answer to her foes.

By seven o'clock fifteen thousand men were massed upon Brighton, and an unaccustomed rattle of some ninety limbers sent thrills of very unusual dismay through the placid bourgeoisie of London-by-the-Sea. War, so long a word and a myth, had suddenly become a thing, real enough, near enough. Long files of private carriages, taking away mostly women and children, wended northward upon the Brighton road, while a crowd filled the steep street leading to the station, to watch the ever-new batch of arrivals which debarked at all the platforms, up and down alike, and at sidings, the empties being returned along the up and down lines according to convenience. By eight o'clock thirty thousand troops with one hundred and ten guns, under Sir Evelyn Wood, were concentrated, and waiting for the enemy; and all through the night the number was being rapidly increased.

But they waited in vain.

England had been several times invaded by foreigners. The last occasion was in the year 1066, and that occasion Providence designed to be the last for ever. This land had since then nursed a race as superb and firm as the foot with which she spurned the breakers raving round her inviolate shores.

At one bell in the second dog-watch the signal was given from the flag-ship: the Channel Squadron, in a double line ahead, at intervals of six cables, some under forced draught, was to steam down Spithead for the Channel, the Magnificent, like the bell-wether of a flock, leading one line, the Prince George the other.

At that moment John Hardy climbed from the look-out pinnacle which he had been permitted to command, on to the deck of the Jupiter.

His heart misgave him, he shrank within himself, he slunk guiltily. He knew that he had only to be noticed to be turned peremptorily away. He was merely a visitor, a guest — a privileged one, it is true — but an outsider. That he should dream of taking part in the coming fight was preposterous, the more so as every man knew beforehand that all were going to certain death. And he had no shadow of status in any ship present.

But he wanted desperately to see the row, and his mind was one of those dominant ones not very subject to considerations of routine.

Once, when a ‘chief-captain’ of cadets on the Britannia, with no further temptation to dissoluteness than his weekly two-and-sixpence of pocket-money, he had been reported to the Admiralty for ‘unsatisfactory conduct’; another such report, and he would have bidden farewell to the British Navy for ever. It was that same gipsy attitude of mind, that sort of devil-may-care lawlessness characteristic of him, which was working in him now, as he stood sulkily there, abaft the after-funnel. He felt like being shut out and banished — and he wanted to see the row. He thought of skedaddling and hiding till the ship was well out from land.

But there was a suspicion of meanness in this contrivance, and even while he hesitated, Captain Angus MacLeod sighted him.

The captain had been an intimate friend of Hardy’s father, and was an executor of the very large real and personal fortune of which the boy was the heir. Hardy now, at the age of nearly nineteen, was an orphan. The family was Hampshire. The country-house in which he had passed his earlier boyhood lies fifteen miles south of Andover.

The captain beckoned. Hardy ran and stood before him on the hurricane-deck with downcast eyes, and cheeks blushing like a girl’s. By nature he was extremely bashful.

‘You here?’ said the captain, with a deep seriousness in his tone.

‘As you see, sir,’ answered John, with a faint attempt at a smile, and a nervous shifting of a leg.

‘You know as well as I do, John,’ said the captain sternly, ‘that this is only a piece of insolence on your part!’

‘If it strikes you in that light, sir — of course: but I should take it very kindly of you if you could see your way to let me be in for the trouble.’

‘In for the trouble? This is a most unprecedented piece of cheek, John Hardy! Be good enough to get ashore, sir. Do you imagine that I am going to have your blood on my hands, then?’

‘Whose blood, sir?’

‘Your blood, sir!’

‘My blood is all right, sir,’ said John sulkily.

‘Come, come, are you sane? Can’t you see that we are all going to pretty certain death, boy?’

‘I can’t think that, sir.’

‘Not? Aren’t French and German cannon as good as English, then?’

‘They may be on land, sir; but hardly, I think, on Her Majesty’s seas.’

At these words, ‘Her Majesty’s seas,’ back went the captain’s head in one sudden cry of gleeful laughter. Her Majesty’s seas! Perhaps there was not one living man English enough, and audacious enough, to produce that phrase, save this particular sub-lieutenant standing bashfully there.

But he, on his part, saw nothing extraordinary in the phrase — it slipped from him quite naturally, an offspring of his quietly supercilious habit of mind.

The captain’s face settled soon again to gravity. This was no laughing matter.

‘But we are wasting time, John Hardy,’ he said severely. ‘Will you be good enough, now, to leave my ship?’

‘In what, sir?’

‘In — in — what did you come in?’

‘In the picket-boat, sir.’

The captain turned his face from side to side, puzzled and irritated. John, seeing entreaty useless, was adopting tactics.

‘You shan’t stay here, sir — that is certain,’ cried the captain. ‘Somehow or other — you go! Get the dinghy.’

‘Shall I scull her ashore, sir?’

‘Yes.’

‘And who will bring her back, sir?’

‘I don’t care! Take two blue-jackets, then.’

‘Isn’t it rather late, sir?’

‘How?’

‘I fancy the ship is already moving rapidly through the water, sir.’

The captain started.

‘Boy, boy,’ he muttered under his breath. He loved the lad, and had loved his father.

But the captain was just now extremely busy. He tossed his hand and walked away. The strength and tenacity of John Hardy’s will sometimes produced results which had the look of fate and inevitableness.

And so it happened that he was with the Channel Squadron, borne in the Jupiter, when it steamed at thirteen knots past Selsey Bill to meet the fleet of the Allies.

CHAPTER VII. IN THE CHANNEL

DR. YEN HOW had his Idea, and John Hardy had his. Nothing in the world is of such supreme importance as an Idea.

Dr. Yen How's Idea was this: that the cupidity and blind greed of the white races could be used by the yellow man as a means to the yellow man's triumph; the white races could be made to exterminate each other preparatory to the sweep, in hundreds of millions, of the yellow man over an exhausted and decimated Europe. Hence the grants by China of territories to Russia, Germany, and France — and the consequent war.

John Hardy's Idea was this: that the new naval warfare admitted of every bit as much constructive plan and shrewd sea-tactics as the old; that the sailor-hero was still possible — the new Drake, the new Richard Grenville, the new Nelson; that it was not (as every one supposed) a mere question of weight of metal, or superiority of gun-fire, now any more than it ever was; that a man born with the sea in his soul, and the sea breeze in his hair, like the old sailor-souls, would still do the trick.

This was his Idea; and he had also this other, subsidiary to that first one — had it more vitally than any other modern Briton — that nothing in the world was of the least importance, except England, and the march of England, and the glory of England.

Perhaps the lad was utterly unconscious that he had these ideas, but he had them; they were there in him, radically and profoundly; and if he was unconscious of them, as he was of his circulation, that was an added proof of their radicalness and profundity.

His nature was as elementary, and simple, and strong, as the nature of Dr. Yen How.

Just as the captain of the Jupiter flung his head irritably and turned from him, John Hardy caught the sleeve of a middy who was hurrying past, and said eagerly:

‘I have got permission to see the row after all!’

‘Good biz,’ the middy nodded, as he passed on. ‘I wish you joy!’

And presently he was at the sleeve of a sub., saying:

‘Here I am, you see. I have got permission to look on at the row after all!’

‘It is like your ubiquitous luck, Hardy,’ the other said, and hurried by.

Hardy was usually more taciturn than this; the fact that he went about in this way volunteering his news showed that he was more or less excited, out of himself. He was going to see a fight — a real one this time. To this moment he had no idea what a naval battle was actually like. Summer manoeuvres were a different affair.

His coldly practical nature was illustrated by the fact that the grudging quality of the captain’s permission did not at all lessen his satisfaction; he had got it — that was enough. He looked only at results.

The object of the enemy was to effect a landing at Shoreham, or near it — a quiet spot, less conspicuous than Brighton or Worthing. They hoped by their prompt and sudden arrival, so soon after the declaration of war, to catch the British fleet napping — as, in fact, they partially did — and so to be able to land three corps d’armée, consisting of 120,000 men, 360 guns, 30,000 horses, and a fairly adequate commissariat and field-transport matériel without the inconvenience of first of all undergoing a naval engagement.

Their sudden presence on the shores of Britain proved that war must have been secretly premeditated and prepared for by them some time before the declaration of hostilities — another indication of that suspicion of treachery which, all through, characterised the action of the Allies in this war. But the excellent telescopes of the coast-guards, and the brisk scouts of the British fleet, served to give a warning which, though late, was not hopelessly so. The enemy, moreover, in their over-confidence, had committed an error in tactics in approaching too near the coast while there was still a little twilight.

Off Bognor the captains and commanders of ships were assembled in the large ward-room of the Majestic. Rear-Admiral John Fellowes had signalled half-speed and summoned them to a conference.

The officers sat round, hanging on his words, as the Rear-Admiral began to speak.

‘Of course, gentlemen/ he said, ‘it has been a matter of anxious consideration to me in what formation we are to approach the enemy. What makes our arrangements rather difficult is the fact that we know little of their present disposition. But it seems to me that one thing should be certain — namely, that their troop-ships and liners will be stationed well in the rear, while the whole weight of metal of their ships of war will be put forward to protect their land forces on the liners, etc. They will assume that our first care will be to destroy their land forces in our panic at the idea of invasion, and their whole effort will be bent upon protecting them, and frustrating us.

‘Of course, in thus guessing our objects they are right enough. We wish, naturally, to baulk the attempt at invasion; but I must point out to you that our object, to be wise, must be twofold, and that our secondary object is more important than our first. I mean, that from the reports we have received of the number of transports, etc., it is impossible that they can have with them a land-force of more than 120,000 to 160,000 men, and that, even supposing these effect a landing, the land-forces at present in Britain are possibly quite capable of dealing with them, provided the enemy be not reinforced by fresh increments of invading army-corps in the near future.

‘It must, then, be our business to make such fresh invasions impracticable for some little time by shattering, as far as we can, the enemy’s powers of convoy — that is, their ships of war. For I need not point out to you that the combined countries of France, Russia, and Germany may place several millions of armed men in England, practically as fast as they choose, if only they have ships to bring them over, and a convoy to protect them from the battleships and coast-defence ironclads at British stations. And against such forces the land-force of Britain would, of course, be impotent.

‘This, then, is my point of view. We must send back our invaders with such a rip in their battered metal that these particular war-ships shall have had enough of invasion for some little time.

‘In the effort we shall all probably perish, but that, I take it, is not with any of us a matter of salient importance.

‘What I propose is this: that we approach to within five miles of the enemy in our present formation; if they approach us in line abreast, or in a semicircle convex or concave, then we echelon right and left respectively, each battleship fastening on the nearest antagonist as fortune may decide; while gunboats, torpedo-boats, and fast third-class cruisers like the Pelorus, will deploy right and left in an attempt to get behind the enemy, where they will do all the damage they can, special attention being given to the destruction of rudders and screws, so as to obviate their ramming-power.

‘If, on the other hand, they confront us in line ahead, then we retain our formation, the first ship attacking the first, the second the second, and so on.

‘My instructions at present cannot, of course, but be general, and much, in any case, must be left to individual initiative — happily so, I think, in the case of British commanders. Further orders will, if necessary, be sent out by trumpet-call, and passed from ship to ship in both files.’

A bow of acquiescence went round the table. The policy was felt to be bad for the immediate present, but wise for the immediate future.

At that moment the flag-lieutenant of the Rear-Admiral entered the room.

‘The enemy’s fleet is reported in sight, sir,’ he said.

‘Ah! what is the hour?’

‘Nearly three bells, sir.’

‘What has been made out?’

‘Only three electric search-lights in a line — probably they are thirteen miles off.’

‘Are preparations well advanced on board?’

‘Yes, sir.’

‘And the same, I presume, in all your ships, gentlemen?’

They all expressed assent.

‘Well, then, gentlemen, here, you see, we are in for it— “it” meaning the first really great naval battle of modern times. I dare say that we shall conduct ourselves with credit, fighting as we do in the name of justice and our country. In half an hour, say, we shall be face to face with these people. I recommend that a ration of grog be served out to all bluejackets meantime, and that final preparations be pushed forward. My flag-lieutenant will send up as signal the words “For England.” I think that is all I need say now, except to wish you a very hearty good-bye, and a fine fight, and the aid and favour of Almighty God.’

The officers, having saluted, trooped hurriedly forth with mutual adieux, and half-satiric, half-sad morituri salutamus, and went away through the gloom each to his own ship.

The snouts of the ponderous bulks of metal were ploughing leisurely through the sea.

Yonder, lit by flash-light on the flag-ship, fluttered the battle-word of the coming combat—'For England.'

But the night now had darkened. A wind freshened from the sou'-west, and drove sombre expeditions of slow cloud over the face of the scurrying and struggling moon. She seemed affrighted at the pregnant silence of this gliding navy — a silence pregnant with a thousand thunders. But the sea was fairly calm, crisped only with short low fringes of foam driven by the wind.

The Jupiter was the second ship in the port file — that is to say, on the side nearest the coast as the fleet forged eastwards.

Her captain had been so preoccupied with affairs during the bustle of the afternoon that he had eaten nothing for hours. Almost immediately on reaching his own ship after the conference, he hurriedly descended to his quarters, and sat to swallow some cold mouthfuls.

Happening to lift his eyes as he ate, he saw, sitting on a couch in the apartment, and quietly watching him, his guest, John Hardy. He had forgotten John.

'Well, John,' he said, across a gag of mutton, 'so you have dared, after all. In spite of my orders, eh, sir? Well, I suppose I must make the best of you, as you are here. But you are a foolish lad, you know.'

'It can't be of any consequence, sir,' said John. 'I wanted to see a fight. It is always experience.'

'Yes, yes. But a young man like you. Have you no care for your life, sir?'

‘It can’t be of any consequence, sir.’

“A day less or more,
On sea, or on shore,
We die — does it matter when?”

Is that the sort of sentiment, eh, John?’

‘Something of that sort, sir.’

‘Well, you might do worse, perhaps. But what is the matter with you?
The sweat is rolling down your face.’

‘They have been allowing me to help a little about the ship, sir.’

‘What, with your own hands, sir?’

‘Yes, sir.’

‘Well, John Hardy — I shall never have another chance of telling you, so let me tell you now, boy — I must say that I regard you as a most worthy specimen of the Navy. Your school and cadet careers were not very brilliant, were they? Rather — ahem — well — we will say nothing of that. But in other respects — you know what I would say, perhaps — I give you my Certificate — that sort of thing. Certainly, you are as bold as a fly, modest, thoroughly English — a little — er — original, perhaps, eh, sir? Like your father, eh, sir? But with the makings of a great sailor in you, John Hardy. Pity you should be throwing yourself away like this.’

John was blushing.

‘You are very kind, sir,’ he just muttered.

‘Do not mention it. The circumstances excuse one, you know, in being quite frank.’

‘Quite so, sir.’

John, all the time, was burning to ask a question. Suddenly he said:

‘Might I ask, sir, what are the proposed tactics for the battle?’

‘Well, John, there’s going to be plenty of fun, apparently, for you to see. The idea is to concentrate all our efforts upon the battleships and big cruisers, so as to render it out of the question, if possible, for this particular fleet again to act as convoy to an invading force.’

‘And the liners and transports, sir?’

* They are to be left severely alone this time.’

* To land their troops on British soil, sir?’

‘Yes, boy — yes — this time.’

Suddenly John Hardy leapt to his feet, his hands clenched, his face inflamed.

‘Oh, sir!’ he cried.

The captain looked at him in surprise, saying:

‘Well, what’s the matter?’

‘Captain MacLeod, England will never bear such an indignity!’

‘Well, my boy, but war, you understand, is not fun and heroics — it is dead earnest. England will have to bear it, I’m afraid.’

‘She shan’t, by God!’ cried John Hardy, striking out his right fist, suddenly riven and smitten by the Call of Heaven within him.

Then, immediately, he fell back upon the couch, sobbing bitterly into his two hands.

The captain stood over him, patting his shoulder, murmuring:

‘Poor John! poor John!’

CHAPTER VIII. THE BATTLE

THE FLEETS DREW nearer, vaguely revealed to each other by electric search-lights.

That morning, as early as five o'clock, the French, Russian, and German national anthems had been played, on board the fleet of the Allies at Brest, and the colours saluted. Immediately afterwards the ships steamed out of harbour. The land-troops were already massed on board the transports.

To prevent their movements being watched and reported, they had proceeded at a high speed, never very far from the French coast, till they reached the longitude of Fécamp; then, striking directly northward for Beachy Head, had slackened speed about five o'clock, forty miles from the coast; then, as the twilight gathered, they had deflected their course to about west by north, making in a leisurely way for the neighbourhood of Shoreham. When they first became aware of the approach of the British fleet, they were moving almost directly westward, as the British were moving directly eastward.

The formation of the enemy was in a quadruple line abreast. In the front were fourteen first-class battleships at twelve cables' interval; in the second, cruisers of the three classes; in the third, gunboats, torpedo-boats, and composite gun-vessels; in the fourth, the array of liners and troop-ships bearing the land-forces.

The British Rear-Admiral had rightly surmised what would be the action of the French Contre-Amiral; his primary thought was for the troop-ships. Out from the flagship went a trumpet-call, repeated far over the ocean in a long line of sonorous and brazen-lunged iteration. Down the files of ships it went braying, a voice that died and instantly rose in vibrant outcry again, commanding all troopers and liners to go pacing backward twelve miles to eastward, and there maintain a hollow square till further notice.

Through the wide region of black smoke which poured forth now over the Channel from the entire allied fleet, flocked the captains of ships to a hurried conference with Contre-Amiral des Vismes de Monthier on the Amiral Baudin.

His recommendation was that the allied battleships should form in two double lines, converging inwards toward the British ships, just as the British ships (as could be already surmised) were diverging outward toward the Allies. He said: 'We have fourteen battleships — they, I take it, eight.' (In reality, the British battleships only numbered seven, for the Majestic was gone.) 'I propose, then, that the four battleships of our present line now farthest to starboard will form the outer converging line of starboard attack, and the next four the inner converging line, parallel to the outer; thus, toward the coast, two starboard lines of eight allied battleships will have between their broadsides a line of four British battleships — and the contest, I think, should be short.

'In the same way with our port battleships; the three farthest to port will form the outer converging line, the next three the inner — thus two port lines of six allied battleships will have between their broadsides a line of four British battleships, eight to four, and six to four. The contest should not be long, messieurs. I even suggest, as a point of tactics, that, in view of our preponderance, we should make our victory instantaneous by placing a very short interval between the combatant ships — say, a kilometre at the most; for, of course, the shorter the conflict the less our damage — a point of immeasurable importance to us, considering the role we have to fill in convoying more invading land-forces in the near future. I need not point out, too, that an enemy's ship, hemmed in between two hostile ships, will be the more hampered in ramming, the closer the quarters. But we have little time for talk; cruisers, gunboats, and composite vessels will find their work cut out according to the dispositions of the enemy's less massive flotilla. I can only hope that these recommendations meet with your approval, as I know they do with that of my colleague, Vice-Admiral von Grudenau. Adieu, then, messieurs! This interruption to our progress will, in a quarter of an hour, be overcome. Vive la France! Vivent — vivent — les Alliés!

'Vive la France — vivent les Alliés!' repeated the allied commanders round the table, as they raised to their lips wine poured from the carafes; then, saluting, they hurried to their gigs.

And none too soon. They had hardly reached their ships, and turned them to the performance of the prescribed evolutions, when the fleet of England was upon them.

The Contre-Amiral had made a small error in guessing the formation of the British battleships. He had assumed that, their number being small, they approached the allied fleet in two divergent single lines of ships; but the British Rear-Admiral, hoping for some unknown hypothetical* advantage, had, as we have seen, decided to advance in two divergent echelons, or step-shape formations. The error was of little importance, for the Allies would quickly detect the formation, and modify their movements accordingly.

Unfortunately for them the eyes of John Hardy, with their faculty of sight and insight, were abroad over the sea that night.

He had burst into sobs in the captain's quarters of the Jupiter. The captain stood over him, patting his shoulder, wondering at the intensity of the lad's pride and patriotism.

But it was neither pride nor patriotism which was then rending the frail frame of Hardy with sobs — it was something far more. To hear irresistibly the Heavenly Call to be up and save the world, and then, at once, to be overwhelmed with the bitter sense of the strong Commonplace, and with the feeling of sheer impotence in the face of it — this is the tragedy of genius.

John sobbed. There had risen in him a sublime strength, an immoderate arrogance, and with it the tingling consciousness that, were he that night the Admiral of the Fleet, he would and could somehow save England from the shame of an invading foot; then, all at once, he remembered that he was by no means the Admiral of the Fleet. So he sobbed.

But his sobs were in the nick of time, for he had the trick of luck. They softened and touched the captain, just at the right instant.

‘Well, John, I must be going,’ he said.

John lifted up his hot face.

‘Where shall I take my place, sir?’ he asked.

‘Your place? I should stay here if I were you.’

‘May I, sir, if it is not asking too much—’

‘What?’

‘Come with you, sir.’

‘Where to?’

‘The conning-tower, sir.’

‘My good fellow!’

‘If it is not asking too much, sir. One must see the fight from somewhere, as one happens to be here.’

‘Well — but — the conning-tower!’

‘I shall make myself small, sir. You won’t talk to me, nor I, of course, to you. A guest chooses his lodging in a case of doubt, you know, sir.’

He was smiling now, and when he smiled his face was wonderfully winning.

The captain hesitated, and was lost. He said:

‘Well, you are an original, John, that’s all I can say — like your poor father before you, boy. Come along, then — come along!’

They ran briskly up.

Suddenly the still night was a-sound. The two fleets were about to mingle.

At that moment so great was the disparity of weight, that the wildest hope of patriotism could have predicted nothing but swift destruction to the British; nor was the objective of the British captains victory, but only the disablement, as far as might be, of the enemy.

To explain the appalling ruin and havoc which one pair of seeing sailor-eyes brought upon the entire allied squadron, we must employ diagrams.

The following is the formation in which the seven British battleships approached the enemy, with an interval of about a knot, or nautical mile, between each pair of ships, A being the Rear-Admiral’s ship, the Magnificent, A’ the Prince George leading the starboard echelon, and B’ the Jupiter, bearing Hardy.

The following is the formation in which the allied battleships advanced, about the same interval being preserved among ship-pairs as among British ship-pairs.

The fleets were no sooner on the point of mingling than Hardy, standing now with Captain MacLeod in the conning-tower of the Jupiter, was in full possession of their method of advance; and he was no sooner in full possession of it, than he started, his eyes widened, and words burst from him.

‘Sir,’ he cried, the enemy are advancing in two double files. It seems clear to me that they suppose us to be advancing in two single files.’

‘Yes, that is so,’ said the captain, proceeding to give the order in which John had interrupted him.

‘But, sir, sir,’ persisted John.

‘Well, John, well,’ said the captain.

‘It seems to me, sir — really — that if the Jupiter and the Victorious both put out external lights and lie low, the enemy will continue to think that we are in single file instead of in echelon, and then—’

Up leapt the captain’s arms.

‘By gad, you are right, boy!’ he cried, staring hard at Hardy, his head struck into a sudden sideward suspension of silent meditation.

Then, in a flash, he saw it all — the whole inwardness of the boy’s suggestion — the long vista of results — the whole huge drama of the enemy’s disaster.

‘Sir — Captain MacLeod — —’ said John, all eagerness.

‘But to warn the Victorious in time?’ mused the captain.

‘Send me, sir! Water from the engines — the picket-boat 1 The Victorious is only two miles off; I shall be there in three or four minutes.’

‘Well — I say yes. You understand, of course, that you will never come back.’

‘Thank you, captain — good-bye — they are done for, captain, by the Lord-!’

He was gone, rushing.

On board Her Majesty’s ships of war things were done with a certain nimbleness; everything was oiled and easy, and went off with the gliding smoothness of lightning. The Jupiter was carrying at her mast-head the bright white steam-light, on her starboard bow the usual green, and on her port bow the usual red light; by the time these were out, and the whole ship plunged into darkness, the little picket-boat was driving her head through two combs of foam, herself in darkness, with Hardy and three blue-jackets, in a direction nearly south.

The picket-boat passed before the ram of the Repulse (C'), and in less than two minutes Hardy was at the conning-tower of the Victorious (B).

Suddenly the Victorious, too, vanished into darkness.

The night was now very gloomy.

There remained a third ship, the Mars (D), whose presence it was desirable to conceal for the time being; the concealment was not so necessary, as she was more remote from the advancing fleet, and by the time the significance of her presence in her then position was understood, the mischief might be done.

But Hardy would leave nothing to chance. It was quite out of the question now that, if he attempted to reach the Mars, the little picket could live in the shattered sea-surface, into which, surely, in a minute's time all that area of water would be torn by shot and shell. Yet he dared. The little boat, in a very passion of haste, throbbing as though she would throb her little heart out, went panting north-westward toward the Mars.

Was he too late? There was a sudden shock and roar from the east, and in the night a dull glare red and morose. He sat, the tiller-ropes in one hand, the other holding a double-glass to his eyes. A gust of wind had blown away his straw hat; the breeze was a-play in his hair.

A British first-class torpedo-boat rushed sounding past him, hasting wrathfully to battle, washed in spray from stem to stern. Close by his starboard bow she dashed like an angry darting fish, leaving the little picket nodding and dipping in a choppy sea which almost swamped her hurried embassy. The next moment a shrapnel-shell burst into light a hundred yards before him. The fight had commenced — Bellona was abroad.

Was he too late? He knew now that to reach the Mars he must perish. Certainly, he could never return to the Jupiter. But he held on his way. He was full of a great joy. Now he knew verily for what he was born; it was for this — the mixed and multitudinous roar of cannon sounding over the sea — England's sea — his sea! Something in his heart, in his life's blood, and in his very soul's soul, answered to it, was akin to it. Never had he been really glad till this night. He held on his rash and desperate way.

His eyes were alight with battle.

Suddenly he said under his breath: 'Bravo I' The lights of the Mars had gone out into darkness. Her captain — Captain Henderson — had noted, first, the extinguishing of the Jupiter lights, and had been puzzled; then the going out into darkness of the Victorious. He had stood with knit brows for two minutes, and had understood. A few seconds later the Mars, too, was invisible.

At once John Hardy put his helm to starboard, running about north-east, to regain the Jupiter. He was now hurrying into the very region of the starboard limb of the enemy's fleet, and by the time he neared the Repulse, that ship was already engaged with two of the enemy. In another half-minute the sea around these three was a white tempest of thrashed and spurting spray, as when thronging hail flogs stingingly upon a lake, and the sky about them was a vague domed cavern of coppery flame. Never did sailor, in so small a craft, run the gauntlet of a more ticklish peril, passing through a sea crowded with torpedoes, and cracking shells, and balls of fire. But the picket-boat never so much as swerved; straight onward she throbbed, through the region of lurid half-light, at her stern-post the Union Jack; then once more into darkness. John Hardy sprang up the side of the dark Jupiter and ran to the conning-tower.

'You have done it, then, John?' cried Captain MacLeod; 'I congratulate you from my soul/

'Thank you, sir. Now, perhaps, I think we may see these fellows banged a little—'

‘We may, John, we may — thanks to you, boy. Wait, wait — let us see.’
It did not take long to see.

In a very few minutes the condition of the battle was this: two French ships, one on each side of her, were battering the Magnificent (A) into shambles; two more, one on each side of her, were making a wreck of the Prince George (A7); two more were tackling the Repulse (C’); the Jupiter was not fighting, the Victorious was not fighting, the Mars was not fighting — the Allies being unconscious at the moment of their presence in their then unsuspected position; one German ship was in collision with a French on the starboard side of the Resolution (C); one French ship was ramming another French ship between the Resolution and the Mars (D); another French ship was blowing a German ship out of the water at a point a long way to the west of the British fleet; and two German ships were cruising about in the same longitude, searching in vain for two enemies which should have been there, and were not.

Thus, of the fourteen allied battleships, six only were engaged in actual conflict with three British vessels, while a fourth British vessel (C) was pouring a tempest of barbette, quick-firing, and machine shot into the ships in collision on her starboard, and watching the sinking of a French ship rammed by a French on her port, side. How this complexity of tragedy overwhelmed the enemy will be readily seen by the following plan, published in every London newspaper the next morning. Black squares and small letters stand for allied ships, circles and capitals for British, the three British which put out their lights being printed black.

It will be seen from the plan that, the lights of the three ships being extinguished, the starboard limb of the allied squadron saw a straight line of British ships — namely, C, C', A', — consisting of the Resolution, the Repulse, and the Prince George. This made them certain of their conjecture that the British were advancing in two single lines, and they accordingly proceeded to port and starboard of these three, in order to attack on both broadsides; but expecting not three, but four, British vessels in each limb, the allied ships n and o went on south-westward to seek them.

Meanwhile, on their port side also, the allied ships saw a straight line of British ships, namely A, C, consisting of the Magnificent and — once again — the Resolution. Believing that this limb, too, consisted of four distinct ships, two of which were farther on, and not appreciating the fact that the same Resolution (C) was about to be attacked by two of their starboard fleet, they steamed forward. Two of their ships, c and f, reached the stations indicated on the plan, surprised to find no enemy; while two others, l and m, came into contact with two of their own starboard limb, b and e. Before she could stop her speed, m had hopelessly rammed e, and the Resolution was pouring a murderous hail upon both b and l, which had similarly collided, b at this time being an inert mass floating helplessly with screws shattered by l; while yonder to the west, c and o both searching for the missing enemy, made a sudden discovery, and began to batter each other with shrapnel, before ever guessing at the hopeless error, and the blind delusion, and the harum-scarum of disaster, in which they had been involved by the simple expedient of Hardy.

At this moment — simultaneously — the three darkened ships opened fire; and peaceful merchantmen, heading with slow industry on their diverse ways, heard far and wide over the Channel the cry and rumour of that complex war.

It was a fearful battle. Nearly all the allied ships which were in actual combat with British ships, having taken position in the hope of pouring a double broadside on the British ship, one from each side, now suddenly found themselves in the predicament which they had planned for the British; for, without warning, a dark unsuspected ship opened fire upon them, placing between two fires those who for others had planned two fires.

Thus, the ship k was between the fires of the Jupiter and the Repulse, the ship j between the fires of the Repulse and the Victorious, and the ship d between the fires of the Victorious and the Magnificent. As yet, no colours had been struck, but the Friedrich Wilhelm (b), whose stern-works had been shattered by the Duguesclin (l), was a barely-floating ruin, with only one water - tight compartment uninvaded by the waters; the Prince George (A') was just plunging — with screws high in the air, and a shriek from her burst and hissing engines that reached the clouds — to her last resting - place; the Massena (e), with a strange fatal suddenness, had sunk on being rammed by the Hoche (m); and almost immediately afterwards the Hoche herself cracked in twain amidships, struck by a torpedo intended for the Massena, which had been launched by a second-class torpedo-boat lowered in the dark by the Mars; while the Mars herself, having not yet relighted her lamps, was rammed at her central armour-belt by a second-class British cruiser, the Charybdis, the smaller ship sheering away with broken bows to go down by the head three miles away amid a crowd of allied cruisers.

Yonder to westward of the thickest region of battle, the Amiral Baudin (c), with a single 37-c.m. shell, had annihilated both funnels of the Brandenburg, while the Brandenburg, before she could detect the ruse by which she was made to destroy her own flagship, had rattled the ribs of the Amiral Baudin with a rain of thousands of rounds of machine and quick-firing 10½ and 8-c.m. shot, and had sent a barbette shell shrieking into the bowels of the French ship, where it ripped her armoured deck, and in a nightmare of fury rent the whole central interior of the vessel into debris.

It was shortly after this that even the din of that wide and various warfare received, as it were, an added shock of horror, when a broad sheet of flame was seen to rise and ride in quivering glare toward the sky, and the next moment a bang of thunder where the Repulse had been shook the universal sea. A fire had run through her entire length between-decks, and ignited at nearly the same moment every atom of explosive within her into one splendid detonation. She did not burst — she crumbled to fragments. At the same time, at the other end of that line of ships, the Magnificent was quietly going down by the poop, where a French submarine-boat had affixed a Whitehead.

In a very few minutes after the actual commencement of hostilities, four of the seven British battleships had disappeared, and nine of the allied fourteen.

Of the intricate and incalculable warfare that was darting in furious wrath in every direction in the shape of the less massive armatures little was salient where all was vast. The enemy was preponderant in number, but deficient in weight of first-class cruisers. The mutual havoc went on rapidly with complex disaster and success. Ships about to disappear rose again, blown high by torpedoes; men on the point of going down in the wheeling suction of some great vessel were arrested in their descent to be mangled by distracted shrapnel, or scalded by some flight of stinging steam; crafts were destroyed and destroyed again, and ten times destroyed again, before they sank in scattered shreds. It was an anarchy and blindness of rage, which rent the already rent, and mutilated the already murdered.

The Jupiter, by some favour of her position, was still seaworthy, when Captain MacLeod, a minute after the blowing-up of the Repulse, said aloud to himself:

‘Now, I think I might very well ram that ship.’

‘That ship’ meant the French battleship k which, now that the Repulse has gone, was turning, together with her sister-ship j, her whole attention upon the Jupiter. Part of the Jupiter’s fore-deck had already been ripped, and a fore-barbette gun unshipped.

At once she went wheeling in a sixteen-point curve to starboard, pouring at the same time a broadside upon the enemy. But it was at once seen that the most delicate seamanship would now be required, for not only was the Jupiter’s intention detected, but k began to manoeuvre to anticipate the attack by herself delivering the ram, while the chase was promptly joined by which had just lodged a finishing shell in the Victorious (B).

The three vessels, though one of them was sinking slowly, and all were more or less ruined, were intact in engines and steering-gear, and went careering in swift flight on evolutionary curves whose outcome only the nicest commanding skill could determine. To destroy a funnel of one or both — this was Captain MacLeod's hope. He started a rattle of quick-firing shot as the three vessels wheeled nearer. But there was a racket on board the Jupiter — a bursting shell — a clatter of broken plate — a stream of blood poured down John Hardy's face — Captain MacLeod fell limp at his feet.

At that moment, from the conning-towers of both the French ships there went forth the command: Prepare to ram.' The Jupiter was between them; and her captain was laid low.

But a born sailor now commanded her.

Hardy gave the order to slacken speed. With his eyes on both the hurrying, impending ships he waited thirty, thirty-five seconds; and at the right fraction of a second he ordered: 'Full steam ahead!'

Blood covered his face, and the breeze in his hair gave him an aspect of wildness and disarray; but his brain was cool.

As the poop of the Jupiter slipped elusively from between the two advancing rams there arose an outcry on both the French ships. But it was too late. No celerity of hand, no power on earth, could now avert the awful catastrophe. The two bows met, and crashed.

One of the French ships leaned to port, as if fainting in despair, then languidly sank.

Was he really in command? Captain MacLeod lay at his feet. Who knew? Would not his, John Hardy's, commands be obeyed tacitly, if he tacitly assumed the command? And heat least, was under no orders from the Rear-Admiral. He ordered three points to starboard, and full speed ahead. The Jupiter went hasting at once directly northward.

Hardy was running from the fight.

The first clear necessity seemed to him now to get out of the battle, while the Jupiter's engines were still intact.

He suspected, indeed, that she was already sinking. But there was hope. She went ploughing northward. Her position on the outskirts of the battle favoured him.

Of what particular crime was it that he was guilty? He knew well that it was a crime. Was it treason, or piracy, or mutiny, or felony? The place which he occupied should have been filled by the commander of the Jupiter, now that her captain was senseless. Hardy knew that — but her commander was under flag-orders. He was not.

Three miles to the north he turned the ship's bow from north to north-east; three more miles and he turned it from north-east to east. Now he breathed freely; the Jupiter was well beyond effective range of the battling ships.

Her lights had long since been again put out. On she went through the darkness, east by south now, battered and broken in her upper works, but tolerably sound below — and with funnels still whole! and with a ram ploughing through the water at eighteen miles an hour! and absolutely safe now from shot!

John Hardy stood in her battered conning-tower with the wind in his light hair, and the blood on his face, and a slight frown on his brow. And on through the darkness drove the silent battleship.

In little more than half an hour she was upon that hollow square of troopers and liners, which were here just forging through the water till the conclusion of the fight. There were thirty-eight of them, and they contained over 120,000 men.

Suddenly, out of the darkness, the Jupiter pounced upon them.

Has the reader seen a thoroughbred, long-snouted fox-terrier, the prize-winner perhaps at some show, let loose in a small room among a hundred hoarded rats? With a gleeful, sudden spring he is among them, as they scamper into a huddled heap at the corners, seeking to hide from the very sight of their little, leering eyes that countenance of wrath. He, for his part, gives one, and only one, swift crack at the bones of the neck, and disdainfully drops the limp vermin, to go on to the next.

It was something in this way that the Jupiter dealt with these thirty-eight troopships and liners. One after another they cracked like tea-pots, they snapped like rotten twigs, they sank at a touch. Hardy rammed one on one side of the square, and went straight on and rammed another opposite; but in the rapid passage from opposite to opposite, he had sunk five others with barbette and broadsides of quick-firing guns. The Jupiter rushed among them like a fury, dashing through a multitude of complex evolutionary curves, and heaping havoc all around. It was a scene of unparalleled carnage. In a short time the ram of the ship was forging through masses of men and horses struggling in the water; what was left of the sides of the square was shooting forth flames; and the Jupiter herself was being swept by tempests of bullets from the land-forces. Without visible result, however. Three only of the transports, sufficiently uninjured by the time they could get speed, escaped. The rest went down.

It was now a question with Hardy whether he could save the Jupiter by beaching her. She was already low by the stern, and the coast was miles away. The moment his work was ended, he gave the order to turn her bow directly northward.

He only just failed.

Half a mile out from Brighton, he bent over Captain MacLeod, looked close into his eyes, and put his hand over his heart. The heart beat, but a splinter had gashed all the chest.

‘Sir, sir, said John, ‘can you not—’

He shook the Captain. A moan came from the prostrate man; his eyes opened.

‘Try to understand,’ said John; ‘you will have to swim, or be lost. Can you understand?’

The Captain stared stupidly, but nodded; and John stripped him hurriedly, then himself.

The next moment he gave the order:

‘Hands to leap overboard and make for shore!’

There was nothing resembling a boat any longer left on board the Jupiter.

In two minutes three hundred blue-jackets were in the water, and the Jupiter, left alone, took in a smooth cascade of sea over her poop.

A blue-jacket on one side of Captain MacLeod, and John on the other, made slow progress forward. Toward ten o’clock they felt bottom; they dragged themselves forward, and fell upon Brighton beach.

CHAPTER IX. JOHN HARDY GIVES AN ORDER

HARDY IN A faint on Brighton sands — Hardy waking on a down bed in Cavendish Square — the transition is rapid, but that is what in fact occurred.

Captain MacLeod, though gashed over the chest, woke to consciousness before John. John had his constant wound inside his chest, and gave signs of it in the form of those pathetic, clandestine coughs of his. He woke wheezing with asthma. Besides this, he had a scratch on his brow from a shell-splinter.

No. 11 a Cavendish Square had been the town-residence of Hardy's race for some generations, and here, in solitary state, the young man lived when in London.

London, lately, had seen a good deal of him, though he liked the country when on shore. This new attractiveness of London was concentrated for John in a certain house in Hampstead.

When he opened his eyes, torn by a cough, they met two others bending low over him — old ones, surrounded by wrinkles; anxious ones, full of solicitude. It was half-past eleven o'clock.

'Well, Bobbie,' said John with a smile, and stretched a little.

'I am pleased to see you so much yourself, I am sure, Master John,' said Bobbie; 'how are you feeling now?'

'I, Bobs? Much the same as usual, I suppose. Where on earth am I?'

'You are in Cavendish Square, sir — in your own chamber.'

‘Oh ay — I see that. I remember now, Bobbie. The battle, eh? and the swim, eh? The old Jupiter did not do so badly, after all. Did any of the enemy escape? And Captain MacLeod — how is he, Bobbie?’

‘He is said to be doing fairly well, Master John. He has a wound in his chest, which is not serious. He is better off than you, I am thinking. It was he who brought you here, sir.’

‘When?’

‘About four in the morning, sir.’

‘Ah, I fancy I recollect something of it. Well, that’s all right, then, Bobbie.’

‘Ah, Master John, not all right, perhaps! When, when, sir, will you learn to take care of that chest, sir?’

‘Oh, bother the chest, Bobs, boy. A fellow has got to do his duty, I suppose, Bobbie?’

John Hardy’s eyelids lifted as he said this, and he turned upward the pure cerulean azure of his eyes in clear open query upon old ‘Bobbie,’ the aged butler of his father and grandfather.

‘Well, sir — well — if you put it in that way, of course. But still, there is this to be said: it was not, so to speak, your duty to go through this; you had not, as one might say, any right to be there—’

‘No, Bobbie, but I was there, you see. And being there, it was natural that one should do what little one could for the old country, don’t you think-?’

‘What little, sir?’ cried Bobbie. ‘Ah, that is like your way of speaking, sir — like your father before you, Master John! This is a proud day for poor old Bobbie, Master John — forgive me for these tears, sir, the tears come quickly when we are old, Master John — a proud day, and the tiptop hour in the life of your father’s old servant, Master John, making dying easy to him from this day onwards, sir. It was what I predicted of you, and to-day you have made true your old Bobbie's word before all the world, Master John. England this morning is ringing, sir, with the name of Hardy, ay, and France, too, sir, and Europe and America; and the servants down at the Hall have sent a telegram to poor old Bobbie, sir, all of them in a body, congratulating me on the man you have shown yourself, and it's a proud day, sir — a proud day — for poor old Robert Mason, Master John, is this that you have brought me.'

Robert's flow of words was choked by sobs. John put out his hand, drew him nearer to the bed-side, and laid one arm round the stringy old neck, the boy's affectionate nature overflowing in murmured words.

'I am so glad, Bobbie, if I have made you happy,' he whispered. 'You know I would do anything to do that, wouldn't I? But what is it all about, Bobbie? Have I done anything very extraordinary, then? England was bound to beat those mounseer people, anyway, wasn't she?'

Bobbie disengaged himself hurriedly. He had his proofs with him — chapter and verse. He had been poring all the morning over a score of newspapers, weeping as he only wept over his old Bible. He had brought them. He flaunted them in the face of John.

'Read those, if you want to know what you have done! Well, it's a proud day — a proud day — for poor old Bobbie, that's all I can say!' he cried in a weak, broken voice, treading woe-begone about, his face in his hands.

John glanced through three or four of the papers, half sitting up, while Bobbie held ever and again to his lips a glass of egg and milk.

The Times concluded an article by saying: 'Assuming that the account to hand derived from the statement of Captain MacLeod be correct, what words of eulogy shall we find in our English tongue to extol and glorify the very young man to whom Britain this day owes her immunity from the shame of an invading foot. In ancient Rome, the people would have been acutely conscious of their inability to invent any Dignity equal to their sense of obligation to such a deliverer. This young man would have been proclaimed Saviour of his Country, and would have been entrusted with the supreme direction of affairs — naval, military, and political — with the injunction to see to it ne respublica damnum capiat. How will England adjust herself to this new-found personality in her midst? We wait with some anxiety to see what shall be done by the Government to the man whom the nation delighteth to honour.’

The Daily Chronicle lost itself in allusion and metaphor. It said: ‘What Nelson was to the ship of wood and sails, that, it is already clear, is this young man to the ship of steel and steam. That is to say, he is its genius. He is more still — he is its embodiment. Ralph Waldo Emerson, in one of his essays, points out that occasionally a man is born who is himself, as it were, the Thing in connection with which his activities are employed; thus, Nasmyth was concentrated Iron, Edison is himself Electricity, Rudyard was himself a Lighthouse. We may add, John Hardy is himself a modern Battleship.’

But it was reserved for the Daily Telegraph to embody in its ornamented style something of that shudder of delight with which England, through all her breadth, learnt with that morning’s sunrise that she had still a son with a voice hoarse enough to proclaim once more to all the earth her Empire of the Sea. No style could have been too florid to express that day the feelings of the nation; for emotion is, in its very nature, florid; and England was in the grip of an emotion.

The Telegraph said: c No one has yet accused this journal of hero-worship; and in speaking as we have spoken of Sub-Lieutenant John Hardy — whom, we confess, we have for the first time heard of half an hour ago — it is partly the man whom we laud, but above all, it is the great nation that could have produced him. We have at command some special information about Mr. Hardy; and we say with the certainty of knowledge that he is as essentially an English thing as the cliffs of Dover, or the smuts of the Black Country. No other land could have given birth to anything at all resembling him. He is doubly the child of England; for he is the child of the sea also. The sea is part of England. The oceans are not her boundary — they are her continuation. If one were to ask Mr. Hardy, “What is the breadth of England?” he would probably reply, “Her breadth is the distance between the Poles.” Such, at least, is the account we have received on good authority of the temperament of this latest scion of an old Hampshire family of thoroughgoing “sea-dogs”.

‘For the rest, the young gentleman is said to have an ailment of the chest; he has the typical blue eyes of the English tar, and very light wavy hair, which he wears rather long. He is small in stature, and slim. His face is said to be the gravest, saddest, prettiest girl-face in the land, and his disposition in private life is much more than usually mild, soft, and affectionate. Our informant hints at a supposed weakness for the fair sex, and confesses that, at the examination stage of his career, the man who bids fair to become the national hero proved himself far from brilliant.

‘So much we have been able to gather; and this fact also, that from boyhood Hardy has seemed to be deficient in one of the ordinary instincts of humanity — the instinct of Fear. Nothing, so far, has appeared to have had any tendency toward alarming him; to use our informant’s words, “He would remain cool if the earth were bursting to pieces.” Such is the man who has ranged himself on the side of England against the allied nations of the Continent.

‘This is no time of ordinary routines and gradual processes. The moment is ecstatic — the hour is immense with Fate. Let the nation for the nonce fling to the winds its old Shibboleths of Use and Wont, and now, without delay, proceed to garland with its fairest laurels the head which has been its salvation. It is certain that, but for Mr. Hardy, we writing here should be writing with a boom of cannon in our ears. What guerdon is high enough for the man who has averted such a doom? Fleet-Captain — Vice-Admiral — Admiral — these are the honorary titles that occur to us, as in no way commensurate with the reward which England owes, and will insist upon paying, to her deliverer. Nay, we know little of the English people if it do not straightway find something so akin to its own secret temper, something so precisely like its own inner self, in John Hardy, and in the cool rashness of John Hardy, and in his contemptuous way, and in his audacious gallantry, and in his homely, Cromwellian grandeur of mind — that a burst of enthusiasm from the entire nation shall at once proclaim him its chosen and darling. England, as Mr. Matthew Arnold said, is a Nation “in the grand style”; John Hardy, we do not hesitate to say, is a Man “in the grand style.” It will not be surprising if these two, having once come across each other, shall, without delay, strike up a friendship perhaps unparalleled in history. The beginning of such a friendship we to-day announce.’

So the Telegraph. The Standard, on the other hand, came out with an essay on Blood. ‘A democracy without an aristocracy,’ it said, ‘is like an egg without salt. It was necessary for Sub-Lieutenant Hardy, before he could annihilate the navies of Europe, to have behind him a long line of ancestors whose home was the sea. He is the apex of a pyramid, the rest of which consists of centuries of the ocean-life and ocean-culture of a race. It is Blood that tells.’

The Morning Post was the only organ to suggest that the country should insist upon the importance of order, and see to it that, if only formally, the young lieutenant should be court-martialed; while the Evening News covered itself with horrid fame by saying: ‘By the Goddess of Victory, Nelson has slain his thousands; but by Jupiter, Hardy has slain his ten thousands!’

There was no journal which did not join in this chorus which rose to greet John Hardy as he woke on the 17th of March. He was the only person who saw his praises with anything like equanimity.

He glanced through three of the articles, then pushed the heap from him.

‘Well, Bobbie,’ he said, ‘it is decent to see one’s name all about in the prints. But what is it all for?’

‘There is the opinion of England,’ said old Robert, ‘about a son of John Nelson Hardy, sir!’

‘Of England, Bobs?’ said John; ‘don’t you believe that. These writing fellows are not England. England is silent — great and silent. She means more, Bobs, and says less. She will love me, too, for what I have done, perhaps — but different from this talk — in her own silent way—’

He stopped, coughing.

‘Ah, that cough, Master John!’ said Robert.

‘Bother the cough! it is rather bad this morning, though, isn’t it? Do you know what I think I shall do, Bobbie?’

‘Well, sir?’

‘Go to a hot country at once.’

‘A hot — what, sir?’

‘A hot country, Bobs.’

Bobs was alarmed. He at once suspected diplomacy. John was whimsical, and wilful. Bobs knew what it meant when those dry rose-lips closed tightly.

‘Which country, Master John?’ said the old man tremulously.

He divined horribly that the bird was about to fly from the old cage.

‘Which country, sir?’ he repeated before John answered.

‘I am thinking of China, Bobbie,’ said John.

The old man’s hands met in terror.

‘China, Master John? Oh, don’t, don’t say China, Master John!’

‘I believe that China is a hot country — in the summer, Bobbie?’ said John in innocent query.

‘I know nothing about China, Master John. Certainly, it is no fit place for such as you.’

‘Oh, I don’t see that, Bobbie.’

‘But why China, Master John, if you really think of going anywhere? China, recollect, is at the other end of the world.’

‘But that’s where my ship is, isn’t it, Bobbie?’

- ‘Your ship? What, ships again? — and you coughing there like an echo among the Chiltern Hills? Well, well, I suppose it’s no use an old man talking, — who has served your father before you, and your grandfather before him.’

‘Yes, it is, Bobbie; believe me, it is, Bobs! But still — really — you will try and be good, won’t you? I must go, Bobbie.’

‘Well, that sea!’ said Bobbie, a hand over his mouth, shaking the head of contemplative wonderment. He was thinking of that ‘sea-fever’ which, in the history of the house of Hardy, had more than once resulted in domestic tragedy and disaster.

‘Well, that sea!’ he said — f those ships!’

‘No, it isn’t quite that, Bobbie; it isn’t the sea,’ said John. ‘Don’t go blaming the sea. Of course, one is fond of the sea, and all that; but that isn’t quite the reason now. I feel that I must go, and I must really.'

'Well, but isn't that what I said, Master John? — that it is no use an old man talking? That no one pays any heed to him? no one whom he has watched over, and yearned his heart over, more than any son? Ah—' suddenly the old man fell half over the bed, imploring with tears. 'Listen to me, Master Johnnie, do, now — give up these wild thoughts! What good can come of them? So, from a boy it always was — and did old Bobbie ever lead you wrong? Do, now, don't think of such things — it is the Enemy puts them in your head — drive them away! Here is all England going to make much of you — why not stay with old Bobbie? Don't go, my son! Don't you go! You are not in a fit state, and it is no fit place, among a pack of heathen men, fighting fiends — what good can you do? Stay here with me! Can you suppose that I would tell you wrong? Come, now, comfort old Bobbie's heart — tell me—'

John Hardy rubbed his pink face against the old man's shrivelled cheek.

'It is so hard to say no to you, Bobbie,' he said. 'I hardly think it is right of you to urge me in that way. You see, I have made up my mind, and it is hardly — kind, is it? If one's mind is made up in a certain way, it is beyond one's power to change it, is it not? Go I must, you see.'

The dry rose-leaves were pressed close now, and Bobbie should have noticed them; but he went rashly on.

'Only listen to me, Master John,' he said. 'Hear me out—'

'No — no more,' said John. 'I bid you be silent now. Pass me a sheet of note-paper and a pencil.'

Old Bobbie, mouse-quiet in a moment, hobbled to a desk, and then back.

John scribbled a few words, handed them to the old man, and said:

'It is all right, Bobbie. I am not the least cross, you know. But there are times when one must be allowed to go one's own way, aren't there? Have that telegram sent off at once, will you? And bring me a good big tumbler of champagne, will you, Bobs?’

The telegram with which Bobs shuffled off contained these words: —

To Selby, Captain of English Bird lying at Freshwater. Please have English Bird ready to sail by Sunday night at latest. Going coast Spain.
JOHN HARDY.

The English Bird was a 74-ton schooner-yacht of Hardy’s own, with an easy speed of ten knots.

CHAPTER X. JOHN HARDY AMONG WOMEN

JOHN HARDY HAD this trouble: he was ‘non-intellectual,’ and his passion had fastened upon a person all intellect.

Had his entry into the Navy depended upon his passing the usual examination as a competitor, he would certainly never have entered it. As it was, he was a ‘service cadet,’ and had received a nomination as the son of an officer of the navy who had performed long and distinguished service. Even so, he had had to pass a test examination; and in this very elementary ordeal he had failed in the subject ‘French.’ Once more he received a nomination, and once more he was given a chance in the examination-hall of the Commissioners of Cannon Row — his very last. All that half-year he was ‘swotting’ like an elephant at the fatal ‘French,’ to the neglect of ‘Composition,’ another of his weak points. During the hot week in June preceding the examination he was a true slave of the lamp; but his strong will this time was at work. With his lucky knack, he scraped through. The number of ‘pass’ marks was 660: he got 662.

Hardy was not a book-man; he had even a secret contempt for book-men and book-learning.

Moreover, as we said before, he got into trouble later on. While in training on board the Britannia he had been reported to the Admiralty for ‘unsatisfactory conduct’ and had been ‘warned.’ The ‘unsatisfactory conduct’ consisted in walking arm-in-arm with a girl of the lowest class through the streets of Dartmouth, both the girl and John being pretty far gone in a state of intoxication.

These, then, were his weak points: That he was far from literary; that he was too fond of fermented things; that he was too fond of feminine persons.

Up to the time at which we met him, he still made spelling mistakes in common English words in writing ordinary letters.

In five or six of the ports of Europe there were more than one young woman forgetful of the crinkled hair and angel-eyes of John Hardy. He was, indeed, painfully shy in the presence of women, and was a very clumsy and heavy lover — but he was also very good-looking, and naïf: and one thing made up for the other. On the whole, he ‘arrived.’

He loved every woman in the world; and this love was, in general, returned.

But most of all he loved Miss Isabel Jay, known to her friends as ‘Bosey’; and Bosey, apparently, did not love him. Her love was already taken up by something else — a thing which she called ‘Art.’

He went to see her on the day of the telegram to Freshwater. A strip of black plaster concealed the scratch on his forehead. He was in the habit, even on visits of ceremony, of wearing a rough and heavy pea-jacket, such as pilots wear, with brass buttons, and thus attired he went out into the streets, a soft cap on his head.

Could he have been recognised, he would have been lifted on the shoulders of the people, and carried to his destination.

A servant ushered him into a very dainty inner room at Hampstead — a kind of studio-boudoir, in a Greek style, with Corinthian pillars, and flimsy saffron hangings. Miss Jay was rather an heiress, and lived with an old aunt in a stately solitude. There now she sat before an easel, with brush and palette.

She was a lady of many accomplishments: of that unspeakably ‘new’ kind; had written two novels of the ‘problem’ sort; she was a preacher of land-nationalization; she had painted one knows not how many pictures; she was not yet nineteen; and she was pretty.

She had a substantial body, with a waist quite as large as that of Eve or Venus. She wore her red-gold hair in coil upon coil of négligé richness about her head; her eyes were green.

In her large countenance there were intelligence and strong self-assurance. The hard bones of her corset were not more visible through her bodice than the Will of her character in her face.

‘Oh, Mr. Hardy, I am glad!’ she cried. Ah, and I have heard!’

‘About the battle, and so on?’

‘Yes, if “so on” means yourself. How very brave you must be!’

‘Englishmen are that, you know.’

‘Are not a good many great cowards? Men do so live in regions of fantasy! Women are more prosaic — and clearer. Did you ever see an average English girl in the presence of a mouse, Mr. Hardy?’

‘Girls are different,’ said John.

Bosey’s lips tightened. This was the kind of ancient point of view, purely male, to which she had the most touchy antipathy.

‘Oh, different of course,’ she said, ‘in pose of nervous structure, and so on, and so on. But substitute for the mouse the broker’s man, and you get at once a measure of the average Englishman’s courage.’

‘Somebody has been misleading you,’ said John. Englishmen are brave. Foreign people are afraid of things.’

She looked at him with real pity, for his insularity, his unintelligence.

‘But why misleading I Can it be that you think an ordinary girl incapable of observing for herself?’

‘I? Why, if you only knew how much I like girls!’

‘Merci!’

‘Ah, now you are sarcastic.’

‘You are too shrewd.’

‘I never know whether you are making fun of me or not.’

‘Well, what does it matter, Mr. John?’

‘But it is not nice to be made fun of by some one whom you like.’

‘Really like?’

‘You know!’

‘You are too complimentary.’

‘Like isn’t the word. I think I like you better than any one in the whole world.’

‘Now you are — what is the word? — spooney.’

‘I should be as happy as the Queen if you would only like me back.’

‘Spooney!’

‘You are not making fun?’

‘Don’t be suspicious. You are too penetrating.’

‘Well, what do you say?’

‘To what?’

‘To my liking you so much?’

‘I can only say that it is distinctly spooney.’

‘But do you like me back?’

‘Oh, I! Well, yes, as you ask me. I like you — back. But in my own fashion, you understand; not in that designingly spooney way.’

‘I do not understand you,’ said John. ‘You are not like other girls.’

‘Then logically you should not like me, since you like other girls so very very much.’

‘I do, though. I like you much better than any of the others. You must not go by logic.’

‘Ah, but I am nothing if not logical, Mr. Hardy.’

‘But facts are facts, aren’t they? If logic contradicts a fact, then you must throw the logic overboard to the sharks. I tell you I like you better than any one. That is enough.’

‘Enough for what — for me?’

‘It should be.’

‘But our human nature is more or less complex, I suppose? Do you mean that the mere fact of your caring for me should be enough to lead me to corresponding actions? That is wrong, you know. Listen, Mr. Hardy: we first met — how long ago? — about five weeks, I think — at Lady Sinclair’s, you remember. And since then, how many times? About six, perhaps. Well, I can see that you are used to easy conquests, you know; and at once I detected that you were laying yourself out to be captured by me, if I chose to take the trouble to capture you. But I did not choose! I have other things to think of; and it will be as much as I can possibly do, supposing I live for eighty years in tolerable health of body, to get through the little all I have in mind. I am not going to say that it is out of the question that some day I may not allow myself to be seduced into marriage by some man or other; but, at the moment, it is a thing so remote from the actual strain of my thoughts, that, I assure you, it has quite the look of an impossibility. All the time, mind you, I am secretly alive to the fact that it must be very nice to be petted and kissed by charming lips; but it is not, you see, precisely what I have chosen for myself. You know about ‘scorning delights and living laborious days,’ don’t you? Well, that is my way. So I beg, once and for all, that you will be more sensible with respect to me for the future, Mr. John.’

Bosey delivered this lecture with brush uplifted. She bent and gave a touch to the picture.

As the last words passed her lips, a sigh escaped Hardy, and this sentence, barely whispered:

‘You are the mate for me, by the Lord!’

She heard him and cried:

‘Mr. Hardy!’

His lips were pressed together. But as he was the firmest, so he was the most uncouth, of lovers. He said:

‘I am going to China in a day or two. I should like to marry you before I go.’

She broke into ripples of evil laughter.

‘Not so soon! Not so soon!’ she cried, angry now.

‘When I come back,’ he said simply.

She looked into his face in unfeigned surprise.

‘Have I not told you?’ she cried, almost with alarm. * What do you mean? I am quite a free subject, you know. This is not Turkey; this is not — Peru. Do you mean that because you are to be the national hero, and so on? Oh, but that is in rather queer taste, then! Have I not answered you?’

‘I love you!’

‘I don’t care!’

‘I do!’

‘You do not!’

‘Ah, you don’t know-!’

‘You are to keep away!’

‘I shall have you yet!’

‘Have me!’

‘Yes.’

‘Silly boy.’

‘Give me one!’

‘Don’t come—’

‘Just one.’

‘What?’

‘Kiss.’

‘Uh! — silly. Do — go — away. This is too absurd!’

She stamped. The dry rose-leaves had brushed her hot cheek. So far had passion led Hardy. Then he started — to this point he had never dared, on his own initiative. A shock of scarlet shyness possessed him.

‘Ah, now I have presumed,’ he said, stammering. ‘Forgive me — I will go—’

‘Well, it is of no consequence, Mr. Hardy,’ she answered, calm already, holding out her hand, ‘but perhaps you had better go.’

‘Well, then — But you understand that I am going to China?’

‘Perfectly. I believe that you will find the Chinese charming artists.’

‘While I am away you will not be marrying some one else?’

‘Not I. You may be confident that I shall remain self-sufficient. Even the new National Darling, you see, cannot tempt me.’

‘But you will think sometimes of a poor sailor.’

‘The newspapers, you know, will remind me of the poor sailor.’

‘Good-bye. I am going.’

‘Then go.’

‘When I come back from China, I shall have you.’

‘You said that before — whatever having me may mean: and I said — No.’

‘But I shall.’

“Well, we won’t discuss the matter now. I am sorry for you, you know, because you look — épaté. But you will soon get over it, and it will do you good. You were overconfident, you know. Will you say good-bye, now?’

‘May I kiss your hand?’

‘Nonsense! you are just like a child.’

‘May I?’

‘Well, if that is any comfort to you—’

He kissed her hand with old-fashioned ceremonial, caught up his cap, and was gone.

Had he been more successful, he would have walked straight home, and to bed, and so made the course of history otherwise.

As it was, he went wandering through a number of streets in a desultory mood, not knowing whither he went.

Night had fallen.

He had a deep radical love for this girl. He said to himself, walking himself tired: * I will have her, I will have her, by the Lord—’

Suddenly his own name caught his eye. He was in front of the Palace Theatre of Varieties.

London was alight. The streets thronged with people. The façades of the Palace were arrayed with galaxies of jets.

There, on a board, the ink still wet, appeared the attraction of the night:

MISS LOTTIE COLLINS

Will Appear To-night

In Her New Patriotic Song,

Entitled:

‘BRAVO, JOHN HARDY!’

The song had been composed, learned, orchestrated, and rehearsed, all in the course of a single day.

He stood looking at the placard, smiling. He felt in his pocket; he had some money. It was about time for the entertainment to begin. He went in.

His mind was, in some of its aspects, as unstable as water. It shifted like phosphorescences in the dark. All forms of pleasure, especially, had great power to deflect and draw him. He could be won from grave to gay by the simplest means. He had not only the soul of a hero but the mind of a baby.

He remembered that one could smoke and drink in music-halls. By heaven! he would make a night of it. If there was blame, the blame was Bousey Jay's.

He never took the dry-land quite seriously. To him it was * shore' — rather a foreign place — a place for 'sprees.'

He put his hand into his pocket again, and looked at what money he had. There was plenty. Now then for Bacchus and Terpsichore; wine, and song, and — Woman?

Nearly all the afternoon, at this very hour, a stream of carriages, containing ecstatic photograph-hunters, Mr. Goschen, Lords of the Admiralty, pressmen rabid for an interview, distinguished persons, were moving toward, and away from, the door of No. 11a Cavendish Square. John Hardy was not at home.

He found himself in one of the 'pit-stalls' during the performance of a ventriloquist. In a few minutes he had provided himself with cigars, and a goodly tumbler of spirit-and-soda-water.

A girl, sitting next to him, touched a companion on the other side of her — a soldier, whose name was John Brabant — and whispered:

'Just look at him; isn't he handsome?'

Her name was Ada Seward. She was the woman who, alone in the world, had been able to melt the ice of Dr. Yen How.

She was a small creature, with skin of a warm yellowish colour, and little quaint Chinese eyes, and light hair with the whitest tinge of red in it; not perhaps pretty, but with some unspeakable attraction of piquancy about her uncommon, saucy little face, which had caused her to receive twelve offers of marriage before she was twenty. Her friends declared that she was the living image of Miss Marie Tempest, the ‘Geisha’ prima donna. In figure she was typically English.

She was perishing to speak a word to the sweet pink face by her side, to its delicate aristocratic lines. At last, during a loud song consigning the German nation to perdition, she found her chance.

‘Now, young gentleman,’ she said, ‘that is my dress, please; it won’t be fit to look at to-morrow if you throw any more brandy-and-soda over it.’

John gave her the sweetest smile she had ever beheld on mortal lips, and said:

‘Pardon me.’

At the same time, he looked into her face, and liked it.

The waiter had already borne him three whispering glasses of beverage.

‘May I?’ he said; ‘here, waiter — may I order for you and your companion?’

John Brabant bowed low with a hearty ‘Thank you, sir!’

But Ada, who was quite three or four grades higher in the social scale than he, being in his company only owing to old associations, nudged the soldier deprecatingly, objecting to the obligation.

It was too late, however. The offer had been accepted. In a few minutes John Hardy and Ada were talking — Ada laughing, John smiling. Brandy-and-soda became the order of the day. Hardy had soon a good deal more than enough.

The audience was in a queer mood, impatient, intolerant. There was neither an empty seat nor a spare inch of standing-room in the place; but the people's interest was all bent upon one future point in the entertainment — the entrance of Miss Collins — and meanwhile they took not the least pains to conceal their indifference. There was something rowdy in the tone of the assembly.

‘By Jove, I am liking you!’

His lips were at her ear.

‘Ah, now, that’s the drink talking, not you.’

‘The drink? Nonsense! I am, really. Are you liking me back?’

‘Ah, that would be telling!’

‘You are!’

‘Go away with you! Why, I have only just seen you!’

‘That is of no importance.’

‘Oh, isn’t it, though!’

‘Don’t be a cruel girl. Here, waiter—’

‘Do you know what I think you are — from your ways?’

‘No; tell me.’

‘You tell me; let me see if I am right. What are you?’

‘You mean my profession?’

‘Yes.’

‘I am a sailor.’

Had Ada’s ears been more delicately nurtured, she would have detected there, half-drunk though Hardy was, a very slight intonation of imperial arrogance.

‘A sailor? You? Go on! Show me your hands.’

‘Oh, my hands are not very rough, I admit. But still — I am a sailor. You may believe me — in the navy, you know.’

‘I see. Well, do you know I had an idea of something like that? A sailor! Yes, that is what you are. You come to the point so soon, don’t you? — like sailors do.’

‘Well, but do you like me back, now?’

‘No, thank you. No sailors for me. They are here today, and gone to-morrow.’

‘That is because they must. You can’t punish them for doing their duty to their country, can you?’

‘The country is one thing, but girls have got to look after themselves, you see.’

‘You are too practical.’

‘I have got to be.’

‘But you will have me for your sweetheart?’

‘Perhaps I will, and perhaps I won’t. It depends.’

Here was an Achievement in Indefiniteness. John Hardy fled from the mental indeterminateness in which the answer left him, by turning to his glass for a drink.

The shifters of the indicating numbers removed the card 7, and put up the card 8; ‘8’ meant Lottie Collins. A murmur of expectancy rumoured through the building. The air grew electric. Every one knew that great things were coming. Already the nerves of the audience were strung high and tense.

‘That is very indefinite.’

‘I can’t help it. Wait and see how we feel to-morrow morning.’

‘Only say now that you like me.’

‘Well, suppose I say — yes. No, no — it’s too stupid!’

‘Sweet of you, Nell! Is your name Nell?’

‘Yes. How on earth did you know? It is my second name. They call me “Ada.”’

‘Ada — what?’

‘Ada Seward.’

‘I shall call you “Nell.” I like that better.’

‘And what is yours?’

‘John.’

Ada was smitten by Coincidence. On each side of her was a ‘John’ — one a soldier, the other a sailor. She was the link which united and disparted Her Majesty’s forces.

‘John — what?’

Here John paused. He was now in a high state of fuddlement, but was capable of remembering that his name was on placards all about the town, and about to be proclaimed by ‘No. 8.’

‘John — what?’ came the question again.

But Miss Collins rescued him. There was the rattle of a drawn-up curtain — an intense ‘Sh-h-h’ swept through the building — and at once there followed a clap and cry of applause as the whole audience leapt to its feet. Miss Collins had bounded on to the stage, bedraperied from head to heel in the Union Jack.

The air was electric. Every heart bounded in every bosom. John Hardy’s right arm had stolen and twined round Ada Seward’s left, his fingers kneading and palpating the soft flesh of her forearm. With his left hand he lifted the glass to his lips. He alone, on the subject of himself, remained careless.

Amid a dead silence the artiste lifted up her arm, and so for a minute stood. Then she gave a sharp, shrewd twist to her wrist, and passionately shouted —

‘Bravo, John Hardy!’

And again the audience leapt to its feet, with howls of rapture, which lasted five minutes.

The boxes were packed with some quite distinguished people.

At last there was quiet. The artiste began to sing. The tune was simple and stirring — the words were like raw rum, as crude and as strong:

When the Allied fleet came over, and passed the Straits of Dover,
They thought they’d have it all their little way;
But a knowing little cardy (they call him Johnnie Hardy),
He crashed them his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye.

CHORUS

Oh! isn’t he a jolly little boy?
And don’t he know his little way about!
When he handed in his card, and the French saw ‘Johnnie Hard,’
Lord! transformation scene, you bet, and wild, distracted rout!

There’s a little sailor lad, and his eyes are mild and sad,
And you’d think he’d not one blooming word to say!
But holy Moses guard, ye (he’s known as Johnnie Hardy)
When he crashes his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye!

CHORUS

Oh! isn’t he a joy, that jolly sailor-boy?
And don’t he know his little way about!
When he winks his little eye, you may just lie down and die,
For his red right hand is thunder, and his eyes shoot lightnings out!

By this time the audience, wrought to a high excitement, had caught the lilt of the tune. When Miss Collins repeated the last chorus, the house vociferated it, utterly drowning her voice in the wheeling tumult which now prevailed. She pretended to retire, loaded with the masses of flowers showered upon her from the boxes; but at once returned at the call of the audience. She sang:

Ah, boldly they came over; and they crossed the Straits of Dover;
But 'Hardy!' was the answer England hurled that day;
And Johnnie winked his eye, and they all lay down to die,
When he crashed them his Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-aye!

CHORUS

So isn't he just bricks, with his little crafty tricks?
And don't he know his little way about!
For his head is crisp with curls, he's a devil with the girls,
But ten thousand times a devil when the Dogs of War are out!

Once more she repeated the chorus, the audience taking it clamorously up. Then she tripped from the stage. But the house roared after her with the frenzy of men parting with their last earthly hope. She had now utterly mesmerised and enthralled them. The moment was ecstatic with an electrical tension impossible to describe. They bawled, they yelled, they stood up straining forward with gesticulations, tears pouring down many faces, handkerchiefs waving. At last she reappeared. She had a verse in reserve. She sang: —

Old England is the mother, and each of you a brother,
To this stern brow that bids the world obey;

And now we shan't be tardy (God bless you, little Hardy!)
In crashing more Ta-ra-ras-Boom-de-aye!

CHORUS

So, isn't he a joy, this British sailor-boy?
And don't he know his little way about!
He couldn't hurt a fly, but he's tricky, and he's sly,
And he makes the sky to redden, and the roaring deep to spout!

She rendered this last verse with almost distracted verve and heat; and before proceeding to give the chorus a second time, stretched forth her arm, and in a fierce tone of command, cried: 'Stand all!'

The audience sprang upright yelling, the male part of it uncovering. The singing of the last chorus burst forth universally. And there, too, was Hardy, hopelessly drunk now, with an arm round Ada Seward's arm, he, too, standing, he, too — with an empty glass brandished in his left hand — laughing and singing: —

So isn't he a joy, this British sailor-boy?
And don't he know his little way about!
He couldn't hurt a fly, but he's tricky, and he's sly,
And he makes the sky to redden, and the roaring deep to spout!

No sooner had Miss Collins disappeared, amid an unparalleled tempest of sound, than the audience scattered. They were capable of no more emotion for that night.

Hardy found himself in the street, leaning on Ada Seward's arm. They were alone. Where the soldier Brabant had vanished to, neither Brabant himself nor any one else knew.

‘Sh’ee cheers for ole Nelson!’ cried John Hardy. ‘Ha! ha! ha! — ole Nelson. Shee cheers, by the Lord—’

‘Come now, be good,’ said Ada. Get into this cab, will you?’

‘Where you live?’

She gave him the Pattison address, and impressed it upon him.

‘Mind, I shall expect to hear from you,’ she said, as she shoved him into the cab, and kissed him.

John, going home in the cab, murmured, with fainting, intoxicated breath:

‘Bosey! Bosey! I shall have you yet, — by the Lord—’

And Ada waited in vain. The next morning he had forgotten her address.

But he remembered — her name.

CHAPTER XI. JOHN HARDY AMONG THE NATIONS

THE NEXT DAY John Hardy shut himself up in a fit of sulky moroseness, flatly refusing to see any one. The day after that was Sunday, and on Sunday evening he was at Freshwater.

His yacht was ready to sail.

He had in his breast-pocket letters of credit from the bankers of his solicitors to business houses in Paris, Berlin, Petersburg, Pekin, and Shanghai.

He had also with him a French dictionary, a German dictionary, a Bible, and a very elementary French conversation book.

He had also with him a portrait of Bosey Jay, which he had obtained that morning from Lady Sinclair.

He had also with him a Colt's revolver.

He had also with him a shilling map of Northern China, and four sorts of foreign coin.

As he stepped from the train from Newport at Freshwater, he saw a late Sunday-edition placard announcing that 100,000 English troops were about to embark for Havre for a French invasion; and this made his heart rejoice.

The English Bird weighed anchor at 8 p.m. He was under requisition by letter to attend at the Admiralty the next day, but he took not the least notice of it, leaving it to be supposed that he had set out before receiving the requisition. He was a free subject, he said to himself.

Before sunrise on Wednesday morning he arrived at the old town of San Sebastian on the north Spanish coast.

He had taken the precaution to bring no linen marked with his name. He intended to travel as an American citizen, under the name of Petersen. From San Sebastian he sent back the yacht to England, and at once proceeded with a small trunk by train to Bayonne, thence to Bordeaux, and thence by way of Angoulême, Poitiers, and Tours to the French capital. He reached the Gare d'Orléans on the Thursday morning at 9.30, nearly a week after the battle of Shoreham, and proceeded westward to a hotel in the neighbourhood of the Madeleine, reporting himself in the hotel bulletin as having travelled from Spain.

The first thing that happened to him was that he fell in love with that charming courtesan, Paris.

He had been so exceptionally and scrupulously insular, that he had always shrunk from leaving England, except in the ships on which he served. Hence he knew some of the ports of Europe very well, but had never been to Paris. Now was revealed to him the fille de joie of the cities of the earth, the pure feminine, as queer, and treacherous, and lovely, and indescribable, as woman. Whoso truly loves woman will not escape her witchery. She is the divine sinner.

Hardy intended to leave Paris at three o'clock; but he put off his departure till the next day; and meantime he got into trouble.

The news of the disaster to the allied fleet had four days since reached France. But the whole thing was incredible; it was not believed, or believed with only half the mind; and for this reason: that the news had come by the roundabout way of the Mackay-Bennet cable — from New York! What lent some colour of truth to the report was the incomprehensible fact that the Contre-Amiral and General de Rosney had sent no despatch-boat to announce the landing of the troops on English soil. Yet the nation refused to believe the incredible. They waited, with suspended mind, with bated breath, wildly hoping.

In the impossible contingency of their fleet having been defeated, they argued that at least one ship would have escaped to bring them the news. But no ship had come: the fleet could not be defeated.

The fact was that five ships had escaped — three liners and two battleships. But of the three liners one was towing another at the rate of about half a knot an hour, and the third was just forging through the water against a head wind under sail alone. The two battleships were German, and in sorry plight. One with a broken screw, and one with disabled engines, they were making their slow way north-eastward with a vague outlook toward Bremerhaven in the mind's eye.

Of the British ships not one craft had remained afloat.

However, on the morning of Hardy's arrival in Paris, one of the three liners drifted on to the French coast, near St Valery en Caux, having on board an infantry brigade, and a crew, perishing with hunger, on the verge of frenzy with thirst. By noon Paris knew.

Then there was brouhaha and houlabalu, or, as we say, 'ructions.'

Paris, in her rages, as in all else, is like a woman. She tears her finery and ribbons to shreds; she foams at the mouth; her hair is 'all over the place/!

Her last exuberance had taken the shape of the Dreyfus riots. Monsieur Zola had been the scapegoat. He had been declared a 'dégénéré' by the University; had been regarded as a 'cas' by the alienistes; had been hopelessly caricatured; was regarded as a man done for.

He waited. On this Thursday morning he had his revenge.

Under the great statue of France in the Place de la Bastille he stood, and the crowd around him spread far up the avenues leading into the Place. He was recognised: 'C'est M. Zola!' And he harangued them.

He had always been known as a very decent orator. And he three times used the word 'trahison.'

This word 'treason' has a strange glamour for the French mind, carrying with it an extraordinary hint of the blackest infamy.

It was a word which Paris could ill bear at that moment. It simply made the crowd a kennel of rabid dogs. Already in other parts — in the Cité, the Place de la Concorde, la Vilette — excited throngs were rushing riotously about the rues and avenues and boulevards, without the incentive of M. Zola's 'trahison' And in the midst of M. Zola's crowd, in the deadliest peril, stood John Hardy.

On his forehead was the strip of plaster which covered the scratch received at Shoreham.

By some sure intuition, the French know an Englishman at once; they say of you at a glance, 'Il est anglais.' And Hardy was very much of an Englishman.

If ever human boy enjoyed himself, it was he at that moment. He loved a row for its own sake, and here was the sweetest of all rows — a French row.

What added a touch of exquisiteness to his enjoyment was his inner knowledge of the cause of the row. These children had dashed themselves like impotent waves against the rock of England, and were now astonished to find that rock was hard, and could shatter them.

John could hardly understand a word of the harangue, though he once heard his own name, but he guessed what it was all about, and he saw it in the distorted faces of the 'people. He stood looking up into the startling eyes of the orator, quietly smiling.

At the first sounds of uproar he had run from his hotel, and followed a crowd eastward. No thought of his danger occurred to him. His attitude of mind towards the people among whom he found himself was one of quiet and assured dominancy.

M. Zola was about to complete his oration, and the mob to rush with some indefinitely hostile purpose toward the Elysée, when Hardy felt himself touched with a deliberate tap on the shoulder.

He looked round and up.

He was confronted by an extremely foreign-looking person, a middle-aged man to judge by his face, but with a head of quite white long hair, and a splendid white beard and moustache. He wore a gray, broad-brimmed, soft-felt sombrero sort of hat, which drooped on one side like a lady's Gainsborough. But the part of him that attracted attention was his two hands; they were simply two constellations of bulky flashing jewels: on each of the eight fingers being several huge rings, glittering with every variety of luminous stone.

His face was very excited. But he said to Hardy, with perfect polished politeness, lifting his sombrero:

'Ah, monsieur a marché sur mon pied!'

'Je ne comprends,' said John.

'Ah! it is as I thought. Monsieur is, then, English.'

'That is so,' answered John incautiously.

'Ah! English — good. Very-well — all-right. I wished to say that monsieur has marched on my foot.'

John knew that this was a lie. But he made a concession; with a condescending nod and smile he said: 'Merci!'

He meant to say 'Pardon!' But 'merci!' and 'pardon!' somehow, were very much mixed up in his mind; he often used one instead of the other.

The very-foreign person said with a bow: 'I cannot help to think that the action was intentioned on the part of monsieur.'

‘Go away, will you?’ said John Hardy.

‘But monsieur has not answered my question.’

‘Yes, I have. Be good enough to go to the devil.’

‘To the-? Very-well — all-right.’ And at once he lifted his voice high, interrupting the orator, crying out:

‘Voila, messieurs — un anglais — de la Marine anglaise—’

John had committed the indiscretion of wearing his mariner pea-jacket, with brass buttons engraved with anchors.

There arose an outcry round him. A commotion spreading wider through the crowd, like circles round a pebble-splash, had him for its centre. M. Zola ceased to hold forth.

They pressed round stifflingly. Hardy began to cough feebly. He pushed back with his elbow a rough-looking, brazen-eyed fellow in an ouvrier’s smock. But his effort to free himself was poor in force. In a moment or two his jacket was rent off him, and a cruel fist smote him heavily in the jaw. He saw clearly now that he was on the point of being torn to pieces.

He wondered what he could do; and having calmly measured the situation, and seeing no chance of escape, he broke into a laugh at his own expense, calling out loudly:

‘Cochers! Cochers!’ By ‘cochers!’ he meant to call them ‘pigs.’ In a moment he was on the ground on his back. But whatever force it is which underlies the world had this frail and dauntless lad in its keeping for the time being. He was necessary.

A diversion was caused by a loud pair of lungs, which cried:

‘Mais, messieurs, écoutez-moi, écoutez-moi—’

It was the very-foreign person, who was also vehemently interposing his utmost bodily vigour to the rescue of John.

‘You know me — you know me all — listen to me — I am Edrapol—’

'C'est Edrapol! Edrapol!'

Instantly the rumour spread far, amid vives. Edrapol, the duellist, the Bulgarian, the world-renowned master of the pistol and the rapier; it was he.

He explained. The English sailor had committed upon him a personal outrage. He begged — it was his simple right — that the life of the miscreant should be spared to make the reparation which was only his, Edrapol's, plain due. The stranger's death was certain either way, but, in short, messieurs, the other way was more neat — more convenable.

And so Hardy was, as it were, torn from the rough hands which had seized him. Edrapol's popularity in Paris was paramount. The mob, led by Zola, rushed westwards. Hardy and Edrapol were alone.

The escrimeur, bowing, handed his card to Hardy, and requested a return of the favour.

'What for?' said John. 'I have no card.'

'But monsieur will meet me?'

'Where?'

'In the Bois, monsieur.'

'But what for?'

'Why, to fight, monsieur.'

'You don't mean a duel?'

'Why, naturally, monsieur.'

'I see. But an old man like you?'

'Not too old, monsieur, perhaps! Does monsieur then hesitate?'

'I do. It is absurd.'

'Monsieur is, of course, sensible to the interpretation which one would naturally put upon any hesitation from his part?'

'No. I am not sensible of it. What interpretation?'

'That monsieur is a coward.'

‘Well, but I am not one, interpret as you please.’

‘Still, monsieur, I say the natural interpretation. I am sure you will realise my point of view if you recollect that I have the reputation of being the deadliest swordsman in Europe.’

‘Is that so? Oh, I didn’t know.’

< Now I think monsieur realises my point of view?’

‘I do rather.’

‘And monsieur will now fight?’

‘I don’t mind. What with?’

‘All that will be arranged for us by others, monsieur. If you will give me your name, your address, and the address of a friend to whom I may send a friend of mine—’

‘I have no friend worth mentioning here. Send your friend to me personally.’

He gave his real name and his address, and turned away from the bowing figure before him. He set out for his hotel.

Later in the day he found himself in front of the Chambre des Députés, and dropped in with a stream of the public.

A glance showed a full house — Zola, Papa Sardou, the young novelist, Pierre Louys — and the Parisian pressmen overflowing into the foreign press.

Below, no dull uniformity, as in the House of Commons, but variety, colours, races. There is M. Grenier, the Mussulman deputy, his white Arabian burnous, near the ‘passage of the Left.’ The centre is packed — Republicans and Opportunists — Government - supporters these. The Right is the stronghold of the Clericals and Legitimists. To the Left, the Socialists.

In the centre of the circle, the tribune — a pulpit; and behind the tribune, but towering above it, the throne of the President of the Chamber, M.

Brisson.

M. Brisson wears no wig like our Speaker; but his patriarchal beard is full of awe.

M. Hanotaux, in the Tribune, is explaining that ‘nothing in the actual situation so far is of importance as regards the annihilation of the British Empire in the near future!’

Applause from Centre and Right. Queer sounds from the Left. There is going to be a row.

‘It is a coalition whose very name is Victory.’

‘It has already been defeated!’ yells a voice from the Left. (Huge hubbub; M. Clovis Hugues, the long-haired poet, screaming something ecstatic through the din.)

President Brisson rises. He bids them recollect that France looks to them for an example of calm and sage deliberation. ‘Délibération calme et sage!’

Hardy understands the words, because they are like English words, and he throws a gasp of laughter behind his head, crying:

‘By the Lord...!’

M. Hanotaux proceeds, though interrupted. His peroration is a touching appeal to the honour, the glory of France. He descends.

From the Left a cry: ‘Jaurès! Jaurès!’ And the young leader of the Socialists, large, blonde, swings himself up to the Tribune. ‘Hanotaux is an infâme. France has been made the tool of Russia and Germany!’ President Brisson calls the speaker to order. But there is deaf obstinacy in the curve of the broad back turned towards the President. He makes M. de Mun, the orator of the Catholics, the object of his bitterest thrusts. M. de Mun retorts. The two men glare. Like a ball flung from hand to hand, so the stinging and witty retort darts quickly to and back between them. The Socialists egg on their man with cries, the Right their man.

A voice from the Right: 'You are the paid spy of the British Rothschilds!' This from M. Carnet, a little fat man, a mere sphere of flesh. 'You are a liar and a coward!' roars M. Jaurès.

There is a struggle on the front right benches. It is Carnet held back by his friends. The air is electrical. The journalists in their Cribs stand and yell their own various views of the world.

Suddenly, from the left, a figure reels through a blind and drunken curve. He dodges the stray members on the floor, wheels, and fetches Carnet a blow.

Ha! sits the wind so, then? Hardy chortles, rearing with glee. In the passage leading from the Right to the lobbies there follows a scrimmage, from which a figure darts up the Tribune; Carnet has given Jaurès a blow under the ear.

Then all is chaos. Everybody is rushing everywhere. Wherever any one sees a head, he drives his fist at it, yelling. The whole Chamber rolls and tumbles in a tumult. They are like bits of vegetables wheeling promiscuously in a boiling and bubbling pot. President Brisson puts on his tall hat as a sign that the séance is at an end. The mêlée forces itself into the lobbies. Outside there is a clash; a sound of pistols. John Hardy has seen — France.

Meantime, all over the city the Garrison of Paris was in the streets, trying to clear them of the rioters. Night fell.

At eight o'clock a gentleman waited upon Hardy from Edrapol. But he could not speak English, and the interview was a fiasco. Hardy sat down and wrote the following letter, which he handed to Edrapol's second: —

Sir,

— This is to let you know that after consideration I have changed my mind about the duel for the present. If you like to think I am afraid of your fine swordsmanship, you can, but that is not really the case. On the contrary, when I tell you my motives, you ought to consider the writing of this letter, if anything, a rather brave and worthy act on my part. The fact is, I am a servant of Her Majesty the Queen, and have already, in my way, been able to do some good for my country. As you know, England wants men just now, and that is why, after consideration, I do not see my way to expose my life wantonly, while things are as they are, for a mere trifle. I am sorry to have to disappoint you, and myself too, in our little duel; but that is how I look at it. However, I make you this promise: that on the day this present war is over I will seek you out, in whatever country you may be, and present myself before you for the purpose of getting through with our little duel; and on that you may rely. I keep your card.

— I remain, sir, your servant,

John Hardy.

The amount of self-suppression, of noble patriotism, which the writing of this simply-worded letter implied for the arrogant spirit of Hardy may be assumed: when it was finished, he gave it, with a curl of the lip, to the ambassador of Edrapol.

The next morning he left Paris, and reached Aix in the evening, whence he proceeded to Berlin. To Berlin the bare news of the disaster had been flashed the day before but it was not until the next morning that more detailed accounts came from the two ruined battleships, now arrived at Bremerhaven. Hardy found the Unter den Linden boulevard quite a Babel with the bawling of the news-vendors; it was rapidly being filled by groups rushing thither as to the main channel of intelligence from all directions of the city, while the Foreign Office in the Wilhelmstrasse was being besieged by a great crowd clamouring to hear the truth, and spreading away to the Schloss, where, it was said, the Emperor was closeted with his Chancellor and his Chief of the Staff. The humour of the crowd was sullen; but it needed only the appearance of Wilhelm, accompanied by the Empress, on the front balcony of the Schloss, to turn discouragement into elation. Wilhelm suddenly drew his sword and flashed it in the sunlight. Then there was joy. No people cheer like Germans. Demonstration was their specialité. They excelled in looking pleased. Their forte was to claim the Future with verve and assurance, whether it really belonged to them or not. Hardy was in the midst of the crowd round the Schloss. He saw the flash of Wilhelm's sword. An hour later he was with a throng cheering itself hoarse in front of the Austrian Embassy, opposite the old home of M. Benedetti, so closely associated with the outbreak of Germany's last war. The Austrian Minister had unexpectedly appeared before the people, who now went wild with delight, a large area of the crowd presently starting to sing old Schneckenger's Wacht am Rhein. Hardy observed every gesture, and every expression of every face which came within his range of vision, and he said to himself:

‘So much for mein Herr, then.’

He reached Königsberg the next morning, and thence went on to Vilna, Pskov, and St. Petersburg.

Everywhere there was commotion, excitement, crowds, posters, mobil.

In the Nevski Prospekt at St. Petersburg, in the Izak Platz, on the ‘English Quay,’ there were throngs, proclamations, printed heads of the Tsar, and every open space was gaudy with banners. The town, however, was fairly quiet, though there were some arrests of Nihilists. The Russians were the most English of the Continentals, or tended to be, when once their races became homogeneous. They had the ruralness, and something of the Stoicism, the Puritanism, and the nimbleness of the British; with this was mixed a certain Orientalism — a vermilion line in the gray of their character.

At his hotel John found an ostler of the Simbirsk Province, an adventurous and cosmopolitan man, who had been a sailor trading between Hull and Copenhagen for some years. He understood English. He struck up a friendship with John, and told him his history. John offered him 500 roubles if he would undertake to deliver a letter by hand in England, setting out at once. And this offer Ivan accepted.

The letter which John wrote was as follows: —

My dear Bobbie,

— Here I am in St. Petersburg after passing through France and Germany, and just about to set out to get by the Trans-Siberian Railway over all that great continent of Northern Asia to Vladivostok on the other side of the world, and so, please God, to Pekin, and my ship.

Dear Bobbie, this is what I have to tell you, and you can write a letter to the Times yourself, so as to let the country know what little I have to say. The French are about to mass four Army Corps in the direction of Havre, and I don't think that for the present we can do much with them there, though later on, when we get our pecker up a bit, I know that ten Frenchmen won't be able to hold out against one Englishman. The German Cock-of-the-walk has telegraphed for the King of Saxony, and Prince Albrecht of Prussia, his Field-Marshal, and for Count Waldersee, Chief of the General Staff. Seven of his twenty Army Corps are mobilising — namely, the 1st, or East

Prussian; the 17th, or West Prussian; the 12th, Kingdom of Saxony; and the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th, belonging to Brandenburg, the Province of Prussian Saxony, Posen, and Silesia respectively. But whether all these are intended to go to help the French, or to defend his own northern coast, or what, I do not know, not knowing much about fighting on terra firma.

Well, dear Bobbie, I have seen my full of the people with whom I have been. I saw some splendid fisticuffs in the French House of Commons, and no end of fun; and some very excited people in Germany and Russia. My opinion of the French is, that they are very nice people, the French women especially. But they are old, they are no good any more, they have not got any youth and go left in them; you know what they are like, Bobbie? Like patti (sic) de foie gras, nice but tainted. They are over-civilised, like an old dowager that's not fit for anything, but to make love-matches. France is no good any more, except for ornament and for tourists to come to. For energy she has got vivacity, and for nerve, verve — like a frivolous old beau! The world has nothing to expect from her. They are wonderfully ahead of us in some things — their lower class especially is far far ahead of ours in everything — but they do not move, their legs are heavy with age. The future belongs to us. At the rate we are going now, we shall soon have all that France has, and a thousand thousand times more, for we shall have youth and energy and vastness as well. The Germans are a young nation and they have all the enthusiasm of a young nation, and they will go ahead perhaps alright (sic). But they have not got anything in reserve, Bobbie. Froth is enthusiastic and young, too, but not very strong. I think the Russians would make mincemeat of the Germans, just as the Germans would of the poor pretty French. But the Russians are raw, new, and not, I don't think, a nation at all. Not one of them is the chosen race, dear Bobbie,

‘the peculiar people?’ If you want to find that, I think you had better look nearer home.

Well, no more at present. I shall expect you to take good care of yourself, mind, while I am away, so that I shall find you hale and hearty when I come back, if I ever do. Don’t be getting up too early in the mornings, now; and don’t forget your bottle of porter regularly every night, as something is wanted at your time of life.

— With love to Bobbie, from his son,
John Hardy.

From this letter it will be seen that John Hardy could not only express his ideas with force and point, though in simple words, but that he possessed a large tract of brain capable of taking in the world, and summing it up, and passing right judgment upon it, ‘as one having authority.’

The letter reached England three weeks later, and could not escape the keen scent of the pressmen. It was published bodily in all the papers, bad spelling and all, the public gloating joyfully over its gentle wisdom, its humour, and its simplicity.

All this time Hardy was travelling, partly by train, and partly by camel caravan, towards his fate in the capital of China.

CHAPTER XII. THE AWAKENING

DR. YEN HOW was seated in a garden of the Imperial City, reading.

He was arrayed in sumptuous robes of the softest, richest silk, embroidered with the tongue-darting Dragon, in token of high rank.

His pigtail reached to his calves; but at present only one inch and a half of it was of the doctor's own hair. The rest was artificial — made of fine black silk. Many dignitaries of even the highest rank in China adopted this convention.

Yen How, a minute or two before, had drawn the chopsticks between his lips as the final ceremony to a dainty feed on rice-birds (just then in season), and the juiciest, tenderest tea. The meal had been held before him by attendants in gorgeous robes, themselves of high rank.

The ice-bound winter of Northern China was over. The sudden, hot spring was here.

By the right hand of Yen How was a stand of ebony arabesqued in walrus-tusk. On it was some of the pigment which the Chinese use for ink, and brushes such as they use for pens; there were also some folios of fine silk-paper; there was a silver gong; and, half falling to the ground, the North China Daily News.

In Yen How's hands was an old copy of the Shanghai Mercury. Yen How was reading it; and as he read, his eyes went small in a smile. Something amused the doctor.

It was this: Herr von Bülow, the German Foreign Minister, had, a good many months before, made a remark in the Reichstag which was reproduced later on in the Mercury.

Von Bülow had said: 'The Chinese Empire has already lasted 4300 years; it will last another 3000.'

'He did not mean it,' murmured Yen How, 'because he is a fool. But a fool may sometimes say a true thing, without meaning it.'

At the same time he touched on his breast the decoration of the Red Eagle of the First Class which the German Emperor had conferred upon him immediately after the grant by China of the territories to Germany.

Then he went on with his slow, contemplative reading.

We have spoken of the meteoric career of this man in China; we said that he 'rose like a rocket.' But he did not do all this by miracle. A rocket will not rise of itself; it must be impelled by an upward, accountable force.

To what did Yen How owe his supreme authority? — for his authority was now far more absolute than that of any Brother of the Sun and Moon who ever occupied the throne of the Hsu's. He owed it first of all to his Learning; secondly, to his intensity of Racial Instinct; and thirdly, to his audacious Genius.

To his Learning, first of all: for in China every door was open to the learned man. The learned man's learning, however, must be Chinese; and here was the miracle of Dr. Yen How's achievements in the State Examination Halls of Canton and Peking: that he who there proved himself more instructed than the pundits in Chinese wisdom, had spent the greater part of his life in acquiring Western scientific views and methods in Heidelberg, Paris, and Edinburgh.

He began at the bottom. He passed through the examination at Canton. The 'Hall' was not a hall at all, but a double row of small sentry-boxes, capable of holding one person only, in which the examinee, provided with food, ink, brushes, and paper, spent two solitary weeks, seeing no one, answering his questions. He usually came out more like a dead than a living man, and, even for the most erudite, the ordeal was one of fire.

During that fortnight of dark seclusion, Yen How smiled and smiled and smiled again. He was examined on the complex Theology, the fanciful History, the intricate old Law, the amazing Astronomy of the Chinese. In all these subjects, and many more, their Learning consists of an immense range of minute dogmatism, which the whole lifetime of their wise men was spent in acquiring. Yen How's big brain knew all about these subjects — more about them than his examiners. But he differed from them in this: that he alone knew the falseness of the answers which he painted. His eyes were all smiles as he sat there writing about the earth going round the sun in so many seconds, and about the place of Confucius in the third hierarchy of the gods. It was the sweetest fun to him.

When he came from his sentry-box at the end of the two weeks among a number of wan and tottering men, his tough visage showed no sign of fatigue. He smiled always. He knew that he would be First on the list.

And First he was. Later, when the result was announced at the portal of the 'Hall,' he was carried to his home through the streets on the shoulders of the people.

The Chinese populace still cherished the same awe and high reverence for the Learned Man which, in Europe, was cherished in the Middle Ages for what was called 'The Scholar.'

Yen How at once received a summons to appear before the Viceroy of Nanking. He appeared. A choice of two things was put before him: he might either accept a Judgeship in the Province of Kiang-si, or he might go north, and compete in another examination at Peking, where, if he was moderately successful, he would possibly obtain a post in the Inner Court of the Imperial City.

One offer was a certainty; the other hypothetical. But Yen How had not the slightest intention of going to be a Judge in the Province of Kiang-si. He had other aims.

He went to Peking, and very soon underwent the far sterner ordeal in the famous Examination Halls of that city. Again he was easily First on the list — a feat which at once admitted him to high honour in the Imperial Court.

He had gained his entree.

Another Chinaman would now have said: 'I have achieved my end.' Yen How said: 'I have made a beginning.'

But the rest was not difficult. In Oriental countries, rises, as well as falls, are rapid. 'Let Haman be hanged, and let Mordecai be put in his place.' The prophet Daniel rose from nothing to the supreme power in a night. Yen How did it in two months.

So great was the necessity for Western methods and Western science, in the Government of China, that the Chinese were actually compelled at that very time to overcome their shuddering racial abhorrence of the white man, and to pay large salaries to white experts, in various departments, to plan and to administer. Germans drilled China's army, Englishmen collected her customs, Frenchmen planned her railways.

It is not possible to estimate the omnipotence which would suddenly fall into the hand of a real Chinaman, who could do all this better than either German, Englishman, or Frenchman. To the Chinese tongue he was sweet as white mice preserved in honey. He became the Emperor of the Emperor.

But then, besides Knowledge and Race, Yen How had something more: he had Genius — the large Eye — the summoning Voice — the enchanter's Wand. The vastness of his outlook — the world-dimensions of his schemes — were simply fascinating. 'Talk, my son, talk,' old Li would say, sitting before Yen How, holding his chin in his hand, his eyes riveted on the doctor's face; and when Yen ceased, Li would say: 'Talk on, my son, talk on; your words have flavour; and the palate of the ear is led astray by them.' Yen How soon became a sort of dissipation for the aged Minister, like an advanced novel for a very young girl. When Li wanted sensation, he came and sat with his chin in his hand, and listened with delicious musings to Yen. It was at Li's own suggestion that the Yellow Jacket was given to Yen How. It was among the necessities of things, and Li saw it. And at once — without an hours delay — the little Heidelberg doctor began to act.

His first care was to bring about a secret treaty between Japan and China.

He had not been idle in Japan. He had taken frequent voyages down the Peiho to Tientsin, and thence to Tokio. Of his insinuations to, and relation with, the Marquis Ito, we have spoken. But Yen How kept his most delicious plum of temptation in reserve till the last. He then showed that however great China became, Japan would always be the mistress of China; when China was the mistress of Europe and Asia, that meant that Japan would be the mistress of the world. The treaty was signed. It was his first step.

Yen How saw that the navy of Japan would be necessary to his schemes. Without that, nothing permanent and final could be done.

His next step was to bring about the European war.

He did it so boldly, with such a grand disregard for appearances, with such contemptuous prodigality, that it was a wonder that both his present and ultimate motives were not divined. For it must be remembered that the idea of 'The Yellow Danger' was no new one to European statesmen. Again and again had the more keen-eyed of politicians pointed Eastward, and said to Europe: 'The Yellow Danger! the Yellow Danger!' Only a year or so previously had Lord Charles Beresford, in a speech delivered, we think, at Hull, used words like these: 'The cloud at present may seem only the size of a man's hand — but it is there; and its seemingly small size is due merely to its remoteness, not to its intrinsic smallness. What appalling fate would be that of Europe, if the yellow races, in their hundreds of millions, organised a westward march, is beyond the imagination of man to conceive.' Again and again had this note of warning been sounded. But the mischief lay in this very fact: that the cloud had appeared of 'the size of a man's hand.' It was too remote. The idea was not yet realised and assimilated by Europe.

Still, as we say, there was nothing at all new in Yen How's idea of over-running Europe, as is proved by the fact that that phrase, 'The Yellow Danger,' had become quite common in every one's ears; what was new, was first, his discernment of the fact that the yellow races would probably fail, unless Europe were, to begin with, made ready for them by a great inter-European war; and secondly, the novel means which he took to bring about that war.

No single soul outside China and Japan suspected his ulterior motive of over-running Europe when he made the grants of territory — for the cloud, though often pointed out, was 'like a man's hand'; but three people, at least, suspected his present motive of bringing about a European war. One was a young student in the Quartier Latin in Paris; another was Sir Charles Dilke, who mentioned it as just a possibility at a dinner at the National Liberal Club; the third was a Hampshire gentleman, who, as we said in a former chapter, wrote a letter to the Times during the excitement preceding the war, making this suggestion of China's motive. The letter attracted little attention. This Hampshire gentleman was John Hardy.

His eye had seen!

Yen How's first step was the league with Japan; his second was the European war; his third was the organisation of China.

This last was a great task — it was stupendous. Only a new Confucius could have done it. But Yen How was quite that.

To wake a nation which has been asleep for four thousand years! To lift the arm! — and cry aloud! — and wake them in their myriads with a ‘Rouse ye! rouse ye! the Hour is come! the Day breaketh!’ in a voice like the Trump of Doom!

The little doctor could do it — and did it.

But again, he did not do it by miracle. He knew his way.

The results attained by great Talent do indeed look like miracle; but they are not, of course, really so. The man of talent himself knows that he must use definitely precise ways and means, which, if used by any one else in the same manner, produce the same results. Talent is Industry — the capacity of being infinitely interested — of taking infinite pains.

Yen-How had been taking infinite pains from the day when he could first pronounce his name.

All his acts in the rousing and organisation of China were based upon a profound knowledge of the Chinese character. The principal points of this character are an immeasurable Greed, an absolute Contempt for the world outside China, and a fiendish Love of Cruelty.

It is impossible for the vilest European to conceive the dark and hideous instincts of the Chinese race.

The first thing that happened after the outbreak of the war in Europe was a wholesale massacre of Europeans in the East. Wholesale — but not haphazard: for Dr. Yen How was directing it. For the time being, every European became precious in his eyes — he collected them with care — he preserved them scrupulously — and he distributed them with deliberate wisdom. They were conveyed over China from Yun-nan to the villages round the Ming Tombs and from the Yellow Sea to the Tien-Shans. No district was without its white visitor. Then sounded Yen How's first trumpet-blast to the nation he meant to rouse. It is Morning! the Day breaks! And at once there occurred a memorable Passover-Day through the length and breadth of China — a holiday of gore, an orgy of death, to symbolise the annihilation of the white race all the world over. When it was ended, there was not a white man or woman alive on Chinese soil, except on an island or two; all had perished in the act of undergoing the most loathsome public tortures. This Solemn Feast-day, this Sacrament of Blood, made a lasting impression upon the spirit of the Chinese race, which is sensitive to the suggestiveness of symbols. Yen How had begun well. Certainly, he knew his man.

The killing of the German drill-sergeants of the Chinese Army was left to be performed by the hands of the soldiers whom they had drilled.

The territories granted to the Continental nations were as yet unoccupied by them. The small European garrisons actually in China had been easily overpowered. And Europe was busy at home, fighting against herself. At last China was free to do as she chose.

The attitude of the nation as a whole at this moment resembled that of a sleeping cat, which hears a sound, and pricks her ears.

To say even so much of the Chinese is to say a great deal. For centuries they had lain in deep, stolid slumber, without one prick of the ears. There were still many millions of them who, as Li Hung Chang had said in Europe, had never so much as heard of the Chino-Japanese war.

How to stir up such a people? How to get at them, and fire them, and make them act? Yen How knew.

He must, first of all, now that he had given them a morning Dream of Blood, kick them hard to wake them, bruising their flesh, if necessary: then, as they rubbed their wide and startled eyes, he would preach to them the Gospels of Greed — and Race — and Cruelty.

Already, by the time John Hardy had reached Vladivostok — just about four weeks after the battle of Shoreham — the kicking process was in full progress. There was a strange stirring, a movement, a new something, in old China. Men said: ‘What is toward? What is to be? Can these dry bones live?’ The Spirit of a Man was abroad in the land — an intense Mind, a vitalising Leaven — kneading, fermenting, energising, creating.

The massacred drill-sergeants were replaced by Japanese officers. But where there had been one German, there appeared now a thousand Japanese.

Yen How’s scheme was nothing less than this: that every Chinaman should be a soldier.

Conscription in China...!

Here was a lesson learned from Europe.

But when we say ‘soldier,’ we mean something different from what is understood by the word among us. We do not mean a man equipped with smokeless powder, and magazine rifles, with Lee-Metfords, and Martinis, and Sniders. We mean only a man having some sort of arms — a club, or a dart, or a match-lock, or a poker — anything which would give him the idea that he had to fight, and which would perhaps delay his death a moment while myriads of others swept over those who had killed him. The Chinese host was to resemble a flight of locusts, covering the entire sky from ‘horizon to p horizon, each member of which was armed with some implement, not so much for the purpose of killing, as for the purpose of protracting his own death, while the rest of the host pressed forward, blighting as they went. His duty was hardly to fight, but to occupy time in dying. For this service none were too old, few too young — and women were as good as men. Yen How's army would consist of the 400,000,000 which formed the population of China.

The organisation of this war-host he planned principally on the French model.

He divided the whole of China into 240 army-corps regions, each containing about two million inhabitants. This arrangement included Thibet, Mongolia, Manchuria, and Korea, the heads of which countries he had long since brought into line with his plans.

In each region he quartered the principal elements of the field army-corps with the necessary staff, setting up in each region a large number of recruiting depots, and depots of artillery, transport, supplies of food and forage, with clothing and camp-equipment.

The whole of the troops and organisation for this purpose was put under the command of the General of that particular army-corps and its region. And this General was, in every case, a Japanese.

Each region was divided into two hundred subdivisions, each of the subdivisions furnishing one regiment of infantry of the line, twenty subdivisions forming an infantry brigade command, and forty subdivisions an infantry divisional command. Divisional commands were also entrusted exclusively to Japanese; brigade and regimental commands to the most trustworthy of the Chinese officers of the regular army.

Each corps was furnished with a vast corps-cavalry-brigade, the horses — to use an Irishism — being mules, and the weapon the long spear.

Each regiment was subdivided into three battalions, each battalion into four companies, and each company into twelve squads.

Each squad contained from sixty to sixty-three persons, who were known by numbers, from No. 1 to No. 63.

They contained children over the age of nine, women (except the wives and daughters of mandarins and other upper classes), and old men tottering on the verge of the grave. The priest and pundit classes were exempted also.

The nation was organised into an army.

This was one method which Yen How employed to kick and prick it into wakefulness.

Each army-corps contained, besides its squadrons of cavalry and its eighteen batteries of artillery, six sections of artificers, six artillery parks, thirty companies of pontooners, six telegraph sections, and forty field-bakeries.

But there were no field-hospitals, or hospital orderlies, no ambulances, no medical provision. Yen How could afford men.

One important feature of the army-corps was the provision of armoured carts. They were to serve not only for transport, but for defence in battle, and their shape was contrived with this view, being long and low, with small wheels, and rather ponderous. One had been made, or was to be made, for each 'peloton.'

All this was now in rapid and intense progress. And the world knew nothing of it!

China, north of Tonquin, had telegraphically isolated herself.

In Japan the manufacture of guns, swords, spears, and small-arms was going forward with agonised activity; and these were coming over to China. China's chief manufacturing energies were directed to the making of armoured carts and tents.

But the drilling of China was only one-half of Yen How's method of rousing it. He knew that it was necessary to drive the nation further still. He did this by taxing it.

Let it not be supposed that any part of his motive was a need of money for all this war preparation. The loan raised in the previous year, which should have been spent by China in paying Japan's war-indemnity, was still, except for one instalment, in the pockets of China.

'The loan had not been necessary to China at all! She could have raised sufficient to pay Japan by an issue of Treasury bonds, the purchase of which may be made compulsory in China, if not subscribed to voluntarily.

Or she could have called upon the Viceroy to wring enough out of the mercantile and agricultural classes.

But neither loan, nor bonds, nor Viceroy extortion had been necessary! Japan's mere credit was good for the building of the vessels she needed; and the money, paid over to Japan, would simply have lain in the Bank of England to Japan's credit. As a matter of fact, in the secret treaty between the Marquis Ito and Yen How, the payment of the indemnity was remitted.

From this source alone China was, for the present, rich; but under the guidance of an exact administrative brain like Yen How's she was vastly richer still from quite other sources.

China, in reality, was never a poor country; on the contrary, she was potentially about the richest in the world. Manchuria was an El Dorado of gold. The mineral mines of Kwang-tung, Heilung-Chiang and the Kirin provinces had been the envy of the nations. But the curse of China had been her official class. The heavy likin charges, which went, nearly all of it, into the pockets of its collectors, stifled many an industry. The Government income was estimated at two hundred and ten million taels, but only seventy million of this — one-third — was accounted for. On the remainder the mandarins wallowed in fatness.

Yen How's eyes screwed into a smile, and he said: No more of that, my sons!'

The substance of what he said and what he did was this: 'You are to extort, you are to squeeze, and plunder, and grind the people ten times — a hundred times — more than ever before — till they perish like sheep of it. But this time you are going to do it, not for your own benefit, but for my benefit, and for the benefit of China. I, Yen How, have said it, and will see to it.'

Within two months from his attainment of the supreme power, he had created a Board, formed on the lines of the Imperial Maritime Customs Board, for a clean-handed collection of the internal revenues. It contained some Chinese officials, but more Japanese.

The immediate effect of this change was an increase — by tens and hundreds — of the revenues which began to pour into the Treasury of Peking.

From the working of the mines, specially organised and superintended by Yen How himself, a great increment of wealth began to flow into the swollen coffers of China.

Yen How was not popular. He was kicking and pricking China into unpleasant wakefulness. But he knew that he had the sweetest oil in store to salve her bruises at the right moment.

All these measures of his would have meant insurrection, revolution, at another time — the introduction of the Japanese element, especially, into the new life of China was distasteful to the people. But now the stern universal military organisation nipped every thought of rebellion in the bud.

To turn a two-legged beast into a man — drill him, straighten his spine, make a soldier of him. He will never be a hopelessly unintelligent animal after that.

Yen How was drilling the Chinese beast, straightening his spine. By the time the beast could look round twice to tear whoever it was that was disturbing his slumber, lo, he was already turned into a man, with sufficient intelligence to see that there was no resisting this new Power which had him in its grip.

The Chinese, when they saw no help for it, began to fraternise with the now ubiquitous Japanese element. Yen How had foreseen this. They had already, more or less, learned to submit to the domination of white men. And the Jap was much less a foreign devil than the white man. On reflection he was judged to be an improvement. On reflection, Yen How, too, would, in time, be judged to be an improvement.

But, meanwhile, he wore a secret steel plate over his breast.

For the people of China were being terribly oppressed and badgered.

The order of the day was drill, drill, drill — tax, tax, tax — work, work, work — all over the land.

As yet no one knew why all this was — what was in the mind of the gods above. Yen How had not yet begun to preach his three Gospels to the people.

So matters stood when, on the 18th of April, Yen How sat in his garden, reading an old Shanghai Mercury.

An attendant opened a door in the courtyard, walked softly towards the great little man, and prostrated himself before him.

‘Speak on,’ said Yen How.

‘A white man has been captured at Moukden, your Excellency, by soldiers of the Liao-Tong division, and sent on to Peking. They have just arrived at the Palace — and await your instructions.’

‘Let him be taken to the Imperial Prison-house for the night,’ said Yen How, ‘and beheaded at sunrise to-morrow.’

He went on reading. The servant made an obeisance, and turned away.

Do not call the man back, Yen How! Let him go and do your bidding, and read you your paper, and be at peace! For this is John Hardy that you have ordered to be slain — and he is as strong as the rocks, and the strong earth, and the sky, and the stars in their courses fight for him!

But Yen How called the man back.

‘Stop!’ he cried.

The attendant returned.

‘What nation is he of?’ asked Yen How.

‘His interpreter says that he is an Englishman, your Excellency.’

‘Let him be brought before me here.’ And Yen How went on reading his paper.

CHAPTER XIII. JOHN AND YEN

JOHN HARDY, HAVING arrived at Vladivostok, had engaged an interpreter, and spent two days in trying to charter a craft for Nagasaki, where he hoped to meet his ship, or hear about her locale.

His impatience was fevered; for he heard that no rencontre had as yet taken place; but that, within a week, it was expected that the allied French, German and Russian vessels would meet the allied English and Japanese. Such was the report brought by junks from Nagasaki and Fusan, and by caravan from Newchwang and Kin-chow.

An engagement had not occurred, for this simple reason: that the Allies had practically been in hiding from the English; and the reason was this simple one: that they were finding extraordinary difficulties in the matter of coaling, the English and Japanese having, as a matter of fact, created a 'corner' by buying up all the coal in the East; so that from Singapore to Vladivostok the cry had been coal! coal!

Now, however — so said the reports — the French, German and Russian vessels had coal in plenty! Whence this supply had come, no one could conceive. It was a mystery — but a certainty.

The battle, therefore, so long delayed, must come soon.

Hardy's pulses beat faster; and his chagrin was intense when, after anxious search, he found no compradore willing or able to secure him a passage to Nagasaki. The East was in suspense, waiting for the future, without interest in the present. It turned a listless ear to Hardy's pleadings.

Nothing remained for it but Port Arthur, where, as he was told, he would be sure to find a willing junk. But the journey was immense. Hardy almost gave up hope of the battle.

But with strong heart he set out. He anticipated no danger. China was not formally at war with England. He did not know that, even in times of settled quietude, no traveller's life was worth a rush in Northern China — as in the case of Sir Harry Parkes.

He had with him quite a little retinue; and he travelled in a palanquin borne between mules.

The northern Chinese were a hard, ferocious, and treacherous race — considerably more so than the southern. They were also larger and stronger men, — rascals tall, and lean, and brawny, their bony toughness being derived from the Tartar blood with which their tribes were infused. Their language, too, was different; above all, their walk. The southerners walked on the flat foot, like Europeans; the northerners swung along on their heels, with a backward slant of the body, like a statue put to lean with its back against a wall.

At Hunshun Hardy stopped for a night at a two-roomed inn; and here it was that, as soon as he was asleep, a consultation occurred between the villagers and his retinue of five.

The next morning he went forward, this time in a spring-less jinricksha or mule-cart. He could no longer bear the swinging between the palanquin mules. It had reduced him to a state of weakness; he was now spitting up phlegm streaked with blood.

At every village now they were surrounded by increasing crowds and clamours. But always John's servants spoke some words to the people, which had the effect of restraining them. As he set out afresh, a throng of those skeleton visages would be there to gape greedily after him; but still, he did set out.

A sickness of the heart — a sickness of the stomach — grew upon him.

Could Man — could Woman — be like this?

Every nerve in his gentle and loving nature rose in shuddering revolt against this race.

He saw the whisperings and confabulations between his men and the mobs, and, with his instinct for truth, suspected treachery. But he was quite helpless.

Everywhere, as he advanced, his eye noted the drilling, drilling, to which the nation was being subjected.

But he was now very sick, and languid, and day by day sat propped against the cart, staring wearily before him, under the growing heat. He was compelled to keep up his strength with sips of the deleterious Chinese spirit samshu; and the only food which he could procure for days was the sickening mass of rice and greens which forms the staple Chinese diet.

He descended the river Yalu in a gorgeously painted junk, drawn on each bank by a mule. Here he had some rest, lying on the deck in long dreams of quietude through the starlit nights of a Chinese spring. Never had the heavens and the earth seemed to him so lovely, enthralled in a mystery of peace, as in those vast sheeny nights of his descent of the Yalu. Near Wiju he commenced the land-journey again, on mule-back this time, somewhat recovered in health.

He was given now to understand that he was being guided to Port Arthur. Instead of this, he was being led northward, toward Moukden.

At Moukden was a garrison of the old regular army; and the railway from thence to Tientsin had lately been completed.

At an inn at Moukden he was eating, when a Japanese officer, accompanied by an interpreter, entered the room, and bade Hardy follow him. It was Yen How's decree that any white man found by chance in Northern China should be sent on to Peking.

Hardy was ineffably surprised, first, at finding himself in Moukden, and next at being hustled into a queer, low, dark railway train, in the keeping of half-a-dozen gigantic pigtailed.

'But,' he protested through his interpreter, 'England is not at war with China!'

'No,' said the Japanese with a grin, 'but China is at war with England.'

In the train John's wrists were bound. His interpreter and servants had disappeared.

They reached Tientsin by train, and thence went on to the village of Tung-chow, five miles from Peking, by junk up the Peiho. Just as the sun set they arrived at the mighty walls of Peking, and had only time to rush between the gates, when the ponderous jaws of the city-portals clanged and roared behind them.

Peking! multitudinous, unfathomable city, place of beauty and of horror, of romance, and of infamy! city of vast triple-boulevards, grand as the imagination of an architect, loathsome as the stench of a sewer, city of gauds and colours, vermilion, and emerald, and blue, and of temples, and avenues, of palaces and lakes and forests, immense, a world in itself, resembling in its tone and aspect no other of the cities of man!

Here may the hoariness of our race on the earth, the vast age of the old world, be read even by the blind.

Whoever is a Dreamer, let him bury himself in Peking. The city is itself a dream — an opium-dream.

It was necessary for Hardy to pass through both the Tartar and the Chinese cities before reaching the Imperial City. Each of these three is enclosed within its own massive walls, independently of the great wall of the whole town. The Imperial City was sacred ground. Here resided the Supreme Power, and here also the Legations. The profane foot entered it on pain of death.

They passed through a number of thoroughfares, broad as three or four Holborns laid side by side, and long as vistas; streets thronging with camels, and jingling mules, and the booths of small merchants, and swaying pigtailed; and in an hour reached the Imperial Portal on mule-back.

The leader of the little band produced his brevet, and found admittance. They proceeded slowly through a park, leading their animals now, and after traversing a number of secluded granite streets, and a long marble colonnade, entered the courtyard of a vast, low, white palace.

Hardy, as they halted, leant wearily upon his mule. There was a hollow pain at his chest, and at the back of his shoulders. His lips were dry and cracked.

A door opened in the courtyard, and a soft-footed official came to learn the reason of this intrusion.

A few words were spoken, and he turned away. In a quarter of an hour he was back again; and five minutes afterwards Yen How and John Hardy were face to face.

For quite a minute Yen How continued to read his paper.

Then he lifted his head suddenly, and said to the official:

‘You may go; wait in the vestibule: when I want you I will sound.’

The man went away. Yen How looked at John Hardy, and John Hardy looked at Yen How.

Both were smiling.

Yen How had still under his eye a scar where the fist of the English soldier, John Brabant, had struck him. So he smiled.

Hardy's hands were unbound. This had been done when he reached Tung-chow, where it had been necessary to mount a mule. He had on the usual blue pea-jacket; and under this, in the breast-pocket, his loaded revolver.

In the colloquy which followed, one of these two men spoke an English as perfectly grammatical as that of Tennyson or Macaulay, though with an intensely foreign something in his way of speaking it; the other spoke broken English. It was Yen who used the good, and John the bad, English.

'Who are you, sir?' said Yen How.

'Me Englishman,' said John, 'name John Hardy.'

Yen had heard of the battle of Shoreham, and he never forgot a name. He said:

'Don't talk pigeon English. I can understand you. I have lived some years in England.'

'Oh, veer goot. Me no knowee that. Me talk good English to Chinaman.'

'As you please. What is it you have come to China for?'

'Me sailor. Me come from Russia to Vladivostok to joinee me ship. What for you no letee me join it? Englishman and Chinaman good friends.'

'Since when?'

'For always!'

'You got a sister?'

John was surprised.

'No,' he said.

'A female cousin?'

'Yes. Well—'

'Will you give me your cousin for my wife?'

John grinned.

‘Why, you queer Chinaman...!’ he cried out.

‘Ah, you say no, you see. Englishman and Chinaman are not such very good friends, then.’⁵

The chief fact about John Hardy was that he had eyes which saw a fact. As these last words fell upon his ears, he looked keenly into the placid face before him; and at once he realised that he was in the presence, not so much of a Chinaman, as of a Mind.

And at once the instinct to speak pigeon English left him. Unconsciously he began to speak naturally. This was a great compliment to Dr. Yen How.

‘But look here, Mr. Chinaman,’ he said, ‘what is all this for? Who are you?’

‘Well, since you ask, I am called Yen How.’

John started.

‘Ah, you know my name, I see,’ said Yen How; ‘I know yours, too.’

‘Yes. Very good — I am glad that I find myself with you, since you are who you are. You are acquainted with European ideas, and certainly a man of sense. I wish to throw myself on your benevolence. I find myself in such a silly sort of scrape. I am a poor sailor trying to join my ship. Knowing China as a friendly country, I thought I should have no difficulty in passing through. Yet here I am! What for? Isn’t it very absurd? Please help me to get out of this! If you cannot set me free of your own power, you can at least put me in communication with the British Ambassador.’

Yen How’s eyes went small in a smile.

‘There isn’t any British Ambassador any more,’ he said.

‘How do you mean, sir?’ asked John.

‘It is the Chinese custom to hang thieves by the heels, head downwards,’ replied Yen. ‘The British Ambassador has been hanged by the heels in the square before the Pekin Temple of Confucius, and died while the people were torturing him with hot irons.'

John Hardy's left eyelid lowered in intense menace.

'That is not really so, Mr. Chinaman?'

'It is, my son.'

'And whose doing was that? Not the Government of China's?'

'It was my doing, my son.'

'Yours, Yen How?'

'Mine.'

Now the two men were really in contact. They looked into each other's eyes, searchingly, eye to eye.

'You shocking little devil!' said John Hardy.

'Call me what you like. I will repay your insult by a compliment: you are a brave fellow.'

'You will be strangled like a frog for this, Mr. Chinaman!'

'Whom by? All the Englishmen in China are dead.'

'All?'

'Every one.'

'A massacre?'

'A regular sacrament of death.'

'But the Chinese believe in a God above, I think?'

'Poh! not much.'

'You do not?'

'Not I.'

'And the white men of other nations, they were massacred, too?'

'All — all.'

'But with what motive?'

'It would take too long to tell you.'

‘Ah! I know.’

‘You do?’

‘Yes! I know! I know! I had a queer, dim idea long ago. Now I know! I know!’

‘You are shrewd then, as well as brave.’

‘Yes! I know!’

John Hardy was in an ecstasy of discovery. He saw the skies growing black, black over the earth.

‘Well, will you give me your cousin for my wife now?’ asked Yen How, all wrinkles.

John did not answer. His brows were knit. It was only after a minute’s thought that he made two steps forward, and laid his right hand on Yen How’s shoulder, the doctor looking up into his face as he began to speak.

‘Now, look you, Yen How,’ John said, ‘I know now, as I tell you, what your idea is like. Let me put it in plain words: you mean to sweep with this Chinese nation over Europe when our war is over, and Europe is prepared for your coming. I was a fool not to see it quite before — but that is it. And this idea is yours, yours only, Yen How: I see that. You have the face of a devil, you toad, you have! Well, I have got an offer to make you — a challenge — if you are man enough to accept it. Get me out of this — put me on board my ship. And I will undertake to fight you, and beat you. I alone, Yen, against you alone. If you beat me, I give you, not my cousin, but the Queen’s daughters for your wives. If I beat you, I squeeze the life out of your throat, you frog. I promise you that I shall breathe not a word of this plan of yours to a living soul — no one shall know from me: and no one shall know from me about the massacre and the drilling of the people. I make you that offer, Yen.’

John Hardy had recognised the great mind in Yen How; now it was Yen How's turn to recognise the same in John Hardy. Here was the full stature of Man, the world-big Thought, the sun-kindled Imagination.

Yen How answered:

'Take your hand from my shoulder, my son.'

'Well, what do you say, Yen?'

'I say that your thought tickles me, boy.'

'Well-?'

'And I say, that if I were to accept your offer, you could go to your ship saying to yourself: "The great Yen How has recognised me as one of the two kings of the world."'

'Still, I wait for your answer.'

'How am I to count upon the silence you promise?'

'Well, you know something of English life. I come of a family of English gentlemen. We never break our word.'

'Well, come, we shall see. Your thought — what shall I say? — tickles me, my son. We shall see — come now. But first — do you know that I gave an order for your beheading? And then I said I would see you. Do you know why? I had a question to ask you.'

'Well?'

'Have you lived in London?'

'Yes — sometimes.'

'Ah, well — there is just a chance, then. Did you ever know a lilee girl called — what's her name? — Ah! Ada Seward.'

Yen How could destroy a world without the quivering of a nerve; but as he uttered this name in a whisper, he slunk, his voice trembled.

Hardy did not answer. The name sounded familiar. He hung his head with knit brow, thinking. Suddenly he blushed. He had remembered — the music-hall — the drunken night — Lottie Collins — Ada.

Yen saw the blush.

To this man, drunk with his passion, it was inconceivable that any other man could see this girl, and not straightway go mad for love. Men will sometimes get so intoxicated with wine, that the sober state becomes inconceivable to them; and they will say to a sober companion: ‘Oh, you are drunk, boy!’

Yen saw the blush, and he noticed now that Hardy’s face was more than usually lovely, even for one of a lovely race. It was a face made to be loved by women.

‘You have seen her?’ He half rose from his seat, and brought his mouth in an intense, secret, cunning whisper close to Hardy’s ear.

‘I have,’ said John.

He had an instinct, even then, that he was running some frightful danger in making this avowal. But he was truthful in a very rigid, rather old-fashioned sense. He had never told a falsehood.

‘You have? — in real truth?’ whispered Yen.

‘I have.’

‘And — kissed her — eh, boy?’

The Chinaman’s face worked. He hissed rather than spoke these words.

John grinned.

‘Why, — you most queer person-!’

He was ready to laugh a puzzled, anxious laugh.

‘You have!’

‘What?’

‘Kissed her — eh, John Hardy?’

‘Of course, I have kissed her.’

‘Then you die!’

‘What, not for kissing Miss Seward?’

‘You die, I say!’

‘It was she who kissed me.’

‘You die! you die, you little white devil! you die! you die!’

Up went the fingers of Yen’s right arm, twinkling in ecstatic wrath.

There was no mistaking Yen How. He meant this.

He pounded the gong twice with the hammer.

‘In one half-hour—’ he said, with a furious nod of the head at John.

Hardy, perfectly cool, saw clearly that all hope for himself was lost. But he had no intention of leaving Yen How behind, to work his mischief in the world.

The second sound of the gong had hardly shivered and clanged, when Hardy, with the revolver whipped from his breast-pocket, blew Yen How — passions, schemes, ambitions and all — out of existence.

In intention, that is — in absolute, cool unerringness of aim. The bullet struck Yen precisely over the centre of his heart. But it struck a plate of steel mail, and did not penetrate.

John was about to fire a second shot at Yen’s head, when suddenly the two men were locked in desperate conflict. Yen had flung himself upon John.

Yen’s eye had long before noted the bulge of John’s pea-jacket over the breast. He was half prepared for what had happened.

The struggle was carried on with the entire physical force of the two combatants, the revolver being the aim of both efforts.

John, though below the middle height, was quite an inch or so taller than Yen; and he was able, with his left hand, to seize Yen’s pigtail, and draw it in a single coil tight round Yen’s throat; while Yen enclosed the other’s right arm and ribs in a grip of iron, squeezing with all his energy, and heaving and slanting his adversary in the effort to effect a throw.

The force of the tough little Chinaman was quite two or three times that of the frail English lad.

This contest of strengths was a foreboding — and a resemblance — of the larger national contest which was impending.

Hardy was comparatively weak. But in his right hand was a revolver, representing the Science of Western Civilisation, which, however, Yen's grip rendered ineffectual; and in his left hand was Yen's pigtail, representing the barbarism, the superstition, the repulsive soul of the East.

Yen's face darkened. A gurgling came from his swollen lips. The rat was being suffocated by its own tail: The West was strangling the East.

Suddenly the revolver went off, and the bullet entered Yen How's left foot. The Science of the West had uttered a cry.

But the West was breathing its last gasps under the stringent ferocious grasp of the East.

The contest was short, and it ended suddenly. A little spout of blood welled and rolled from Hardy's lips; and at once he lost power, and fainted.

Before he could fall to the ground, an attendant had come up, and struck him a blow on the brow with a heavy bamboo. He fell at once flat on his back, his face covered with blood.

Almost immediately Yen How was cool.

'Take him away,' he said. 'He has attempted my life — he must not be killed.'

'The torture, Your Excellency?'

'Yes. But I will direct it myself. Go away.'

He sat again, as the attendant lifted John in his brawny arms. . He commenced once more to read the Mercury.

There was a bullet in his foot. But he would not move: the racking pain was sweet to him.

The intensity of the Chinese instinct of Vengeance is a mystery — it is not human — it is not bestial — it may be demonic. To us, at all events, it is incomprehensible.

To them pain is joy, if, at the same time, they can gloat over the knowledge that it is in their power to take a thousandfold vengeance on the causer of the pain. They hug their pangs — they wantonly put off the hour of their revenge — they roll in a secret luxury of malice.

In the matter of Torture, the Chinese have excelled all nations in a devilish cunning. They have investigated the nerves of man, and adapted their plagues to them with a nice and minute ingenuity. And Yen was more ingenious than the most ingenious.

He intended to give his mind to this matter. Meantime, he went on reading.

CHAPTER XIV. THE VANISHED FLEET

IT WAS TWENTY hours before John Hardy, in some absolutely dark place, opened his eyes. At about the same time, the battle at which he had hoped and striven to be present was going forward.

For over a year the question which had been agitating many an English mind was this: Is our weight of metal in Chinese waters enough? Is it commensurate with possible contingencies? Is it not too hopelessly small?

This anxiety had been somewhat allayed by the spectacle of ship after ship of the British navy — the Barfleur, the Bonaventure, the Hannibal, the Gibraltar — steaming away in mysterious haste to the East.

On the other hand, they had not steamed away alone: they had followed — they had been followed by — a host of the choicest, mightiest ships of Russia, France, and Germany, all hasting eastward, eastward, as if in the sweep of some law of gravitation, all with the same secret urgency, the same suggestion of mystery, and flurry, and design.

Heavy Russian armaments like the Vladimir Monomakh had hurried after French craft like the Pascal, and German craft like the Gefion. An addition of some 30,000 tons to her Chinese navy was made by Russia alone in her ships, the Rossiya, the Sissoi Veliki, the Navarin.

This Eastern fever had infected even nations not precisely in the running. Away in the sweep of the Chinese Current went battle-ships from Italy, from Austria, from America.

In a few months the seas of the Far East were gravid with the navies of the world.

China herself, by way of pantomime, had been building cruisers at the Vulcan Dockyards at Stettin; and at that very time was promenading the boulevards of the seas, quite like one of the chic, with the new. Hi-Chi, Hi-Tien, and Hai-Shen.

The Hi-Chi had a speed of twenty-four knots, and was a cruiser carrying an armament as heavy as many vessels twice her displacement.

The fleet of Japan was in prime fighting order, modern, as smart as it was swift and strong. It was worth any two of the fleets in Chinese waters put together.

Was England's weight of metal sufficient? This was the question.

The fact was, that England had ceased to be acutely anxious when it was once known that her weight was greater than that of any two of the European nations combined.

She had added 37,000 tons, in round numbers, to her former Chinese squadron; Russia 36,000; France 11,000. But, all told, she had concentrated 126,700 tons in those waters, whereas Russia's total was only 83,000, and France's 26,000. It followed, therefore, that Britain had a preponderance of some 17,700 tons over these two.

This had seemed enough, considering that some of Russia's terra-cotta coloured ships were»old-fashioned.

It was hardly remembered that there was Germany, too, with a weight of 27,000 tons in Chinese waters. Russia, France, and Germany together had a preponderance over Britain of 10,000 tons.

The fact was sufficiently impressive in itself; but it had not been terrifying, even to those who remembered the possibility of the German element being hostile to the British, when they also remembered the splendid fleet of — Japan.

Here was an additional element of 200,000 tons — all on the side of Britain.

For was not Japan the friend of England? Were not their interests identical? The Britain of the East, and the Britain of the West — how natural that they should stand shoulder to shoulder!

But there was one question, in connection with this queer, outlandish, yellow ally of England, the correct answer to which would have sent as great a shock through England, could she have known it, as she had ever received in her history. The question was this: ‘Where on earth, during the early part of April 1899, did the Allied fleet in Eastern waters get their supplies of coal?’

We have stated that England and Japan, by a clever deal, had, weeks before, effected a corner in all the Welsh and other coal in the East.

Yet on the morning of the 19th of April the whole Allied navy, which some little time before had been almost immobilised for lack of steam-fuel, and had been hiding and dodging, each ship for herself, all about the northern Chinese coasts, now steamed gallantly past Quelpart in search of the British fleet, supposed to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of Chemulpo.

They were steering north-west; Nagasaki lay south-east; they were therefore coming from Japan. Could it be that from Japan they had obtained this coal?

And where was the fleet of Japan? For two days Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Seymour had been expecting it, by previous arrangement, to appear off Chemulpo. But as yet it gave no sign.

The Vice-Admiral was not at first precisely anxious; for his only ground of suspicion that anything was wrong in China was the fact, reported to him at Hong-Kong six days before, that all communication between that island and the mainland had mysteriously ceased. Yen How had left the Englishmen on Hong-Kong alive, having no desire to have every Chinese port shelled by British guns. Hence, when the Vice-Admiral coaled and started northward hurriedly on receipt of a telegram from Tokio stating that the Allied fleet had managed to procure some coal, and were steaming eastward upon Japan, he had no suspicion of the massacre. His reply to Tokio was that he was starting northward at once, and would avoid an engagement, until the junction of the two fleets; and he instructed the Japanese fleet to join him at Chemulpo.

But at Chemulpo he received a shock. There was no white man in the place.

All he could suppose was that there had been a rising in the town, and the white men killed.

But he hardly attached any political importance to the fact. Such things were common in China.

He waited with perfect confidence for the Japanese fleet.

The next morning he received a cable despatched from Nagasaki to Fusan, and brought two hundred miles on mule-back to Chemulpo. It was as follows:

‘The Allied fleets, plentifully supplied with coal, are about to steam eastward in search of you. Japanese fleet will follow.’

‘Steam eastward!’, ‘Supplied with coal!’, ‘Will follow!’ Certainly, now, if ever man was puzzled, it was the British Commander-in-Chief.

For if the enemy were steaming eastward supplied with coal, that meant Japanese treachery. But if Japan were treacherous, and had joined the Allies, why on earth did she take the pains to warn the British of their advance?

And why ‘will’ follow? They should have set out, according to the Vice-Admiral’s instructions, long before. If they had not already set out, they were treacherous; but if they were treacherous, why did they give this warning of it, instead of taking the advantage of a surprise?

That they were not neutral seemed proved by the fact that they were 'following' at all.

The Vice-Admiral's brow was a heavy cloud of care. He decided that the missive was a hoax, then that that was impossible, then again that it was a hoax.

He sent an expedition of blue-jackets by road to Seoul to see who was there. They returned with the announcement that there were no white men in Seoul.

The secret of Japan's action, though inscrutable, was this: she coaled the Allies in order that they might destroy the British; and she warned the British in order that they might destroy the Allies.

She helped both sides, being the enemy of both.

But this policy was too subtle for the British Commander to divine without an absolute clue.

The absence of white men at Seoul, as well as at Chemulpo, was merely an added shock. It brought no real light to the mind. He waited on, with anxious heart, for the appearance of the Japanese.

Two days he spent in coaling the fleet out of four colliers which had accompanied him from Hong-Kong, and in taking in stores from the store-ships. %At the end of the second day there was still no sign of the yellow ally of England.

The thing was so inexplicable, that even wonderment could find no guess. Japan was a nation among nations, responsible, presumably careful to keep her pledged word. What, then, could have happened?

'What, in God's name, has happened?' said the Vice-Admiral to himself twenty times during the course of that terrible and sleepless night.

But he did not neglect the warning of Japan's cable. The next morning, immediately after the saluting of the colours, the fleet steamed from Chemulpo harbour, the flag-ship being the Barfleur, one of the only two line-of-battleships present.

The Vice-Admiral, in his ignorance of the real facts of the situation, had no intention of being caught at anchor without sea-room.

So far, no action had taken place in the East. The approaches to Vladivostok harbour, Port Arthur, and Kiao-Chau were crowded with mines, and defended by forts. The Vice-Admiral had preserved his fighting power from injury, till the first naval battle. After that, in the event of victory, he meant to proceed to the hostile ports.

He went cruising south-eastward under half steam. A bright, breezy morning of Spring.

But what now is that, away yonder on the southern horizon? A long streak of gray mist, which has the property of growing swiftly broader and darker. The Japanese fleet at last, surely!

No. It is the fleet of the allied enemy. That is quickly determined by the look-outs.

They numbered twenty-nine, and occupied the whole region of the southern hemi-horizon.

The British ships were thirty-three. Among them, however, was a very large number of smaller-tonnage craft, torpedo-boat destroyers, first-class gun-boats, second and third-class cruisers, despatch vessels, and sloops of war, of varying weight, from about 4000 to as low as 260 tons. But there, too, on the other hand, were the great Terrible, and her sister-cruiser (in whose books was the name of John Hardy, absent), the Powerful. These had each a tonnage of 14,200. There, too, were the Revenge with 14,150 tons, and the Gibraltar with 7,700.

The weight of the enemy was greater; but 'it was not much greater; and even so, it was not the custom of Englishmen to count as a deterrent from battle a preponderance of the enemy in physical power. The Vice-Admiral banished from his mind for the time the mystery of the Japanese fleet, and sent forth his commands with a high heart.

Nimble Jack, below decks, belted his trousers with a determined snap, and stripped himself of blouse and shirt, prepared to sink, to fight, to swim, to die, to live.

Already from the conning-towers could be discerned the pea-soup colour of some Russian ships, though both fleets were pouring round the horizon two regions of dark smoke.

The British approached in a very wide wedge, the Barfleur leading at the apex of the formation, while the enemy maintained a double line, the whole of the first line being composed of Russian vessels, the heavy Vladimir Monomakh occupying the central post.

The barb, so to speak, of the British wedge was as strong as possible. On each side of the Barfleur, somewhat astern of her, came the Powerful and the Terrible. It was the intention of the Vice-Admiral to begin well, and to derive all the moral prestige which this fact might afford. At the moment when the Vladimir was two miles from the Barfleur, and three from the Terrible and the Powerful the battle commenced on the British side. All the three British vessels had kept their forward barbets trained upon the Vladimir, and they fired simultaneously. The result was just like magic. Before the smoke had cleared, the Russian ship was no longer on the surface of the waters.

An instant afterwards, and the battle was general.

In the fury of warfare which now ensued, let the reader fix his eye upon a middle-sized and comparatively unimportant ship which stands far back in the starboard limb of the British wedge. She is called the Iphigenia; a second-class cruiser; tonnage 3600, horse-power 7000; not very wonderfully armoured, but agile in the water, and capable of showing a clean pair of heels. On board of her is — Fate.

Yonder is the Gefion engaged with the Terrible, and yonder both the Pascal and the Indomptable with the Revenge, and yonder again the Barfleur with the Admiral Nachimov, and the Powerful with the Jean Bart. Wide is the war and various. The British wedge has penetrated the fleet of the Allies. The navies of the world are mixed together in a hotch-potch of combat. Either with design or without, the battle, within five minutes from its start, has become a mere metie of thunder.

There are instances, on one side and the other, of splendid manoeuvring, of the right thing done at the right moment. But these all are individual, between ship and ship, captain and captain. Neither on the one side nor on the other is there any wide plan, or grand plot, or omnipresent eye. On the whole, it is a question of weight of metal against weight of metal. The great man is not there.

Slowly, in his dark prison, the Chinese Iron is entering into the soul of John Hardy. He is being taught the meaning of Fear, and familiarity with the face of Pain. This, too, was necessary for him.

But see what a mess the Terrible is making of the Gefion yonder in the very thick of things. Some of the ships are fighting at little more than pistol-shot distance; and the Terrible is well within half a knot of the dismantled Gefion, when Commander Madden, careering to starboard, trumpets forth through the uproar in a kind of German: ‘Haul down your flag, or I’ll ram!’ And half a minute later down sails the flag of the Gefion; and half a minute later still, down dives the Gefion herself to her final harbour at the bottom of the Hwang Hai, which swallows with her all that part of her crew which a pinnacle of the Terrible is unable to rescue.

But the Revenge has lodged a 12-inch shell in the fore-port magazine of the Indomitable in vain. The French ship shudders — then, a little forward of amidships, there is a red belch that spouts high above her mast, and curves outward in a lurid rain far over the sea — then there is a long reverberation of clattering thunder — and the Indomptable bursts and sinks. But this row is mingled with another, caused by the ram of the foundering Pascal which is working and ravening in the central armour-belt of the Revenge. The three vessels disappear from sight within a minute of each other.

There, on the far starboard edge of the British line of battle, the Iphigenia — on board of which is Fate — is levelling her whole port battery in one incessant roll of Gardners and Nordenfeldts upon a small approaching second-class torpedo-boat; growling harshly is she, like a hound which bristles and gnashes and snarls, retreating backward, at the sudden apparition of an advancing cobra.

The torpedo-boat lances one of her needles of steel, but it is caught by a wave, tossed upwards in a whiff of spray, and sent flying to starboard, where it explodes under the stern of the French first-class battery-cruiser Aréthuse. As the tube of the torpedo-boat sends forth another explosive, the ram of the Iphigenia passes into and over her small assailant; the torpedo explodes ten yards away, but tears a hole in the for'ard protective bulkhead of the Iphigenia. She commences to settle down by the starboard bow.

But what is this phenomenon which now suddenly appalls every eye — the eyes of friend and of foe; something appalling by its mere novelty, not hitherto seen in sea or land warfare — something in the air — with all the properties and the powers of a spirit of evil?

It is a balloon — narrow, low, and long — French in origin. It can be steered backward and forward even in the teeth of a light wind; and its operators have the power of dropping dynamite shells with a steel casing, containing liquid oxygen and blasting gelatine, upon the hostile ships. It has come sailing with the light breath of the S.W. monsoon from a French ship which has studiously kept far on the outskirts of the battle.

It is not a toy; nor is it sent up as a curiosity for the amusement of the British ships. It becomes stationary high over the Barfleur; a black dot is seen to disengage itself from it, and a moment or two afterwards ninety-five British sailors are dead, and the engines of the Barfleur are no longer there. Then, sparing of its shells, it moves on in another direction, and then swiftly in another, and another, letting fall each time, like some evil bird, its deadly droppings. Except two, which fall into the sea, every shell destroys a ship. One bullet of a rifle would be sufficient to prove fatal to it, but it is high, its movements are swift and sudden, and when at last it tumbles, pierced, into the sea, the battle is all but over. It has done its work.

This had been the wisdom of France in the times of peace: that she had not despised the ingenious man, and his ingenuities; she had invited the thinker; she had welcomed the dreamer of dreams.

This was the second time since the beginning of the war that the British had come into contact with the Forges et Chantiers de la Méditerranée, and had shuddered intensely at the contact.

But we are an ocean race! Every cock on his own dunghill — and England on the sea. But for the French balloon, the British would very likely have won the battle by five seaworthy ships, and one unseaworthy. As it was, they won by two seaworthy ships, and one unseaworthy.

The last shot fired was fired by the Iphigenia at a German third-class cruiser, which she sank. This was the last but two of the Allied vessels left afloat; the other two, having some time since struck their flag, were now sinking fast.

Besides the Iphigenia, which had engines, funnels, screws, and rudder intact, but had a considerable crank bow-wards, there were afloat of the British craft the Daphne, a twin-screw sloop, practically uninjured, and the Barfleur, floating a mere log, unable to move. There were fifty-seven men alive in her.

The Iphigenia had one boat, and the Daphne two, still capable of passing over the water; and these were- soon out, two of them making toward the Barfleur to take off her crew, and the third in the direction of one of the still floating two ships of the Allies, for the purpose of rescue.

The sea was oilily smooth; the breeze had died to a mere breath; the sun had climbed to noon.

All was still. Over four buried navies the water swung lazily — as a cradle which one has ceased to rock, of its own motion.

Weirdly sad is that vast and wandering grave of the sailor; and careless is the great heart of the sea.

So intent were all who floated during this quiet noontide in the central ocean upon the humane work of rescue, that no one noticed the swift approach upon them of a growing cloud from the east; and it was only when a shrapnel shell came screaming upon the already shattered Barfleur, that the British sailors, to their consternation, discovered that yet another enemy was upon them.

Presently, as though the new arrivals had found an entire fleet to oppose them, the air was full of fire.

Five large cruisers were seen to be steaming at full speed upon the small remnants of the four fleets.

But cruisers of what nation? They carried no flag!

The two vessels of the Allies — small torpedo-boat destroyers — had long since struck their colours. And at once, as a precautionary measure, the three British vessels did the same.

But it made no difference! The rain of fire continued.

Happily, before the boat of the Iphigenia reached the Barfleur, the Barfleur dipped, and sank. So also did one of the Allied ships, and also one of the Daphne's boats with her crew. The other of the Daphne's boats, and the Iphigenia's boat, at once turned to hurry to their ships.

For the moment, the Iphigenia was still beyond effective range of the shells of this strange enemy; but one of the screws of the Daphne was shattered by a semi-submarine explosion.

At once, as their boats reached them, the two British ships turned tail under forced draught, flying straight westward from this sudden, dread, mysterious foe.

Both were very swift; but the Daphne could now only move with half her speed. On board the Iphigenia the pumps were at work.

The strange enemy, seeing that there was no longer target for their shot, ceased fire, and slackened speed. Only the swiftest of the cruisers was told off to continue the chase of the fugitives.

She gained upon them both, especially upon the Daphne; but a stern chase is a long chase, and it was an hour before the first shell, shattering every gun in the Daphne's port central battery, warned her that further flight was useless.

The Daphne, as she fled, had again hoisted her ensign, and now again she struck it; and again was surrender met by a hail of shot from this extraordinary adversary.

The Daphne at once re-hoisted her colours, spun sharply round to port, and bore straight down upon her pursuer.

Her commander was at least determined to sell the life of his ship dearly.

But he was met by such a cataract of shell and shot that he perceived that he must certainly founder before accomplishing the ram which he meditated.

He determined, far off as he was, to risk the launching of his last torpedo.

It proved a happy inspiration.

The little needle of disaster went hasting, in steadfast headlong flight, in spite of swinging wave and baffling spray, straight upon its victim. It fastened upon her beam at the level of her armoured deck, a few inches below the water-line, and burst.

The strange vessel started, and, with a cough that rent her, threw her fragments over the sea. She was the Japanese cruiser Tschiyoda.

A minute later, while the Iphigenia was still hasting back to the scene of the duel, the Daphne sank with all hands.

The Iphigenia was now miles out of sight of the four Japanese cruisers. She continued her course eastward, very slowly sinking all the time.

About midnight of the next day she was beached on a sandy bottom not far from Kiao-Chau.

She had on board a hundred and eighty men.

CHAPTER XV. THE SUICIDE OF EUROPE

AT THE TIME of the battle in the Hwang-Hai nearly all Europe was at war.

If any one had imagined that Russia, France, and Germany could declare war against England, and that there the matter would end, he must have been blind to the actual meaning of the then conditions.

Shortly after the defeat of the Allies at Shoreham, a burst of Homeric laughter was caused over England and the Continent by the announcement that the Prince of Monaco (an independent sovereign, possessed of the magnificent army of sixty body-guard carabineers) had declared war against England.

The episode, amusing in itself, was not without significance.

The Prince was not a mere pantomimist. He had been compelled by some intricacy of the actual situation to act as he had acted, and his action only meant that so complex and finely-poised was the machinery of modern European polity, that it was no longer possible for any considerable portion of Europe to be at war without plunging into war the rest of it also.

With the sound of the first cannon a thousand slumbering passions of the people started into life. The hour had struck for the placing upon the stage of a thousand schemes of long-meditated revenge, avarice, and aggression.

Servia rejoiced. Her secret vow to settle the long-standing account with her Bulgarian victors might now be fulfilled. Bulgaria rejoiced. Now at last would she be free of Tsar and of Sultan alike.

Sweden looked round with something of the aggressive enterprise of her old hero, Gustavus Adolphus, wondering if now, at last, she could not accomplish the deliverance of her Finns from the oppressive hand of Russia.

The Cretans, certain now that the Sultan would have his hands full of matters other than their small selves, girt on the dirk and carbine of massacre. Austria turned her eyes toward Salonica with languishing,' and her right hand crept out to steal.

Roumania dreamed that Russia's only motive for war was to furnish an excuse for her destruction, and rushed in arms to her frontiers. Italy had territories still 'unredeemed': and was not this the time to redeem' them?

Denmark had been nipped and curtailed, and her day was come for vengeance; Portugal was alert to stab in the back her British rival in Africa in the hour of his preoccupation.

At Athens, at Belgrade, at Sophia — from London to Batoum — from St. Petersburg to Megalo-Kastro — the sword leapt from its scabbard.

Mobil I

The Sultan pressed his fez tight upon his head, sitting among cushions; and the panic of the sinner in the day of his calamity gripped coldly at this man's heart. He had heard that the main body of the Servian army was moving eastward from its headquarters at Knuzevatz, and were being massed upon Nisch and Vranja, while fresh levies were being made in order to form a strong reserve; and he had hardly heard it, when the further news arrived that a bloody battle between Servian and Bulgarian divisions of infantry had occurred near Vlassina, in which the Bulgarians had been routed.

The messengers of evil followed fast one upon the other, like the messengers of Job.

The same night a considerable Austrian body crossed the Save, and quietly occupied Belgrade.

The next morning Austrian troops bivouacking in the open spaces of the city, and Austrian officers taking dejeuner on the boulevards, met the astonished eyes of the waking citizens.

It seemed as if the Golden Horn was in danger of being broken.

For this action was tantamount to an act of hostility against Russia on the part of Austria. Wilkin, a few hours after the occupation of Belgrade, another Austrian brigade, without firing a shot, was installed in Scemendria. The same day telegraphic communication between Constantinople and Odessa was interrupted.

Macedonia was in flames, and a land of ententes, — both Anti-Turkish and Anti-Bulgarian, — from end to end. The Vali of Saloniki was assassinated and mutilated in the streets of his city.

The Porte had called out the last class of rediffs; and rediffs from Smyrna and the Tripolitaine, to the number of 70,000, were being massed with a view to the protection of the frontier line. Fifty thousand men, still left around Stamboul, were distributed along the chain of forts from Roumalie Kavak to the Golden Horn. A fleet of Turkish torpedo-boats without torpedoes, and ironclads without ammunition, steamed northward through the Bosphorus. But before they reached the latitude of Midia, a fleet of Russian Black-Sea battle-ships, torpedo-boats, and transports crowded with 90,000 troops from Odessa, had shelled and occupied Bourgas. (Bourgas is in direct railway communication with Constantinople.)

The uncalled-for action of Austria in occupying the two Servian towns was Russia's defence for her occupation of the Bulgarian town.

Events followed one upon another with an ever-increasing frightfulness of rapidity. Developments which at other times would have required weeks for their outcome, now required hours. Europe wheeled in a delirium of haste. The next day half-a-dozen sotnias of irresponsible Cossacks pushed forward across the Galician frontier to Lubica; and without delay Austria declared formal war against Russia.

Here was a topsy-turvydom of things — brought about by the festering greed and the old malice of the nations. Germany was the pledged ally of Austria; Germany was the pledged ally of Russia against England; and Russia and Austria were at war!

Look, too, at those Italian Bersaglieri and Alpini climbing like chamois over the Alps, with batteries borne on nimble-hoofed mules, by the Mont Cenis route. Italy means to get back, now, old Savoy — which is her Alsace-Lorraine — and is engaged on the one hand with French dragoons and mountain-chasseurs among the Alps, and, on the other, is shelling with her fleet the batteries that defend the Riviera, preparatory to landing three corps, her 2nd, 4th, and 6th, in the neighbourhood of Nice and Mentone. Yet Germany was the ally of Italy; and Germany was the ally of France; and France and Italy were at war!

Mobil, then, ye sons of men! Set briskly to it — for it is now or never. Mobil for your lives!

In England there was no longer a nation: there was only a Militia. The nation had become an army.

After three days of a terrific artillery battle between British ironclads and the Forts de la Floride, de l'Heure, and de Tourneville, an English army under Lord Roberts had occupied, first Havre, and then Harfleur. A series of disastrous battles, between Harfleur and Yvetot, had followed, in which the British, though outnumbered, were generally successful in claiming nominal victories. But they made no decided advance. The hitherto unknown results of modern contrivances were found to make victory almost as fatal as defeat. The very small bullets of the Lee-Metford and Lebel rifles — the enormous rangf of the magazine rifle — the use of smokeless powder — were discovered to be elements whose effects were, on the whole, ten times greater than had been anticipated. Division after division hurried over from Britain to the support of the Flavre army; and corps after corps of the French massed upon Rouen, upon Harfleur, upon Concordville, and the neighbouring towns to oppose them. It became a question of men.

Five British ships, which were all that was left of the Mediterranean Squadron after a great engagement in the Bay of Algeciras, were reducing Marseilles at the very time when the Italian ships were engaged in an incessant artillery duel with the forts along the Riviera coast. Yet Italy and England were not formally allies.

North and south a dark cloud of tragedy widened over France. In less than six weeks from the commencement of the war her 7th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Corps d'Armée had ceased to exist, in consequence of signal Italian victories in the south; while in the north a steady deluge of British regiments had accounted for seven more of her corps. Toulon, the impregnable, was in the hands of General Ricotti. Havre was a British base.

Already the reserve of the territorial army was being mobilised for probable service.

France was shrinking under the intolerably harsh frown of England. The Joy of the whole earth was about to perish.

England herself, in her tough, silent way, was in the grip of bitter suffering. The Government had established public granaries over the kingdom. But the price of bread was prohibitive. Whole villages perished.

Singular as it now seems, she had had no separate cable connecting her telegraphically with South Africa, which was to a large extent her life. When she was disconnected with the Continent, she found herself disconnected also with her most important colonies. It was necessary to adopt the method of sending a despatch vessel round the Cape in order to recall the Australian and Pacific Squadrons. The Suez Canal had long since been blown up by the French officials at Port Said.

At the Cape a naval battle had resulted, by some few ships, in a victory for the Allies, in consequence of overwhelming odds. Cape Town and the British seaboard of South Africa had been shelled. Sierra Leone had become French.

But Australia and the seaboard of India were already safe. The enemy needed all their still floating navies nearer home.

On the strongly-fortified German coast England's success had been hardly less than marvelous. A small fleet of British war-ships and troopers had appeared at the entrance of the Kiel Canal, and captured Tronning.

There the two great branches of the Teutonic race measured strengths. England had sent, 100,000 men to fight a nation boasting the most exquisite military organisation the world has ever conceived, and capable of placing in the field an army approaching three millions.

The first result was mere disaster for the invaders, — but not moral defeat. They retained Tronning, and, by a coup, the remnants of the scattered army under Sir Evelyn Wood possessed itself of Stralsund. They did it under cover of a bombardment by a British fleet, among the British ships being the three Swedish cruisers Gota, Svea, and Vanadis, which suddenly appeared, and joined in the action.

Nor was this England's last word to Germany.

It can never be that guns and swords alone can rule the world. The nation with the stoutest heart and the hardest brow, she is the mistress.

What happened at Havre, happened at Kiel and Stralsund. England with astonishing, steady pertinacity sent men to fight — only, here, the rigour of the thing was greater, the flame hotter.

In all that low-lying tract of land between Wismar, Neu Brandenburg, Anclam, and Stralsund a series of murderous conflicts took place, Wilhelm himself directing the course of the campaign, and the English being entrenched for the most part behind a semicircular line of earthworks stretching east and west, with Stralsund for base.

The three lines of railway, west to Lübeck and Hamburg, east to Stettin, and south to Berlin, were in the hands of the British; and after a day of fearful carnage in the neighbourhood of Neu Brandenburg, in which the German army was routed with a loss of 150,000 men, a successful rush was made for Stettin, which, in the course of a night attack, fell into British hands.

The same night nearly the whole of Berlin was destroyed by fire, a catastrophe attributed to the action of Socialists.

And ever England came to Germany — raw levies, meagre Cockney-born lads, boors from the Downs, Lancashire bodies, persons in kilts: not terrible to look at: terrible to meet in battle.

Their chief characteristic is not that they are brave, and agile, and cool; but that by some unknown national quality of mind they really contrive to do what they try to do. Their results always produce a certain effect of surprise.

Before these nimble invaders the tapfere Krieger of the Fatherland slowly receded.

From Thon, that Metz of the East, from Koenigsberg, and Danzig, and the great military depots of the North-east, troops were drafted to repel this obstinate, rock-browed, small, unseasoned foe.

But the more the English poured their levies upon the German sea-board, and the greater the draughts by Wilhelm upon the as yet inactive corps, and the nearer the possibility of a call upon the Teuton shop-keepers and burghers of the reserve, so the more Socialistic seemed to become the opinions of the German nation.

Socialism — with its absurdities — with its heavenly gospel of salvation for the world — had, for ultimate good, or ultimate ill, got into the blood of the nations during the latter half of the nineteenth century, far more than any one then supposed. Men who most hated the word, thought Socialism, and did not know it. It was bound to come out when the great moment for its birth arrived.

Wilhelm walked on an abyss, and the ground beneath his feet was parchment.

He had no sooner withdrawn a large portion of the Army of the Vistula, than Danzig was sacked and taken by the Swedish fleet.

The most extraordinary phenomenon of this vast and complex war was the success of Sweden everywhere. Within three weeks a division of her gallant little army, consisting of only three corps, had gained a permanent pied à terre as far south as Bromberg; she had wrought havoc with the northeastern coast-defences of Germany; and she had turned West Prussia into a depopulated wilderness. Another division of her army, consisting of five corps, had in two great battles on the Banks of Lake Ulea routed two Russian war-hosts, and had pushed on to Helsingfors, which they captured from the land side, and made their headquarters. Intoxicated, they turned their faces across the Gulf of Finland toward Cronstat.

The hands of Russia were full enough.

Immediately upon the outbreak of war with Austria, she had concentrated, as fast as her defective railway-system would allow, great masses of troops, consisting of the 4th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 12th Army Corps, in the direction of Lemberg. Behind these followed the more remote 13th, 16th, and 17 th Corps.

Including the Corps d'Armée doing unsuccessful battle with the Swedes in Finland, by far the greater part of Russia's vast territorial power was now in the field, three additional army-corps having advanced from Kars to the investment of Erzeroum, where a crushing defeat at the hands of a mixed army of Turks and English awaited them.

The eastern limb of the British Mediterranean fleet had steamed through the Bosphorus, conveying transports to Trebizonde, and then proceeded northwards, with the double object of a search for the Russian Black Sea Squadron, and the bombardment of Odessa and Sebastopol.

Austria had massed her forces into three armies: one in East Galicia, on the Dniester, another on the San with its back on Przemysl, the great bulwark of Middle Galicia, and the third on Cracow, the key of Western Galicia, on the Upper Vistula.

The Great White Tsar was preoccupied. All around his sky were clouds and darkness. That mighty breadth of empire was already rocking to its fall.

The gray and green-coated soldiers of Russia were swarming round her borders, more on the defensive than the offensive. In the first fixed battle with the Austrians, General Gourko, the old Invincible, had been routed with such a horror of widespread massacre that the brain of the aged general was unhinged.

And ever anew — after each orgy of blood — went forth the cry over Europe: Mobil, Mobil.

In a skirmish near Karatova between two demi-regiments of Macedonians and Bulgarians, not a single man was left alive.

In fact, Europe was destroying herself. Everywhere, from Land's End to the Caucasus, the grin of a spectre was perceived in the air — the Spectre of Hunger, and grim Scarcity, and raw-boned Want.

England had America to supply her wants; but wants cannot be supplied save by the purchasing power of the party who wants. England's purchasing power had consisted in her commerce, and her commerce was near to death.

America, moreover, in this crisis, had no idea of small profits and quick returns. She had been thrown by the war into a state of financial collapse. And, with the blindness of selfishness, she raised her prices to prohibitive figures.

On paper England remained rich enough. Her consols were taken up eagerly. The chief financiers and bankers of the world filled her war-chest. The security of by far the larger half of investments depended upon her success. As a matter of self-interest the Rothschilds, and Wall Street, and the kings of finance, threw in their lot with her.

But the industry of the world was at a standstill, and there is no wealth not the direct offspring of industry.

Germany, France, Italy, and Russia opened their ports to all comers, adopting the free-trade policy of England — but too late. That, of course, which they were unable to buy was not brought to them to be sold.

Russian wheat, by Imperial command, ceased to be exported. But it would quite certainly have ceased to be exported without the command.

The fields grew rich and oozy with a human sap, the blood of millions. But the hand of industry was palsied to sow the seed.

Mobil, then, ye children of Europe! Mobil all ye can! But know that in the end it shall bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder.

CHAPTER XVI. THE LOVE WHICH FOO-CHEE BORE TO AH-LIN

FOO-CHEE WAS NO. 13 of the 3rd squad of the 1st company of the 2nd battalion of the nth regiment of the 2nd brigade of the 1st division of the 17th Army Corps of the great army of China.

Every morning and every night he lifted up both his hands, and he blessed the name of Yen How, illustrious, who by his might had changed the old flow and show of things. For why? Because Ah-lin was No. 15 of the same squad of the same company of the same battalion of the same regiment of the same brigade of the same division of the same Army Corps of the great army of China.

Every day, between four and a quarter to six o'clock, the company was drilled on the plain south-east of Pekin, half a mile from the walls. The roll was called before drill, and if any one was absent, he or she was hanged publicly, by the heels, the next morning. So Ah-lin had to be there, and Foo-chee saw Ah-lin, and blessed Yen How, illustrious.

Ah-lin was a girl of eighteen, very pretty, with the elongated face which the Chinese adore, and eyes so long, and narrow, and slanting. She was the daughter of a tiny silversmith whose shop was on a fifth floor in a gaudy Pekin main-street.

Her father lived his life in a corner of the single room which was his shop and dwelling. His life was a dream, and his food rice-greens and opium. When he awoke from his paradises, he languidly took up a piece of silver, and looked at it, and put it down again.

Ah-lin's father and mother and herself lived happily upon fifteen tiaos per week. The father was exempt from service, because one of his legs was incapable of walking. The mother served in a different company from that of Ah-lin.

But in spite of her poverty, Ah-lin had an elongated face, and peepy little bewitching eyes, and a pigtail of incredible length. Her feet, of course, had not been cramped, and she walked with a fine free swing, slanting a wee bit backward, like the true Northerner that she was.

'Foo-chee,' said Ni-ching-tang, who was the father of Foo-chee, 'take your eyes from Ah-lin, my son. Leave Ah-lin be. She is loved by Sin-wan, and Sin-wan is among the honourable ones in the days which are.'

Ni-ching-tang knew what he was saying; for he was a very subordinate cook in the multitudinous kitchen of Yen How, and Sin-wan was a warder in the Imperial Prisons. Ni-ching-tang and Sin-wan were good nodding acquaintances, as we should say.

That Sin-wan loved Ah-lin there could be no doubt. He had more than once risked his neck in leaving the Imperial precincts at unlawful hours to make signalling gestures before the fifth-floor room of Ah-lin's parents.

But Sin-wan was of middle age, and unduly stout. His neck was thick and hard, and seemed made for hanging. And his countenance was as hideous as Fe's, the joss, as it stands carved out in the ebon idols.

Moreover, Sin-wan was addicted to orgies of the spirit samshu, and the impress of these excesses was left on his brutal face.

Ah-lin's eyes, though narrow, could see much; and in her secret meditations in the darkness of the room at night she would think that Foo-chee was pleasant to look at, and Sin-wan was not.

Foo-chee was a young man of twenty, and a seller of Thibet incense-sticks in the next street to Ah-lin's. And these two units, among the tens of thousands of human beings that swarmed and sweltered around them, felt within them the stirrings of that force which made the world.

Ah-lin had noted the following eye of Foo-chee often, long before the strange drilling commenced; and when she found herself almost next to him in the 3rd squad, she had a presentiment and a tremor. It was the doing of the upper gods.

‘Ah-lin,’ said Ah-lin’s mother, Nan-lin, ‘turn away your eyes from the eyes that turn to you. Foo-chee is pleasant to look at, but Sin-wan is among the honourable ones in the days that are. A child should love her father and her mother above herself, and do all for them.’

But it was the doing of the upper gods, what happened. Ah-lin was near to Foo-chee every day in the new drill; and the drilling straightened Foo-chee’s back, so that his backward slant as he walked was increased, till a woman would have died for him.

But Sin-wan, one night, beckoned to Nan-lin from the street, and Nan-lin sent down Ah-lin, and Sin-wan took Ah-lin by the hand and said:

‘Ah-lin is well formed, both in face and figure. Therefore I, Sin-wan, will marry with Ah-lin.’

At this directness Ah-lin hung her head. It was not difficult to perceive the sequence of cause and effect in this matter — and she was afraid of Sin-wan.

‘Do you say yes, Ah-lin?’ said Sin-wan. ‘If you say yes, I will take you now to a meal in Hing-Chang-Li’s eating-house, with fresh tea to drink.’

‘I say yes,’ replied Ah-lin, ‘but my father and’ mother — to whom all honour — do not wish me to marry now.’

‘That is a lie, Ah-lin. Your father and mother wish you to marry. And you wish to marry, too. But you do not wish to marry with me. You wish to marry with Foo-chee.’

‘Foo-chee?’ — she started— ‘Where did you hear the name of Foo-chee?’

‘Your mother told me his name, Ah-lin.’

‘It is strange. I know no one with such a name.’

‘It is a lie, Ah-lin. His name is written in green and red picture-letters over the booth where he sells incense-sticks. I have seen it, and I have seen him.’

‘And what do you say is his name?’

‘Foo-chee.’

‘Well, it may be, Sin-wan. I know nothing of the matter.’

‘Foo-chee shall die, Ah-lin, if you do not marry with me.’

‘Oh! what for? Whom has Foo-chee hurt? He sells his incense-sticks, and hurts no one!’

‘Now I have made you say that you wish to marry with him. For you do not wish me to kill him, Ah-lin.’

‘Kill him, if you wish.’

< I will kill him.’

‘But why so?’

‘Because you will not marry with me.’

‘I did not say I will not marry with you, Sin-wan.’

‘Then you will?’

‘I must.’

‘When, Ah-lin?’

‘When the new drilling is no more.’

‘Oh, that may be never. No. It shall be while this moon is big.’

‘I cannot, Sin-wan — I cannot.’

‘Why not, Ah-lin?’

‘It is my father and mother, — to whom all—’

‘It is that dog’s gall, Foo-chee! Foo-chee shall die, Ah-lin.’

‘Oh, me! I am not feeling happy, Sin-wan!’

‘No, nor am I feeling happy, till you say that it shall be this moon! Nor shall Foo-chee feel happy, when my knife is rankling in his liver! Say it, Ah-lin?’

‘I say it, Sin-wan.’

‘While the moon is big?’

‘Yes, Sin-wan.’

‘Then I will go. And I will come again to-morrow night at this hour.’

‘Did you not say that you would take me to the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li for a meal, with fresh tea?—’

‘I cannot to-night, for I have no time, since I must return now to the Imperial Prison. But to-morrow night — or the night after — you shall feed at the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li.’

So Sin-wan turned on his heels, and walked away on them. And when he arrived at the portals of the Imperial City, he was already late, and his bulging neck was in danger.

The Imperial Prisons stood, in a great quadrangle of marble, fringed with stupendous avenues of long-haired trees of the banyan genus, being surrounded by a moat bridged by a number of marble bridges. The building itself is of marble, and of very great size. A stone’s throw to the south stood the palace of the Austrian Ambassador, embedded in a bower of foliage; to the north, a hundred yards away, and separated from the prison by a lake overgrown with huge lilies and moon-leaved water-growths, stood the shaded palace of Yen How. The Imperial Palace itself was half a mile away by the broad avenue, but there was also a short-cut to it from the palace of Yen How.

It was the quiet hour of the evening-time, and the sumptuous landscape of the Imperial City seemed to faint and doze in a dream of lotus peace.

Leaning over one of the marble bridges that spanned the prison-moat was an old man. It was Ni-ching-tang, the father of Foo-chee. His day's work was over, and he was looking sleepily upon the dark and slumbrous water of the moat.

As he leaned so, Sin-wan approached him, passing to his duties in the prison. Ni-ching-tang would not have heard the tread of the thick-felted slippers; but Sin-wan spoke.

'Give good to you, Ni-ching-tang,' he said. 'Has his Might, the Governor, passed this way yet?'

'No, Sin-wan,' the old man answered, and his eyes smiled; 'fear nothing. He will not know.'

'Know what, Ni-ching-tang?'

'That you are late — again.'

Sin-wan leered.

'It comes of going to seek a little wife,' he said.

'Poh! it is nothing — if you are not seen. But a wife?'

'Ah-lin is her name, and she is the daughter of Lan-sing and Nan-lin, his wife. We will marry this moon. She is well formed, both in face and body.'

'What, with small feet too?'

'No small feet; but well formed in face and body.'

'And she lives where?'

'In the third quarter, and the main street.'

'Why, I have a son who lives near the main street of the third quarter.'

'And what is your son's name, Ni-ching-tang?'

Sin-wan did not notice that Ni-ching-tang paused a second before he answered.

‘My son is called Cheng-lu,’ he said.

Then Sin-wan passed on, and entered the prison.

As he went in, he took from his bosom a small cylinder of ebony, round which clung a roll of silk-paper.

On the paper were six lines of writing, each starting from the top and going down to the bottom. Each line started with a date, and underneath the date came the instructions for that day.

This document had been painted by Yen How, with his own hands.

Yen How had stood over John Hardy, with watch and stethoscope in his hands. John had lain bound on his back on the marble floor.

Yen How had examined him from head to foot. He had felt the texture of his muscles, had palpated the calves of his legs, had held his pulse, watch in hand. He had applied the stethoscope to John’s chest, and heard the wheeze; he had laid it over his heart, and made an estimate of the exact timbre of the beats, systole and diastole, venous and arterial.

When it was over, he knew the precise truth about Hardy’s vitality, its quantity, its intensity, its whole diathesis; he knew just how much mental and physical torture the lad could bear, and for how long, without an actual cessation of life.

He was not in a hurry. He waited — Hardy was well fed and nourished. It was over a week before the torture began.

Now, when Sin-wan opened the door behind which John lay in sleep, Ada Seward would no longer have recognised the pretty boy who had sat beside her in the music-hall, nor Miss Jay the gallant fellow who had made her start in an alarm of self-retention.

Broad streaks of absolute white mingled with his long fair hair. His bony hands clutched and trembled in his sleep like the hands of some aged miser.

At the first faint sound of the key, he sprang with a bound straight to his feet, wide awake. He had learned to be afraid now.

Sin-wan, as he turned the key, muttered something to two men who were now with him. They went away up a narrow stairway into a room above.

He gave a final glance at the directions under Day IV. on the silken scroll, and with studious brow ran over the points on his fingers. This was the fifth scroll of the kind, all covering a space of six days, which Sin-wan had studied.

Having satisfied himself that all was ready, and his instructions well in his head, Sin-wan entered the chamber and closed the door behind him.

The sight of that face had become a pang and a sickness to the soul of Hardy. To all his tortures it was an added torture. It grinned in his nightmares. It was the devil of his hell.

He sank back in a corner, pale as death.

Sin-wan never brought him his food; so that Sin-wan's face was associated in his mind only with agony. Yen How, who knew the mind and its secrets, had willed it so.

The room was not very small, but it was of stone, and damp. However, in one corner was a bed which was nothing less than luxurious, the coverings being of fine, padded silk. Hardy had not suffered from cold; still less from hunger or thirst.

These were tortures far and away too elementary and obvious to occur to such a mind as that of Yen How. The body, by itself, is capable of intense pangs; but never is torture exquisite when it is wholly divorced from the mind.

Yen How's profound knowledge of this fact' was proved when he said to himself:

'One of his tortures shall consist in the daily sight of — a Face.'

Beside the quilted bed, there were in the chamber a table, on which was water and wine: near it, a cushioned chair; and a stool made of a hard greenish-coloured wood, provided with a straight upright back, and cross-pieces in the legs. It could not be moved. It was cramped by iron rivets to the flooring.

The room was lighted by three Chinese lanterns which hung above Hardy's reach, let down through holes in the ceiling a short way.

Sometimes one, or two, or even the three, went out, through some carelessness of the attendants; and even when they all burned, there was not much light. But Hardy's eyes, long accustomed, saw everything.

One of the ingenuities of pain to which he had been subjected consisted in the mere appearance of Sin-wan. Once Sin-wan had entered, leered round, and retired. The next day he entered, leered round, and retired. Was the ordeal over, then? A heavenly hope leapt in Hardy. The next day Sin-wan appeared with a brazier crowded with white-hot wires.

Several times lately Sin-wan had entered, leered round, and retired. With every new entrance now, John hoped that on this day no new sword would pierce him. For to-morrow he cared not — only for this day his spirit cried to Heaven. But on many a day Heaven turned her ear from him.

He breathed in an agony of Hope, in an Arctic Hell of Fear.

In the course of weeks his great mind had quite collapsed. He was now utterly demoralised and craven.

He knew neither morning nor night. He had lost count of the days and the weeks.

He did not commit suicide, because, at first, the means were not ready at his hand. It is not an easy matter for a man to dash his brains against a wall. Later, when he looked round for the means to kill himself, an intense cowardice seized him. He clung to life — only to life. Just one little spark, too, of his innate stubbornness lingered. After a torture, he would pray aloud that Heaven would send its swift Messenger upon him; but his obstinate will to live returned, if a day of peace was granted him.

Now, as Sin-wan showed his face, he cringed against the wall with staring eyes of expectancy.

Was this a day of torture? or a day of grace?

What added a touch of intensest horror to the relation between this boy and this man was the fact that they had never exchanged a word. They were as remote and divided as two creatures of different planets. Sin-wan did not know a word of English, nor John of Chinese.

A day of torture, or of grace? He had ceased to care for the morrow; but to-day ...

A wild hope stabbed his heart. Sin-wan had no sort of implement about him. He could not torture without an implement. It was a day of — grace, then?

No. The Chinaman walked to the cabinet in a corner where lay some cords. And he lifted them on his forearm, and he came to where John, half-standing, half-falling, cowered.

John had long ceased to make any resistance to the binding process.

During the operation this time he fainted. But terror woke him. He was placed on the high-backed stool, his arms bound behind the back, and his chest, high up to the neck, upon it. Underneath, his shoeless feet were bound to the cross-pieces.

He could not move his head backward, for the chair-back prevented him; forward, he could move it about fifteen degrees, and from side to side about thirty.

What was in store for him? He was wide awake now. With starting eyeballs he waited.

Five minutes passed.

Then Sin-wan produced something.

It was a leather strap, four and a half inches broad, sixteen long. At the ends were clasps.

He put it round Hardy's neck and clasped it. And now Hardy could move his head neither backward, forward, nor sideward.

He sat with elevated chin, staring — a gaze of horror into vacancy. Yet he felt no pain.

He waited five more minutes, and the dim thought that reeled within his brain in a vertigo of woe was this: how long? how long, O Lord?

Five minutes, and then five more: and then he felt — something.

Yet it gave him no pain.

It was a drop of fluid — water, in fact — which had fallen upon his head from above.

He waited half a minute, and it came again 3 and half a minute, and it came again. And so, regularly, every half-minute it came for some ten minutes.

This, of itself, to an ordinary person, would be a misery. But by this time John Hardy was so familiarised with agony that to him it was simply nothing. The slowly-dropping water collected on his head, and was trickling down his face, when he began to wonder, with a species of glad incredulity, whether this could be meant as a new torture.

He could have borne it all the night, and all the day, and thanked God for His clemency.

Suddenly he lanced a horrid shriek.

A drop of something else had fallen upon his head, and eaten into his scalp. It was a drop of strong oil of vitriol.

* * * * *

Would the falling of the vitriol continue? or the falling of the water?

The next drop was a drop of water.

But if it had been vitriol, and vitriol thenceforth regularly, Hardy's agonies would have been far less monstrous than, in fact, they were.

In this was manifested the profundity of Yen How, that he knew how exquisitely to intensify the pangs of the body by means of the travail of the soul.

The next drop was water, and the next was water, and the next was water, and the next was — vitriol!

And now John Hardy cried out against Heaven, straining at his cords, and bawling like a bull.

But drop by drop from the ceiling fell the implacable fluid; not so many drops of water, and then a drop of vitriol, but with crafty variations, sometimes two drops of vitriol at a time, and then for minutes not another.

Yen How, however, knew his craft too well to make such an ordeal last very long. Sin-wan had instructions that, as soon as the victim showed signs of madness or collapse, the torture should cease.

Accordingly, when Hardy ceased to cry aloud, and a reddish stream trickled down his chin, his bands were undone, and Sin-wan cast his unconscious body on the bed.

Just about the time that he did so, Ah-lin was standing before the incense-stick booth of Foo-chee.

'It is not that I am bold, Foo-chee,' she said, 'that I come here to speak. But I must say what I have in my mind.'

Here was blessedness, and a wringing of the hands, and an embarrassment of the pleased eyelids, and the favour of the upper gods, for Foo-chee.

‘It is an incense-stick that you desire,’ he said, ‘and your name is Ah-lin, for I know it. And all the incense-sticks which I have are yours. For why? Because we stand and step together each day before sundown in the same company of the drilled — no other reason.’

‘It is a lie, Foo-chee,’ said Ah-lin, ‘there is another reason — though I cannot guess what it can be. But whatever the reason be, you must now throw it quite away. It was not for an incense-stick that I came — though incense-sticks are pleasant, and I have long desired one — but to tell you just that. You must throw it quite away.’

‘And for why?’

‘Because another, who is greater than you, wants just the thing that you want. If you get that thing, he will kill you. In order that he may not kill you, he shall have the thing.’

‘Cruel Ah-lin!

‘No, not I. You say what is not, not knowing, Foo-chee. But he will kill you; therefore he shall have what you desire.’

‘Then I shall kill myself, not having what I desire.’

‘Cruel Foo-chee!’

‘You will, then, feel happy if I live, Ah-lin?’

‘Yes; and therefore I shall make myself feel unhappy by giving to another what you desire, in order that I may feel happy at the same time in knowing that you live.’

‘To feel happy and unhappy at the same time is mixed, Ah-lin.’

‘But it is better, Foo-chee, to feel happy and unhappy through a long lifetime than to feel happy for a little hour, and then die.’

Here was the practicality of the Woman. Foo-chee pondered it. Then he lifted his head and said:

‘There is a riddle somewhere which I cannot solve, Ah-lin. Let us go, instead, to the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li for a meal, with fresh tea. And with you take three of these incense-sticks.’

Ah-lin hesitated, and was lost. Foo-chee drew down the flap over his booth, and carefully adjusted the ring to the staple; then together they walked off on their heels; and their swinging pigtails met and touched, as it were knowingly, behind them.

And at the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li they ate a hearty meal, with a whole mitin of fresh tea-leaves.

They were in the sweep of the force which underlies the world. It was the doing of the upper gods.

CHAPTER XVII. THE CHINESE IRON

THE NEXT DAY John Hardy, at the hour of evening, sat in his corner, watching his door with a kind of wild-beast sullenness.

His nerves had an instinct of the hour when Sin-wan was due to appear.

So sick was his soul with misery after the ordeal of the day before, that he had eaten nothing since. His food lay untasted on the table.

He sat sprawling with disjected limbs on the floor, watching the point of Sin-wan's expected entrance through the fierce and sullen corners of his eyes.

He had often had the thought of braining Sin-wan with one of the porcelain platters, or of strangling him with his pigtail, or with one of the ropes used to bind himself. As he sat there the thought now recurred to him. His brain was in that condition in which thoughts are no longer semi-voluntary, but seem to come and go at random of their own motion, like winds through the vacant heaven. He had, however, sufficient reason left to give no entertainment to this thought. His chance, if he ever had it, was long past. He was too hopelessly frail now.

He sat long, expecting. One of his lanterns went out; then another; in half an hour the third. He was in darkness.

Suddenly the lad started as though a sword had pierced him.

He looked eagerly towards the door; and he said to himself, 'No, no.' It was too incredible; he must be mad.

'Mad, mad,' he moaned, his head buried in his two arms, as he rocked himself slowly to and fro, with a regular motion like a pendulum. So he went on for about half an hour, his face hidden, with sometimes a moan, and sometimes a word. ‘What have I done?’ he said wearily, in the thinnest whine: What have I done — O God, Father, God? ... But now I am mad, mad...

> It had seemed to him, as the third lantern went out and left him in darkness, that, at the edge of the door, there was a long streak of semi-light — that the door was open I

He had sense enough to know that the condition of his mind was one far and away removed from a state of ordinary sanity; that his senses were now quite capable of playing him tricks. But when, after a long time, he lifted his head, there, still before his eyes, was the streak of light.

He sprang to his feet, and his pallor of death assumed a hue of even more absolute wanness. Groping limpingly along the walls, he made toward the door. But, on the whole, it was rather to assure himself of the optical delusion which he supposed, than with the expectation of finding the door really open.

But the door was, really, open.

What made his heart go bumping and bounding within his ribs was the look of Providence — the hint of God’s finger — in the fact of the lanterns all going out at the very time when the door, by some extraordinary means, had become unfastened.

But though one step meant salvation, and one instant’s delay meant death, yet could he not take the step. The sudden shock of hope — the sudden suspicion of Heaven — all but killed him. He dropped back against the wall, panting, panting, trying with his right hand to force back the violent galloping of his heart.

But the instant that he could move, he moved. With wide mouth and gasping chest, he cautiously pushed back the door, and passed through it.

Toward what? Toward certain capture? It must not be supposed that he was now in a mental condition to give this question even a single thought. He went through the open door precisely in the way in which a wild animal passes through the open door of its cage — instinctively toward liberty. He lived by moments. At this moment he was free; to the next lie gave not a thought. He simply walked forward as a stream flows downwards — because it is a law of nature.

He found himself in a long corridor; and yonder, half-way down the corridor, was — a man.

The man's back was toward John; and he was bending down, cleaning a blue-glass lantern.

It was at this sight that the first notion of the impossibility of his ultimate escape occurred to Hardy; and with this appreciation of the impossibility, came also the ravenous Desire, the frenzied Hope. As he slid swiftly back behind the door, and drew it upon himself, he was no longer a mere wild creature of instinct. He looked forward — he reasoned.

He waited, fearing worse than death to stir the door. Then he had a sudden horror which pricked him like a goad to action — if Sin-wan came? It was his hour!

He very slightly pushed back the door, and peeped out. The corridor was empty.

He ran now, with the stealthy feet of a man treading on hot embers. His feet were bare and made no sound. He had on a shirt and trousers. But the shirt was filthy, and the trousers flapped in long rags all down his legs. His hair reached to his shoulders.

At the end of the corridor was a door. He pushed it lightly. It did not move. He forced his shoulder against it. It was locked.

He was as much a prisoner as before, then? Immediately after the first intolerable sinking of the heart he could not believe it. A vague, but real, faith was in him now. The mere fact that he was where he was proved Providence. He believed dimly that God now was willing him to be free, wild as the idea was, far off as the probability might be.

He looked round for some means of escape; and there, in fact, was a tall window in the side of the corridor, slightly open.

He ran to it, and looked down. It opened upon another corridor twenty feet below.

Twenty feet! The distance was infinite.

Underneath his flapping rags one could see the red and livid patchwork of his flesh, where it had been nipped and pinched and burned and pricked and bruised in half a hundred agonies. How could he leap twenty feet? It was as dreadful to him as to an infant. Like the very aged, he was afraid 'of that which is high.'

But as he looked again he saw a short rope hanging over the window-sill by which he could help himself down.

And now, at this sight, it is a wonder that some suspicion of the fact that all these happy chances were only part of another elaborate torture did not enter his head. But his brain was so preoccupied with the idea of Providence, that nothing of the sort occurred to him.

With endless pains he managed, with the help of the rope, to reach the lower corridor; and at once, with the same stealthy trepidation, he set out, running in the same direction in which he had so far come.

At the end of this corridor also was a door; and at his push it opened.

Now he was in yet another corridor, at right angles to the first and second. In which direction should he turn? He did not care. He would be guided right by the Hand that led him. Away to the right he went with tottering gait, treading on embers, hugging the wall.

If only his heart would cease its awful thumping! Surely, surely, through all that vast building, through all Peking, they would hear the echoes of that labouring bosom! So it seemed to him.

His white, wide lips were twisted awry in his effort to take in and expel his noisy breath.

As he ran in this excess of agitation, he suddenly remembered the battle of Shoreham, how he had been cool in the midst of sounding cannon and angry war. Could he not still be so? Was he so much changed? He made a weak effort — a faint self-assertion of the old John Hardy. But in another instant he forgot the effort. It was far from him.

He reached the end of the corridor, and was about to turn to the left, when, there before him, he saw two Chinamen, near to him, talking. They were standing in the middle of the passage which he had to pass.

Had they seen him? Had they not heard the labour of his heart? Apparently not: they remained deep in talk.

Must he lurk till they moved away? Would they not come his way?

Suddenly, behind him, down the length of the corridor in which he stood, he heard a sound. He looked and saw a man approaching him. He was between two dangers.

The man's eyes were bent meditatively upon the ground. He came swinging toward Hardy.

The night had not yet come, though it was near. The corridor in which the two conversed was not dark, but it was much dimmer than that in which John stood. It was necessary for him to move — the third man was coming near.

He stole forward, inch by inch, sideways, with his chest against the wall, and his face twisted round, watching the two talkers. He came near them — he was opposite to them — by a stretched-out arm they could touch him.

Stealthily he crept, slowly as the movement of a glacier; he was past them. And he was no sooner past them than, with incautious haste, eager only to be on — to be on — he sped away. During those instants of slow motion he had passed through all the terrors of the grave.

The two men calmly continued their talk; the third came up and joined them. Hardy went onwards undisturbed.

For quite half an hour he stole forward, all leers and tremors, like a thief in the night, through three halls, over a courtyard, along two more corridors, without anywhere meeting any one.

The slumbrous gloaming deepened. He began to think himself lost in this endless structure, without hope of finding exit.

But at last he saw an oblong of distinctly lesser obscurity; he knew that this must be a door of exit from the prison.

Could it be true? Was he really about to escape into the open day — under the sky, the clouds? He leapt forward. And as he did so, a man stood in the doorway, and leant his back against the door-post.

It was far from light now, but Hardy would have felt the presence of that form and face in the darkest midnight. It was Sin-wan.

John was still in full career to make for the door, when his eyes fell upon this man; and like a shying horse he bolted aside. A door, as he touched the wall, gave way before his pressure. He rushed through, mad to put a world of distance between him and that face. As he hasted forward, in the dark now, he stepped upon nothing, and tumbled headlong down a flight of stone stairs.

He had hardly time to pick himself up when he heard that some one was behind him, descending the stairs, humming a tune. And he knew that it was Sin-wan.

Off he rushed again; and again, in five minutes, there was light. He stood between two walls, about five feet apart, about ten feet long; and at the end of them was a portal, painted green, half open; and beyond the portal, he saw — trees!

He was free! and yet he shuddered. Behind him was Sin-wan, coming, coming; and before him the open gate; but the whole of the space between him and the gate, and between the two walls, was paved with broken glass.

There was not an inch of harmless ground upon which to place his naked feet.

But Sin-wan was behind. Hardy stepped forward, and reached the gate, and passed through it, running.

Every footprint which he left behind now was a footprint of blood.

Still onward, panting heart! The hand with which He leads is surely rough — but still, is He not leading?

And now for the bridge of marble ahead, which spans the moat. He reaches it, and starts and stops.

There, in the middle of the bridge, leaning over the parapet, looking at the water, is a man.

This gauntlet also Hardy must run. Crouching against the opposite parapet he crawls forward.

His lust to be free is now a thousand thousand times more intense than ever before. Every danger that he has escaped has added to his terror a deeper terror, to his hope a wilder frenzy. Like a beast he crawls forward on hands and knees, step by step, without a sound.

But as he is exactly opposite the man, the man turns quite round. Hardy leaps to his feet. They are face to face, and eye to eye.

All is over, then. He has been seen.

But no! What mean those groping hands, that hesitating step, as the man turns slowly away? Is he blind? Can those eyes see nothing? So John Hardy believes. Here, at least, is Providence, and the leading Hand.

Away, once more, towards the palace of Yen How, and then down the long avenues to the portal of the Imperial City. This part of the way he remembers, having passed through it before. Onward, in the shade of the great trees, he limps, leaving behind him his trail of blood. He meets no one. He is under the open sky. Among the leaves sighs the evening wind.

He reaches the great portal, and, strange to say, there is no one there. He passes out. He is in an open space — beyond the Imperial walls — which properly belongs to the ‘Chinese City.’

So far has he escaped. A feeling of absolute security rushes upon him, and with it an overwhelming, speechless gratitude. He drops to his knees; his face turns upward in an ecstatic agony of love to the skies, washed in tears; out stretch his arms in adoration.

But between his eyes and the sky comes a face, and between his stretched-out arms comes a form. He leaps with a shriek to his feet, recognises the face of Yen How, and faints in Yen How’s arms.

The slightest possible smile wrinkled the corners of Yen How’s eyes.

‘Poh!’ he said in English, ‘it is nothing. Why such a cry as that? It is your own fault, boy. You ought to have known that Providence — if there is such a thing — never works in these outright ways. Yen How’s Providence does — but Yen How is a smaller fellow altogether than the Big One above — if He is there at all. Is He there? Is He there? Ah! — may be, and may be not. But just now it is Yen How for you, and not He. The man cleaning the lanterns, and the men talking together, and Sin-wan, and the blind man — they all saw you, you know, boy, because Yen How f put them there to see you. And it is hard to escape from Yen How, whose Ada Seward you have been kissing, and whom you have tried to shoot, lillee English boy. And Yen How is not done with you yet — not yet — not yet. But those English!’ — here he ceased to speak to the unconscious form in his arms, and continued his meditative soliloquy in Chinese — * those English! They are just like devils for fighting! Only 150 or 200 of them, they say, at Kiao-Chau, and six weeks gone, and they not killed off yet. Stupid Japanese ship-captains to let them get away in that fashion. However — ah, lillee English kisser,’ — he addressed John Hardy again ‘ — wouldn’t you like to be with the 200 white men at Kiao-Chau now? I think you might be able to play some tricks with their help, too. But Yen How has you tight — Yen How, the toad, the frog, eh? Stop, though! isn’t there something in your Bible about a plague of frogs in the land of Egypt in the Pharaohs’ time? Yes, surely — yes. Well, now, how would you like a little plague of frogs in your land of England, eh? Ah, well, it is near. It is not far off now...’

At this point a man appeared; Yen How handed him the limp body of Hardy, and walked up and down a long time that night under the shade of the trees of the Imperial avenues.

About this time there were two men outside the Imperial precincts who ought to have been within them. One was Sin-wan, and the other was the father of Foo-chee, Ni-ching-tang.

Ni-ching-tang went to the dwelling of his son Foo-chee, whom he loved, in order that he might see Foo-chee, and receive from him the reverences due to a father. And, lo, Foo-chee was not there; and Foo-chee’s booth was deserted.

Said Ni-ching-tang:

‘Now where can Foo-chee be?’

Sin-wan went to the dwelling of his promised wife, Ah-lin, to see her, and receive from her the reverences due to a husband that is to be. And lo, Ah-lin was not there.

So Sin-wan said:

‘Now where can Ah-lin be?’

Now Ni-ching-tang was shrewd, and Sin-wan was shrewd. So Sin-wan said:

‘Ah-lin is not far from the booth of Foo-chee.’

And Ni-ching-tang said:

‘He who knows how to find Ah-lin is far on the road to the discovery of Foo-chee.’

And Sin-wan set out to go to the booth of Foo-chee, and Ni-ching-tang to go to the dwelling of Ah-lin. And midway between the dwelling of Ah-lin and the booth of Foo-chee these two men met in the street.

It was Ni-ching-tang who spoke.

‘Ho! ho! — late hours — late hours,’ he said (and he half hid his nose behind a sportive hand) — ‘Mate hours, and a merry courting-time—’

Sin-wan was struck dumb. Ni-ching-tang knew that Sin-wan had no right to be out of bounds, but Sin-wan did not know that Ni-ching-tang had no right.

‘A merry courting-time?’ said Sin-wan at last; * but it is not so with me, Ni-ching-tang.’

‘Well, after all, pleasure is pleasant to feel,’ answered Ni-ching-tang, still harping on the same string; ‘and they will not know in the prison, Sin-wan, — for who will tell them?’

‘Pleasure is pleasant to feel, yes,’ said Sin-wan; but it is not pleasure which I am feeling now, Ni-ching-tang.’

‘And why not, Sin-wan?’

‘Because Ah-lin, of whom I told you, is away from her home; and my mind is telling me that she is making some one else feel pleasant instead of me.’

‘Ho! that is bad. And who is that some one, Sin-wan?’

‘He is called Foo-chee.’

‘Soh! And you are now looking for Ah-lin? — I see.’

‘I am looking for Foo-chee.’

‘And for why?’

‘To kill him.’

‘Soh! to kill Foo-chee. Well, that is the only way. But has Foo-chee no brother, no father, who will kill you back again?’

‘I do not know.’

‘With keen tortures?’

‘Poh! I do not think of that.’

‘With dreadful agonies of the brain and the liver, Sin-wan?’

‘No! I do not think of that. He is a brotherless dog, a seller of incense-sticks.’

‘Well — well, do your will, Sin-wan. It is the only way. As for me, I am not feeling happy, too. I have a son, who has an enemy. And I am going to look for my son now, that I may hear from him whether it will be necessary for me to kill his enemy or no.’

‘Well, then, may you do well, Ni-ching-tang.’

‘And you, may you do well, Sin-wan!’

And so they parted. But they neither of them found Ah-lin or Foo-chee that night; for they did not think of looking into the eating-house of Hing-Chang-Li, where they two again were that night.

So Sin-wan and Ni-ching-tang hurried back, both of them, to the Imperial precincts, making an inward vow that, on the next night, they would procure more time, and do better.

CHAPTER XVIII. SIN-WAN

THE NEXT EVENING, at about six, John Hardy lay on his back on the bed of his prison.

He was conscious that it was near the hour when Sin-wan appeared.

His feet were so gashed and raw from his run over the glass, that he had not stood since he had been thrown upon the bed. For two days he had eaten nothing, being sick, sick. He was not far from death now.

How long, O Lord? How long? This was the burden of his feeble thought.

But he retained an intense interest in the nature of the added pangs which this day had in store for him.

When the key turned, he sprang upright, though, at the effort, the wounds in his feet broke into fresh bleeding.

Sin-wan entered, and at his entrance this time John Hardy's flesh writhed like the flesh of a twisting serpent from his feet to the roots of his hair.

Fire was the instrument of torture at which he felt the deepest horror. And Sin-wan had now with him a brazier, which swung from his fingers by a handle.

In the brazier glowed and flushed the living coals of flame.

He had in his hand no other instrument that John could see. But John, by this time, had begun to learn that when the instruments were at first invisible, then, in general, the agony was the most relentless.

And now, at the sight of the flame, feeling himself too hopelessly feeble to pass through any further hell that day, Hardy, by an impulse, did what he had never done before. He fell upon his knees, and stretched out his clasped hands in an attitude of meek supplication to the Chinaman.

Sin-wan was a man; he had the limbs and bodily structure of the human being. Who could say if within him, too, some trace of the divine origin of man might not linger, some throe of love, some sob of pity? In John's eyes, as he knelt, cried a world of mute pleading.

But the Chinaman showed no sign of having seen him. He deposited the brazier in a farther corner, took some small metal objects from a fold of his robe, dropped them on the floor, and approached the kneeling form. He proceeded to bind him as before, arms and feet, to the chair. But this time, first of all, he took off John's shirt from the upper part of his body, leaving it to hang downward from the navel.

This done, he went towards the fire, took up two of the six small metal objects which he had dropped, and put them on the fire to heat.

The six objects consisted of four tiny Latin capital-letters in iron; they were the letters A, S, Y, H — the initials of Ada Seward and Yen How; there were also a roll of iron wire and a pair of pincers.

It was the intention of Yen How to print the four letters all over the body of John Hardy — on his breast, on his two arms, on his thighs, on his back; two at a time; two each day.

And the letters of the first day, as Yen How had ordained in compliment to his queen, were to be A and S.

But, as usual, Yen How had no idea of inflicting the mere brutal pang of a burn upon his victim; some mental refinement of pain must mix with the scream of the physical nerves.

Sin-wan took one of the two iron letters from the fire with the pincers, and holding it from him, approached Hardy. The iron emitted a red glow, and seemed to burn into the staring eyesight of the victim.

When his bare chest could feel the radiated heat, his torturer stood, holding the metal steadily still. And so, for a few minutes, remained; then returned and replaced the iron in the fire, without having touched John with it.

And now he climbed and stood upon the table, the roll of wire in his hand. The three lanterns hung from the ceiling by hooks near to open spaces in the boarding of the ceiling, through which the candles were placed in the lanterns. Over one of these hooks Sin-wan threw a length of wire; and over another length of wire. The hooks were near to each other.

With one end of each of the two pieces of wire he made a half-loop; and at once he hurried to the fire, snatched up the red-hot letter A with the pincers, and hung it upon one of the loops; then the S, and hung it upon the other. Their weight was sufficient to make the wires run through their supporting hooks; and they fell upon the marble floor.

Sin-wan now gathered the other two ends of wire and secured them to a point in the wall, having drawn the two letters some inches from the ground. In his hand he held a piece of bamboo, and with this, standing in a line with the wires, he struck first one of the letters, then the other, gently forward.

The two letters began to swing to and fro through the chamber, with uneven motions, one this way, one that. And right in the line of their movement sat John Hardy.

It depended entirely upon the force of the propulsions which Sin-wan imparted to the letters with the bamboo, whether or no they touched the naked chest of the bound victim.

Sometimes they touched, and left behind them, as they swung back, a whiff of smoke. Sometimes they touched twice in succession, one, or both.

Sometimes they were only expected — with shrinking horror, and whistling breath, — and did not touch at all.

It was a monstrous torture — the worst he had yet suffered — this coquetry of pain — these fleeting, incalculable kisses of the hot and dancing letters. For every kiss — a whiff of smoke.

Let us draw a veil over his agonies. His mouth was wide, bawling — his eyes straining from their sockets; and at the tension of every fibre of his soul and body, his hair whitened — his skin grew sere — he lived through many a year — he became an old man.

It was some twenty minutes before the see-saw of the swinging wires ceased. Sin-wan hurriedly left his post, ran toward John, and bound his eyes with a cloth. What happened within the next five minutes John did not know. He strained his ear to detect a sound, though he kept on mechanically bawling in a lower key. But he heard nothing. In reality, Sin-wan was reheating the metals to redness; and his noiselessness had for its motive the fact that he wished to take the victim by surprise.

When the two bits of metal were of a bright glowing red, he passed one limb of the pincers inside the top of the A, and the other limb inside the upper curve of the S, and, holding them so together, at once trotted eagerly and silently upon John.

A beastly scream broke forth, wondrously like the cry of a cat in the extreme of physical anguish. Sin-wan had suddenly clapped the hot pieces upon Hardy's right breast, and held them there. The metal sank, as into a bed of soft luxury, into the wasting flesh, fizzling forth a steaming smoke and reeking stench...

At the exact moment when his spirit fainted, and he lost the sense of pain, Foo-chee and Ah-lin met in one long embrace.

Toward this they had been drawn and swept for days, and now, as the poets say, the two trembling dew-drops had trembled into one.

It was outside the walls of Peking, and all the members of Foo-chee's and Ah-lin's company had swarmed back into the town; for the drilling of the drilled was over. And only these two were left.

And Foo-chee said:

'Ah-lin.'

And Ah-lin said:

'Foo-chee.'

And Foo-chee said:

'I am feeling happy, Ah-lin; for we are here where none can see us, and the moon which is rising there is pleasant to see, though her face is round.'

And Ah-lin said:

'Her face is broad in a laugh of joy, Foo-chee! And do you like a woman with a broad face, Foo-chee, or with a long?'

'I like a woman with a long face, Ah-lin,' said Foo-chee, 'like yours, Ah-lin.'

And Ah-lin replied:

'I am not feeling at all unhappy, Foo-chee.'

And it was then that the two dew-drops trembled into one in a long embrace.

A really long one: for it began a minute before the closing of the gates of Peking, and it lasted a minute after it. And had they had any idea of the real state of affairs, they would have felt like two very shattered and dislocated dew-drops indeed.

It was Ah-lin who woke first from her trance, and she woke from it with a start that made her pigtail wriggle, and she whispered an awful pallid word into the ear of Foo-chee, and together they started towards the gates.

They were shut out, they were hopelessly late. Peking refused them. They must spend the long night without.

Ah-lin had an instinct that this meant death for her beloved, perhaps for herself also.

They stood hand-in-hand, and the upper corners of their slanting eyes went very high indeed.

Still, a whole night hand-in-hand with the beloved is not nothing. They walked away with a happiness troubled, but not destroyed.

An hour later Sin-wan and Ni-ching-tang were ransacking a certain area of Peking, one for his son, the other for Ah-lin and her lover, but separately, unsuspected by each other. As for Sin-wan, his knife was bright and white.

‘Oh, where is Foo-chee?’ said Ni-ching-tang to himself. ‘Is my son dead?’

The suspicion grew upon him, it became a certainty. He hurried back to the Imperial City, and made inquiries for Sin-wan at the prison. Sin-wan, he was told, had obtained a scroll to pass in and out of the sacred precincts at any hour of that night.

So! Sin-wan was abroad then; and if Sin-wan was abroad, then it must be that Foo-chee was dead.

Ni-ching-tang went from the prison straight to the palace of Yen How, and he descended into the vaults wherein was his sleeping-room, and he held the reeking flame of a saucer-lamp of earthenware over a box, and into the depths of the box he dived. He brought up two blue phials and a broken joss-stick; one of the phials contained a poison, and the other a non-poisonous drug; and this last he put into his bosom.

Then he re-clasped the box; and at once he fell upon his knees, bowing his body and folded hands up and down, touching the cold plaster with his forehead. And from his lips came groans of prayer. And he burnt incense to the gods.

Then he went up again, and out from the Imperial precincts. He, too, was provided that night with a scroll of permit.

Onwards he went, walking very fast. And as he treaded the intricacies of Peking, he was engaged in a strange continuous effort of mind: the effort to recall all the English words he had ever known.

Once, long ago, he had served in the kitchen of an English family in Canton, and had then been quite a master of pigeon English. But now he found his vocabulary wondrously small. On he went, cudgelling his brains, through the dark and swarming vastness of the city.

Ni-ching-tang was a great man, if patience alone can make a man great, for he searched all that night for Sin-wan, and did not find him. So was Sin-wan a great man, if patience can make a man great, for he searched all that night for Foo-chee, and did not find him.

But towards the break of day, as he sat drinking samshu in a den, Sin-wan had an idea. He was a drunkard, and could be inspired by drink; nor was he now sober. His idea was that Ah-lin and Foo-chee were not in the city at all, but without it.

He went back once more to the dwelling of Ah-lin to inquire if she had not yet come home. And then, hearing that she had not, he said:

‘Fearing me, they have fled from the city together, and are now at Tung-chow. To Tung-chow, therefore, I will go. For the edge of my knife has the itch this night, till Foo-chee scratch it for me.’

But it happened that while Sin-wan was crying aloud from the street to inquire for Ah-lin, Ni-ching-tang had come to inquire also whether one Ah-lin was there. And as the day was prone to break, Ni-ching-tang, far behind Sin-wan, was cautiously shadowing him towards the city-gate which leads out upon the Tung-chow road.

Sin-wan waited there twenty minutes, and when the gates opened, he passed swiftly through under the bellies of the crowding camels, the gall of malice and yellow jealousy rankling bitterly in his jaundiced soul.

To kill — to hew, and slice, and stab — a ravening hunger for this red breakfast was upon Sin-wan. He had had a comfortless night, a night of dark thought and impulse, and the hot samshu was talking hot things to his head.

And surely the gods were on his side — anxious for nothing that morning were they but how to provide a red breakfast for Sin-wan! See how they draw up the curtains of night for him; and now the day has that very-early-morning grayness for which one can find no adjective to express its utter yawniness; and now, just as it is light enough, Something makes Sin-wan turn his head to the left — and he sees.

But poor Ni-ching-tang is struggling frantically among the mules and camels, which press inwards and outwards through the just-opened gateway; and he has got jammed there, and the man is nearly mad in his agonised struggle to be free; for Sin-wan has passed through, and he has lost him.

Foo-chee, interlaced with Ah-lin, was fast asleep, as was also Ah-lin, they half-propped against the outer surface of the wall, between two buttresses, not very far from the gates.

Sin-wan walked up to them, smiling, lest one or the other should be awake, and see him; and the knife-handle was in his palm, and the blade up his wide sleeves. And when he was right over them, and saw how they breathed heavily, and how the confidence of old love was in their careless embrace, he drove the knife first into Ah-lin with a loud breath, and she sighed, and died. And then, with loud breaths, he drove it several times into Foo-chee, and he sighed, and died. And then into Ah-lin again, and then into Foo-chee again, he drove his knife.

‘Dog’s gall,’ he said, as he turned away, and found himself face to face with Ni-ching-tang.

‘What, Sin-wan, is that you?’ said Ni-ching-tang; ‘oh, I can see what you have been after. Ho! ho!’

‘Those are they I told you of,’ said Sin-wan. ‘I have done what I said I would do, Ni-ching-tang.’

‘So I see, Sin-wan! Well, it is the only way — the only way.’

‘As for you, you will tell no one, Ni-ching-tang?’

‘Poh! not I. For why should I? I who have known you these months, and the two dead not at all. Phew! see how they lie — still embraced. Are you sure they are well dead, Sin-wan?’

‘Oh, well dead.’

‘They should be. The man — he has one, two, three, four, five stabs — yes, five — ugly wounds, too. The knife went deep each time. What was his name? — Foo-chee? Ah, well, no more Foo-chee now — no more Foo-chee.’

‘Let us be going, Ni-ching-tang. For watching dead dogs is not pleasant to the corners of the eyeballs.’

‘But/feel pleasure while looking upon them, Sin-wan; and the middle of the eye is not offended by the sight of them embracing together — young things, too. But you leer obliquely upon them, Sin-wan, having slain them, through the corners of your eyeballs, and so receive disagreeable feelings from their sight.’

‘Still, let us be going — let us be moving away, Ni-ching-tang.’

‘Well, as you wish it, Sin-wan, let us be moving. But they lie very well together, Foo-chee and Ah-lin — Foo-chee, with his five gashed wounds, and her arm behind his neck. A young man, too, he seems to me — a seller of incense-sticks, I think you said. No more incense-sticks now for Foo-chee — and no more Foo-chee now at all, Sin-wan. Well, well — well, well. It was Foo-chee and Ah-lin; and now it is no Ah-lin any more, and no Foo-chee at all. Five stabs, too, and ugly wounds all. One would have done the work, but he got five, well home. Oh, they are well dead, Sin-wan! — have no fear. But Foo-chee has no father, I hope, no brother, to avenge his death, Sin-wan?’

‘I care not.’

‘With horrid tortures, Sin-wan?’

‘Poh! he was a brotherless dog.’

‘Well, if that is so ... But your walk is staggy, and your eye wanders. We will have a morning drink together in a drink-place which I know, and then to the day’s work...’

They re-entered the gates. A reaction had come now upon Sin-wan; his nerves were unstrung from their high tension, and the samshu swam stalely in his turgid brain. He followed Ni-ching-tang as a lamb to the slaughter.

Ni-ching-tang led him down into a foul, dark cellar, where drink was placed before them. And into one of the two calabash-cups Ni-ching-tang poured a liquid from a blue phial.

Sin-wan had thrown himself sullenly upon a plank-projection near the black-earthen floor, and Ni-ching-tang handed him the draught.

CHAPTER XIX. 'THE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY'

THE DRAUGHT WAS non-poisonous; but Sin-wan had hardly drunk half the contents of the cup when he fell back, fast asleep.

And now, when no eye but God's could see him, the malice of a fiend worked and twisted in the face of Ni-ching-tang. He took Sin-wan's knife, and he ran the edge of the blade gently, almost playfully, along Sin-wan's throat, and over his face, and round the roots of his pigtail, revelling in his sense of power, wallowing in that sweet lust of cruelty which brings to the Chinaman the same keen delight which bodily forms of enjoyment bring to the Western.

He ran the knife-edge along Sin-wan's skin; but he had not the least intention of hurting him. The pleasure of self-restraint with which he kept his itching fingers from violence was exquisite.

The Chinese theory of vengeance is not, like the Hebrew, 'an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth'; it is, 'two eyes for an eye, and thirty-two teeth for a tooth.'

Ni-ching-tang could easily have killed Sin-wan, as he slept there; but, had he done so, he would have despised himself as a weak and bungling boor.

For vengeance to be complete and satisfying, the victim must know who it is that is taking vengeance upon him, and why he is doing it; and the avenger must know that the victim knows. Under these conditions, the longer the period which the vengeance occupies in its accomplishment, the sweeter the cud of satisfaction which the avenger chews.

Ni-ching-tang intended that, for the murder of his son, Sin-wan should suffer weeks of torture before death. And although it was beyond his power to inflict those tortures with his own hand (as he would have wished), yet he knew that it was easy for him to cause them to be inflicted by hands stronger than his own.

He did not lose much time in the self-indulgence of running the knife-edge over Sin-wan's throat. Presently he put down the knife, and he dived his hand into Sin-wan's bosom. From thence he took out Sin-wan's permit to pass in and out of the Imperial gates, and also an Imperial Mandate ordering the Keeper of the Prison Keys to deliver a certain key to the presenter of the Mandate.

With these two rolls in his own bosom, Ni-ching-tang ascended the narrow earthen steps, and at the entrance above met the keeper of the drink-place yawning his eyes into invisibility against the door. Ni-ching-tang told him that a man, holding position in the Imperial precincts, was asleep below, and did not wish to be roused.

'Let him sleep: he will wake himself,' said Ni-ching-tang.

Then he sallied forth. He twisted at a steady trot among a number of alleys, and stopped at a gaudy bamboo-umbrella booth, where an early-morning merchant was lounging desolately. Ni-ching-tang spoke some hurried words in the merchant's ear, and the merchant nodded, listening, then disappeared down a court, and in three minutes returned, leading a mule by a rope.

Ni-ching-tang scrambled on to the back of the mule, tossed his hand in token of thanks, drove his heels into the outstanding ribs, and went galloping away.

He traversed in this way two lengths of intervening street, and, still galloping, passed through the city gate which he had lately entered with Sin-wan. He turned the mule's head eastward toward Tung-chow.

Tung-chow, as we have said, is a village about four, or possibly five, miles from Peking. It is, as it were, the 'port' of Peking, for it stands on the Peiho, Peking itself not being a river-city.

At Tung-chow, Ni-ching-tang had a nephew. And this nephew was the owner of three river-boats, two of them fitted with junk-sails, the third a mule-boat, all three traders down the Peiho with Tientsin in millet, rice, and barley. In twenty minutes Ni-ching-tang, at the river-side, was talking to his nephew from the mule's back. And Ni-ching-tang said:

'Which of the three boats are here, Li-kien?'

And Li-kien replied:

'The mule-boat is here, and also the Taku, which lies there where you see.'

'The Taku has a junk-sail, Li-kien?'

'Yes.'

'Then I will buy the Taku from you.'

'I cannot sell the Taku, Ni-ching-tang.'

'It is a lie, Li-kien; for you can, and you will. At the waning of the next moon I will pay you for her three hundred taels, which is a good reward, in silver pieces. For your cousin, Foo-chee, is dead — and there will be no more Foo-chee any more now at all, Li-kien; for he has been murdered by five stabs, and ugly wounds all. And it is necessary, in order that his slayer should die with horrid tortures, that you sell me your boat, the Taku, without much talking. And now you see that you told a lie in saying that you could not, Li-kien.'

'It was a lie,' admitted Li-kien.

'And the part which you shall take in avenging your kinsman,' went on Ni-ching-tang, 'shall be this, Li-kien. You will put on board the Taku rice, and spirit, and water, and fuel, and a rudder-oar, and everything which a man may want for a voyage down the Peiho, and a voyage over the sea, during a week, or more. This you will do. And this also: you will wait here near the Taku, all the forenoon if it is to be so, till you see a young man come riding on a mule; he will be wrapped up from head to foot in a great mantle, so that not much of his face, and nothing of his head, shall be seen. His face shall be yellow like a Chinaman's, but give a keen look into his eyes, and you will see that he is no Chinaman, but an English dog. You will put him on board the Taku, Li-kien, and you will hoist the sail for him, for he is without strength, and you will send him on his way alone. And, as you send him on his way, burn an incense, that he may go to his journey's end in safety; for, if he be re-captured, Sin-wan, who slew your cousin, will be tortured, but not killed; but, if he escape wholly, then Sin-wan will be killed after he has been horribly tortured.'

Li-kien pondered, and then objected:

'But one man in the Taku, he must needs be cast away, unless he be—'

'He is a sailor, Li-kien, and do not fear. And be sure you place in the Taku a drawing of China, and instruments such as are used by seafaring men as the sign-posts of the ocean. For he can doubtless read such things; and it is necessary for him to arrive at Kiao-Chau, where he will meet with his countrymen, and be slain with them when they are slain: but none will know that it is he; and Sin-wan will die. The mule you will keep till I send for it.'

Immediately the old Chinaman turned the mule's head, and galloped back to Peking.

All his movements now were characterised by an intense haste, and yet by a certain calm which did not forsake him. He had much to do, and yet he did not stop to think of anything; he did not forget anything; everything seemed prearranged.

Within the prison he was unknown, and he had the Imperial stamp, which opens every door, in the form of Sin-wan's papers.

When he presented himself before John Hardy he had in his hands pigments, costume, and everything ready for the necessary disguise.

At a new face Hardy started — for we see the finger of God where it is not, and where it is we see it not. John anticipated now some new torture, to be carried out by a still more subtle agent than Sin-wan.

As for Ni-ching-tang, he spoke not a word, simply doing his will swiftly on the impotent captive. He painted his face, he dressed him. And all the time he was cudgelling his brains to remember all the English words he needed to tell Hardy what he was to do.

He found, however, that there was one fact of the situation which all but balked his plans. Hardy was weaker than Ni-ching-tang had counted upon. If Hardy's mind was in as feeble a state as his body, it seemed certain that Sin-wan would not die.

He took the dazed captive under the arms, supporting him, and half-dragged him forth. And while John Hardy was still wondering to what new experience of pain he was being hurried, he was in the open air. And still Ni-ching-tang spoke no word.

With Ni-ching-tang's own permit, and with Sin-wan's, the two passed beyond the Imperial precincts, Ni-ching-tang lifting after him the lagging steps of Hardy. What was happening to him John could not dream; but yonder, beyond doubt, was the sky, and there the sailing clouds, and under them a breeze of heaven which went wandering gladly towards the sea.

It was not possible that he was free? He did not believe it. In his profound distrust of heaven and of earth, he denied it. He was mad again — it was a new torture — the most devilish of all.

But when he found himself beyond the gates — and there around him spread the wide plain — and there, tethered to a tree drowsed the waiting mule — and there above him was the vast vault, and the free and wandering airs — what could he think? A strange, low, whimpering sound — as feeble as can be imagined — as thin as the plaintive whine of a very old and senile man — came from his lips, and two forbidden tears rolled down his cheeks.

He was wrapped in a long robe of soiled silk, which covered the hat of straw on his head and descended to his feet, hiding his rags beneath; and on his feet Ni-ching-tang had put felt slippers. Thus attired he was pushed and manoeuvred by the Chinaman to the back of the mule. The rope was put into his hand; and it was then that, for the first time, Ni-ching-tang spoke a word.

Ni-ching-tang had need of his whole English vocabulary to express now all he had to say. For quite half an hour he went on talking, and it was evident that the scheme which he was putting into execution must have been long meditated; for his instructions to Hardy how to secure his safe arrival at Kiao-Chau were as minute as possible. In his uncouth and tentative English he gave some idea of the formation of the harbour; and he also spoke of the position in which the stranded Iphigenia lay, pointing out to Hardy that the cruiser would serve as the chief landmark to warn him of his destination. He gave John his own name and that of his nephew. Finally, he handed John a sharp knife with which to commit suicide in case of recapture; and he ended by saying:

‘Am got you anything to question me?’

Yes: John had something to ask. He said:

£ Yes — one question.’

And he waited a minute before’ he asked it.

‘I owe nothing to Yen How, do I, for my present freedom?’

He repeated the question thrice, and no sooner had Ni-ching-tang gathered its meaning, than instantly his head went shaking in a series of vigorous ‘No’s.’

‘No, no, no,’ he went; ‘you no goee believe that, mind! You getee catch — getee catch! Yen How catchee you — sharp — killee you!’

Good; all this, then, was not due to any clemency of Yen How’s. Even then — at that moment of feebleness, when he was still hardly beyond his prison-walls — John Hardy shrank from hearing that there existed anything good, or human, or redeeming in the Chinese character. He was desperately and clandestinely unwilling to hear it. Some dim and far-off instinct even then told him that it would be necessary for him to go on believing this bad race to be wholly bad, wholly of hell; and that it was in order that he might so believe it, that the Chinese Iron had been ordained to enter into his soul.

But, with a certain reluctance, he ventured upon yet another question. He said:

‘And you, sir — what is your motive for setting me free? — Mercy? You want poor Englishman goee free? — Or you havee some other reason?’

Ni-ching-tang smiled at this simplicity of the little foreign devil, when the meaning of the question entered his head. He said:

‘Poh! you no troublee head for that. Me havee other reasons. But that nothing for you.’

Good again! he owed nothing to them.

Ni-ching-tang pointed along a road, and the mule moved.

The Chinaman, whose presence in the Imperial precincts was nearly due, stood a while and looked after the drooping figure on the mule’s back. Then he re-entered the city to arrange for the burial of his son.

John occupied two hours in accomplishing the four miles to Tung-chow, and, during this time, thrice fainted from sheer powerlessness.

But on the banks of the Peiho, Li-kien was duly waiting, and the Taku was in perfect readiness to receive her strange white master. By the time the alarm had spread through the Imperial precincts that, by the carelessness of his gaoler, the white prisoner had escaped, Hardy was in the middle of the Peiho, already some miles below Tung-chow.

In a wondrously short time, as the boat glided down the river, he began to lift his head, to observe, to reason, to purpose. How large was the world to him! His wan eye turned whitely upward, and dwelt upon the sky; one great sob thronged in his bosom for exit from his choking throat; his face worked.

The boat was a bluff craft with an erection aft, making her there a kind of house-boat, and with stones laid round a slab of iron, for cooking, for'ard. The junk sail could quite easily be hoisted and adjusted by a single man, and gave to the boat, with a fair wind and stream, a speed of some seven knots. In a land where carts are driven over land by means of wind and sail, as in China, the navigation of the seas and rivers is in a condition far from elementary. John found his craft pliant and ready, and the bulge of the upward-tapering lug-sail was fine to his eyes. An exhilaration of mood, ecstatic, high, grew upon him. The day was broad and clear, and busy with breezes. On either hand spread endless flat-lands, already sprouting with the tender green of barley, rice and millet. The river was all but deserted.

There was an aspect, not of earth, but of Paradise, in the bright and balmy world. Henceforth — and he knew it — he would have little to do with joy, and soft emotion, and the throe of genial feeling; for the gentle heart within him was turned to stone, or something resembling stone. But for the present he was too weak in body and mind to resist the charm of the wide and placid landscape, and the feeling of freedom which it brought. His heart was still not quite a dead thing.

Yet, let us record two facts. First, that John Hardy, from boyhood, had been of an intensely religious nature; that he had had a somewhat crabbed habit of reading methodically one chapter each morning from the Bible; and that his affectionate soul had overflowed in affection for his Maker also. And secondly, let us state, that on this morning of his deliverance he several times resisted and repelled the impulse which rose in him to give thanks to God. He refused. So much had Yen How changed him. The boy had hardened into something more (or something less) than a man.

Midway between Tung-chow and Tientsin, he left the rudder-oar and searched the boat. Li-kien, apparently, had forgotten nothing; there was food and drink in plenty, a pot, a compass of Western make, and a curious instrument, which he assumed to be a contrivance for taking the sun's altitude, but which he could not at once understand.

He made a fire, for which the materials were at hand, put on some rice to boil, and resumed his place at the oar.

Now and again a painted junk passed him, toiling up the river; but he was not even at the pains to hide himself, as Ni-ching-tang had warned him, so sure was he of safety.

At sundown he glided between the central space, then open, of the bridge of boats across the Peiho at Tientsin. At eleven o'clock, under a calm and radiant night, he had Taku on his starboard beam; and soon he was in the open sea of the Gulf of Pechili.

Feeling drowsy, about fifteen miles from land, he shipped his oar, lowered his sail, and went to sleep.

The point of his destination was Kiao-Chau, once German, then very much English.

Here, seven weeks before, one dark midnight, a hundred and eighty English sailors had beached the battered second-class cruiser Iphigenia, and landed.

The subsequent adventures of these men, when properly written, would fill volumes. At present we can merely glance at them.

At the moment of landing, the Englishmen were no longer wholly in the dark as to the real state of things in China. The absence of white men both at Chemulpo and Seoul, of which they knew, if not very suggestive in itself, was very suggestive when no explanation could be found of the flagless ships which had chased them, except the one that these ships were Japanese.

The possibility, therefore, that they would be massacred on Chinese territory occurred to them; and their object in coming to Kiao-Chau, which was not very remote from the sinking ship, was to throw themselves upon the protection of the Germans, who, as they supposed, occupied the forts of Kiao-Chau.

Previous to this, the Germans had very strongly fortified the harbour and its approaches. Its waters were thick with submarine mines, and two strong forts at each of the claws of land which formed the entrance, together with one on the low-lying island in the basin of the harbour, made the position one of considerable strength.

The harbour is about six miles long, and lies N. by W., and S. by E. Around it, in general, is high ground, save at the north-eastern entrance, where an area of sloping meadow-land rises gradually to the higher levels of the inner entourage of the basin. And it was here that the Iphigenia, then on the point of sinking, was beached.

Fifty yards away, on the brow of a slope, stood the N.E. fort. Though the night was dark, and rain fell heavily, its outlines could be made out.

The blue-jackets held a sort of informal synod on the sands. There was among them only one staff - officer, a lieutenant called Edwards, who, however, was wounded in the breast, and in a kind of daze. Happily, all the special hands were in evidence except the surgeon, these including the chief engineer, engineer, and assistant engineer, the gunner, the boatswain, the carpenter, with the stokers, and all engine-room hands. Beside these there were a hundred and fifty blue-jackets.

It was decided to make straight for the N.E. fort, and though no one present could talk German, a volunteer committee of ten men, headed by the chief engineer, a Mr. Murray, set off toward the rising ground.

But these were careless watchmen, these Germans!

Where was the sentry, and the challenge, and the soldier's stalk, and the rattle of the butt-end? Nowhere was there a light to be seen through all the dripping and desolate night.

The ten men reached the fort to find it as solitary as a desert. They called, and the hills echoed their voice, and through the open portal the night-bird fled and screamed. They passed within the gateway between the two outer bastions, and into the courtyard, and thence onward through every open door. They saw one dead Chinaman sitting in the embrasure of a window, grinning in old decay. But otherwise there was no sign of any struggle. At all events, there were no Germans there. Only the guns refrained, and some ammunition, and some stores, but not a single small-arm.

What to do now? It only remained to visit the S.W. fort, and the fort on the island. And these they found in the same condition.

The Chinese had gained possession of them by killing the unsuspecting sentries in the middle of the night, and seizing, almost bloodlessly, the rest of the garrison, so to speak, as they slept in their beds. The captive soldiers were distributed over China for the celebration of Yen How's Sabbath of blood; and the forts had then, for the time: being, been deserted.

There remained no further doubt in the minds of the British blue-jackets as to their own fate. But they were resolved to sell their lives dearly.

The Iphigenia had still a steam-pinnace uninjured, and in this they took turns in plying backward and forward between the ship and the island all the night, landing everything in the way of stores, small arms, and ammunition which might prove useful.

The gunner, Shillitoe, counselled the occupation of all the three forts; but Murray and the rest, fearing the result of a division of the little army, gave their voice for a concentration of forces upon the island-fort, on account not only of its disconnection with the mainland, but also of the fact that it appeared to be the most powerful.

This plan was somewhat unfortunate, because the island was uncultivated, and furnished no other food than a scanty supply of wild orris and cassava roots, though there were three springs of rather brackish water. Moreover, at about sunrise, the movements of the pinnace were observed by some peasants on the mainland, and shortly afterwards there was a considerable commotion to the east and north of the bay. Though the work of the pinnace was not half completed, it was seen that no further voyage must be attempted, nor had any effort as yet been made to spike the guns of the other two forts. At about seven, these two opened fire simultaneously upon the island fort.

At this period China was awake, or at least had opened her early-morning eye-lids; she had tasted blood, and every Chinaman was feeling the thrill of that electrical cobweb spreading over the land, of which the brain of Yen How was the centre. The artillery combat which now commenced between the island-fort and the others was fought not more obstinately on one side than on the other.

But the fixed batteries of the outer posts had not been constructed for inward attack, while the inner had been constructed for outward attack. By noon, the two outer fortresses were in ruins. But the poor Iphigenia also, by which the castaways set much store, had been broken by the wanton Chinese almost into nothingness.

Arid now commenced a series of strenuous and adventurous days and nights for these one hundred and eighty men — or rather one hundred and seventy-nine, for on the next day Edwards died. They had hardly any food; it was necessary to get it, and to get it in the teeth of the armed Chinese, directed by Japanese. And they got it.

Each night had its own tale of brilliant sortie, or crafty ruse, or ticklish enterprise, or cautiously-premeditated plan. One by one their numbers lessened — they became a hundred and seventy — a hundred and sixty. But those who remained went on furnishing materials for a new Odyssey; in two weeks they were the most exquisitely-trained body of men in the world; every day added to them a new supremacy of discipline and culture; eye, and hand, and brain were in it; they could twist through the grass like snakes; could climb like Alpini; could see in the dark; could shoot like machines; could plan in deliberative council like statesmen. In seven weeks they were a living monument of the adaptability to every possible condition of life of the nimble English race.

But their Odyssey lacked Odysseus. It was Hamlet without the hero.

To do anything of much greater importance than the procuring of their food, they needed a Leader; and a very decent Leader indeed was on the way to join them.

CHAPTER XX. 'WHAT A FACE!'

DURING THE AFTERNOON of the seventh day from Tung-chow, John Hardy, hugging the coast, arrived in the locality of Kiao-Chau harbour. The solitary helmsman had made a good voyage, being familiar with the ocean-winds and their moods, and having an old comradeship with the brine and spray. However, he had several times got wet, and every few minutes now was shaken by a moist cough, alternated by vomitings due to a constant sickness of the stomach.

He was being wafted along by a gentle breeze, when he spied a portion of a ship's bow above the thin, inaudible fringe of foam which lined the coast afar. And at once, noting his course, he put out farther to sea, and lay to, ten miles from land.

He guessed from the fragmentary look of the wreck that the Chinese had been busy with the English sailors of whom he had been told. At eleven o'clock, he ran in for the harbour. Unfortunately, all he knew about it was its locality. Ni-ching-tang, indeed, had told him that the Englishmen were upon an island; but when he entered the basin he saw no island, for in the darkness and distance the contours of the island, which, on the east, is near to the mainland, seemed part of it.

The moon was young, just rising; it was a night of stars; things near were visible, things remote lay in a mystery of shadow.

Hardy ran his bow upon a gravelly bottom near the east entrance, intending to mount the rising ground and search for the island. For what he knew, he might be already on it.

In this way he came to the east fort, now mostly in ruins. He passed through a broken arch, and saw guns lying at random in the court. He examined the battlemented square, and entered what remained of the heavily-armed works. But there was nowhere a human being.

His search was conducted with extreme caution. With the same care he descended to his boat, and made for the opposite side, where he saw a stonework outline against the sky. Here the ascent was steeper; he scrambled up a pebbly footpath, scraped through some scrub, and entered the fortification. There was less marked destruction on this side. He examined bollwerkswahre and glacis, aussenwerk and donjon, and saw no one. Then he entered an inner court, where was a low building with small barred windows: barracks and mess-room. And in three of the windows near the ground he saw light.

On his hands and knees he crept toward one of the openings. As he drew nearer he could hear a sound of laughter, and some one protesting in harsh gibberish. He knew now that he was among Chinese. But he continued to advance, eager to acquire some sort of knowledge of the facts of his situation. He reached the window, lifted his head, and peeped in.

The room which he saw was long and surrounded by beds at regular intervals. On most of these lay Chinamen asleep; three only were intently playing some sort of dice-game at a table on which was a lantern.

As Hardy looked — before he could run — before he could cover his mouth — he was seized by a sudden cough which sounded through the still night and the quiet room.

The three Chinamen sprang up at once, looked in amazement in the direction of the sound, then snatching three rifles, and making a great noise, they rushed toward the door.

Hardy, too, was off, running; but before he could cross the breadth of the yard the three were out of the door. At the moment, he was in the shadow of the buttress of a barbican, and he knew that if he left it to cross the strip of moonlight which lay along the exit from the yard, he must be seen. He stood still, therefore, crouching in the deepest shade.

The three, in a state of great excitement, ran toward the spot which he had left, and finding nothing, scattered about the yard in flurried search within the deep embrasures of arches, and the black shade of turret or buttress. Their eager examination was disorganised, the second again scrutinising a spot which the first had just searched, and the third, perhaps, following suit.

It was all over in the space of certainly not more than a minute. One of the Chinamen rushed to the corner in which Hardy crouched, his hands groping; in a few seconds he was followed by the second; in a few seconds more by the third. And they dropped like a line of little wooden soldiers, upon which one blows obliquely, one after the other, stiffly, at full length. The knife of Ni-ching-tang was no sooner out of the first than it was in the second, and instantly in the third. Before the startled sleepers within had rubbed their eyes, sprung to their feet, and snatched their weapons, he had diminished the population of China by three. It was the first-fruits of his vengeance.

Now, meantime, was his chance to run, and he ran. Thirty Chinese soldiers, however, were after him, and one saw him as he slipped through the exit from the inner to the outer courtyard. This man raised the hue and cry, and it became a question of running, first towards the outer exit, and secondly through the scrub, and down the steep hillside; guns popping all the while, and the Chinamen screaming in an ecstasy of excitement.

Behind the rising ground, on the general level of the mainland, there was camped a half-regiment of the old regular army of China under a Japanese lieutenant; and these, hearing the firing, quickly set off at the double up the gentle incline at the back of the fort.

Hardy was saved from the shots of the thirty on the top of the plateau by doubling and bending among the scrub, but by the time he had plunged and scrambled to the bottom of the steep path, bullets were whistling round him. The night, however, was dim, and the riflemen, as they ran, shot at random.

There lay his boat, her prow just touching and swaying in the gravel. If he could push her off, and gain the shelter of the house-deck, he would be safe. Two of the Chinamen, however, who had not slackened their speed in order to shoot, were upon him; and when he leapt to his bow, and put out the oar to shove off, one of them, and immediately the other, took hold of it. A short struggle ensued. One of the Chinamen, struck by a flying bullet in the nape, relaxed his hold and dropped; at the same time Hardy's power of grasp failed, and the oar slipped from him; but so suddenly that the pulling Chinaman slid on his heels, and fell backward into the surf. Hardy was quick to leap upon him, buried his knife in his bosom, regained the oar, and the next moment had the Taku afloat.

He hurried astern, trimmed the sail, and half sheltering himself under the deck, contrived to steer, making farther up the harbour, where he now knew the island must be.

In a minute or two the boat became the aim of the three hundred or more additional rifles, now arrived from the plain. They riddled her hull and sail, but she kept on her way, till there came a boom of big cannon from a quite unexpected quarter, and suddenly the splintered Taku dipped her bow, and disappeared in five fathoms of water.

The Chinese, apparently, had no heavy guns mounted ready for use at the fort, for they fired none; but the English had; and when the sentries reported a daring Chinese junk approaching the island, she was fired at; and she promptly sank, riddled by her foes, shattered by her friends.

In all the harbour of Kiao-Chau no Chinese craft had dared for weeks to appear.

Happily the outward bulge of the island was discernible at the moment, and not more than 500 yards distant at its nearest point. Hardy began to swim. The Chinese, astonished at the sinking by the white men of a boat containing a white man, ceased firing, though a wanton shot or two dropped about the swimmer.

Panting hard, he reached the near point of the island, where a sparse growth of thin-trunked plane-trees made a wood to the water's edge. And he had hardly trailed his dripping form out of the surf, when two men, springing from nowhere, had him by the throat, and he was on his back with a pistol at his temple.

Hardy said to himself:

‘They will do well.’

And he added aloud:

‘I am an Englishman.’

There was a scrutiny of his face, a chuckle, a few exclamations, and he was on his feet.

The search-light apparatus of the fort was out of order. Till he spoke, no one on the island had had the faintest suspicion of the truth.

In ten minutes he was in a lighted room, with nearly all the hundred and fifty gathered round him, hands on knees. There were far more questions than answers. Chatter, chatter went the tongue of Jack.

‘But you have not told us, sir, who you are,’ said Murray.

‘My name is John Hardy,’ he replied, ‘and I am come to China in search of my ship, the Powerful. Can you give me any news of her whereabouts?’

‘Oh, Lord!’ cried a blue-jacket, named Brassey, ‘just hark at that! Powerful, is it? Why, sir, if you’d as much water in your inside to-night as the Powerful’s got, it isn’t Powerfuls you would be thinking about, I don’t think.’

‘There has been a battle?’

‘That there has, sir.’

‘Who won?’

‘We did.’

‘By how many ships?’

‘The one we came here in, and two the Japs sunk.’

‘The Japs?’

‘Ay.’

‘They sunk some ships?’

‘They did that.’

‘But they were our allies, were they not?’

‘Funny allies at that.’

‘They gave you no warning of their real intentions, I’ll be bound,’ said John Hardy.

‘Not they,’ some one replied, ‘it was bash-into— ’em, take-me-as-you-find-me-boys, and no mistake. They didn’t even carry a flag.’

‘They have broken the law of nations,’ said Hardy, looking on the ground. Then, after a few seconds, as if musing, he added: ‘They have violated the Law of Man.’

And the words, taken in conjunction with the most strange, grave face from which they came, had in them something so solemn, and judicial, and meaningful, that, for a minute or two, silence fell upon the men; and they looked at his bent form, somehow expecting him to utter something further of singular and momentous.

But he gazed on the ground and said nothing.

Already this gray-haired youth, this venerable stripling, had produced a profound impression upon them.

Somebody on the outskirts of the crowd whispered to somebody else:

‘What a face he’s got!’

And the whisper went round. And now it was: ‘Just look at the phiz of him ‘; and now it was: ‘I don’t think he’s all there’; and now it was: ‘Lor! look at his face.’

It was a face in which there was something thrillingly wild; the face not merely of a judge and an avenger, but of a judge and an avenger come back from the grave, with just that hint of the Ineffable which makes us shudder.

Yet he sat there simply enough, looking on the ground, with one elbow on his wet knee.

CHAPTER XXI. MURRAY'S DIARY

MR. MURRAY, THE nominal head at the fort — though in reality he was only the first among equals — on opening one of the chests brought from the Iphigenia in the pinnace, found a quantity of notepaper, and as there were pens and ink in the fort, he bound it in some brown paper, wisely determining to keep a record of the varied days of this strangely-fated crew.

Under date 8th June we find as follows: —

8th June. — Last night, near twelve, a strange thing happened. We sank a Chinese boat in the harbour with No. 3 south-bastion six-incher, thinking it an enemy. It proved to have contained an Englishman, named John Hardy, ship Powerful (as he says).. He reports himself as from Peking in search of ship. That's about all we can get from him at present. No explanation so far as to how he escaped death in long voyage through China. Something strange about him somewhere, and men pass astonished remarks.

Still two sacks of rice left, last of third being used at dinner to-day. Also two hind legs of camel with quarters, three small sacks roots, two jars Chinese spirit from the millet-farm, and about a pound of tobacco. The sow, Joyce says, is near her confinement, and a day or two should bring us great things from her. Harris, Tom Brown, and Daly complain of diarrhoea, and Machen of violent headache. Otherwise all well. Tom Newton to be buried presently.

9th June. — Tom Newton buried last night at ten. For last message to his wife see under 6th June. This morning noticed a considerable body of Chinese (guessed 500) march past on brow of hill east of island. Big dust-cloud ahead, looking like horse-artillery. Brassey says they mean to give us fight. But I disagree. Their game is to starve us out — if they can.

This noon, Council. Resolved: that at midnight thirty hands swim to mainland at different points, taking Sniders in waterproof bags, and ammunition. To meet near lake to N.E., and make a dash for probable mules on tea-farm N. of lake. Long discussion of ways and means. Resolved: first volunteer to be leader. To surprise of all, the stranger, Hardy, volunteered first. Had listened to discussion without a word, turning from speaker to speaker. Is small, and seems weak in chest. Sow doing well.

10th June. — This day cook, to surprise of all, produced pudding made of roots and honey, found, he says, near west stream in valley on island. First we heard of honey here; lads all wild with excitement, and everybody clapping cook on back. Am now smoking last pipe. Tobacco done. Also last of German coffee, and yesterday no more sugar. Lads hope for unlimited supplies of honey, but I rather doubtful. Not the right place even for the wild kind.

Expedition last night very successful. Two mules (all there were on farm), also sack rice (brought over by pinnace), also a skin containing some sort of oil, and no one injured. Joyce says it is good for food, but Brassey denies, and the two came to blows. The men came back speaking well of Hardy, some saying that he means more than he says.

Most of the day spent in washing shirts and sheets by hands. Harris and Brown still bad with diarrhoea, and now also Collins, but Daly better.

He is an original, this man (I mean Hardy). To-day, while washing clothes, great discussion between Brassey and Davis, which nearly came to blows. Says Davis, 'Why, the man is fifty-five,' he says, 'if he's a day.' Brassey answers that he will lay to it that he is a lad of twenty-five, and not a day older. Then other hands join in, one saying this, and another that, and the lads getting warm. Hardy sitting a good way off, washing sheets. One says: 'Why not ask him, and settle the question?' But no one volunteers to do that. Everybody going to have a look at sow this afternoon, and plenty of bets, c But nothing yet to report.

11th June. — Great excitement this morning, and all Chinese liquor finished. Sow littered with four, and beauties all: one pinky-white, two pinky-white and black, and one pure black. Lads all ready for fun, and everybody determined to make a day of it. Hardy alone drank nothing. Brassey very rowdy, but afterwards got to sleep. One of mules refused to eat roots, and was killed in afternoon. A detachment of lads down by sea-shore cutting down trees for fire-wood with swords, and one hatchet. Not an adze in fort. Very slow business. Hardy recommended blasting, and this tried with success. But fearful anxiety beginning to be felt about powder and shot. Only three rounds of ammunition left to some of big guns, and no possibility apparently of making powder for ourselves. At six o'clock, Council. Resolved: to make a dash in small hours of morning for west fort in order to seize possible stores and ammunition, Hardy leading. Pinnacle to take two detachments of twenty-five each. A desperate piece of business, in my opinion not yet necessary, but proposed by Hardy, who has seen fort, and seconded by lads. Search this afternoon for more honey, but without success. Men walking about with hands in pockets, without tobacco.

12th June. — Lovel, William Brown, and Jackson dead, and not less than thirty Chinese. I with bullet-hole in my left hand, very painful. Result: two barrels of powder, and a green tea-box half full of Lee-Metford magazine-rifle cartridges. Half of us, in retreat, swam across harbour-mouth from west fort to east, Hardy among us. Then along east side of harbour by land, pursued by Chinese, and then, swimming again, to island. The toughest job we have done yet. Our guns, ammunition, and some of our clothes, meanwhile, in boat with captured things, and we swimming with swords in our teeth.

But the curious thing is this. As we walked toward our fort, the day began to break, and Hardy having on no shirt, we saw all his body in a queer bruised sort of mess, and two letters, quite distinct, an A and an S, looking as if they had been branded into his right breast. He throws no light upon himself, and not one has the pluck to ask him. It is clear that he is a gentleman, and it is 'Sir this' and 'Sir that' from all the lads to him.

13th June. — Says Brassey to me this noon, 'Wasn't there,' says he, 'something about a John Hardy in the battle of Shoreham that that collier from Perim reported at Hong-Kong before we sailed north?' 'Yes,' I said, 'there was.' 'Then this,' says he, 'is the man.' 'There are many John Hardys,' I said. 'But this,' says he, 'is the man.' 'What makes you think that?' I said. 'Everything,' says he. And he was so certain of it, that he partly made me so as well. He has gone whispering it, too, to all the lads, and they are talking it over amongst themselves. Nobody asks Hardy, but before this day is out I mean to put the question straight before him. Gun-cleaning pretty nearly all day, and Walters, who has been down to the water's edge on the east side, reports that Chinese are heaping a lot of stones on edge of cliff, probably with intention of building. Let them build away. The four piggies doing well, and the old girl as pleased as punch. We shall never have the heart to kill them. Not a scrape of baccy, and no more honey.

14th June. — It is to be hoped that this Hardy is not come here to lead us all to the devil, but that is about what I suspect it is going to amount to. Time will show. He has a strong influence over the lads, and is all for wild schemes and adventures. Says he last night, most of us sitting about in the north mess-room, 'But what,' says he suddenly, 'are your ultimate aims?' 'Ultimate aims, sir?' says Brassey. 'You don't mean to live here always, I suppose?’ says Hardy. ‘It’s enough for us to think of getting food to eat, without looking so far ahead,’ says Martin Hall. ‘Don’t be a fool, Hall,’ says Tom Brown; ‘listen to what the gentleman says.’ ‘I have not said anything,’ says Hardy. ‘I merely ask a question, which I leave to your reflection. If you will think it over, I believe you will be wise. And if you cannot find an answer, come to me, and perhaps I may be able to help you.’ He very seldom speaks, this Hardy, and when he does, the lads listen wonderfully to him. For quite five or six minutes, I suppose, not one spoke a word after he had said this. And now they are all saying that he’s got some fine scheme in his head. This afternoon at five, Council. Resolved: that the Chinese preparations for building on cliff be investigated and destroyed, if necessary, between twelve and one to-night. Hardy proposed as an amendment: that an attack be at once made on Chinese village, three miles to S.E., for purpose of getting in large store of provisions in event of contingencies. But his voice overborne by seventy-five to seventy-three votes. This afternoon Day sent to wind octagonal clock in B bastion, and broke mainspring. Have not asked Hardy anything about battle of Shoreham, or marks on chest, but mean to, sooner or later.

15th June. — This day extraordinary scene at Council. It seems that Brassey, with five or six others, came to Hardy about noon, a sort of deputation, telling him that the men had been thinking over his words of two nights before, and were wanting him to summon a Council and say what was on his mind. Hardy says yes, he would, as they wanted it. So about four, Council. Hardy stands up, the lads sprawling all about, on benches, on the floor, looking at him. Hardy has in his hand one of the three Bibles from the Iphigenia third chest. Well, everybody waits, wondering now what is coming. Hardy begins to talk, and keeps on talking for half an hour. All about himself first — his family, where he was born, everything; then about his coming to China to seek Powerful, and his capture by the Chinese at Peking. Suddenly off he tears his shirt, and shows wounds and scars all over body; and he points to the gray patches in his head: Chinese torture, he says; some of the men wiped their eyes, so movingly he spoke. Sometimes when his face is animated, I declare he looks like a lad of nineteen, and it is hard not to love this man somehow. Then he went on to speak of the Japs and their treachery to the British ships; then he said that all the white men in China had been massacred by the Chinese; and last of all, out he came with the announcement that the Chinese and Japanese combined are about to attack Europe. Every one held his breath at this, and we were all pretty excited by now. ‘Well, what are we to say of such a race, men?’ says Hardy. ‘Do you not agree with me that the earth would be well rid of such a people?’ ‘Yes!’ we cry; ‘yes! yes!’ we all shout out. ‘As for me,’ he says, ‘I, here and now, before you all, and before Almighty God, devote my entire life henceforth to their destruction; and I invite you all to take that oath with me.’ And so saying, he lifts the Book, and kisses it. The men leapt round him at once. One cries out: ‘You are the John Hardy of the Shoreham battle, aren’t you?’ Hardy says ‘Yes.’ Then Brassey roars out ‘Will you be our leader?’ and every man jack of us cheers this to the echo; and then Hardy hands Book to each of us, and as we kiss it, each of us grips his hand in token of obedience to his orders. And as the last of us grips his hand (that was Paddy Burke), Hardy, turning away from us, goes leaning out of window, and Brassey says a tear was rolling down his cheek which he wanted to hide. I suppose there never was such a scene in the world; it was just as if we were all mesmerised by him, some of us wanting to cry, and I as moved by his influence as the rest. The lads are swearing to follow Hardy through thick and thin.

Expedition last night did nothing, and discovered little. There were merely some piles of stone and two carts, but without mules. In one of the carts a hard-backed land-turtle, which the lads brought back. But their climb up that steep hill as good as useless. From their report it is probable that the regular Chinese force in the neighbourhood is being increased. Happily, perhaps, for us, this is a thinly populated part of the country. Something will have to be done for food, and that soon. It remains to be seen what sort of stuff this Hardy is made of. No one can deny that we got on pretty fairly before he came. Heat fearful to-day, but rain now pouring in torrents outside.

16th June. — At midday-mess Hardy says to lads: ‘Don’t scatter, men. I wish to talk with you at once.’ So immediately after meal, Council. Hardy at head of table, I on right, Brassey on left, Tom Brown, Davis and Joyce sitting near. Says Hardy: ‘You have been good enough,’ he says, ‘to choose me for your leader. I hope to prove myself worthy of your favour, but for the present I prefer to consult with you, rather than to give you orders. Here you are, a splendidly trained set of fellows, and Englishmen — 148 of us. I believe we might be able to do something more for our country and ourselves than killing a few Chinamen now and then. The thing is to know what we want to do, and to set about it in the right way; and, as a rule, the right way is sure to be the simplest way.’ ‘Hear, hear,’ says Brassey, who is a regular champion of Hardy’s, and everybody gives a nod at somebody else. ‘Well, then,’ says Hardy, ‘but no man can work without Tools, and every workman should stick to his own Tool, the carpenter to his chisel, and the blacksmith to his sledge. We, men, are sailors; and the Tool of a sailor is a Ship. What we have got to do, then, is to get a Ship.’

This went straight to the lads — he spoke so sweetly and simply to the understanding of everybody. We cheered, every man, though not a soul could guess where this ship was to come from, or what we were to do with it when we got it. But the mere fact of his saying it made the thing seem possible.

‘A Ship, then,’ goes on Hardy; ‘any sort of Ship, so long as we’ve got our Tool to work with. And you mustn’t think that I am child enough to propose to you anything that is impossible for you to do. I have studied you carefully since I have been among you, and I know what each of you can do, and what the whole of you together can do, and what you cannot do. As for ships, they are lying round you in plenty, only waiting for you to go and take one.’

Everybody looked at him in surprise at this.

‘Ships, sir!’ says Brassey, ‘whereabouts?’

‘All round the Chinese coasts,’ says Hardy. ‘I told you, didn’t I, that the Chinese have seized and massacred in a body all the Europeans they could find in China. Well, at the time of the massacre, there were, of course, merchant-ships of all nations in every Chinese port, and you may be sure that the Chinese took special care to overpower and secure the sailors on board these ships, lest they should escape home and tell what the Chinese were up to. Meanwhile, the ships themselves remain, probably quite empty, or perhaps with a few Chinese on board in charge. I myself saw five in Tientsin harbour when I sailed down the Peiho to come here, and there did not seem to be anybody on board. So you see we have plenty of ships and to spare.’

‘But,’ said I, ‘how are you to get to them?’

‘In the pinnace,’ says Hardy.

‘The pinnace can’t carry even a quarter of us,’ said I.

‘Then she shall carry half a quarter of us,’ says he; ‘and the rest of you will remain here till we come for you in the ship.’

‘But how are the rest of us to live without the pinnace?’ said I. ‘We can’t carry bags of rice on our backs across the harbour, sir.’

‘I know that very well,’ says he, ‘and that is why I proposed to you the day before yesterday to make a raid on a village, instead of going to search into what the Chinese are building, which does not immediately concern us. What we have to do, in the first place, is to get in a good stock of provisions by means of a series of bold and well-planned raids into the thinly-populated country round, first crushing the small Chinese battalion, if necessary; and when we have enough stores, both for us who go, and you who remain, then, and not before, some of us will set off in the pinnace. That seems to me good sense.’

‘And to me!’ cries Brassey, with a wave of the hand. And to me,’ goes the cry down the benches.

‘But,’ said I, ‘when we have got our ship, what do we do with her — go home?’

‘No — that is not precisely what we swore to do,’ says Hardy. ‘As to what we will do with our ship, I have got a plan which I feel confident you will approve when I lay it before you. But there is a good deal to be done first, and I won’t trouble you with that now. The first thing I want every man to set his mind upon is to bring me into the fort here a live Chinaman with two sound legs. Without that nothing can be done.’

At this our astonishment knew no bounds. A live Chinaman!

‘And may I ask, sir,’ said I, ‘what it is you want a live Chinaman for?’

‘To send him on a message,’ says he. ‘It is the answer which he will bring back which will make our ship of any use to us.’

‘He won’t come back,’ said I.

‘He will,’ says he.

‘Right you are, sir!’ cries Brassey.

‘I will not keep you any longer now,’ says Hardy. ‘But later in the day, I will select a hundred of you to come with me to-night; and I recommend you to look to your swords and your rifles.’

And with that we broke up, every one forming part of a group to discuss our new man. The second mule killed to-day, and two more of our men complaining of bowel trouble. Joyce talking of blowing up tortoise with gunpowder, and saying that they are good food in South Seas. Lads conversing about different brands of tobacco, and smelling keg.

CHAPTER XXII. MURRAY'S DIARY (CONTINUED)

17TH JUNE. — Harvey, Lane, Yates, and Tom Joyce dead. Brassey wounded in leg, Harry Jones in leg, Field in shoulder, Burke in forearm, Mackay in forearm, Wright in groin, and I again in left hand near the old place — my bad luck. One or two wounds look ugly, but the rest not much. Bodies of Harvey, Yates, and Joyce with Chinese, but Lane brought back and died in fort. Burial to-day at 3. Not less than fifty Chinese done for, says Brassey. Result: splendid haul of three camels (one killed in battle, and carcass left behind), seven mules, twelve small animals like sheep, two sacks millet, and five rice. Returning loaded from village met Chinese battalion cutting us off. Made quick charge, and thought they would turn tail, but didn't. Sharp fight. Literally forced our way through them. But our powder getting very low. What shall we do? Lads very well pleased with expedition, and speak well of Hardy. He proposes that one of mules be set aside for drawing one of Chinese carts on top of hill, to bring home haul on next expedition. But mules won't eat roots, have to be fed on rice, and grass on island scanty. Hardy says salted mule-meat, but even so, weather very hot. But will be tried. No live Chinaman to be got. They know how to run, these Chinese. At four, Council. Resolved: to repeat raid this night on village, N.W. by N., six miles off, according to report of Fraser and Brassey. Hardy looking far from well.

[Here follows Murray's account of three fresh raids, too minutely described to be reproduced here, and conducted with varying success. In the last of the three Hardy did not join, being ill.]

21st June. — At last, live Chinaman. Captured at high noon. Five lads, among them Hardy, swam one by one to east side, diving most of time. On cliff some Chinamen pouring stones out of carts for building. Men, hiding in scrub, climb up cliff-side, no very easy matter with weapons and other things in hands. Peep over cliff-edge, and decide which Chinaman it is to be. Then rush out. Chinese off in their mule-carts, and a squad of soldiers, some distance off, give fire, but at random, taken unawares. As marked Chinaman turns to gallop off in mule-cart, Brassey, who has lasso, throws; and lasso falls clean over Chinaman's head, dragging him from cart, which gallops off alone. Splendid feat for Brassey, for Chinaman was not near, and Brassey has wounded leg. Chinaman quickly bound, and hustled down hillside. Pinnace waiting at shore to bring lads and Chinaman, and Chinamen atop still banging away. But no one hurt. Lads say that Hardy gripped Brassey's hand, and gave it a squeeze. This like Hardy's decent way. Chinaman being very kindly treated, by Hardy's orders. A brawny raw-boned brute, and seems not to know what to make of treatment.

22nd June. — To-day at one, Council. Resolved: that sufficient stores now in fort to last all two weeks, and that pinnace starts as soon as Chinaman is sent on message. Resolved: that Chinaman be sent to-morrow, Hardy wishing him to grow accustomed to kind treatment before starting. Hardy has chosen to accompany him on voyage the following: — Brassey, Tom Brown, Fraser, Burke, Knollys, Leaf, Pawsons, John Jones, Maitland, Samuels, Clayton, Rogers, Machen, Gibbs, John Pound, Maunder, Chapman, and Glyn. I remain in charge. Practically no powder will be left when lads set out. To-day overhauling of pinnace, and preparations. Lads found some opium on Chinaman, which they smoked, and some of them still very queer.

23rd June. — To-day great fun, and lads talking of sagacity of Hardy. But no one understands meaning of message. Chinaman brought before Hardy after mid-day meal. Hardy at table, with pen, ink, and paper. We all standing round, Chinaman looking queer. Hardy looks at him and says, 'You talkee English?' Chinaman makes no sign. 'Can you talkee English?' No sign. Up jumps Hardy on a sudden, a razor in his hand, and he seizes hold of Chinaman's pigtail, as if to cut it off. 'Oh, save, savee,' cries Chinaman. 'Very good,' says Hardy, 'you talk English, then.' Hardy had guessed beforehand that he could, because Chinaman, on day of capture, had on European felt hat like those some of Chinese boatmen wear at Shanghai; that was why Hardy singled out this particular Chinaman. Well, Hardy says, 'You poor man?' 'Me very poor,' says Chinaman. 'How much you give for one silk pigtail?' says Hardy. 'Fifty tael,' says Chinaman. 'You got fifty tael to buy one pigtail?' says Hardy. Chinaman looks scared. 'Fifty tael?' says he, 'no, no.' 'All right,' says Hardy, 'me going to cut off your pigtail, and me going to give you letter to carry Pekin. You carry letter well, and bring back true answer soon, me promise to give you back pigtail, and no do you any harm. You understand?' Chinaman trembling like a sail in the wind. But he says 'Yes.' Hardy says 'Very good.' Then he turns round to paper, tears half a sheet, and begins to write, the lads looking over his shoulder. He writes:

'To Ni-ching-tang, Imperial City, Pekin.

'You tell me quick where Japanese navy is, or me very likely get caught, and then me tell Yen How who set me free. If you can write, you write name of place where navy is on this paper, and also name of your nephew at Tung-chow, so that me may be sure the answer comes from you. If you no can write, you tell this man name of place, and name of nephew. Be quick, or me get caught, and tell Yen How about you. — John Hardy.'

When Hardy had finished his letter, he read it aloud to Chinaman, and gave it to Chinaman. He said, 'If you no be back in nine days from now, me burn your pigtail in fire, and you no have pigtail no more.' And with that, up he jumped to his feet, and wrapping pigtail round left hand, with two sweeps of razor he had it off about three inches from the root, leaving just enough for the man to plait it on to again. Chinaman curled and shivered, as though razor was in his flesh, and a fine long pigtail it is, too. Hardy then wrote name of Ni-ching-tang's nephew, by which I am to verify that Chinaman really has been to Ni-ching-tang, and handed paper to me to keep. Nephew's name is Li-kien. If Ni-ching-tang cannot read, Chinaman will deliver message verbally. It is clear that this man Ni-ching-tang has some strong motive for telling real truth to Hardy, but we none of us know what motive is, nor why Hardy is anxious about station of Japanese fleet. However, we have much confidence in his views. Chinaman was let free, and taken to mainland, and much fun we all had. Pinnace now ready, and the nineteen men to start at midnight. Nearest treaty-port, according to map, is Chefoo. And to Chefoo they mean to go. Pinnace loaded with last coal in fort. Compass, sextant, chronometer, stores, and everything we can think of on board. Weather stifling hot, but lads in good spirits.

24th June. — Lads, apparently, got out of harbour all right last night. For us here the game is a waiting one. After to-morrow, by Hardy's orders, a man to be always on the look-out near the east fort during night. If lads get a ship, she will show three lights in a triangle to let us know when she comes. They will send boats ashore to east headland, to take us off, we swimming to east side of harbour, and taking all live stock still left. If Chinaman not come back by the time Hardy returns, nothing to be done, and red light to be shown by sentry to ship. This day killed the sow. The lads yawning, and spoiling for a fight.'

[Six days of the diary follow, containing nothing but trivial details of the life of the fort, and the account of a massing of some two thousand Chinese in the locality. The next entry of importance is on the 1st July.]

1st July. — This day at noon, Chinaman spied on east shore of mainland making signals. Great excitement among lads, who have been dull. Sent two men to fetch Chinaman over, and the fuss that beggar made about coming into water lasted nearly an hour. At last lads managed to bring him over between them. Chinaman handed me Hardy's note to Ni-ching-tang, and underneath in English characters, just legible, the words "Nagasaki" and "Li-kien." It is clear, then, that Chinaman did his work well, and the only thing open to doubt is whether Ni-ching-tang has told the truth in saying that Jap navy is at Nagasaki. Chinaman trembling with eagerness to get back pigtail, doubting apparently that we would keep our word, and the lads having great sport in making him think that we wouldn't. Pigtail produced at last, and lads lashing one another with it all over the place, to Chinaman's agony. Then pigtail given to Chinaman, to his great joy. But I don't think it prudent to let him go free, and am keeping him prisoner for some time yet.

2nd July. — Some lads sent out to scout, report continued massing of Chinese tents on plain to S.W., 500 counted, and we here without the power of firing three rounds of shot. Heaven only grant that Hardy turns up trumps. The men seem to take him with perfect confidence, and the lapse of time makes no difference to them. It is wonderful to me how thoroughly Hardy has got over them. I never saw anything like it. The two hind-quarters of sow completely spoiled owing to heat, and the men all saying it is head cook's fault, and he very sulky.

[On 3rd July there is no entry.]

4July. — Here we are, every man-jack of us, on board a very smart and spanking little German barque called the Conrad, a thing of about 400 tons, and we making straight for Nagasaki, God only knows what for. However, everybody in the best of spirits, and the lads ready for any game. This man Hardy is, in my opinion, as wild a creature as ever drew the breath of life, and yet it would be a lie if I say that I have not every confidence in his leadership, for I have. The Conrad is very high out of the water, and is scudding along with a good stiff breeze, the foam singing past the level of her bulwarks, and her deck too steep to walk on without gripping hold of things. She's got nothing in but her ballast, and not too much of that. So away we fly, under all plain sail and courses — a tidy spread of canvas for this light thing — but toward what? I am surprised at the lads: they don't seem to be asking themselves that question. The nineteen who went to Chefoo have got a fine old tale to tell of the capture of the Conrad, which they accomplished at about ten at night, without the least trouble. There was nobody aboard of her but an old Chinese woman, and one of those frizzy dogs that the Chinese eat. Not content with the ship and her three boats, Hardy boarded two other ships in the port, and seized three more boats, so that, counting the pinnace, we have got seven boats in all, which is not bad for a little nipper like this. What is troubling me is the thought of provisions; we have not enough to last us another three days at the present rate of going on. The ship is packed with men, and very far from packed with food. It is true, we should be in sight of Nagasaki by sundown tomorrow, if this breeze lasts. But how in the name of Providence we are to get provisions at Nagasaki, even if we are not blown to the devil by some little Japanese gunboat, is what I don't see. It isn't that I mistrust Hardy; there can be no doubt that he has a head-piece, and can lead. But I am a prudent man, and this looks to me like the wildest and maddest voyage that ever was made by any crew which ever put to sea.

5th July, 1 p.m. — Breeze continued good during night and all morning. Conrad splendid, and twice did twelve knots. Lads looking out confidently for coast before sunset. Hardy having long private talks with Richardson and Lovel, both of whom have been Eastern traders, and say they know Nagasaki harbour well. Everybody getting pretty excited, and some saying Hardy ought to speak. I with great weight of fear at my heart, which I can't get rid of.

5th July, 6 p.m. — Good for Hardy! I believe it will work! though as wild a thing, I suppose, as ever entered into the brain of a man! This day at five, Council. Resolved: that in the event —

[Here Murray's diary abruptly ends, and is not resumed till some weeks later. But the account which follows is also due to Murray, though given in a different form.]

Some little time after one bell in the second dog-watch on the 5th July, the Conrad's crew sighted the blue coast of Kiusiu, they at that time being in a very high-wrought state, on account of the announcements made to them by Hardy in the 'Council' at five, of which Murray speaks. It may be said, by the way, that Murray (a homely well-meaning man, more cautious than enterprising by temperament) fails to give in his diary anything like a fair idea of the enthusiasm with which John Hardy by this time seems to have inspired this crew. As a matter of fact they now followed him blindly, adoring his audacity, believing in his success, entranced by his personality. Hardy was for them a dazzling Angel sent to lead them to vague glories and to indefinite conquests, the precise nature of which did not, for the present, trouble their sailor-brains. When he unfolded his plans at the 'Council' on the 5th, they discussed nothing, but hailed with rapture his proposals, eager to use their magnificent training for him, to do and die for him. Even Murray was infected. And at eight o'clock they lay-to behind a small island outside Nagasaki harbour, and waited there.

The moon rose. And everybody looked at her. For in all the creation there was nothing half so interesting to this crew this night as the earth's satellite.

She was at her full, and gravid with light. Up she climbed from the East in peerless, cloudy majesty. At midnight she was nearly overhead, and had then wheeled about her a light fleecy cloud, prismic with rainbow hues, like Miss Loie Fuller in her serpentine dance. The night was full of shining, and shining was on the calm water.

The crew of the Conrad looked at her, and swore. John Hardy, sitting among the main-sheet ropes behind the wheel, looked questioningly at her, and muttered; but the moon did not hear.

It was better to be out at sea among the brisk breezes and the spray. At one o'clock Hardy gave the order to let go the sheet of the main-jib, and put the helm to lee. The Conrad swung round, and went snorting once more to Mother Carey and the central sea.

At ten on the following night she was back at the same spot behind the island, and there she lay-to again. And the sailors watched the moon arise, and saw her climb to her noon, gravid with light, and saw her wheel about her a light cloud à la Loie Fuller. And they swore more than ever.

But this time there was no turning back. It was now or never. Their stores were at an end.

John Hardy said to two men leaning over the bulwarks near him:

‘Well, by moonlight, then, lads. It may not turn out to be so bad as we think.’

And at about two o'clock in the morning, six boats put off from the Conrad and rowed away. Two contained nineteen men each, one twenty, one twenty-two, one twenty-three, and one thirty-three. On board the Conrad eight men were left.

At this hour the moon was westering far down the steep slope of her setting course, and all the smooth sea was branded with trails of crushed and tremulous silver. The old and drowsing Night, heavy with vigil, was all enkindled now and aglow, instinct with the glamour of the moonbeams absorbed through many a long hour, like an old toper who has imbibed in solitary orgy all the night, and towards morning he rises gorged for bed, drunken, and sighing with surfeit. A flush of pallid gold suffused the fainting air. Yonder, like a lamp which has burned through all the slow period of the dark, and in the small hours it fumes and smoulders red, and gives an odour in the room, so down with troubled visage went the moon. Hardly a breath sighed through the slumbering harbour, and about its dark and silent islets.

The narrow inlet of sea which forms Nagasaki port lies nearly north and south, and is about twelve go (three miles) in length. At its mouth it is only a quarter of a mile broad, and though it spreads out within, it is nowhere of very great breadth. All along its length, however, on both sides, the land opens up into numerous bays of some capacity. On the east side the land is mostly flat, and here used to be the 'foreign settlement,' with a water-frontage of some 700 yards, backed by picturesque slopes on which stood the villa-residences of the rich merchants. On the west side, however, where the moon went down, rose wooded mountain and steep crag. The whole is thoroughly sheltered, and affords anchorage for the biggest ships.

The six boats, furrowing their silent, silvery way, entered the harbour-mouth at the north-west, the largest boat (which contained Hardy, Richardson, and Brassey) leading. Any one looking at this little fleet would have said that each of the boats contained no more than two men. The rest of their crowding crews were stowed away in the bottoms, and lined the sides, lying mostly at full length, and covered with strips of tarpaulin. Under the tarpaulins, too, were lanterns. The cross-seats, except those used by the rowers, had been removed.

The course lay among a number of islets, with the navigation of which Richardson seemed quite familiar. They passed Kami-no-Shima, the site of a disused gun-battery; and they crossed a stretch of sea, all white and encrusted with moon-, light, to Takabok.

From the cliffs of Takabok, two centuries before, thousands of Christians were flung by the Japanese into the sea, because they refused to trample upon the cross. And after two centuries Hardy came to Takabok.

Yonder, a little inland, was the burning light of the Iwo-shima lighthouse, and farther still, the less brilliant beam of the Kage-no-Shima pharos. Farther still lay Pappenberg, and then Nezumi-Shima, which, in old quiet days was so often used as a picnic-place by the white residents of Nagasaki.

One by one the islands receded, and the file of daring boats stole nearer and nearer upon the interior of the harbour, now in shadow, now adventuring swiftly across a patch of sea gloating in the dream of moonshine. And now, behind them is the last island, and before them the open basin, and ponderous in black slumber on the basin — the great navy of Japan.

But where are the eyes of the watchmen, that they cannot pierce those dark coverings, and divine that there, beneath them, is creeping nearer and nearer an insidious death, a strange retribution? The watchmen, if they see, cannot divine. The riddle of destiny is far beyond them. All droops and fawns in slumber, the sea, and the old night, and the moon musing in her far western couch, and the divining of the watchmen.

Only the best-trained crew in the world, led by the best leader, are awake: and they have sworn an oath.

And, suddenly, a miracle of luck is revealed to them. For yonder all the western half of the harbour is seen to be lying in absolute shadow, while the eastern half is still glittering in aspen coruscations of white light. And the main part of the fleet, it is clear, is lying within that western gloom.

The boats, by signal, separate. Each knows its work — each has its instructions.

They are, in general, to aim at the stars, they are to fly at big game, they are to make for battle-ships.

But each has separate recommendations to fulfill. And to every man is given his place, and his work, according to his powers. The company is organised into captains, commanders, lieutenants, as in the big navy at home. Hardy has been minute.

The biggest boat of all, containing thirty-three men, cruises at zigzag for three or four minutes; and then Hardy sees, and decides. He whispers an order; and the boat — the long-boat of some European four-master — turns directly westward, and enters the recess in the coast-wall which lies north of the Tetegami dock. Here the water is hardly ruffled by a ripple; and here the blackness of shadow is complete. Few points of light are visible within that gloom — only the white harbour-lights of a great ship.

Her massive hull is just discernible, disparting the water with its outward-bulging girth. She conveys a suggestion of such ponderousness, that it looks as though no power on earth could ever move that squat mass an inch through the water. She is the bran-new giant of the Japanese navy, the terrible Hirosaki and she has a crew of 576 men.

But they sleep, and the thirty-three wake; and yonder to the far eastward, in the broad brand of shimmering and weltering moonshine, is a boat in which some harbour-police are lolling on their oars, chatting, seeing nothing. And the bull's-eyes of the lighthouses glare steadily, and the watch-lights of the ships glare steadily, and they see nothing.

The oars are muffled, and the boat glides through shadow beneath the poop of the Hirosaki, and when a grappling iron steals upward and fixes in a beading of the stern, we may very well say that the British lion is crouching to spring.

Up wriggles Brassey by the pole and gains the cornice, and, immediately afterwards, up wriggles Hardy. And when Hardy gains the cornice, he coughs a little; and Brassey whispers in his ear a long Sh-h-h-h.'

Yonder, eight yards from them, is the officer of the watch, walking to and fro, between the mainmast and the aft twelve-incher.

The two lie on their faces, and are hidden by a ridge of bulwark above the cornice. Within reach is a coil of rope, and Brassey's hand steals between an interspace of the taffrail, and with absolute noiselessness draws forth the coil, makes a knot round one rail, and lowers a rope-end to the boat.

And now the men arrive rapidly. There is plenty of room to receive them. They are like flies climbing an overhanging rampart by a spider's fil de toile.

Before the last man is up, three of them have run stooping forward, and the officer drops without a groan. Just then, from for'ard, a man climbs the stair to report to the officer that the lights are duly burning: it is his half-hourly duty.

And as he reaches the topmast rung, the sword of Brassey is in his breast, and he drops.

The upper deck of the Hirosaki is a village, nearly five hundred feet long, but an almost deserted village. Just for'ard of the foremost funnel, two men are talking, one leaning against the foremast, one with his hand resting on a boat-davit; and a moment before the sword pierces him, the latter gives a light laugh at a jest of the other; and the other utters a feeble cry, and dies. The upper deck of the Hirosaki is an English village.

They descend to the main-deck, to the fo'cas'les, to the cabins, to the engine-rooms, down to the turtle-back armour-deck at the water-line, and everywhere, with the silence and the thoroughness of the Angel of the Passover, they smite, they slay. As a man cries out, he dies; he opens his eyes, and they are sightless. The ship flows with blood.

At a door for'ard, Hardy lifts a lantern and looks into an apartment in which sleep fifteen men. He shuts the door upon them, secures it, and does not kill. They are the remnant, — the only men left alive, — and he will have need of them.

In the bunkers of the Hirosaki are 700 tons of coal. The Englishmen are soon crowding in the engine-room.

Five other ships, besides the Hirosaki, are already in their hands. But their work is not over. Massacre for massacre — John Hardy's for Yen How's! Each has his Sabbath, and his Passover-night.

Once more the six boats put off from the six captured ships, each containing from five to nine men, all carefully picked and mixed, according to their special knowledge of ship-work; and these six meet at an agreed spot opposite the patent slip of the Dock Company. Then three of the boats' crews abandon their boats, stepping over into the other three boats, and these three row away, each containing sixteen men.

And each glides beneath the stern of a Japanese warship, and the men climb, and kill, and hurry to the engine-rooms.

Down in smoky disaster and eclipse sets the red moon, and the deep dark which precedes the morning covers the silent tragedy.

Three pistol-shots altogether, two in one ship, one in another, have been fired by the Japanese. These shots represent all the struggle which has taken place.

But the darkness which has supervened, almost as suddenly as the flickering-out of an out-worn lamp, cannot prevent the watches on other ships from perceiving that some of the fleet are pouring out an unaccountable smoke from their funnels. They must be lost in amazement, unless they conclude that the ships have received secret orders from the Admiral to sail. But they look on, and do nothing but look — for the Admiral is with the fleet, borne in the Hirosaki and all, they think, is under his eyes.

There is a rattle of chains, and the steam-windlasses are a-clank, and as the first faint hint of day tinges the East, the solid-looking bulk of the Hirosaki — moves. And one after another the nine bulks move, wending northwards in file.

Nine — they are few in number, but they represent a good quarter of Japan's weight in war-ships. And with that quarter, Hardy would then and there attack the other three-quarters, were it not that he lacks one thing — men. The crew of a six-inch quick-firer is five; and five men represent the third part of a complete ship's-crew in this sparsely-manned fleet.

But the sound of cannon is good to the ear of Hardy, and in mere self-indulgence, as the Hirosaki steams past the island of Takabok, he sends a wire-gun shell among the still slumbering fleet. And the startled hills of Nagasaki awake, and cry aloud with many a voice of surprise, and the shell bursts in the engine-room of a cruiser.

The shot is not answered. There is an amazement so profound as to resemble coma. While it lasts action is impossible.

But the amazement of the Japanese navy at being shelled by their own Admiral-ship was, if possible, surpassed by the crews of the three new Chinese cruisers, the Hi-Chi Hi-tien, and Hai-Shen, when, three days later, at noon, a fleet of nine Japanese ships proceeded without warning to sink them as they lay at anchor at Shanghai. They made no resistance to this overwhelming assault; they simply sank.

In each of the nine were a few Japanese who, by Hardy's orders, had been spared to do forced labour on the ships.

Being unarmed, they behaved well, and from them was learned the probable station of the three Chinese cruisers.

The 'Hundred and Eighty' (so called) then proceeded southward, and touched at Hong-Kong, intending to take on board whatever men they could find there. But there were no longer any white men at Hong-Kong, though there was coal.

They then turned their bows toward the West, among them being the Conrad, with her crew of eight.

CHAPTER XXIII. THE FROWN OF ENGLAND

BY THE END of July, one thing at least had been clearly hinted to the whole of Europe: that if those English could not write music, they could work; if they could not make pretty things, they certainly could fight; if they were not élégants, they at least possessed the knack, and the secret, and the sword of the Conqueror.

'La morgue Britannique!' 'la raideur Britannique!' — it was not, then, after all, a mere insolence of semi-savages, but a pride based on a genuine supremacy of racial value and valour.

The Continental nations were not quick in learning this fact: a lingering unbelief persisted in them; and in learning it, they perished; and in teaching it to them, Britain herself all but perished.

The numerous campaigns had now occupied not quite five months; and at the end of this time Europe was in a state of collapse and exhaustion far exceeding that which existed at the close of the Thirty Years' War.

About a league to the south-west of Liege, in a pine-wood, there stands a small, old-fashioned inn with overhanging gables, whose frontage looks directly upon the brown waters of the Meuse. Here the Emperor Wilhelm, Duke Paul, representing the Romanoffs, and M. Hanotaux met by appointment.

The first was chiefly a soldier, the second chiefly a diplomat, the third chiefly a man of business.

They sat in one of those vast bedrooms of old Belgian inns, on the first floor, grouped near a window which overlooked the river.

The deliberation was conducted, as usual, in French.

‘The situation,’ said M. Hanotaux, ‘has — developed. And developments generally demand new plans. The facts we know: by means of a single contretemps to our fleet, France finds herself with two invading armies in her territories, Germany with three, and Russia with three. And in no case has any one of these eight armies been unsuccessful.’

‘The defensive,’ said the Emperor, ‘has always been intensely repugnant to the genius of the German army. It is an army of conquest and aggression. The smallness of its victories in this war has been due to the fact that it fought on German soil.’

Duke Paul and M. Hanotaux smiled at each other with their eyes.

‘But the question is one of means, rather than of causes,’ said M. Hanotaux. ‘Let us face this fact boldly: that our great enemy is aided by the geography of the earth. We should have beaten England — we none of us doubted that we should. But we have not. To me there seems to have been two chief reasons for this failure, which may now be more or less removed: First, the diversions caused by the hostilities entered upon against us by other nations; and secondly, the sea.’

‘But both reasons remain?’ said Duke Paul interrogatively.

‘The sea does,’ broke in Wilhelm, ‘but, candidly, it is my opinion that France should long ago have made peace with Italy, and Russia with Austria.’

‘Your Majesty is perhaps a little sanguine in this view,’ answered M. Hanotaux, ‘for Italy was the aggressor, and perhaps one might say the same of Austria. On the other hand, Germany seems to have no real cause for a bloody war with Sweden and Denmark.’

‘But was not Sweden, then, the aggressor, monsieur, as far as Germany was concerned?’ asked Wilhelm. ‘Did she not wantonly attack my coasts for no other valid reason than that Germany was the ally of Russia? And since Denmark has joined Sweden in this attack, what would you have? This, be sure, is not a matter for the peace-maker, monsieur, but for the unsparing and implacable sword!’

‘Still,’ said M. Hanotaux, and he stroked his straggling barbiche de bourgeois, ‘our conference, conducted in a spirit of unyielding insistence upon rights, will hardly result in good fruit. The fact is, that we each of us have to fight one great, and at least one smaller foe. I have inaugurated this meeting for the purpose of asking in the most definite terms this question: Since the resources of Europe are visibly nearing their end, do we prefer to conquer the great foe or the small? Is it wisdom to persist in both attempts?’

‘I agree with you in principle,’ said Wilhelm.

‘The principle is obvious,’ said Duke Paul.

‘And to me the details also seem obvious,’ said M. Hanotaux quietly. ‘England triumphant over Europe means, of course, the wiping out of the empires of the world — it means a Cockney earth. When I say “a Cockney earth,” I shudder, your Majesty — I shudder, M. le Duc Paul, — and you shudder, too. The thought, you will say, is not pretty (Ce n’est pas bien jolie ce que fait penser ça!). And the nations will not permit that? Let us make peace with our brothers, that we may crush the stranger!’

‘A League of Europe?’ said the Duke.

‘A League of Europe,’ answered M. Hanotaux, and bowed.

Wilhelm flushed with enthusiasm, and he said:

‘I agree! — in principle.’

‘The principle is obvious,’ put in the Duke.

‘And the details, I think!’ cried M. Hanotaux.

‘Who will make a beginning?’

‘If we say — Germany.’

‘Not Germany!’ said the Kaiser.

‘Then Russia,’ said M. Hanotaux.

‘Hardly Russia, perhaps,’ mused Duke Paul. ‘The heart of the Tsar is set upon the crushing of Sweden, at least—’

‘Then France!’ exclaimed M. Hanotaux, ‘since you leave to France this glory.’

‘You mean that you will accept the conditions demanded by Italy, monsieur?’

‘Yes, your Majesty!’

‘At once?’

‘No — not precisely — but soon.’

‘When?’

‘After the next great battle.’

‘Whatever the result?’

‘Yes, M. le Duc Paul.’

‘But after the next great battle the southern resources of France will, as I understand it, be at an end,’ said Wilhelm bluntly. ‘You will be compelled to do what you offer to do.’

‘Not “compelled,” perhaps, your Majesty; for the territorial resources of Italy will be practically at an end also. There remains, however, her — Navy. We have need of it.’

As the inwardness of M. Hanotaux’s scheme unfolded with these words, it won the whole interest of his interlocutors. In both the royal and the ducal brains ripened at the same instant this thought: ‘A Second Invasion of England.’

‘I follow you with the closest attention, monsieur,’ said Wilhelm.

‘And I also find your reflections of the profoundest interest, monsieur,’ added the Duke.

‘France,’ proceeded M. Hanotaux, ‘will adopt that line of conduct under the following conditions: first, she will satisfy the claims of Italy on the understanding between her and Italy, that Italy becomes the ally of the Allies; and secondly, France demands that the two Allies follow her example, by generally granting the demands of Sweden, Denmark, and Austria, on the understanding that they also become the allies of the Allies against the common foe of Europe.’

Wilhelm leapt up.

‘The thing is done, monsieur!’ he exclaimed.

‘It is a question of when,’ said Duke Paul.

‘Precisely,’ said the Kaiser, ‘it becomes a question of when.’

‘When the next great battle between France and Italy has been fought,’ answered M. Hanotaux.

‘No!’ leapt from the mouth of Wilhelm, in a half-suppressed start, and then there was pause. The fact was, that each desired to fight yet one battle with the enemy with whom it was proposed to make terms, in the hope and belief that the victory would be his, and the terms of peace therefore more advantageous for him.

Duke Paul spoke meditatively; and he said:

‘I agree, on the condition that Russia will make no terms with Sweden and Austria until after the next considerable battle with each of these, whether the battle of France with Italy has then occurred or not.’

‘And the conditions of Germany are identical,’ said the Kaiser.

‘Then there is nothing for it but to shake hands on the compact, your Majesty, and M. le Duc Paul. It may be observed, however, that your condition, and mine, ensures a certain and very considerable reduction of the not large territorial forces now at our disposal. Is there no departure possible from this determination?’

There was no departure. The three men spoke on for an hour; and as the darkness gathered, they rode away toward Liège, and took train in different directions.

The agreement, often repeated, was this: five battles, one by France, two by Germany, two by Russia; then, if possible, a European peace and League.

Russia would be prepared to hand over to Austria the doubtful legacy of the still warring Balkan States, and all that stretch of fair land from the Golden Horn to Cape Matapan; and she would yield Finland, with an indemnity, to the victorious arms of Sweden; Germany would buy off Sweden and Denmark; France would yield to Italy the Haute Savoy, Avoie, the Alpes Hautes, Basses, and Maritimes, and Var.

For all this large generosity there was a cause, bitterly near home, awfully pressing. The one thing now that could save Europe from England was the imposition upon England of the necessity to recall her armies to defend her own territory.

For, at last, 100,000 British soldiers occupied all the Seine valley between St. Germain and Argenteuil, and, the headquarters of Lord Roberts and his staff was the Taverne St. Roch near the great escalier of St. Germain. A hundred thousand men — a small army when the war began; an immense war-host now. There was no intention of attacking Paris, which required an investing circuit of 125 miles; — but Paris was not France. Normandy already was once more British; the rest of France lay open; and Italy had crossed the Isère.

Germany's plight was hardly less extreme. Her splendid legions had thrown themselves northward in three continuous streams to meet three branches of the same Teutonic race of which she was part. To the west, occupying Schleswig-Holstein and the upper reaches of the Elbe as far as Domitz, Denmark lay encamped; to the east, Sweden had drawn lines of circumvallation by a ring of earthwork forts and Schumann gun-turrets round Breslau, having captured the Breslau-Posen railway; and midway between these two was that brazen-browed, nimble, ever-intruding enemy, who alone had made possible to the others their victories. Northern Germany, from Hamburg to Tilsit, had been the scene of the most unparalleled series of massacres — carnage after carnage — ever witnessed in history; Royal Saxon Corps, famed in military history, Bismark Cuirassiers, gallant Silesian and West Prussian Corps — paragons of the soldier's hope of attainment — all had been flung, and flung in vain, into the devouring maw of war; still the British came, though in ever-lessening numbers; and still from farther and farther south marched the precious levies of the Fatherland. Seven of the twenty corps of the Imperial host remained; and of these, two Bavarian brigades were marching upon Naumberg, whence a nondescript army of Socialists, Nihilists, and malcontents had issued from its headquarters a manifesto to the nation, announcing the day of Liberty, and inviting support.

As for Russia, she turned a four-fold face south, southwest, north-west, and inward, and everywhere saw doom. The Army of India, having waited in vain for invasion, crossed the Helmund, annihilated at Merv the still - unrecalled remnants of the Russian army of Turkestan, and had now, after a great victory at Novo Tcherkask, reached Kharkov by road, with the Kremlin for its objectif. Odessa, Sebastopol, and the Black Sea littoral were British. Of the two divisions of the Austrian army, one had in a single day disappeared; but another quickly sprang in its place; and this, with its sister army, adopting Moltke's principle of marching separately and fighting together, had, after a strenuous campaign, only surpassed for carnage by the great drama of blood transacting itself in Northern Germany, made Poland an Austrian province, and crossed the sources of the Niemen. Russia was doing doubtful battle in Bulgaria, Turkey, and Asia Minor. The battleships of Sweden were at the mouth of the Neva; and in the heart of Russia itself a deep subterranean muttering, like a presage of universal earthquake and overthrow, was suggested by the mere word 'Nihilist.'

This, in briefest outline, was the situation on the Continent at the moment of the conference in the wood at Likge. The three nations which had primarily been made the tools of Yen How, regretted now their rashness. They had miscalculated the Lion.

But, suddenly — as if it needed only the conference in the wood to bring them luck — their sky cleared. In the darkest hour of their extremity they found a hope, their last.

On two days following, about two weeks after the meeting in the wood, two considerable victories attended the arms of the Allies.

One of these was French: the 14th (or Lyons) Army Corps of 40,000 men met the advancing Italian Army between Bourgoin and the left bank of the Rhone, and though outnumbered by ten thousand, gave to Italy an emphatic, and indeed final, negative to her long-fought attempt at conquest. And at once the Aurillas brigade of the 13th (Clermont-Ferrand) Corps, which was all that was left of it, was ordered southward to cross the Alps and carry the threat of war into the enemy's country, prior to the proposition to Italy of the terms agreed between the Allies.

The second victory was Russian, and was gained in a far more momentous conflict over the magnificent British-Indian troops, which had gallantly won its way from Quetta almost to the walls of Moscow. Upon this battle General Dragomiroff, in a great, final bid for victory, had concentrated almost the whole remaining forces of his master. It was a mixed combat in which Ural, Orenburg and Transcaspian Cossacks fought with Bengal Lancers, and Turkestan Infantry Brigades with Royal Fusiliers. The battle, from the commencement of which the 90,000 British were greatly outnumbered, was, after five hours' massacre, won by a flanking movement of Don Cossacks. The number of the slain was 160,000.

Great as was the exhaustion in which this dear victory left Russia, the immediate result was a sudden and enormous increase of her prestige. And two things at once happened: first, Sweden, no longer acting in concert with the great arm of England, which was the incentive to her audacity, became anxious to secure by peace her conquests in Northern Russia; and secondly, the Kaiser, knowing that terms would now be offered to Sweden by Russia, became anxious to make terms with Sweden before her hands were freed to direct upon Germany the entire remnant of her forces. In this way it happened that nearly every one of the contending nations were, owing to the results of these two battles, strongly motivated toward peace. Nor could Austria resist the pressure of her allies, Italy and Germany, nor the large amenities of Russia south of the Balkans; and in the many-sided treaty signed at Vienna on the 23rd of August, Denmark, too, compelled by the pressure of events, was one of the signatories.

It was now that the long expected had come at last. Led by the rigour of events, and led by the general tendency of long-maturing sentiment, an exhausted Europe had inaugurated a League — as the first preliminary to a renewal of her life — having for its object the destruction of an exhausted Britain.

For Britain, too, was exhausted; and already had lost semblance to that land of free-handed opulence which her sons remembered with sighs. Bull's girth had thinned.

Yet if photographs at this hour could have been taken of all her people, and the traits of these agglomerated into the expression of a single face, that face would have been the wild and wan and gaunt visage of a Man, on whose brow brooded a fatal frown of indignation and resolve, not to be softened but by death.

The idea of Europe was to hurl itself in its whole banded strength upon this diminished force. And it would be strange if, this time, the island could withstand the continent.

England's navy had, on the whole, done well. Up to the moment of the new League, she still might be said to command the seas. But with the League, even without the practically intact navy of Italy, her supremacy was gone. With the navy of Italy, it was twice and thrice obliterated.

The new Allies, indeed, looked forward with certainty to another great naval battle before they could effect their design; but their ultimate passage to England was practically assured.

And Sweden, flushed with victory, contributed an Army Corps; and Russia, freed from invaders, contributed two; and Germany one; and France one; and Austria three; and Denmark two brigades; and Italy two brigades.

Mobil/

The port of debarkation was fixed at Antwerp, whose neutrality thus suffered willing violation, and in the last days of August 360,000 troops, troop-ships, and war-ships were hasting over sea and land to rendezvous upon Antwerp.

England, warned both from the Continent and America, was not in the dark. On the 5th of September, when the great Armada set sail from the Belgian port, her whole available force in ships of war was massed in Portsmouth Harbour, all but ready to sail.

It was on this very day, towards two in the afternoon, that a singular species of duel was taking place between two men at Worthing. It was war in extremis, as bitter as, and more breathless in its mad intensity than, the great war going forward around them.

One of these men was called Richardson, and the other Atkins. Atkins was excise, with a salary of thirty shillings; Richardson was municipal, and acquainted with rates. His locale was the Town Hall, and he earned forty shillings. Both were fairly active young men of twenty-five.

Apart from their steady and respectable employments, each had a species of less reputable avocation, which, however, he pursued with extreme zeal, and, for some reason or other, was proud of. Richardson said that he was 'on the staff' of the Evening News; and Atkins that he was 'on the staff' of the Sun.

This only meant that they had agreed to send any local news that might be of interest to those papers.

Now, on this 5th of September, a bit of local news of considerable interest did, in fact, occur. For a strange-looking little craft, which was nothing else than a Maltese speronare, had arrived at the pier; and from her had landed a man of uncertain age, who slowly walked up the pier with his eyes on the ground, made his way to Dixon's Commercial Hotel halfway up the Pier Street, and there disappeared. The rest of the speronares occupants had at once put to sea again. But it was quite an hour afterwards, before either Atkins or Richardson, being employed on their Jekyll affairs, got the least scent of this Hyde matter.

It was Atkins who, at the dinner-hour, first entered Dixon's commercial-room. In the front of Dixon's was announced a 'Daily-Ordinary,' the two words being separated by a great gap where the word 'Shilling,' now painted out, had once stood.

As Atkins entered the room, he saw the back of the stranger, who was leaving it by a door which led to the bedrooms above, and he started.

The whole interest of his life was instantly centred upon this man; there was something in his appearance, his dress, which aroused the instinct of the reporter. About the man was the brine and odour of the sea.

At this time, a bit of news was to the people of Britain like rain to the desert. Men often spent their very last half-penny in buying a paper, which they knew could tell them little more than they already knew.

We have said that Atkins was interested at sight of the stranger j but this interest became a passion the moment that, approaching a spread side-table, he saw beside a soiled plate a piece of paper; and on the paper a certain name written at the bottom of a promise-to-pay, together with a London address.

It had happened that the stranger had, to begin with, informed Dixon that he was without a copper in his pockets; and Dixon, after some* demur, on the security of a gold ring, an honest face, and a written promise-to-pay, had not only trusted the stranger with a meal and a bed, but had lent him twelve shillings to pay his fare to London that night. The promise-to-pay he had in a moment of bustle left on the table, and Atkins saw it, and turned to run.

And as he turned to run, lo, Richardson was at the door. And Atkins let his flat hand fall upon the paper, and stood leaning with careless grace.

Richardson, on his way to Dixon's, had heard of the arrival of the stranger, and there was a breath of haste at his lips. He said:

‘Hullo! Anything up?’

‘Not as I know of. You heard anything?’

‘No. Seen the article in to-day’s D. T.-?’

‘No. Why are you so late to-day? I have had dinner ten minutes—’

‘What, are you off? It’s only—’

‘I’ve got to be. Beastly job on hand — gauging business for Hatley’s. See you to-night at the club—’

Atkins' diplomacy was bad, for his walk toward the door, for one thing, was too rapid to be natural; and Richardson had noted his statuesque pose, his rather pale face, and his unmoving hand on the paper. So he had no sooner passed through the door, than Richardson, too, had read; and at once he, too, rushed to the door. But it was locked on the outside.

The thought of summoning slow Mr. Dixon by the bell never even entered his head; he simply flew to the window, dashed up the sash, dropped into the area, and climbed up to the rails on the opposite side by the help of a swinging coal-cellar door.

Yonder, half-way down the street, was Atkins, running with all his legs. Richardson, as though life lay before, and death behind, was after him.

Atkins, however, was considerably taller and fleeter, Richardson being inclined to fat; and the race was clearly the foremost man's, when, suddenly, there appeared from a bye-street, with callous saunter, a policeman about ten yards ahead of Atkins.

And at once Richardson sent forth the impassioned shout of 'Stop thief! Stop thief!' many times repeated.

And an instant later Atkins was firmly gripped in the arms of the officer.

'Let me go, Jones, you infernal idiot!' screamed Atkins, 'you ought to know better, you damned fool! Can't you guess — Jones — you silly ass—'

But Jones, with zealous sense of duty, maintained his grip on the frantic man, till he saw the accuser mysteriously rush onward past the accused. And he tossed his head with a smile, as he relaxed his hold of Atkins; and he said:

'Oh, well, I suppose it's only one of their little newspaper squabbles—'

So Richardson only reached the telegraph-office about ten seconds before Atkins; and the telegraph man was engaged to Atkins' sister.

And therefore the Sun got its message some five minutes before the News; but by some sleight-of-hand, or extra energy, the News was not out-done. It reached Piccadilly Circus some fifteen seconds before the Sun, though the Sun was first at Holborn; and it was never quite determined to which of the two Finsbury and Tooting owed their gratitude for the news.

On the placards of each the words were the same
JOHN HARDY ARRIVED IN ENGLAND.

CHAPTER XXIV. BEFORE THE BATTLE

DURING ALL THAT afternoon and night England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland uttered its voice.

For the 5th-6th of September the usual 5,000,000 letters and post-cards delivered by the Post Office leapt to 14,500,000. This meant that the whole nation had taken busily to pen-and-ink, to paper and card-board. It meant that it was profoundly stirred about something, that it wanted something with its whole heart.

These extra millions of letters were directed to London, some to the Government offices, the majority to the London daily papers. Not a thousandth part of them were ever opened. The Circulation Office of the London Postal Service Department was kept in a flurry of business all through the night. St. Martin's in the morning got postmen where it could; and the bags of the carriers bulged.

When any vast collection of animals acts in this spontaneous way, all doing the same thing, it is that they are stirred by some instinct which is in unison with the soul of the world. The Universal Voice is, in truth, the voice of God. Democracy is thus a kind of Holy Scripture. Its will is the Decalogue.

The nation, having eagerly drunk the news that John Hardy had suddenly reappeared in England as mysteriously as he had disappeared from it, demanded his presence at the impending battle. It insisted that no nonsense about formality or convention should deprive it of his possible help. Most of the people demanded his appointment as Admiral of the Fleet.

And why? He had only been instrumental in winning a single battle for England. If they had reasoned, their ardour of persuasion could not have been so intense. But the fact is, that their cry proceeded from that divine instinct for truth which, in hours of extremity, often inspires nations, and sometimes individuals. That Hardy was the right man, just then, just there, they felt intuitively; and they did not mince matters in proclaiming it.

The only person in Europe to whom the coming battle, or his own possible share in it, did not seem of direct momentous importance, was Hardy.

For the immediate motive of the Allies was to compel the withdrawal of the British troops from the Continent; but supposing they effected a landing in England, there impended an enemy upon them, as Hardy knew, far more terrible than all the combined armies of several Europes; and this enemy would at once compel them to do the very thing they sought to force upon Britain.

And it was near — it was not far off. As he stepped into the train at Worthing that night, he bought a paper; and in a small-type paragraph, unmarked perhaps but by him, he saw this quaint item of news:

‘A train containing 500 Chinese has arrived at St. Petersburg from Vladivostok. They seem poor, and the object of their journey is unknown. It is the intention of the Russian authorities to send them back to their own country.’ Hardy muttered to himself: ‘So soon, Yen How?’

But in the eyes of England, of Britain, of Europe, the coming battle was the Greater Waterloo of world-history; the final shock of this annihilating war; the crowning Armageddon before a probable thousand years of Peace

If Britain failed now, she failed; and if Europe, then Europe failed, too. There could be little further struggle: for who would be there to make it?

There would be no fight left in the limp nations.

Hardy reached London at eleven p.m. It was partly expecting him, for as soon as the two Worthing reporters had got off their news, Worthing had pricked its ears and heard. Dixon's became the centre of the town, and a moving crowd surveyed the house for hours. Long before Hardy appeared, all his immediate plans were known from Dixon; he was then cheered by the full street; only those near enough to see him well being mostly silent, impressed with something of that strangeness of expression which made the sailors at Kiao-Chau whisper: 'What a face!'

London, therefore, expected him, without certainty as to the hour. A considerable crowd waited at Victoria; but when at last it saw him, made no sign. They looked for a very young man, with swift glance and free air. They saw a man with stooping shoulders and gray in his long hair; and decided that this was hardly he.

But one pair of eyes knew him under his disguise. Old Bobbie Mason had been waiting all the evening at the station, wondering why his boy had forgotten him, had sent him no line or word. When at last he saw, he started with horror; but he knew his own.

Outside, instead of the crowd of busy cabs, Hardy saw a meagre muster; and his musing eye noted the raw-boned look of the horses. As his carriage passed through Buckingham Palace Road, a baked-potato apparatus stood before the Palace, and he noted with a pang the largeness of the crowd around it. The streets were almost deserted. Even the policemen seemed fewer. In a bye-street, near Oxford Circus, an old woman walked, and behind her a cat, with little halts and runs, followed persistently, sending out piteous feeble cries to the night.

Old Bobbie, sitting there by his side, waited for a caress of the once affectionate hand. But no caress came. They drove onward in absolute silence. The only words which John had spoken were the two: ‘Well, Bobbie,’ at the station-platform. The old man was frightened.

Once only, as John was moving off to bed, the old butler broke out; and he cried, with clasped hand:

‘Master John — what — what — have they done to you!’

And John answered:

‘They have tortured me to death, Bobbie, if you want to know.’

And that was all. The rose-leaf lips were pressed pretty tight now.

Early in the morning the Government knew what it had to do, if it meant to keep its place. In a thousand startling ways it learned that the nation’s will, this time, had got to be done.

But the thing was officially impossible. Hardy was nobody, officially. The ships’ crews were complete; and it was anticipated that the main portion of the fleet still at anchor would sail at noon. The Government could not exactly telegraph to a Captain or a Vice-Admiral, and say: “You must give up your place to John Hardy, because he is a better man than you.” They were absolutely at their wits’ end.

But the chief characteristic of the British race is its nimble way. It actually does manage in the end. At nine o’clock Captain MacLeod, once of the Jupiter, now of the Royal Sovereign, was seized by ‘a sudden illness’; at half-past nine, Admiral Sir Nowell Salmon, principal Naval Aide-de-Camp to the Queen, was at 11a Cavendish Square; at ten, Lord Charles Beresford, upon whom, in the hour of peril, the supreme command had been imposed, telegraphed to the Committee of National Safety, and also to the Admiralty, offering to Hardy a joint command of the squadron: at half-past ten Hardy was hasting in a special train toward Portsmouth.

But he went under compulsion, not knowing why. He had no theory of naval war. He had, indeed, won a battle, but — he shrank a little from this prominence. The truth was, he was more or less unconscious of the clearness of his own eyes and the valour of his own heart. It needed that the actual hard facts of a situation should be before him before he could assume the aggressiveness and the self-assurance of the hero.

When on the point of setting out from Cavendish Square, he had cut from the newspaper bought at Worthing the paragraph about the 500 Chinese. And he had written the two following letters, the first to Mr. Goschen at his private address:

Dear Sir,

— I am just about to set out to fight in the battle which you kindly allow me to attend. In case I should get killed, I am writing this letter to ask you if you will kindly send a ship, flying the English White Ensign at her mast-head, under that the Blue Peter, and under that the Union Jack, to the island of Monte Christo, with orders to bring home what she will find there. I believe you will find that this will come in useful to you in a few weeks' time.

— I am, sir, your obedient servant,
John Hardy.

The second letter was to the Prime Minister. It ran:

My Lord,

— I take the liberty to enclose you a slip from a newspaper about some Chinamen who have come to St. Petersburg, because I believe it is well worth your attention. In my opinion, within three or four weeks from now there will be some four hundred millions of yellow men in Europe, and perhaps in England, too. I have just come from China myself, so I ought to know what I am saying. A very great man, named Yen How, is the cause of all this. In my opinion, the very best thing England could do would be to withdraw at once from the Continent the armies she has there.

— I am, my lord, your obedient servant,
John Hardy.

If ever man was shocked with fright, or started at the keen spur of terror, it was the Prime Minister on reading this note.

Now he understood some things which had puzzled him.

News had reached England that some American cruisers in Chinese waters had mysteriously ceased to report themselves. Later had come the news that no intelligence could be obtained of some Italian and Austrian ships of war sent out to China during the 'Eastern craze.' Merchant ships from Europe had sailed round the Cape to the Far East, and their long-delayed return was still awaited. It was known that China and Europe were telegraphically disconnected.

These things, at another time, might have given to Europe some hint of the actual facts. But during the preoccupation of the war, not the remotest inkling of the truth occurred to any one. China was a forgotten land. The result of the great battle in the Hwang-hai was still unknown in England — all was unknown. Hardy was the first messenger from that silent, but busy, Eastern world who had appeared for many a month.

At the Hard a boat awaited him. He was taken on board the Anson, which carried the Admiral's flag at the main, and was received by Lord Charles Beresford in his private cabin.

The cheery sailor took the hand of the grave-faced one, and said:

‘I congratulate you heartily, Mr. Hardy, on the merited enthusiasm and confidence which you have aroused in your countrymen, and I shall feel myself honoured by your collaboration.’

And Hardy said:

‘Thank you, my lord.’

And, after some few words, they sat together, and Beresford said:

‘The facts, since you are ignorant of them, are roughly these: the navy of Italy is practically intact. Of her first-class battleships, two were sunk by Riviera forts, but about 130,000 tons of her 150,000 odd tons in this line remain, with say 16 guns over 13 inches, and, counting the whole fleet, 44 over 10. With the names, tonnage, and armaments of the various ships you are familiar, the two lost ships being the Re Umberto and the Ruggiero di Lauria. France, on the other hand, has lost heavily in the war; her Toulon squadron of eighteen armoured ships, which she had reduced by those sent to the first invasion of England, was destroyed in the Bay of Algeciras, during an attempt to pass through the Straits. A few antiquated wooden things like the Colbert and the Suffren, as well as that rather lame duck, the Richelieu, still remain.

‘Her Levant squadron, however, is mostly good for fight; there was a brush with our East Mediterranean force, but the French turned tail, and were lost in a mist after some mutual injuries. The majority of the fifteen coast-defence iron-clads, moreover, are intact, and I have no doubt will be dragged into this final effort. Altogether we have, I think, to reckon with a contribution from France of, say 96,000 tons, and this will include, I think I may say, the Brenntis, the Sfax, the Trident, the two three-masted contre-torpilleurs, Voutour and Cosmao, the Amiral Duperré, the Levrier, the cruiser Troude, the Marceau, and the Magenta. Those, I think, are all I can be sure of.

‘In the Baltic there have been four battles, one British-German, one British-Russian-German, one Swedish-Danish-German, and the last Swedish-Russian.

‘On the state of affairs with regard to Baltic ships I am unfortunately not so well informed. I very much doubt if there remains to Sweden a single effective ship of war; but, If I am not wrong, we may expect to have to do with a contribution from Russia and Germany combined of, say, 100,000 tons, one-half of which, I calculate, will be battleship weight, and the rest cruisers and torpedo flotillas. Austria will send her single battleship and her 32,000 ton-weight in cruisers, making altogether, with torpedo-boats, say 40,000 tons. Putting all these together, I have calculated, Mr. Hardy, an opposition of 456,000 tons.

‘Very well, now. Let us turn nearer home, and see what force we have to oppose to this great armada. Britain, I assure you, has had a hard and up-hill fight of it. There lie around you ships recalled from every quarter of the globe, except China, where, I hear that you say, our squadron has gone to Davy Jones. If an invading army were to descend from, let us say, the planet Jupiter, they would find all our colonies undefended. Happily our enemies are in the same plight. Altogether we have at our command, including available coast-defence ships, 156,000 tons, just about one-third of the enemy’s force; and if these figures do not fill you with a certain gravity, it is because you are a Briton and Mr. Hardy.’

Beresford smiled as he concluded, leaning back his chair; Hardy, looking upon the ground, did not smile.

After a minute Hardy said:

‘I take it, my lord, that after this battle there won’t be any ships of war left anywhere?’

‘There will be the Japanese, Chinese, and American navies,’ said Beresford, ‘and some things of Spain, with some inconsiderable Portuguese and Dutch ships. Europe will then have to fight with her Atlantic greyhounds.’

Still Hardy did not smile.

‘And what are our best ships, my lord?’ he said.

‘Our best ships are good,’ replied Lord Charles Beresford. ‘We have the Illustrious, the Hood, the Anson, the Trafalgar, the Royal Sovereign, on board of which you will bear the joint direction of the battle, though, I am sorry to say, without a flag-captain! also the Centurion, the Nile, the Bendow, the Hero. You will see in a few minutes for yourself. Not all the most modern of the modern, perhaps — but all good ships and true.’

‘There won’t be much of them left after the battle, my lord,’ remarked Hardy.

This was obvious. Lord Charles Beresford coughed. And he said:

‘I suppose not. But now — the case being as I have explained to you, what are your ideas as to a plan of battle, and so on?’

For some time Hardy was silent, perusing the ground. Afterwards he said:

‘To be candid, my lord, I have no idea, not a single one. Or rather, I have one.’

‘Very good, Mr. Hardy; let me hear it, and we will then confer together upon it.’

My idea is this, sir,’ said Hardy, ‘to ask you to let me take a cruiser, or a pinnace, or something, and go to the foreign fleet with a flag of truce to try and persuade them, by hook or by crook, to go back again to their own country.’

‘My good Mr. Hardy!’ broke from Lord Charles Beresford’s lips.

‘You are astonished, my lord,’ said Hardy. ‘You guess that I am as fond of a fight as any one, and you did not quite expect to hear that sort of proposal from me. But I make it seriously to you, and in doing so I forget my own inclination, and even I forget the glory of England. I am thinking of the good of the whole world. The fact is, sir, I happen to know more of the actual conditions of the present and the near future than you do,’ and therefore see things in different proportions. I say to you, Lord Charles Beresford, that mankind is at this moment in by far the greatest fix in which it has ever been since the first man stepped; and how it is going to get out of it, God only knows. You think you have been having a great war in Europe, and so you have. But this little great war of yours is not anything compared with what is coming upon you, sir. Believe me, for I know, or I would not say it. It has been man fighting with man all the time, has it not? But how if all the devils in hell, myriads of them, my lord, suddenly break loose upon you? It would be an easy thing for four millions of yellow men, with a proper leader, to conquer Europe in its present state. But it is not four millions which are coming; it is four hundred millions; and every single one of them a devil, as I say, vomited from hell. I have just come from China, and that is what I have to tell you, sir.’

As Hardy ceased, he lifted his hitherto careless eyes, and now there was a flash in them; in the face of the other was horror, query, incredulity.

There was a dead silence. Lord Charles Beresford had of old been himself one of the preachers of ‘The Yellow Danger’ but he had preached it as a theory, afar off. When he was told that it was here — had come — it shocked and appalled him as though he had never once heard of such a thing.

In the midst of the silence there was a knock, and the Admiral’s Flag-Lieutenant entered the room. He said:

‘The Indefatigable has steamed in, sir, and signals that the enemy are now passing the Straits.’

A chain of four British cruisers, going and coming within signalling distance, the remotest keeping watch upon the enemy, the nearest in touch with Portsmouth, had been told off for this duty two days previously.

‘We must be looking alive, then,’ said Lord Charles. ‘The words you have spoken, Mr. Hardy, are terrible; and the course you suggest seems to me one almost requiring the authority of the civil powers. But now, you see, there is no time. I suppose I must take upon myself the responsibility of acceding to your views.’

‘I believe that England will approve our conduct, sir.’

‘Good. At the same time I can’t say that I have much faith in the success of your expedition.’

‘I hope it will succeed, my lord. If it does not—’

‘Well?’

‘Then it will serve another end.’

‘What end?’

‘I shall have a good look at the enemy’s formation, forces, and disposition.’

And at these words the eyes of the two men met.

And Lord Charles Beresford smiled.

And John Hardy, for the first time, smiled.

CHAPTER XXV. THE GREATER WATERLOO

THE SHIPS LAY in harbour with fires banked and steam at a quarter of an hour's notice.

The single signal 'Weigh!' went up from the Anson, and ten thousand sailor - hearts went fluttering, as the fat chain-links, like processions of slow-footed sea - tortoises, came waddling clumsily in-board.

It was arranged between Hardy and Beresford that the plan of advance which the latter had long since determined upon should be put into execution and maintained, up to the time of Hardy's visit to the allied fleet. If, after the visit, Hardy desired to take over the sole command, he would signal that fact throughout the fleet.

At noon exactly the ships steamed out. At once the news was flashed over all Britain, and an hour later the churches of the land, in hamlet, town, and city, were thronged with worshippers imploring the Almighty to protect His Witness in the earth, and not to forsake in the hour of her extremity that chosen Nation, His Servant, which had proclaimed the greatness of goodness, and, as far as her poor striving eyes could see, had loved Righteousness, and had hated Iniquity.

The ships passed Spithead massed in four columns in line ahead, flag and senior officers leading their columns, Hardy at the head of the starboard line in the Royal Sovereign and Beresford at the head of the extreme port. Ships had stringent instructions to keep their speed, and maintain an exact formation. Six knots, eight knots, ten knots were signalled; and it was evident from the position of the steam-cones that every ship had steam in plenty.

It was a bright early-September day; but as often happens on such days, a bluish mist, which was half a mist and half a luminosity, delicately veiled the distance.

Off Selsey Bill the second link of the chain of look-outs joined the fleet, an hour afterwards the third, and half an hour afterwards the fourth. The last, having come in at the rate of twenty-one knots, reported the enemy off Winchelsea, steering W. by S. in four lines abreast, the last line consisting mainly of troop-ships, and the whole occupying a vast breadth of sea midway between the French coast at Dieppe and the English at Winchelsea. In half an hour everybody of any rank in either fleet had a glass at his eyes.

It was the head signalman of the Royal Sovereign who first sent a thrill through his ship by reporting that he could make out something to eastward; and five minutes later every glass could detect the enemy, faint and toy-like in the vague haze as mirage, or the other-world hues of soap-bubbles. The fleets were then twenty miles apart, and it was just after four, the day being as bright and hot as ever.

Hardy, the glass at his eyes, said to a signal midshipman, an old Britannia ship-mate of his own age:

‘I want No. 98. Have her signalled alongside at once.’

No. 98 was a quite new first-class torpedo-boat, the fastest thing in the British navy, and the first of her build. Only 130 tons in displacement, she yet had a length of 160 feet, and an I.H.P. of 2800. She steamed, or rushed, at the rate of thirty-three knots, and while she was doing it her crew were not comfortable, and the sea in all her neighbourhood changed colour. Hardy, before he stepped aboard her, took the precaution to drape himself from head to foot in oil-skins.

Away, then, in a few minutes, drove No. 98 at full speed, swaying through a horrible vibratory heave of her flanks, like a charger which has galloped all day, and at night-fall he sprawls with drooped neck at the inn-gate, the sweat reeking on his rocking ribs; so drove No. 98, groaning for speed, seeming far too frail for the power that pumped and travailed within her rocking ribs.

Eastward she flew, a mere white spectre of hurrying foam; and within this shroud of spray, Hardy, in his oil-skins, lay flat on his face, his left arm round an upright at the extreme bow, a double spy-glass at his eyes. From the mast-head amidships floated a large white flag.

As soon as No. 98 was seen to shoot ahead of the fleet, Lord Charles Beresford signalled slow speed, and the fleet proceeded at a mere crawl through the water, this having been previously agreed upon. It was Hardy's idea that the enemy were probably ignorant of our exact forces, and that something might possibly be gained, when the facts of the battle unfolded themselves, by maintaining this ignorance as long as might be. Hence a nearer approach was for the present avoided.

In thirty-five minutes Hardy was on the deck of the allied Admiral-ship, the ship being the Andrea Doria, and the Admiral, in virtue of seniority, Admiral Premesnil, the Grand Duke Alexis being second in command.

He was led, his face half enveloped in the throat-flap of the oil-skin, and the water streaming to his feet, into the Admiral's quarters. Premesnil, a tall man, with gray hair, and a stately courteousness of manner, sat opposite Hardy, supporting a thoughtful brow on thumb and finger.

'May I ask, sir,' said Hardy, 'are you fairly well acquainted with English?'

'Fairly well, sir,' answered Premesnil; and that is not a confession, but a boast.'

He bowed. Hardy bowed.

‘Well, sir,’ said Hardy, ‘I come to you to make a proposal of peace. But before I can say anything, I must ask you to slacken your speed, so as not to approach too near to my fleet during our talk. Our fleet is almost stationary. I ask the same of you.’

‘It shall be done, sir. But first let us understand who we are. I, as you guess, am the Admiral-in-Chief here: Admiral Premesnil. Who are you?’

‘I have the joint-command of the British fleet,’ said Hardy, * in collaboration with Lord Charles Beresford. My name is John Hardy. I speak for myself and my colleague.’

‘Might I ask — Hardy of Shoreham fame?’

‘Yes, sir.’

‘Good. Then I shall at once comply with your request as to speed, and order you a glass of wine. You have had a good drenching, I see.’

The Admiral touched a button, and gave an order as to speed. But Hardy declined the wine.

He put his brow on his hand, and he began to talk slowly and gravely in his plain, strong Saxon, unfolding to the Admiral why he was there, going into the minutiae of the Chinese character, prophesying in simple English, but with the conviction and effusion of a Hebrew Seer, the doom of Europe,

He spoke for half an hour without interruption. And when he was finished the Admiral sighed, for he was weary, and was wondering what this all was about, and when it would end. He did not believe a word of the matter.

The thought occurred to him: ‘Can this be a ruse to keep back the battle till darkness comes on?’

His manner stiffened. He was narrow and technical; he lacked both sight and insight.

‘And what are your proposals, sir?’ he said.

‘I have made them!’ said Hardy.

‘But not seriously — come now.’

Hardy leapt to his feet, flushing. ‘Do you reject them, then?’

‘In my own name, and in the name of my colleagues, without consulting them, most decidedly — yes.’

«Then, sir, we will fight you.’

‘Since nothing else remains, Mr. Hardy.’

‘I say you bon jour, monsieur.’

‘Good-day, Mr. Hardy.’

They bowed. Hardy passed through the door, his brow very pink, the Admiral following.

Again they bowed as Hardy passed down the ship’s side, and never met again.

Back tore No. 98 to her own fleet, Hardy lying at her stern with the glass held steadily to his musing eyes.

To the surprise of the British, the torpedo-boat, instead of returning to the starboard column, made for the extreme port, steering for the Anson.

At this time Hardy, stung by the French Admiral, and excited at the near approach of battle, was flushed in face, and about him was something of his natural look of youth. His blood was up. He had come into contact with the realities of the case — the very realities to which his own inner nature was akin. Here he was at home, among native things, which he could manipulate without fail. His nature, as it were, rose and buckled on its sword, feeling its force, not doubting its dowry. He was prepared now for any responsibility. His soul recognised and acknowledged itself, and his eyes were bright. He was a Hero.

As other men discover theories and apply them to facts, so he, on contact with facts, evolved theories. He had formed a plan of the battle.

He ran up to the Anson's side with alacrity. And as he was hurriedly met by Beresford, he hurriedly said:

‘These people will have nothing to do with peace, my lord. The thing now is to beat them.’

‘I heartily agree, Mr. Hardy. Am I to understand that, having seen their disposition, you are prepared to take over the sole command?’

‘I am willing, my lord.’

‘Good! And have you come to tell me that? *

‘No. I came to save you a journey to my ship, as I was already abroad from mine. What I want is a meeting of all captains and commanders in your ward-room at once. But it must be at once/

Beresford instantly turned, and sent a middy packing with the order; the flags climbed up, and a flotilla of forty-three hurried boats came converging over a wide space of sea.

They were soon on board, and gathered in the wardroom. Beresford, half-rising from his chair, said: ‘Mr. Hardy will speak on my behalf and on his own, gentlemen,’ and sat down again.

Every one of those assembled eyes rested critically upon Hardy as he rose, he in his oil-skins, they all in uniform, prepared to pass judgment upon him as seaman, as general, as man.

Would he not hesitate, or blush, or strut, or stammer? Would he not show himself blatant, or timorous, or crude, or uninitiated?

They none of them felt absolutely sure of him. Only Hardy felt absolutely sure of himself, standing on fact. He rose with the self-assurance and the self-unconsciousness of Cromwell, four-square to his place and his hour.

This is what he said:

‘We have not much time for talk, gentlemen, as the enemy must now be approaching us at the rate of eight or ten knots, and I do not want them to come too near before I tell you what I think. Lord Charles Beresford has calculated that they outweigh us by three to one, and that is just about the truth. Now I am not at all sure that you will all absolutely agree with what I am going to say about that; but, personally, I am quite certain of my ground. They are three, I say, and we are one. Well, suppose three men attack me in the street, what would be the best thing, and what would be the worst, which I could do? The best thing I could do would be to set my back against a wall, face them, and try to drive away at them; the worst thing, would be to get in the middle of a triangle formed by them. We agree, of course, as to that; and hence the horror which all military people have of the phrase “between two fires.” But surely, gentlemen, with a ship it is different! On land you must not be too bold, for then you become rash; but on board a ship, I give it as my opinion that the rasher you are, the better the chance you have! Why, let me ask you, ought I to try to get my back against a wall, if three men attack me in the street? There is no other reason than this: that I have only got one face and two hands. If I had three faces, and six hands, the best thing I could do would be to get in the middle of them, and try to finish them all off, before any two could attack me in one quarter. Now a ship has four faces — a bow, a stern, and two sides — and under each of these a gallant number of hands. I believe now, whatever the books on naval tactics may say, that you will be on my side in this matter; for one, of course, must not go by books, where so much is at stake.

‘But I do wish to convince you quite fully. Let me point out to you, then, what you know, that the modern battleship, as distinct from the old-time ones, is a far more potent thing as an attacking than as a self-defensive machine. The Camperdown rammed the Victoria as they were playing about together, and down, with hardly a sigh, went the Victoria, like lead. If you were to armour a battleship to resist the attack of a 11 i-ton gun, that ship would sink without troubling any one to fire the gun off. And what does this prove? It proves that if three ships attack one, the best thing which that one can do is to turn three faces simultaneously to those three ships, and batter away at them with her hundred hands, making sure that, not one, but four ships will have disappeared when the smoke clears. In other words, the one ship must get in the middle of the three. It is a question of time.

‘Of course, gentlemen, if a ship could float with only one side, then it would be of great importance for her to avoid getting “between two fires.” But when one side is broken, both sides sink, and it is of no consequence whether or not the other side is broken too; while it is of consequence that that other side should, before it sinks, be sinking an enemy’s ship. It is a question of time.

‘I hope I make myself clear. I am led to express these thoughts to you, because they have just been passing most vividly through my own head; and they have been doing so in consequence of the sight I have had of the enemy’s fleet.

‘The arrangement of that fleet you already partly know. The important point is this: that their first and second lines abreast consist of two rows of battleships, the first numbering ten, and the second nine. Now these are arranged in echelon; so that you get a series of nine triangles with their bases toward us, and their apex away from us, as you see in this drawing which I have made, marking the names of ships as far as I could determine, or guess, them.’

A paper with a diagram was handed round.

‘Now, gentlemen, since we have just nine battleships, we have it in our power to make a dash into these nine triangles, and fire away; but in that case, every second allied battleship in the front line would be attacked by two, instead of one, British ship; and we really have not the material to spare for these luxuries. No: what I propose is that we spread ourselves out, so that six of our battleships shall occupy the whole length of the French line abreast; and in that case, as the diagram shows us, our extreme starboard ship will find herself running into a foreign triangle, base facing; our second ship into a quite distinct foreign triangle, apex facing; our third ship into a third foreign triangle, base facing; and so for the six ships, base facing and apex facing, alternately. Thus our six ships will engage eighteen distinct foreign ships; and the foreigners will have one ship left: and we shall have — three.

‘Now that one left ship of the foreigners I wish to have attacked by Torpedo-boats No. 47, No. 53, and No. 98 at the same moment, the instant the battle commences. They are to do nothing else till that one ship is in the air.

Well, with regard to our three battleships left, it is chiefly to tell you what I think should be done with them that I have called this hurried meeting. Gentlemen, it seems to me, really, that a perfectly whole and sound ship, suddenly and unexpectedly entering a battle when it is more than half over, must be not only a tremendous weapon in herself, but must necessarily be the cause of a tremendous demoralisation in the minds of her enemies. Hence it is that I grudge the time taken up by every word that I am now speaking. The enemy cannot be quite certain of our numbers — they do not know that we have these three ships. I therefore want these three, at once, to retreat westward under forced draught till they see the smoke of the battle, and then, making a detour, to get behind the enemy's troop-ships, and dash among them from the east. I have very good reasons for knowing that, this time, it is not a matter of supreme national importance whether the foreigners land upon English soil or not; but still, we do not want the people of Britain to be saying that they had a fleet, and it was not good enough to clear the seas of foreigners. The three ships will therefore worry among the troop-ships, sinking all they can — on this clear understanding, that they be not careful to destroy straggling ships, that they waste little time, that they dash as soon as may be into the general battle, and finish the destruction of the enemy.

‘The three ships which I tell off for this duty are the Centurion, the Bendow, and the Hero.

‘With regard to the method to be adopted by the Six, the three which enter a triangle-base will, after as much fight as possible without lowering speed in the middle, pass through and ram the apex; then if possible, and if need be, re-form, return, and fight. The three which enter their triangles by an apex, will ram the apex, enter, and fight.

* One of the greatest horrors of modern sea-battles I believe to be the danger we are all in of doing injury to our own ships. But this time we shall be so spread out, that nothing of that sort is likely to happen — to battleships at least. But to captains and commanders of cruisers and composite vessels I commend that reflection. For they, passing into the second line of the enemy, will have a thicker fight, which, I hope, will be conducted on the same principles as those I have enunciated for battleships.

‘That is all I had to say, and now we must look sharp, I think, especially those Three. I wish you success and goodbye. After all, ships are dead things; it is not ships that fight a battle, but men; and every one knows that we have the right men. Nice steering, dash, and plenty of quick thunder: that, I think, is much. We ought to be able to destroy this foreign fleet I have seen their Admiral-in-Chief, gentlemen, and he certainly did not look to me as if he knew much about ships and fighting.’

A low noise of laughter ran round the room. Already the magic of Hardy’s plain but dashing and fascinating personality had caught and won his colleagues. It was impossible not to see by the faces around him that he was approved. He possessed the faculty of making men work with enthusiasm for him.

‘What about the battle-word?’ said a captain, as they turned to troop away.

‘Suppose we say Trafalgar?’ said Hardy.

‘Trafalgar has been already used three times during the war,’ said Lord Charles Beresford. ‘I had decided upon another, Mr. Hardy.’

‘What, my lord?’

‘Shoreham,’ answered Lord Charles Beresford.

And a murmur of ‘Hear, hear,’ as the officers busily shook hands, spread half-way up the stairway; and Jack, a short while afterwards, knowing who now led him, received the signalled word with high enthusiasm.

By the time Hardy reached his own ship in No. 98, the three appointed battleships were off to the west.

It was just three bells, first dog-watch; and the day, as if lingering to see, showed hardly a tendency to darken. The allied fleet was now much more distinctly marked on the horizon. The British had quite a stripped appearance, prepared, to its mast-heads, for battle.

As soon as Hardy reached his deck he ordered ten knots to be signalled. And at once the two masses of power began to approach rapidly, growing up upon each other, marching over the insubstantial deep, to meet.

It is impossible for even the coolest heart to be present at the impending of a contest so august, without a quickened beat, a thump of awe. Even to contemplate the thing from afar is horror. The weak flesh shrinks. The forces that rush to horrid combat are hardly of man — they stride out into the infinite, they reach the supernatural, they become ghostly. Commonplace Jack suddenly finds himself face to face with ineffable Hell.

They are ten miles apart — they are eight — they are six. The heart seems jammed in the dry throat, and the hands shake like reeds through which the huntsman's dog has flitted. The anticipation of the thing is, if possible, a greater horror than the reality.

The five ships have pricked their course off, debouching to port, and the three appointed torpedo-boats are rushing like sword-fish still farther to port upon the single doomed ship designated by Hardy. Only the Royal Sovereign in the far starboard limb maintains her straight course to eastward. Hardy is in her conning-tower, and his eyes, alight with awe and joy, are everywhere.

Signal after signal goes up from the Royal Sovereign. The speeds on both sides intensify. She is five miles from the two ships between which she means to run, and she is the foremost of her own fleet. In two minutes she is four miles; in two more, three. How frightful is her Silence...!

If the earth's foot should slip upon its course, and she were perceived to be sailing slowly, yet with ever swifter and madder joy, toward her native sun, just so the wild heart would beat, and the blanched face be pinched...

The ships are no longer mere toys one to the other. They are two miles apart. Hardy waits, grandly patient. They are two thousand yards apart... And then the Royal Sovereign talks.

Talks — and is answered. It is a single savage bark of Cerberus, the hell-dog, answered by two single savage Cerberus-barks — the talk of heavy guns. But before the sounds have passed in pallid flight over the sea, there breaks forth a continued rolling row, like that solemn roar of doom and deep-throated jabber of bubbering and thundering Etna, the mere intolerable tumult of which throws the three crews into a sort of crazy daze. It is the lighter guns which jabber.

John Hardy forgets Yen How and his tortures. He is a youth again. A wild hilarity lights his gallant eyes.

But now he is passing midway between the two ships, and straight before him is the third. Not an instant of that precious period passes unmarked by him. Though his face, like all faces there, is a face of ecstasy, the back of his brain is cool as ice.

‘Plenty of quick thunder,’ he had said — in his robust, Cromwellian way! And as he passed by her, the great Brennus reeled and plunged, with a sort of tragic haste, from sight.

But now all the battle, over many a mile of troubled sea, is rolled in smoke; and nimble-treading clouds pass in mysterious haste to and fro across the water. From fifteen miles away to northward there comes a great detonation, and the Italia is ‘in the air.’ The three torpedo-boats detailed to attack her have been sunk, but the sixth steel-needle waits half a minute swinging between her screws, and bursts, and sends her — flying.

Near by, Lord Charles Beresford on the Anson has rammed the Lepanto at a triangle-apex, and run on with sinking bows toward the Amiral Duperré and the Oldenburg; and these two he passes with such a rain of wrath that not a single crew is left alive at their unprotected guns.

Now, if never before, is proved the truth of Hardy's saying, that the modern battleship is a destructive, rather than a self-protective, engine. Even as he gasps the sharp, short order Ram! the two masses of white cloud, within which are the Royal Sovereign and the Francisco Morosimi coalesce; they are both tearing along at fifteen knots in nearly opposite directions; they close — they meet; and there is nothing on earth to which to liken the shocking jar with which those armoured powers crash.

On both ships every living brain spins and faints; and before any one has recovered consciousness, the Francisco Morosimi is wheeling furiously in a hollow basin of sea, whose waters shoot and gurgle in cataracts above her leaning hull.

All along the line of fifteen miles, from the Italia 'in the air' to the Francisco Morosimi in the deep, the tale of tragedy has accumulated; and in three minutes the charge is over, and the ships are firing stern-guns.

Only three minutes — and at the end of that time, one British battleship, the Illustrious, and four foreign battleships, the Italia, the Francisco Morosimi, the Lepanto, and the Admiral-ship, are no longer there; seven minutes later, and nine more foreign battleships, with three more British, sink, without receiving further injuries. Some of the crews of these last are afloat in boats.

Two of the six British ships in tatters, and six of the enemy in tatters, still float. Hardy slowly opens his eyes, leaps to his feet, looks around, and orders his helm to starboard; for there is a wide clear space about him. He is told, in reply, that it is impossible to keep steam, as the water is rising in the stoke-holds.

This only means that he cannot ram again, not that the fight is quite over for him. The Royal Sovereign creeps wearily round; yonder to the north-west is a still reeking ship, the Sfax, hardly moving; and like a dying lion, intent upon dealing a last rent to his enemy, the Royal Sovereign, trailing her wounded stern, drags herself painfully forward upon the Sfax.

The ships are alone, and the combat, dreadful because almost stationary, lasts five minutes. Neither is fit for fight, yet neither will strike colours. The rain of shells clash midway in the air, and burst in unison, as if with clapping hands, and grand hurrahs of flame and sound. The ships are near; and suddenly cries Hardy: 'Helm hard to port — hands prepare to board!' And as the Sfax discharges a last broadside at nothingness, the high bow of the Royal Sovereign creeps forward upon her quarter; there is a small crash and mutual shudder of the meeting ships; and the next moment, Jack, with Hardy at his head, is swarming, cutlass in hand, with nimble impetuosity, into the enemy's aft upper-deck. The feat is unexpected; the Frenchmen wince and die; in a moment the British tar is everywhere, and his touch is rough. A white-faced commodore rushes past Hardy on the main-deck, crying: We yield! we yield!

The stern of the Sfax sways and wobbles a little: she feels the suction of the Royal Sovereign which has quietly sunk beside her.

Hardy stills the tumult, orders the French flag to be pulled down, and leaps to the conning-tower. He looks abroad with keenly curious eyes over the sea. Around him is a great dull roar, and the air is all of thin smoke. No human brain can now altogether divine, much less direct, the vast drama that is still progressing. Far away, beyond the ken of vision, the battle is raging between meeting cruisers, between torpedoes and contre-torpilleurs, between shot and shell, ram and barbette, in incalculable hurly-burly. But through all this confusion there has run, and runs, a thread of plan, on at least one side. Hardy, as far as he can see, is well content. He waits and waits, with wildly throbbing heart, for the appearance of his three battleships.

As for himself, he is a prisoner. The Sfax has neither screw, nor rudder, nor boat. At last they come, hurrying from the eastward, where they have been delayed by sinking the greater part of the enemy's troop-ships — in line abreast. Hardy's signalman has been busy among the French flags, and when they approach within a thousand yards of the Sfax, summoned by steam-siren, he signals them to destroy, or capture, first the five dismantled battleships which remain.

And with this order the battle is nearly over: the mere apparition of the fresh ships has all but won it. There is a renewed energy of firing which lasts from four to five minutes. And then a gradual, and finally deathly, silence grows upon the dun air and the callous green sea-surface; and night at last descends.

CHAPTER XXVI. THE YELLOW DANGER

WE, WRITING THE history, have gone into detail, and explained the means employed by Hardy in the winning of this great, battle. But the mass of the British public, not looking narrowly into means, looking only at the astonishing result, hailed the victory as a perplexing miracle of genius.

That even one of the British ships should return to harbour was marvelous. But that three should return, having in tow two Italian and one French ship, after destroying the overwhelming remainder of the invading force, this seemed to approach the incredible.

The three ships arrived at Portsmouth at eleven in the night. They were the Nile, the Hero, and a sloop, the Pelican. (The Benbow, the third of the ships kept by Hardy in reserve, had been torpedoed at the last moment.) They had on board, beside their own crews, Lord Charles Beresford, Hardy, and a number of boat-loads of British and foreign sailors which they had picked up. The three captured ships — the Sfax and two Italian gunboats, — all disabled, were towed to Newhaven and left. The three British, almost intact (the Hero had some central-battery guns unshipped), proceeded to Portsmouth.

At midnight there was a sound of jubilee bells in London, in Liverpool, and in every considerable town in Britain. Watch - night processions, which showed no intention of going to bed, filled the streets; and penniless Hodge at the door of the village ale-house heard a rumour, and was glad.

Better times would come now; hard Scarcity and dreary outlook would be no more; the great war was over; and the True Blue had won it.

But the real case was fearfully different. The war just practically ended was a preliminary: it was the first-piece comedietta before the tragedy, and it was put upon the stage by a great actor in order the better to set off his own grandiose strutting and storming. It was the streak of foam which foreruns the tidal-wave.

If ever man had a day of strain and toil it was John Hardy that day; with every breath, his chest wheezed in labour; when he landed at Portsmouth at eleven, his hands hung so heavy that he could hardly stir them. His voice was gone. The sound of thunder still sang in his ears.

Yet, even while preparations were being made for a train to conduct him to London, he wrote, and had sent off, a telegram. It was to the editor of the Times. It said:

Kindly reserve two columns for letter from me for to-morrow. Will let you have manuscript by three a.m.

John Hardy.

At this message Printing-House Square rubbed its tickled hands, and was prone to dance. The editorial head grew dizzy with big anticipation. For copy at that moment from John Hardy, two columns of it, was copy indeed — and gratis! It seemed too exquisite a thing to be true.

‘But what can it be all about?’ wondered the editor.

A thrilling description of the battle!’ suggested an inspired sub.

‘Hardly that, perhaps,’ doubted the Chief.

One of the staff waited in Cavendish Square, which, till far into the morning, was filled by an upper-class crowd. A little before three the Times man drove from Hardy’s door with the precious copy written in pencil; and not till then did Hardy's head drop asleep on the table where he sat; part of the copy he had scribbled in the train with half-closed eyes.

The letter contained no thrilling description of the battle; though it was thrilling enough, too, and made the Times editor rub his eyes in a somewhat unusual way.

Was the letter a stupendous hoax? Or was it a letter the publication of which would lift the Times to a greater pitch of glory than was ever dreamed by human editor in this world before?

The Times man was questioned narrowly. From whom had he received the letter? From Hardy's old butler himself. There could be no mistake.

It appeared next morning, side by side with the detailed description of the battle. And England rubbed its eyes, too, as the Times editor had rubbed his.

Hardy had spoken out clearly, careless, in his belief in the British character, whether he threw the nation into a state of panic or not. He told what was coming; he explained the motive with which the European war had been brought about by Yen How; he told of the massacre, of the action of the Japanese fleet; he showed how there was not even the least possible chance for Europe; how England alone, for a time at least, was sheltered by her sea; and how this was the chance of England to come forward and prove her patriarchal heart, her imperial clemency, her motherhood of the world. He gave his reasons for thinking that the fulfillment of his prophecy was near, impending, about to happen. And he wound up with a series of numbered skeleton recommendations. They were:

1. That the tiny remainder of the British fleet be utilised to seize all the merchant-ships in European ports; and that these ships, together with all the available ships in the British mercantile marine, be employed, with or without the consent of foreign governments or individual owners, in bringing over to England, and in taking to America, and to Africa, such of the inhabitants of Europe as could and would seek shelter in those countries.

2. That America be invited to a League with Britain, having for its object the salvation of the white races, and the extermination of the yellow.

3. That the armies of Britain be at once recalled from the Continent.

4. That the Government at once begin to make all possible provision for the huge increase of population in Britain which would result on the appearance in Europe of the yellow men.

Such were the Times' two-columns, and under the last was the name, John Hardy.

Of the sensation which this letter caused it is impossible to give a real idea, for there is nothing else to which to compare it. By noon copies of the paper were being bought and sold for ten guineas.

At this hour thanksgiving hymns were being sung; and the name of Hardy was being made the text of a thousand sermons.

After the battle of Shoreham, he had been instinctively adopted by the race as its 'darling'; the battle of the Channel made him definitely its hero; his letter made him its Leader.

He was at once elected a member of the Permanent Committee of National Safety.

Not that there was no searching of heart, no doubting, as to this extraordinary letter. To many people it seemed as wild as possible. The proof which Hardy adduced to show that the Yellow Wave was near (if it was coming at all) was his contention that Yen How, having destroyed Europe by the European war, would not be sufficiently silly to wait for Europe to recover herself before his invasion. The argument was sound, if the hypothesis was sound. But where were the signs of his coming? There was an 'if.'

On the whole, however, the nation had learnt to trust him; and trusting him, it stood aghast at his awful message.

At this time, the people of Britain, if they had never been so before, was genuinely a nation, as distinct from a mob. They had suffered keenly together, resolved and acted nobly together: and they had been welded in the furnace-heat. By a Nation we mean a multifold Man. It was remarkable, about this period, how large an amount of attention was attracted by certain badly-spelled letters written to the papers. Each man felt himself verily part of the whole, and 'the government was upon his shoulders.' It was no longer a nation of shopkeepers — it was a nation of Councillors. 'To be made perfect by suffering' is even more true of communities than of individuals. 'Happy,' it is said, 'is the nation which has no history' — but 'nation' in that phrase should be spelled 'crowd.' It is the Marathons and Trafalgars which knit and nationalise. At all events, Britain, now, with her largely decreased population, was certainly knit and nationalised. She could proceed from thought to action almost with the spontaneity of a single brain and arm. In her hand was the sword — but upon her brow sat Deliberation, and the grave air of the Statesman.

This was all the more, and not the less, reason why Hardy's announcements were followed by the wildest dismay, the most unalloyed panic. For Britain, and every Briton, felt that it was England, in the end, who would have to dam the yellow wave, or sink beneath it; that it was she, and she alone, who must needs take up the cross of the world, and, like the Christ of the nations, with many an agony and bloody sweat, redeem mankind.

Whatever else was true or false in Hardy's letter, this, it was clear, was true: that, in the event of the yellow wave, Continental Europe was powerless.

When there would be no eye to pity, and no arm to save, it must, then, be the arm of England which should bring salvation. And was it able...?

There was the fleet of Japan, the fleet of China. And if even there were not the fleet of Japan, neither was there any longer a British fleet at all capable of opposing the landing, even in open boats, of an endless succession of innumerable armies on various parts of the coast.

These reflections at once occurred to every one. And they had the same effect upon the mind, as if it had been scientifically announced that some fatal change was about to occur in the composition of the atmosphere of the earth.

It was felt, of course, that the yellow conquest could not be an ordinary conquest, if it happened at all. There was no question of conqueror and conquered living together afterwards and fraternising, like Norman and Saxon. The yellow conquest meant, naturally, that wherever it passed, the very memory of the white races it encountered would disappear for ever.

At this dark thought the heart quailed; and there was Panic.

And at five o'clock of the day of the Times' two-columns, the Pall Mall Gazette came out with the following:

(From our own correspondent.)

By Anglo-American Cable Co.

New York. — The New York Evening Post publishes to-day the report that a body of Thibetans (?) has seized the Russian railway between Kokand and Krasnovodsk, together with the partially - dismantled fortress at Samarkand, and have finally appeared at the east bank of the Caspian. Their number, probably amounting to ten or fifteen thousand, has not been definitely ascertained. The rumour originates, I understand, from an Evening Post correspondent at Astrakhan, and comes via Odessa and Paris.

This item of news, meagre as it was, was enough for Britain. At once every one jumped at the right conclusion. Here, it was agreed, were ‘the signs of his coming’ — the first!

As when a sudden comet lowers near the earth, terrifying the heart of kings, prophesying Change to the nations, and shaking pestilence from her ‘horrid hair’ — so, with its growing certainty, did the British nation cower at the drear future. Some one rediscovered the telegram about the 500 Chinese at St. Petersburg, and noised it abroad afresh. The bleak and dismal sky lowered darkling.

At twilight the Prime Minister was sitting by John Hardy’s bedside, which two physicians had just left.

CHAPTER XXVII. THE THREE GOSPELS

ABOUT THE TIME when the three important personages met at the inn, in the wood near Liege, Dr. Yen How was deep in study from morning to night. On the table before him, all round his feet, overflowing every article of furniture in the apartment, were maps, general maps, local maps, special maps, survey maps. He had a goodly wide brain, and every village in Europe, its position, its name, its population, and every stream, and fort, and railway, and town, was climbing into that brain, one after the other, with the intention of staying there. And when he was finished he knew how God had made Europe, and how man had made it, and what was in it.

He knew also Asia.

While he was still pondering his maps, China was already far on its march. The seizure of the railway-line by ‘Thibetans’ (?), reported in the Pall Mall Gazette, had taken place four weeks before the news reached New York. The British army of India, afterwards annihilated in Russia, had passed that way, and left an easy task for the yellow pioneers.

Even before this China had begun to flow westward. Yen How had found her a frozen stream; and like a frozen stream when the sun shines strongly, she had moved at last under his steady heat, slowly, in trickling rivulets, long before the crash of the dripping ice and the billowing broad rush of the torrent.

Having waked China by the methods we have described, how did he effect this irresistible Western tendency, so mighty in its impulse at last, that an arm a million times stronger than Yen How's could not have checked it, had he willed?

He did it by preaching, with the inspiration of Confucius, only with a far greater success than Confucius, his three gospels of Greed, of Race, and of Cruelty.

And in doing so, he remembered the density of the skull which he had to inspire with ideas; he was not preaching even to Russian moujiks, but to men slower still of understanding. To plough a fact into their brains he knew that he must plough hard. But he was quite equal to this. With his usual thoroughness he said: 'A hundred ways: and of these one will not fail.' At all events he had chosen the doctrines to teach which the Chinese were most apt to learn, and had, in fact, already been taught by nature. And herein lay his chief wisdom.

Just when the pressure of the new taxation crushed heaviest upon the penurious poor of China, he collected an army of 400,000, composed of men taken from each of the regiments into which all the land of the Mongols was now divided; and this force he hurled in two divisions across the Si-kiang against Annam, the ancient antagonist of China, and Burma. The horrors perpetrated in these atrocious and totally unexpected raids could not be described; a great massacre resulted, and the army amassed hoards of spoil, gathered from many a Buddhist vihdra and jewelled palace - gate. And immediately on its return, the individuals who composed it were redrafted, laden with booty, to their former districts, to spread through every village in China fairy-tales of gore and gold in foreign lands.

There was not, moreover, a drill-sergeant of the remotest squad of conscripts who did not become a missionary of Yen How, preaching for him the three glad tidings of hell.

Many Chinese did not know that there was any other land than China, nor had, till the Massacre, seen a white man, nor known that there were such things as white men.

Now they heard; and the astonished ear was charmed.

Could it be that beyond that land of pinched scarcity which they knew, there was Another, in which feeble, pretty creatures, resembling real men, lived in rose-beds, and threw to one another balls of gold, and made love on couches of eider-down and ivory? And if not, what was this rumour, these tidings of good, coming strangely from afar, this new talk? And this new holiday of blood, and this new drilling, after four thousand years? And this new Movement, and this new stirring of sap in the old, dead tree-trunk after the long long changeless winter? Surely the seasons return! and by wondrous miracle leaves are again on the branches, and all is new! There is, then, Spring and joy in the world? and not utter, ugly woe — four thousand years of age? Gold? — and frail, white limbs to be torn apart? — and the blood of luxurious kings to be quaffed by thirsty Chinamen in carved goblets of alabaster? — and cushions of embroidered silk hanging in plenty for all among the lazy, rotting melons on the far-off trees?

Far into the dreamiest wilds of savage China, Mongolia, Thibet, came this message of blessedness, this New Religion of lust. And every citizen became a convert, and every convert a zealot, and every zealot an apostle.

And the more intolerable Yen How made China for them with burden, and drill, and tax, the louder and deeper swelled their cry to be led forthwith into this promised land of plenty afar.

In the Commentaries of Caesar we read of whole communities packing, as it were, their trunks, leaving their own land, and migrating in a body to some new territory. It was this strange, wandering tendency which now possessed the Mongolian race; but instead of a tribe or community on the march, the stars were to look down and behold a nomad Empire.

This weird and, indeed, awful spectacle destiny had held concealed in her womb; for this, too, was to be one of the acts in the drama of Man; and in the fullness of time it was evolved, and seen.

But no one knew better than Dr. Yen How that the Mongolian race in its passage across the old world would meet with obstacle and pain — the weariness of the march, the day's hunger, the fight in the street, the rain of shot and shell at Metz, and Koenigsberg, and Paris, and Dover; as for the Japanese section of the race, he knew that Greed and Cruelty alone were incentives sufficient to provide a steady impulse to their native firmness and valour; but as for the Continental section of it, he decided to hurl them forward by an added impulse — the excitation of the instinct of Race.

In China this instinct took always a religious form. And hence Yen How had skilfully contrived to invest his Massacre with something of the solemnity of a Rite. In the cities round the coast, where the white man had long been known and abominated, the massacre gave an impetus to racial animus, which perhaps was capable of no further fury; but, in addition, he planned for China on the whole a religious mania in connection with this very race-instinct, which he counted upon to inspire it in the direction he willed with the frenzy of the Crusader.

The religion of China consisted in the worship of the dead; and this worship took the form also of the worship of the living, whenever the living happened to be a reincarnation of the dead. On this point Buddhism and Confucianism were at one: the belief in reincarnation.

The living were reincarnations of the dead when they were either proclaimed to be so by the priests, or when they were proclaimed to be so by the Emperor, or — when they could work miracles.

Now Yen How could work the most astounding miracles; and he was proclaimed by the Emperor, and he was proclaimed all over China by the priests, to be the reincarnation of a dead man. And the dead man of whom he was proclaimed to be the reincarnation was — Confucius.

To begin with, he was made a Saint.

Then (at about the time when John Hardy joined the Englishmen at Kiao-chau) began a remarkable 'triumphant passage through China of this great man and his enormous Court of dignitaries, when, in a grand religious festival lasting by Imperial Decree through a month, Yen How was presented and hailed in temple and at praying-mill, from Peking to Lhasa, as the Heaven-descended Leader of the only Race, come back, according to old promise, to lead them to the conquest and fruition of the world. His progress was attended with more than Imperial pomp; he was raised high on a throne of royal splendour, and exhibited to the muttering and kneeling people: the dazzled eye admitted him a god.

If in some mountain-dell of remotest China there dwelt some benighted peasant who had never yet heard the name of Yen How, the ruler, the driller, the oppressor, there was certainly not one now who did not know of Yen How, the Reincarnate, the bringer of glad tidings, the Head of his People.

Confucius was China; and Yen How was Confucius. He stood for the Race.

Thus did he centre in his own Person the whole race-instinct and race-religion of the land. He associated the new creed of lust with the old of superstition; and of both he was the embodiment and Prophet.

He knew that principles must centre in a Person before they can lead nations by the nose, and fire them to heroism and martyrdom. No stirring Mahomedanism without Mahomet, and no strong Christianity without Christ. But in thus making himself the sole guide and motive-power, the one centre of adoration and trust, to the whole people, he went a step too far; he committed an error in tactics; he did not take into account every contingency.

For if the shepherd chance to perish, what will become of the sheep?

CHAPTER XXVIII. THE YELLOW TERROR

THIS WAS THE very question which John Hardy, with his sure eye for the main fact among ten thousand, asked himself— ‘If the shepherd chance to perish ...?’ At all events, it was the shepherd with which he, personally, had to do. Between him and Yen How was the tug of war; and he knew it.

So, as he lay among his pillows, almost as white as they, a week after the battle in the Channel, he called old Bobbie to him, and said:

‘Bobbie, do you know anything about British regiments and the dress they wear?’

‘Not much, I am afraid, Master John,’ answered Bobbie. ‘Well, then, you will find out, please, and as soon as possible — to-day. I want to know what regiment it is whose privates wear—’ and he frowned in an effort of recollection— ‘wear a scarlet uniform with white facings, and have somewhere about them a Prince of Wales’ plume and a coronet. Yes, that is it. Please find out; and whether they are still in existence, and all about them.’

The old servant bowed and went away. In his eyes now was a perpetual wonder and reproach. The colour and taste of the world were changed to him; some one had meddled with his heart’s delight; Hardy had come back, but the dazed old fellow could not find him.

Hardy was now recovering from an attack of asthma which had brought him near to death. When he opened his eyes to renewed care and thought, he had lost a week. The Chinese were in Europe.

He put out his thin hand and languidly lifted a Times, and he saw the words ‘The Yellow Terror,’ and his hand fell helplessly; and presently he lifted the paper again, and he glanced at another place, and saw the words — ‘It is this scream of the Chinese which seems to inspire their victims with some indefinable new species of terror, never before ...’; and his hand fell again.

But already, by the next morning, he could sit up in bed to drink his cordial, and then he began to study the week’s events. His vitality was in reality intense and tough, and the thread by which he clung to life a strong one. He set to work to gather facts, and he could work stoutly.

While the pile of papers was about him, old Bobbie hobbled into the chamber.

‘This, I think, Master John, is the name of the regiment you want,’ said the old man, handing a slip of paper.

On the paper was written —

‘The Duke of Cambridge’s Own (Middlesex Regiment). Regimental Dist.: No. 57 — Hounslow.’

‘Well, Bobbie, and what about them?’ asked Hardy.

‘The depot of the regiment is Hounslow, Master John; and their late history is this: the first line battalion was in India at the beginning of the year, and the second line battalion was drafted from South Africa to join them a month after the commencement of the war. Both of these, as far as is known, have been destroyed in Russia. The 3rd and 4th (militia) battalions have been fighting in North Germany, and seem to be no longer in existence, except for some few now in hospital at Chelsea, sir.’

‘And have you found out the names of those?’

‘No, Master John.’

‘Then do so at once.’

He went on reading. The details had about them a certain indefiniteness, and they were not voluminous; but he was quickly able to determine that the Chinese avalanche was pouring in four main streams.

The 500 'Chinese' who had come to St. Petersburg 'seeming poor,' and were to be 'sent back to their own country,' were not Chinese at all, but Japanese; and before they could be 'sent back' they had mysteriously scattered, and disappeared in the general mass of Europeans. They were intended to report to Yen How when the moment had come for him, personally, to move forward toward Europe.

The Jehu of that wild four-horse chariot still sat far back in his seat, the reins taut in his hands. The fourfold van of his army was upon Europe, while its rear was still upon Peking. It stretched across the world.

Between those two mighty masses of mountains which, like the ramparts of the New Jerusalem, have locked in the Celestial Empire from contact, or knowledge, or suspicion, of the vague world beyond, they came. The Dead-sea lake, after old ages, was amove, aflow. Through that mysterious land, which the race-venom of the Mongol race have made a third unknown Pole in the midst of the earth, crawled the weird procession, the unbounded caravan. The wild elephant and the mild-eyed zebu saw them with wonder, and the summer monsoon went gadding with the marvelous tidings toward the plain, and over the sea to Africa, gossiping that there above, on the high flat land, was a New Thing moving under the sun. The sources of the Mekong, the Salween, and the Irrawaddy, which only the eye of the couchant tigress and of the yellow man have seen, beheld their week-long passage, and heard the creak of the cart, and the cry of the camel, and the muling of a child at the breast.

They heard also the sudden scream with which the Chinese laughed.

Never was so sloven and pell-mell an army; never so straggling, and lumbering, and clumsy an array; but never a power more eager, and more certain, to reach its goal.

The Friant Division of the French Army, going from Presburg to Austerlitz, once marched forty-five miles a day for two consecutive days. But never a day which did not see this far-spread host sixteen leagues farther towards its aim. They could not be called infantry, though millions, during great part of the way, went on foot; for the armoured carts which Yen How had provisioned, the presence of which spread out the host from continent to continent, were the chief means of locomotion, and continually changed their occupants. There was, moreover, no care for life; if a man was ill, if he dropped out of the march like a bird from the flight, he was left to perish, or to return.

The length of all the units of a single army-corps in column of route was so unlike anything with which we are familiar, that the figures are incapable of conveying any idea of its vastness. If the corps could have marched on a single road its length would have been 1200 miles, that is to say, the length of three Englands; and the entire corps would have taken thirteen days to pass a given point.

This inconceivable worm of humanity contained among its two millions of individuals women incapable of walking a thousand yards, children born since the march began, old men, boys and girls of ten.

Each of these pilgrimaging masses of men was in itself a nation, such as those of which Caesar writes, only probably far vaster. Its members came, nearly all, from the same province, spoke the same dialect, had been impelled forward by the same set of influences, had been drilled by the same captains. Only its officers were, in the main, Japanese; and into the rank and file of each corps had also been drafted thirty thousand Japanese, all men.

At the time when the five hundred scattered at St. Petersburg, and Yen How, immediately afterwards, received from them through Vladivostok and Nagasaki the news that all Europe was ready to receive him — there were already of these nomad nations a hundred and forty on the march.

Some of these hosts (particularly those that passed by the depression of the Jungarie Mountains, along the course of the Irtysh, where the central plateau of Asia finds its Western gate) had need to traverse tracts of desert country, bare of flocks, bare even of forage for mule and camel. Even by these, however, no widespread difficulty as to food and forage was felt. Whole districts of China had been left bare, as though eaten up by human locusts, by the successive corps which, as it were, bore the country away with them.

Already, on the march, the soldiers of Yen How — men who had lived upon skeleton scarcity from birth, at the rate of some fraction of a penny per week — began to taste the luxury of life. Not merely dried vegetables, rice, salt, and tea, he saw squandered around him, but sausages, pressed meats, fresh meats. The administrative convoys and regimental trains, intended for the distribution of supplies to the troops, covered many a mile; the administrative convoys being in four echelons, two half-a-day's march in the rear of the regimental trains, and the other two intended to bring up possible additional supplies from the rear. Auxiliary convoys, also in four echelons, and containing many hundreds of vehicles, took up deposits of rice, biscuits, and hay, made long before the commencement of operations at cantonments which extended to the farthest bounds of Chinese and Thibetan territory. They also carried supplies of preserved meats and forage, and followed the army-corps at a distance of two days' march.

Each individual of an army-corps, besides, was compelled to carry seven pounds of food in some utensil corresponding to a mess-tin or haversack; this to form a reserve not to be touched, except when every other means of supply failed.

During the process of mobilisation, each division of infantry, and each army-corps headquarters, had already vast collections of requisitioned herds of animals, from dogs to camels, sufficient for four days' meat, but intended by the help of other provisions to last for months. On the march the cattle marched between the advanced column and the main body of the column.

It was grand with what smoothness the immeasurable machine slid into motion; there was no confusion; western army-corps marched first, and then the next in order took up the minuet of nomadism, all converging and diverging in, rhythmic involution and evolution, like the harmoniously intertwining currents of a stream, as China began to flow in earnest. In the week; on the day, at the hour that Yen How designed, they moved, they passed away.

Through all that breadth of Thibet between the Himalayas and the Kuen-luns, on a level equal to the height of Mont Blanc, they came pouring and blundering ponderously, fifty army-corps of them, some abreast, separated only by short intervals of twenty, or thirty miles, a hundred millions of them, — and behind each man a pigtail wriggling in haste.

Towards what do they press? What vague blessedness? They do not know. They do not ask. When the Pied Piper played his tune, all the rats of all the cities went gaily in haste after him, entranced, they, too, with wriggling tail, and whiskers cocked, and vaguest prospect. Yen How is the Piper of these prone, purblind, forward-shouldering multitudes of nations — he himself a dancer to Another piping.

Then, again, along the sources of the Irtysh they poured, and, one night, all round the inhospitable steppe-like slopes which surround the lower level of Lake Balkash, there camped another fifty army-corps, some within sight of others, making by far the largest collection of human beings covering a similar area which the stars had yet seen. And the next morning, and during all that day and the next, army-corps after army-corps, they moved, they passed away.

The first (Thibetan) fifty are southern and western tribesmen, used to hard industry, short of stature, their skin a clear yellow, almost of lemon. They are from farthest Taiwan, from Fo-kien to Yun-nan, and from Kwang-tung to Ho-nan; and they pass between the sources of the Yang-tse-kiang and the Mekong, and between the Hwang-ho and the source of the Kia-ling, climbing to the flat roof of the world through colossal forests bordering on everlasting snows, where glaciers and masses of angry water tear and pierce the mountains, forming natural routes through the impassable. By the time they reach the high table-land of many rains and rushing rivers and abounding lakes, they find silent villages and deserted groves of the mulberry. The Thibetans have already passed away. And on through the stripped and empty land they go, shouldering and trundling — a hundred millions — and behind each man wriggles a pigtail in haste.

Then, by the caravan - route which passes from Peking through the Gobi desert north of the Southern Altai, pass the second (Balkash) fifty. They are Kobdoans, North-western Mongolians (so-called), and tribesmen of the Chinese provinces north of the Hwang-ho (Except those of Kan-su, Shen-si, and Pechili); men of a duskier yellow, as of weak-tea-and-milk, tall, and nomads already by instinct and habit, not averse to a further house-flitting — in plenty of company! And these pass the sources of the Irtysh to Balkash, and thence go swarming down into the lowlands and desert places round the Aral Sea, where Russia had so sweated and striven in vain. Across the Caspian they will follow at the right hour the pioneering (Thibetan) fifty.

Then there are ten corps (the smallest of the four great branches), which, one by one, take the caravan-route passing from Pekin north of the bleak and bare Kuen-luns through all that rich agricultural region — an oasis in a land of barrenness — which is traversed by the Tarim river, beginning at Lob Nor, and ending beyond Kashgar. They are from the teeming provinces of Kan-su and Shen-si — twenty millions — behind each man wriggles a pigtail in haste.

But the fourth main branch — Pechili, Korea, Kirin, Manchuria, Eastern Mongolia — tarry long behind; for these are to travel swiftly, and in luxury — in Western-civilisation railway-trains! Not till the last moment before mobilisation is the Russian garrison at Vladivostok shelled by Japanese ships, and Vladivostok itself seized from land by Chinese soldiers. From Vladivostok runs a railway to St. Petersburg; and outside Vladivostok harbour, while the shelling of the forts is proceeding, waits a fleet of merchant-ships crowded with many thousands of large-grade railway-carriages, such as are required by the Russian lines, manufactured all at Nagasaki. And so to Vladivostok come the thirty Western corps, the sixty millions, the fourth great torrent of that disemboguing Nile. And as the crowded train moves out westward from the station, a shocking shrill scream of glee and terror from two thousand throats — the shrill glee and terror of a child in its first swing — fills all the air. It is ‘the Chinese scream.’

But how great a general is that little doctor! This large matter of his, which would have bewildered, and abashed the genius of Caesar, is all clearly perceived and calculated in his intellect of ice. When he thinks of the world-magnitude of it all, he says ‘Poh!’ To God the world is a grain of dust; to Yen How it is a geographical globe: he metes it with a compass; in a moment he walks about it With what ease and thoroughness has his first thought — that thought which could have occurred only to genius — been realised! By a few scratches of his pen Europe has been prepared to receive him. 1 There will be no more Maxims there’ he had said to the Marquis Ito with screwed-up eyes; and there are no more Maxims there, or none worth mentioning. To lead one’s troops ‘along the line of least resistance’ — that being the first maxim of the general, how great a general is this Yen in first of all creating a line of no resistance along which to lead 1

But to guide that restive, rearing four-horse chariot even over the levellest plain, — how iron-strong must be the wrist of its Jehu, and how sublime his gallant callousness!

This was his general plan: to connect himself telegraphically with his armies, and personally to direct their actions even in minute particulars. For the peculiarity of these monstrous hosts was this: that by means of their unimaginable numbers they could, almost without effort, carry out works in a day which no other army could dream of ever accomplishing at all. Thus, the fifty Thibetan corps crossed the Caspian from Krasnovodsk to Baku, with its carts, transport, and stores, on huge towed rafts constructed within two days from materials which they carried with them. So also, wherever the first three great branches passed, they were followed by as many lines of telegraph as there were corps, just as the spider is followed by the thread it spins. And in the centre of this web sat Yen How at Pekin.

Such was the general plan. His particular plan was this: that the first line of Europe’s defence should be Germany; for with exact foresight he calculated, some months before the battle in the Channel, that, in almost any case, Germany would still have left some of her army-corps. Russia he meant to take by surprise; the Balkan Peninsula by surprise; and both, he calculated, would be incapable of serious opposition.

Into Russia he would pour the sixty millions who went screaming along the Vladivostok railway; into the Balkan Peninsula sixteen millions of the first (Thibetan) hundred millions. The remaining eighty-four millions of these were to be German, Swiss, and Austrian. The two other branches, numbering altogether a hundred and twenty millions, were to be divided into thirty French, twenty Italian, ten Norwegian and Swedish; and because Holland and Belgium had not been directly ravaged by the war, and Spain only by the American war, he designed for Spain the large number of thirty millions, and for Holland, Belgium, and Denmark thirty millions.

And at Pekin Yen How might very well have remained, and directed all this with absolute exactness and success, were it not that, at the back of the man's brain, there lay this singular thought: that none of the women of England must be killed! — till he gave the word. And he knew well that no earthly power, save his own strong, present, personal grip, could restrain his wild hordes, fresh from the gleeful slaughter of Europe, from washing their hands in the blood of every human female in Britain.

Therefore he took train at Vladivostok.

The difference between him and Hardy was chiefly this: that with the race-instinct and race-hatred and race-ambition of the Chinaman was mixed a personal, private motive, stronger even than the race-motive. Hardy, like the very greatest, was concerned only for the world.

It is written in the book of the Law of the Universe that selfishness shall sooner or later be a source of weakness. Whoever denies this has not gone deep.

The difference between Hardy and Yen How was the difference between Wellington and Napoleon. The latter, being more richly endowed, should have been the stronger — and was not.

At the time when Yen How took train there was no longer any country corresponding to what was meant when one said ‘Russia.’

As soon as the first contingent of the first army-corps passed through the Urals north of Mount Iremel, its first care was to destroy all telegraphic communication between the locality and western centres. Up to this moment not even a suspicion of what was coming had occurred to any one on the Continent, for it was not till the day after the first arrival of Chinese that the two British forces in France and Germany received homeward orders.

On the very day of their arrival, the final battle had been fought in France near Bar-sur-Seine with a French loss of eighteen thousand; and on the same day the Emperor Wilhelm, rashly advancing with his staff and an insignificant reconnoitring party too near the British lines at Landsberg, was surprised by a troop of mounted vedettes, and taken prisoner.

But when, on the next day, Lord Roberts invited General Daubisson to a conference, and Sir Evelyn Wood invited the freely-liberated Kaiser, the announcements by the two British generals of their intention of immediate withdrawal, and of its cause, was received with mere amazed incredulity. The blow of the thunderbolt was stupefying. The Continental leaders did not fall to their knees and beseech the aid of their British invaders; there are tidings too large to find for themselves room in the brain.

But even while the two conferences were proceeding, what was to become known as the ‘Yellow Terror’ was already abroad — and fifty thousand Chinese had settled in fifteen or twenty Ural villages, whose streets were strewn with disembowelled dead.

And almost as fast as the news could spread westward the Chinese spread westward also.

It was the strangest army of occupation. As soon as an army-corps entered upon Russian territory it scattered and vanished; it split up into divisions, and one division went one way and one another; and divisions split up into brigades, and one brigade went one way and one another; and so the subdivision went on, every regiment, every company, having its town or village allotted to it by long-previous design. By the time the first contingents of the second corps had crossed the Volga at Syzran, there were probably not a thousand Russians left alive anywhere between Perm and Astrakhan.

There was no fighting. Those that could fly or hide, fled or hid. The rest heard the 'Chinese scream,' and died. For every one that died two screams went to Heaven — the scream of the victim and the scream of his slayer.

Then spread 'the yellow terror' — at first slowly, then with the wings of the lightning.

In old Saxon times mothers frightened their crying babes with the swiftly-whispered words: 'The Danes are coming!' But the panic horror with which Europe in a few days learned to receive the simple announcement: 'The Chinese are coming!' had no resemblance, in its unutterable awesomeness, in its supernatural affright, to any previous terror experienced by men.

The Black Death of the Middle Ages, which nearly altogether emptied Europe, inspired no doubt an equal tragic suggestion; but it probably failed in something of that staring, pallid, dry-throated panic characteristic of the Yellow Terror, chiefly on account of the element of the unknown and wholly novel in the Chinese cataclysm, — on account, also, of the certainty of his doom which pierced the heart of each European, — and on account, thirdly, of certain hints of unutterable horror which accompanied the rumours of the onward sweep of the yellow wave.

The reign of hell which had followed upon some Japanese victories during the Chino-Japanese war was well known in Europe. If China had fared so at the hand of Japan, how would Europe fare at the hand of China led by Japan...?

Lamentation and a voice in Ramah, and a widening, running shriek, swelling into a cry of such volume and intensity as had never yet risen from earth to the throne of Heaven, marked the middle of the month of September in Europe.

Then came to pass, even to the utmost, that vision in the Apocalypse of the poet: 'Woe, woe to the inhabitants of the earth ...'

Among the millions that rushed westward in plague-stricken panic and frenzied selfishness was the famous duellist Edrapol, who happened to be then at Cracow.

He made straight for Paris; and on arriving at the hotel in the Avenue Wagram where he always stayed, he found awaiting him this letter: —

Sir,

— As I promised you, I am writing to seek you out for the purpose of the little duel to which you challenged me, the European war being now at an end. I confess to you that this duel of yours and mine seems to me a very absurd thing; but still, a bargain is a bargain. I am in a low state of health at present, and quite unable to come to you, even if I knew where you are to be found. But I write instead, so as to be able to say I did not altogether break my word, and am getting the letter to you at considerable personal trouble. I hope you will receive it, and send me, when you can, a reply.

I am, sir,

Your servant,

John Hardy.

CHAPTER XXIX. THE WEAK POINT

DURING THE FIRST part of that memorable Week of accountable, yet strange, Night, when the darkened sun and the quaking crust of the earth seemed to the affrighted imagination of men surely to portend the coming of the great and dreadful day of the wrath of God, John Hardy's agents were hot on the trail of the young woman whom he sought.

Three weeks previously, the old butler had brought him a list of the men left in hospital of the Duke of Cambridge's Own regiment, and as Hardy's eye ran down the list, he saw a name which he had heard, which was on the tip of his memory, yet which he had been unable to remember. His eye lit up at the sight of it. It was the name of the soldier John Brabant.

There was nothing miraculous in the fact that Brabant still lived; yet to Hardy it seemed nothing less than a genuine miracle. Faith in the Divine formed the groundwork and rock-bed of his simple nature: and his eye continually searched for, and assumed, the stealthy, busy Finger.

A day afterwards he was able to leave his bed, and at once he hurried, muffled up, in a close carriage, to the Chelsea Hospital, and the bedside of Brabant.

Brabant, as it happened, was dying from exhaustion as the result of an amputation, and did, in fact, die a few days later. He was, however, able to give the address of the villa at which the girl Seward had been, or was still (for he was not sure), a servant.

To Hardy, the one thing of paramount interest in the world seemed to be to have this girl, whose initials he bore branded on his breast, secure in his own keeping. He had the instinct to lock her away in some castle of absolute safety, and feed her every hour with his own hands, lest chance or change should befall her.

That, at a time when the earth was travailing in death-birth, all should depend, one way or the other, upon a London servant-girl, was wondrously like the way of Life. Things happen so — not ‘with vigour and rigour,’ as Mr. Matthew Arnold very well says, but in that fast-and-loose fashion. When fate is not freakish, she is unlike herself. The unprecedented is the natural, and may be counted upon. Destiny is full of novelties.

That a nerve in this particular girl should set a nerve in Yen How a-tingling, and that Yen How’s tingling, spreading out beyond all limit into transcendental rapture, should infect a whole planet with tingling, — this was nothing more than the launching of a battleship by the pressure of an electric button, or the loosening of an avalanche by the rolling of a pebble. In such surprises both Fate and Nature abound.

But Ada Seward was no longer at the Pattison villa; all the information which could be gathered there was the fact that she had a brother, a bicycle-smith, residing in Church Road, Chelsea, to whom she may have gone after suddenly leaving the Pattisons. But the brother declared that she was not there; and either he could not, or would not, give any further details about Ada to the agents employed by Hardy.

It became clear that about the girl and her movements hung some sort of mystery; that something was being concealed with regard to her.

Hardy commenced to seek her throughout England, advertising in every paper, and setting to work the best detectives.

If she were abroad? If she were dead? And if Yen How knew it — had secret means of knowing it? In that case Hardy had no hope.

He remained in a state of brooding, morbid pensiveness. At night he sat long at table after dinner, drinking much too freely, his right hand on the mouth of the decanter, his left hanging heavy, his head sunk. In this way three weeks * passed; and still the girl remained hidden.

Then came the memorable Week of Darkness.

At this time the wild flood of migration from the Continent was in full sweep. England had risen nobly to Hardy's summons to offer herself as the City of Refuge to the ill-fated peoples of Europe, and had opened to them a large and pitying bosom, as a mother folds her terrified child.

The merchant marines of all the still unswamped nations, with the whole available merchant marine of Britain, were engaged in the continual task of deportation.

But like 'the pious pelican' which feeds her young with the blood of her own torn breast, England fed the stranger with her life.

The famine grew sore in the land, even though the self-governing colonies, at the first warning of the facts, set stoutly to work to meet the demands upon their feeding powers.

In Britain itself, quite suddenly, there sprang into being the visible germs of a real Socialism. The necessities of the human race no longer admitted of quibbling and compromise with the root facts of life and the root laws of God. It had been the custom before the war to say, in a phrase so generally accepted that it had passed into an axiom, that England could not feed herself' The wild fancifulness of this assertion (which might bring a smile to the lips of even a child who seriously thinks of it) may be seen from the arithmetical fact that England (or any ordinary piece of land of similar size) can feed, not only herself, but almost the entire population of the globe — under right and natural conditions of life. For if a man, or a child, unhampered by artificial customs, will set to work with a spade and a hoe upon the ground, it is a fact that a very small piece of fertile land — something like the tenth of an acre — will supply him not only with food to keep him continually munching, but with so much more than he can eat himself, that he shall have enough left over to give in exchange to some one else who has spent his time in making boots and clothes, and wishes to sell these in exchange for the surplus corn or carrots grown by the first man. Now, on the broad bosom of Britain, which is not niggardly, but rich in alimentary bounty, there are 790,000,000 of such pieces of land; and 790,000,000 is much the larger portion of the population of the earth.

England, therefore, if she be properly governed, can quite surely feed not only herself, but the rest of mankind as well.

This had been the ‘open secret’ of social life, preached through many a century by the single-eyed great ones — with their simple and discerning wit! But it needed nothing less than the inexorable compulsion of Destiny to teach it clearly, once and for all, to the whole race.

Meantime, in the absence of regulations, which involve time for their accomplishment, the rich men, and the not-poor men, of Britain came nobly forward with proffered purse to the perishing millions.

But from the West, from across the Atlantic, there came to Britain a shock almost as horrifying as the vague rumours of the reign of Hell then going forward eastward on the Continent.

America, crowded with ten thousand Christian churches, refused to receive the fugitives from Europe.

This shocking inhumanity had for its excuse an objection to be swamped by ‘a pauper immigration.’

England, now the one great Mother of the world, pondered this thing in her heart — and never forgave it.

Hardy’s proposal of a League between Britain and the United States had ended in a fiasco. An attempt had at once been made by the British Government to carry the proposal into effect. America had accepted the idea; but as soon as it came to a question of detail, of the making of sacrifices, Mammon, 'the least erect' of all the spirits, drew back into selfish aloofness.

Meanwhile the only possible defensive measure against the Yellow Wave on the part of England was an intense activity at Chiswick, at Jarrow, at Chatham, at Birkenhead, at Sheerness, at Portsmouth, at Paisley, at Glasgow, at Newcastle, at Pembroke, at Sunderland, in every Government, in every private, dockyard. Thousands of men were requisitioned from remotely allied trades to aid in the agonised work of building, building, building. But Hardy, for one, smiled at the idea that Yen How was going to be simple enough to allow Britain time to build ships to beat him.

He, for his part, had set going another activity, equally eager, and more to the point.

By direct suggestion to the First Lord of the Admiralty, he had singled out the men of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers as the nucleus of force which must now become the hope of Britain.

Though there was hardly any longer a Royal Naval body of men, there still remained a Royal Naval Reserve in considerable numbers; when therefore Hardy designated the Artillery Volunteers, Mr. Goschen, who alone was in the secret of his plans, expressed surprise.

Hardy, however, persisted; and the next day, by proclamation, the members of the force were requisitioned for service. At the same time a large additional number of volunteers sent in their names to the commanding officers of the stationary drill-ships.

The members of this force, which had always, since its formation by special Act in 1873, formed one of the most exclusive clubs in the world, consisted only of professional and business men, — doctors, bank-clerks, solicitors, stockbrokers, authors, — who had regularly left the desk, or the consulting-room, or the office, to attend at least twice a month at gun, rifle, pistol, and cutlass drill, until they attained the standard of 'efficients', — men who had cast off the orchided frock coat, completely sinking their social position, to put on the blue working-dress of the simple blue-jacket on the yearly cruises in the gunboat, or the Saturday-to-Monday cruise in the seamanship-practice schooner. These men, belonging exclusively to the great middle class, represented the very essence of the mood of England. And it was with them alone that Hardy proposed to set up the first, and perhaps the last, dam to the flowing Yellow Wave.

He wanted 4000 of them; and he got them.

The various drill-ships of the local brigades were assembled at Portsmouth with tenders, and the work of drilling and instruction went forward with unremitting zeal, the 4000 and odd gentlemen who composed this strange force subjecting themselves to the most grinding discipline, sleeping in hammocks, swabbing decks, cooking food, and cleaning guns; opening, above all, their already trained minds to the art of fighting on moving water.

But when they asked one another why they were doing all this, there was no forthcoming answer. There certainly were the men, but where were the ships?

Hardy, in his jealousy lest his ships might be used for purposes at all other than those for which he designed them, had kept his secret well. They were to him like buried gold to the miser. He gloated over the thought of them, over the loud bad language he would make them talk, when that great hour came.

Meantime, he sat brooding often, sometimes desperately ill, sometimes with his hand resting for hours on the mouth of the decanter, his sunken head crowded with the busy fumes of wine.

And as he sat so one night — it was the Tuesday of the Week of Darkness — something spurred within him, and he sprang to his feet, and took his cap, and went out into the stifling dark air.

His once gentle heart, though embittered and desperate, was not wholly dead. Under this sudden impulse, wine-inspired, he jumped into a cab and drove to Hampstead.

He stopped at the door of Miss Jay. He had now been several weeks in England, yet had not seen her. Why he now went he did not ask himself: some vague motive worked in him to insult, or press, or smite her in the face, — such was the tragic desperation of his empty and callous heart. Love, tenderness, were far from him now; yet in the depths of his nature some ungovernable cry in the dark, some fierce yearning perhaps, spurred him toward the sister of his soul: such subterranean throes occur in the dim places of the hearts of men.

Her carriage drove up to the door as he entered it, and he found her in evening dress in the drawing-room, cutting the leaves of a book. War, and eclipse, and the overthrow of the world, seemed to leave untouched the reposeful tenor of this very modern young lady's life.

Here was the 'morgue Britannique' in its very ultimate demonstration.

'You are well again, then, Mr. Hardy?' she said, giving her hand, 'I am so glad!'

'Well or not, I am come to see you, you see.'

He threw his cap one way and himself another, and looked gloomily at her.

She, for her part, was shocked — at his aged eyes, his wild aspect, the quite visible gray in his hair. Now, at least, she recognised a grown man, and a master of men.

For minutes of inward reflection there was silence between them. He said:

‘I told you I would come again, and come I am.’

Her heart bounded. She answered:

‘Yes.’

‘Have you got over all that about Art?’ This he asked with a momentary gentle smile.

‘No — not got over it’ — the irony in her leaping up, and smothering the pity: ‘not yet. A weakness of that sort clings so to one. In the absence of a sun, one works by lamp-light — which is all that remains.’

‘Well, I see you are still a mocker. But one cannot always go on mocking.’

‘No, no. I do not mean, really, to mock at anything. In reality, I am very sorry, and sad, at everything.’

‘Is that so?’

‘Yes.’

‘Well, I believe that, too. At bottom you are good and kind.’

‘I hope so.’

‘That was why I came to see you, now. God only knows why I came. You ought to have married me when I told you.’

‘Oh, as to that—’ she said.

‘No, no, do not begin that again!’ he retorted fretfully. ‘Can’t you guess that I am changed in mood, and everything? All that is not for me any more.’

Somehow her heart sank; and the sadness of autumnal winds sighing among dead leaves smote its chords. So wild a pity is in the world, and so bitter a sob.

She said:

‘I can see that you are changed, yes; and I divine that you are far from happy. What has been the matter?’

‘Why should I tell you?’

‘There is no reason in the world, Mr. Hardy.’

‘You see, that is the way you talk to me!’ he said, regarding her fixedly under his eyes: ‘soon, when I am gone, you will be saying to yourself, “Well, it was bitter of me not to love and comfort poor John Hardy in his misery.”’

‘Gone?’ she questioned,—‘gone, where to?’

‘Gone to God’ — and in a lower tone—‘gone to hell.’

And now she rose, and in haste went to sit beside him. And the pity of ministering angels was in her voice.

‘Tell me,’ she said, ‘for you have come to me feeling that I am your good friend, and you should tell me.’

‘Ah, it is nothing,’ he said, and he flung himself backward on the sofa where he sat.

‘It must be very much since it has affected you so. I heard something ... but did not quite realise it. You should — you should have come before.’

Come for what? I tell you it is no good at all any more!’

‘But you are too — too despondent. See — you say you want my love and comfort — there is my hand in yours, my friend. If you do not tell me your trouble, that will mean to me that you do not — really — care for me.’

‘Ah, I did, though! I did!’

‘And do — or you would not come. Can’t you see that? You do still. So you must open your heart to your friend.’

He looked into her eyes, and they swam in tears. His head lying back on the sofa-back rolled from side to side.

‘You are a good, kind girl,’ he said, ‘and I knew that long ago. I had a kind of power to guess everything that was in you. Why did you not — but it is useless talking now. Let me go away.’

‘No, no — do not say that.’

‘Well, now, I call you wondrously good.’

‘Of course I am — of course. Can’t you divine? I — naturally — do not wish you to go. You look so sad — so worn with suffering. Why is that? How is it? Ah! I am so — I could not tell you. But you — tell me, for I beg you, all your trouble.’

‘Well, well ... But to what end?’

‘Because I ask you; and because I feel that it will do you good to tell me.’

She ought to have said, ‘Because it will redeem you, and save you to tell me’ for that was the truth.

And, indeed, an impulse did then rise in John Hardy to tell to her at least that history which he was hoarding and hugging venomously in his breast, which he had breathed to no living soul, save in one short sentence, to old Bobbie Mason; the history of those long tortures — how the scream of a cat had been rent from his twisting and beastilised soul — how he had cursed the deaf ears of God — how, now, his poor nerves, tingling in a chaos of jangling dissonance, like the wires of some shattered instrument of music, represented all the universe to him as a mere black nightmare crowded with sighing winds and unutterable, dismal shapes of woe — how, above all, his passion for vengeance had settled within him into the cruel and wicked malice of a fiend.

He had the impulse to tell it all out, and save his soul; and he said:

« Well — I will tell you — if your ears can bear it. You know, do you not, that I went to China — but no, no, no! I am not a child, Miss Jay! do let me get away — !’

And suddenly he had snatched his hand, had sprung up, and was gone almost before the cry had leapt her lips.

And she, for a long time, sat staring vacantly at the floor, and did not go out that evening.

During that (Tuesday) night, the Japanese fleet, just arrived in Europe, appeared in twos and threes along the southeast coast. On Wednesday morning, England heard the news that Hastings, Brighton, Worthing, and so on to Bognor, had been reduced to heaps of broken stone, some seven hundred people having been killed. None of the muzzle-loading district coast-defence ironclads had been left afloat.

That was on the Tuesday. On the Wednesday evening Hardy received a small wooden box, bearing the direction: ‘John Hardy, England.’ It bore no stamps, and had evidently been brought from its origin ‘by hand.’

On opening it, he found a quantity of paper stuffing; and, this being removed, a dry and shrivelled, but still evil-smelling object, upon which had been stuck a small oblong piece of paper. On the paper were three lines of tiny, neat writing; and the words written were these:

‘From Yen How to John Hardy.

Heart of His Royal Highness Prince Heinrich of Hesse.’

Prince Heinrich of Hesse, as Hardy knew, was a young child of eight.

Even while Hardy sat contemplating this object, a private detective was ushered into his presence. He came to say that, at last, by means of a confession of her brother, he had been able to trace the whereabouts of the girl Seward.

CHAPTER XXX. THE CHINESE SCREAM

THE FRENCH INVASION was twofold, one-quarter of the Italian Chinese crossing into the Gulf of Lyons to Cette by towed floats, and so along the canal from Cette, across the narrow part of France, to where the canal meets the Garonne near La Reole, and thence to the Gironde and the Biscay coast. This horde, with half the French horde proper, making altogether twenty millions, were to be British.

So it happened that, while the French horde proper were pouring through Belgium by Verviers, Liège, Namur, and Charleroi, pressing towards the practically unfortified northern frontier of France between Maubeuge and Rocroy, at Hirson, five million Italian Chinese had already decimated the western sea-board, and had been organised into stores - collecting, and barge, raft, lighter, and tug-collecting and constructing brigades.

All behind these two invading hordes, what resistance there had been was over, with the exception of some half-dozen detached strongholds, whose garrisons were gradually yielding to famine; and everywhere to the east and north of France, again with some exceptions, was the unsparing pigtail. These exceptions were Hungary, Turkey, Lapland, Finland. For in Europe the Mongolian invaders found some twenty-seven millions of Mongolian inhabitants already there, and it was one of the purposes of that great inventor and consummate statesman, Yen How, that these should be left alive to form (the Hungarians especially) the nucleus of a new civilisation, which was to be neither like the old Western, nor like the old

Eastern, and like nothing in the world save something which he, Yen, had quite definitely mapped out in his own wide space of brain.

The western sweep of the Yellow Wave had, in fact, been slightly swelled by some hundreds of thousands of European Turks and Magyars.

Near Charleroi was made what was practically the last battle-field stand of Continental Europe. The Elysée, with rash pride, had issued a manifesto to the people of France, inviting all who could not fly to give in their names as fighters at bureaux established in various quarters of various cities. To this call 200,000 French youths and old men responded, and an untrained army, of which the last residues of the Reserve of the Territorial Army formed the nucleus, set forth to hurl themselves upon the infinite.

It was computed that each fighting European destroyed, one way and another, thirty yellow men. But could the arm of each, dead-weary of slaughter, have destroyed three hundred, or three thousand, still the effort would have been wasted. Over the carcasses of a thousand dead straggled a million living. To shoot the vagabond Atlantic with cannon is a mockery of one's self.

The garrison of Paris remained; but the occupation of the French capital, supposed to be impossible to any other army, was, though bloody in its accomplishment, not extremely difficult to this.

A corps and a half, making nearly twice the number which, in its palmiest days, had inhabited the city of light and joy, sat down along the northern valley of the Seine, their lines occupying a length from the Achères-Poissy railway-line to the Forêt de Bondy, well beyond that outer ceinture of fortifications composed of great strongholds such as Corneilles, Franconville, Cotillons, Montmorency, Domon.

The first care of the besiegers was to isolate the city; and in every direction, during one- night, all the lines of railway radiating from the centre were blown up along a distance of some score of yards.

Then at once, with light siege train, a brigade was thrown forward, and an attack begun upon St Germain-en-Laye.

Precisely what was the thought of the French general, what his ultimate hope, in making his determined resistance is not known. But a determined resistance he did make. Such had always been the splendid desperation, the tragic pride, of France.

The Chinese, on their part, might very well have drawn lines round the entire outer ceinture, and waited there till all the cats and dogs of Paris and its villages had been eaten; but this no longer suited their mood. The yellow man in his senses is, indeed, afraid of cannon. But the entire race was by this time no longer in its senses; here was a people dancing mad, gorged with gore, flushed with victory, greedy of agonies. Fear they no longer knew. To celebrate for ever a jubilee of devils in a scarlet world — to raise ever higher monuments built of human corpses, and shriek and dance around them — to live, to roll, to die in red — this was their sole remaining instinct.

General Saussier, sitting at St. Cloud with his staff, received telephonic message from St. Germain:

‘Chinese are being mown down by thousands, but still they come.’

And half an hour later by telegraphic click-clack from the mighty seven-battery Fort de Marly:

‘Strong assault by Chinese. No. 2 redoubt carried by gangways and scaling-ladders in teeth of guns. Loss of enemy immeasurable.’

And an hour later from St. Cyr:

‘Chinese now swarming over glacis. Battery in rear carried. Ammunition cannot, I fear—’

No more. So southward and eastward spread the tale of huge carnage, of steady, rapid advance. By nightfall of the first day of siege, St. Germain, Marly, St. Cyr, Versailles, Chatillon, had fallen.

It was on the next morning, at the hour when the sun should have been seen to rise, that men were first startled by a continuance of the darkness of the night.

The secret of this phenomenon was, of course, unknown at the time. In England, presently, it was given out by the scientists that some monstrous thing had happened, probably in some region of the South Sea — some unparalleled passion of Nature — which had poured over the earth in inconceivable mass its scoriae and tufaceous particles and multiform volcanic ashes, darkening the day. That some new properties were present in the atmosphere could not be doubted; for at the same time an intolerable oppression settled upon the chest, and, perhaps by reflex action, down sank the spirits of men; the minds of the children assumed the garb of crape and sackcloth which the Mother had put on; and an awe, and a charnel horror, and a fear, such as the heart had never yet known, gripped it now.

In England, it may be presumed, this unutterable pall of gloom lay much less heavily upon the imagination; for here the Chinese and their reign of terror were a mere inconceivable nightmare, not a present fact. But in England, too, the universal nerve felt the strangeness and the thrill of that ghastly obscurity.

It was ghastly because it was not complete. Utter gloom would have been more tolerable. Towards noon, during all the week, the sun was not wholly hidden, but appeared as a garish blotch of leprous lavender, giving nothing that could be called light, making only the darkness visible; while, as if to vie in chromatic hideousness, the moon appeared one night for an hour as a black eye-socket, with a rim of pallid green; and then disappeared.

The sickly gloom of the daytime was just sufficiently relieved to enable near objects to be discerned by the troubled eyes, while distances were lost in unrelieved blackness.

The event at Timor, by which the entire island was destroyed, was of so extraordinary a character that positively the whole planet, with the exception of some parts of America, may be said to have been infected by the catastrophe. Nagasaki disappeared, with many of the inland towns of Japan; a tidal wave inundated a large tract of the Kimberley district of Australia; Vesuvius plumed her cones with a rufous fume of lurider red; and old Etna, purring and stuttering her thunders, broke into strange and gruff garrulity. Over Europe, from the Mull of Oe to the Urals, there was an almost continuous, just perceptible quaking of the ground, which nowhere broke into violence, nowhere did damage, yet was remarkable for its menacing continuity, its unparalleled universality.

Not a breath stirred the air.

If beneath such a sky and upon such a quaking earth we could really conceive the 'Chinese scream,' we should then really understand the speedy delirious deaths of the few successful fugitives from Europe during that week of apocalyptic woes.

At Auxonne, in the Place d'Armes, where there stands a statue of Napoleon I., the whole remaining population assembled on the irruption of the yellow man, almost filling the open space, and fell to their knees with clasped hands, waiting. They only knew the nearness of the Chinese (who always and everywhere ran noiselessly, barefooted, or in soft shoes), when the sudden Chinese scream at the glimpse of the crowded victims burst upon their ears.

One of the terrors of this massacre, and of others, was the uncertainty as to which sort of death any given victim might die; one of the horrors was, that whatever death a Chinaman inflicted, he loudly imitated with his lips, in an instinctive way, the nature of the death. They came pelting in their swinging run, into the Place at Auxonne, and as one lifted a club to smite a head, he screamed inarticulately; and as the club fell, he cried ‘Shrash!’ And as another caught a flying child by the heels, he screamed inarticulately; and as he swung the frail skull against the base of the statue, he cried, ‘Pop!’ And as another aimed his pistol at a near man, he screamed inarticulately; and as the pistol went off, he cried ‘Bam!’ And as another seized a woman from behind by her hair, he screamed inarticulately: and as he danced and jumped upon her spouting abdomen, he cried ‘Wash!’

A very large proportion of the populations of Europe had been absolutely unable to fly: many had not had time, when the Chinese were upon them; many, with infinite effort, had reached the coast to find no craft there to bear them away. Roughly speaking, about one-half, calling upon the rocks and hills to cover them, remained; many, as at Auxonne, shut up in fortified towns. For a time the darkness of day and night enabled many to hide about the country; but it is doubtful if any considerable number could have owed a final escape to this means.

At Epemay, half a regiment having entered the town toward night — though between day and night there was small distinction now — went marauding with flaring torches into every house, searching for victims and finding few. The streets were empty — the inhabitants had vanished. In this surprising famine of blood the baulked hordes poked furiously about, like tigresses robbed of their young. At last, a party, ferreting around the entrance of M. Moet’s cellars, discovered the subterranean excavation which extends in vast vaults some nine miles through the chalky rock of this region. Hither for the most part the doomed people, in unreflecting panic, had rushed, as into the last hole left on earth to cover them; and here like rats in a trap they were caught. With thrilling screams the Chinese, at the signal, ran swinging from their scattered search about the town, toward Moet's in the main street. It had been drizzling all the day, and their feet were dabbled to the knees with the soft clay of the neighbouring hill of Montigny, of which was made the Epernay earthenware; so that within an hour the long ramifications of the ransacked excavations were a mere filth of dabbled gore and mud. The vaults, moreover, contained several millions of bottles with from four to five thousand pipes of the best champagne; and here at this depth of forty feet below the streets, in the midst of this gloom relieved by rare lurid flares, there was transacted so red an orgy of massacre, screaming lust, and sighing drunkenness, so mixed a drama of filthy infamy and sabbatic Satanism, as earth, and perhaps hell, never saw. In the matter of crime the yellow man is ingenious; what we cannot conceive, he can do; so that where we end he begins, his natural talent being for the grotesque and the macabre. And when the orgy grew still for very surfeit, when there welled from him the sigh of perfect peace, down dropped his head upon its pillow of flesh, and his snoring breath fanned the hair of the naked dead.

Simultaneously, the other wine-vaults of Epernay were invaded; and, above, too, the streets were strewn with dead and drunken. The town was burned down before the night was over, some thousands of Chinamen perishing in the flames.

As for the Parisian corps and a half, fort after fort of the outer ceinture glutted their monstrous batteries with carnage, and yielded. At Meudon two gallant companies of chasseurs d pied flung themselves down an escarpment to hurl back an assault with scaling-ladders; they hurled back the assault, and were literally trampled under foot by the swarm of on-coming multitudes. Then it was the turn of Mont Valerien. Bouviers fell, de

Buc, Bois d'Arcis. At Satory every siege-gun of the Japanese was uncarriaged, and the fort was only taken by the sheer powerlessness of the great guns any longer to keep range with their mangled rifling. Issy fell. At Chatillon the whole stock of ammunition was exhausted in slaughter. Vanves fell, Ivry fell, Montrouge fell. Nearer and nearer closed in the inevitable crowding circle. The Chinese were at St. Cloud, at Putoux, at Suresnes, and at Sèvres.

Even while the war was raging round southern forts they came screaming through the Porte de St Cloud, and went swarming into the Bois up the Alle de Longchamp, making for the Porte Maillot which gives direct access to the city. The iron-barred gate was closed, and the foremost, pressed forward by the now disorganised mob behind, fainted and perished in the block. Still onward surged the crowd, trampling itself in frantic, blind rage into a ghastliness of heaped-up death, while the gendarmerie which lined the walls sent whistling gusts of lead through the trees upon the ever-advancing hosts. Then a stream of Chinese extricated themselves sideways, and with a half-run to the right sought to make through the trees for the fosse, and so for the fortifications. And as they turned, they fell; and others following, turned and fell. And now, the whole current began to tend in the way of these pioneers. Forward they are pressed, and press, and fall; but they fall ever nearer to the fosse; and now they are falling into it; and down through the wide, ever-filling ditch they press, treading upon a carpet of dead flesh only; and now there is no more a fosse, but a level floor of bodies; and across this they rush, and attempt to climb, and fall; and the level floor is no more level, but slants upward to the parapet; and along this sure gangway of soft and sinking luxury, this vast snake-nest of intermixing pigtails, they press, they run; now they cannot fail: they gain the parapet; they scream; and Paris is Gomorrah.

The mystery of license to which, during all that week of black horror, the chief of the cities of men was a prey, can only be hinted here. It was well understood that Paris was to be the capital of the new Chinese world; and it was therefore with a certain feeling of old proprietorship that the Chinese entered it. They dealt with the inhabitants as a man, returning from a long journey, makes short work of an accumulation of rats in his chief cellar.

They stormed in a solid body up the wide Avenue de la Grande Armée, and also in two solid bodies, right and left, just within the fortifications. Near l'Étoile, stretching right across the breadth of the avenue, and also across the Boulevard de Berthier, there were barricades of the Garde Municipale, and street-fighting, and massacre, and mounds of trampled yellow corpses. But the flood behind swept onward the flood before with the inevitableness of the ocean-tide. Within a few hours all that length of thoroughfare which the Parisians called the boulevards extérieurs was occupied; and the inhabitants were driven inward like wild horses within a ring of prairie-fire.

Another host had entered south by the Porte d'Ivry into the 13th arrondissement, another from Montrouge by the Porte d'Orléans into the 14th; and now, swarming in their millions, they infested the ways and by-ways of the city, its squares and its bed-rooms, its stables and its public buildings, with glad rage, with prying Bacchic stare, with gaping mouth.

Here was the New Pekin.

The bony visage of the yellow man, in moments of unbridled lust and mad excitement, is a brutal spectacle. The countenance is a travesty; the divine image becomes a mask of hellish farce. It is as though a panting skeleton played a comedy. There all is seen — the nakedness of the passions, the bare, rampant hideousness: the face becomes an indecency. What added to the frenzy of these riots was the fact that among the invaders were sweating women, crazy with heat and dust, and the instinct of blood, and the ultimate wantonness of crime.

On the night of the entry, on each of the iron railings in the wide space of the Place de la Concorde glared an impaled head. At the Invalides, in the circular pit where lies the tomb of Napoleon, there lay a compact mass of bodies reaching to the level of the railings; and on this bed of mortality lay a score of Chinese men and women in exhausted sleep.

Here, too, was subterranean massacre in catacomb and égout. On the Quai St. Michel a body of fifty Quartier Latin students stood waiting in proud, pale, silent patience, holding hands, and died smiling.

While the city from La Villette to Boulogne was still one shrieking Sodom, Yen How arrived in Paris.

Though eager to be away to the coast, he had come hither to inaugurate a ceremony, which was to be memorable. This was on the Tuesday of the sunless week.

He lost no time. He summoned to him at the Elysée captains and generals of brigades, and commanded them to make ready the people for the long-predetermined Ritual.

To-day he was no more Yen How the General, he was Yen How the Prophet-Priest.

He had with him the Chiam, the hereditary high priest, counting an Aaronic ancestry of a thousand years; he had with him a gorgeous retinue of bouzis; he had with him the idol of Quonin, the Chinese Virgin, sitting among cushions in rich robes — the idol of Matsoa, who swam from a far country to China through many seas in one night — the idol of Quonin, Virgin of the North — the idol of Fe, the eagle-headed joss — the idol of Minifo — the idol of many-handed Puffa — many idols; he had with him the books of Confucius, and the books of Tansin; and he draped himself in the robes and solemn gauds of the Arch-Priest, that he might inaugurate and set up in one central Temple of the West the religion of the East.

He chose Notre Dame.

And the work of torture, and infamy, and slaughter, now nearly over, ceased; and on that day the people flocked toward the Cité, and the ancient church of Christ.

Never was assembled such a multitude within a city. To lend the last impressiveness to the ceremony, Yen How had ordained that these should be the sole public idols, for the time being, brought over from China. A Chinaman without idols is like an opium-smoker without opium. This gorgeous ritual, therefore, was in itself quite sufficient, once for all, to fix and establish Paris as the centre of the new Empire. In the earlier hours of the day messages were everywhere flashed over the Continent, and to China, stating the exact hour of the Inauguration; and at that hour, account having been taken of differences of longitude, by far the greater portion of the yellow race bowed its muttering head, prostrated itself, and turned a jaundiced eye to Heaven.

Yen How, with thick ivory ring on thumb, arrayed in a blaze of colour, was borne in open palanquin of gold all along the Rue de Rivoli and by the Pont de l'Arcole through the kneeling throng, preceded by thousands of bouzis, bearing the majestic god Fo, and the huge - bellied, broad-faced Gan.

The line of route was illuminated with the myriad variegation of lanterns, as was also the interior of Notre Dame. While everywhere, from Montmartre to Montrouge, a noise of jangling bells rang through the sombre air. At the hour of the sacrifice, steaming human heads were offered to Matsoa, as a variation on the usual boiled heads of the pig.

In the tiny shrines which, on three sides, surround the nave, where pricket-candlesticks and rich, religious decor had long represented the rather foppish religiosity of the Parisian 'dévoté' were set up the statues of grotesque and grinning josses. The Crucified gave place to Fo, and the Immaculate to Quonin.

The studied pomp of this memorable Hegira was overwhelming in its effect. The prostrate multitudes groaned in inward agonies of veneration; and the God of their veneration was, in reality, Yen How.

When the sacred books were opened and solemnly presented, it was not forgotten that Confucius, who wrote them, was mysteriously there, in carnal presence, before their favoured eyes.

He, for his part, the little doctor — even in that grandiose hour of his triumph — smiled inwardly, as usual. In all the sun and earth there was hardly heat to melt that ice.

Only where the focussed rays of self touched the secret spot, he warmed, and flowed, and felt.

The pageant of Inauguration was at two. By four the broken Paris-Calais railway was repaired, and Yen How with his retinue set off westward.

Already Paris presented a strange sight, apart from the heaps of dead in the streets, and the bodiless heads and arms with which the screaming Chinese played ball. She looked Chinese. The Mongolian race, like the English, can adapt itself readily. All the winding length of the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré was, in two days, bright with gauds and hues. Shops had been appropriated by individuals, who made haste to find pigments to daub the legend in characters which seemed to grin. Lanterns were hung out. The gay city assumed another tone of gaiety: vermilion on her houses, and vermilion in her streets.

The work of blood recommenced.

At battered Marseilles, the Chinese, entering by the Boulevard de la Madeleine, found a deserted city, filled with the roar of the famishing animals at the Zoological Gardens. Their only prey was the very aged, and a number of nuns, medical men, and invalids, collected chiefly at the New Hospital. In their squeeze to get at these a number of Chinese were crushed to death.

At Lyons an incredible mêlée, made up of the madmen of the hospital of Antiquaille, of Chinese, and of Soeurs de la Charité, raged for an hour through the vast, straggling building. Beneath the Pont de la Mulatibre there occurred a block of corpses which spread gradually upward between the banks of the Saone; and this, within two days, aided by the stifling heat of the stagnant and sunless air, resulted in a pestilence among the invaders. At once the dying men were seized with the instinct to rush northward toward Paris, the home of the gods; and it was only the promptness of Yen How, who ordered the clearance of the river, and the instant shooting of every sick Chinaman, which prevented more widespread disaster.

At old Valence, where some failure of commissariat — caused by the deportation southward of provisions, and the voluntary destruction of the vineyards — had occurred, there was scarcity for a day, and food in plenty the next. The low hedge that divides the yellow man from omnivorousness was in Europe found to be very low indeed — where ‘the flesh of men is not yellow, but pink, like the new-born mouse. At the first spur of hunger, the hedge was leapt with an easy bound.

For a day hard scarcity; the next, flesh in plenty — roast and sodden, bake and stew.

Meanwhile, if there was a man in Europe who had a strong will neither to be eaten when dead, nor tortured alive at slow fires, nor shot with arrows, nor pierced with bullets, nor pulped with the clubs which the Chinese use for pounding rice — that man was the duellist Edrapol.

Thrice had he been caught, and thrice he had escaped.

He reached Dieppe, and for the second time within two days, he had no sooner reached his point of aim than the irruption came.

He ran at the first breathless news down to the basins; and, with a crowd of hunted men and women, saw the last little boat making her way, thronged with people, out of the mouth of the outer basin.

He had forgotten, in his mad haste, both sword and pistols; and as he saw hope cut off by way of the sea, his first instinct was to rush back, and get what was like life to him — a weapon in his hand.

Even as he ran through the street, along which men and women were rushing in wild-eyed distraction, he heard the scream. It had reached Dieppe.

Edrapol stopped, and gazed crazily about. His big soft-felt hat was pressed back hard on his head; the long hanging ends of his white moustache shook. It was not a moustache — it was a drapery.

Here was a stern end to an existence of pleasure; here an absence of all punctilio intruding itself upon a life which had made punctilio its bride. The Chinese slew without ‘seconds,’ or ceremony; though the aggressors, they chose their own weapons. The trifler’s heart sank within him.

Round he leered, standing a moment in the third position, as if to parry the tierce thrust — his hat pressed hard back on his head.

The scream came from a side-street; it was very near; his inn was before him; he flew forward.

He reached the deserted house, rushed up the stairs to a room, and dropped to his knees before a portmanteau. From his arsenal of weapons he chose a six - chambered revolver and a dainty rapier. With these in his hand he felt better.

He stood and listened, his beard, his whole body, shaking.

In about a minute the place was filled with noise, shouted gibberish, shrill laugh. Edrapol bolted his door.

But it was soon discovered, and battered in with clubs. About ten Chinese, hot, crazy, bent upon blood, rushed in upon him, screaming.

But this time they reckoned without their host. A man does not acquire a European reputation for nothing.

Edrapol put his legs into the exact pose of elegance suited to the occasion, and with the revolver in his left hand and the rapier in his right, he began to kill scientifically. Every shot entered the middle of a heart or brain, and every stroke failed not to sever the intended artery. The last pigtail dropped upon the writhing corpses of his fellows, and Edrapol leant a little on the handle of his dripping rapier, the model of grace.

It was near sunset then, about two weeks before the dark time.

He crept from the chamber. The house was empty. He found a recess in a wine-cellar, in which he hid till three the next morning.

The house was then full of other Chinese, and the corpses of white women; but the living were as unconscious as the dead, drunk with the orgy of the day. Edrapol passed through them, and made his escape from the town eastwards and southwards.

For a week he lurked in a little empty farm-house between Dieppe and St. Valéry; and then some Chinese came to the farm-house; but Edrapol escaped.

For another week he seems to have dodged and lurked about in that neighbourhood, near the shore, in the vain hope of somehow getting away in a ship. But no ship came.

He was carrying about with him a piece of cheese which he found at the farm-house, and this, with occasional autumn hedge-fruit, appeased his hunger. He remembered the bonbons of Moissier with regret.

Unexpectedly, one midnight, walking along the beach, he came upon a broken hut, and near it a small seamy skiff, containing half an oar. He was just able to move her; and after three hours' work, got her to the water's edge.

He put off in her, and as the water oozed in, he baled it with his voluminous hat. When he was not baling, he paddled.

His notion of reaching England in this fashion was hopeless; but the old duellist, the luxurious boulevardier, clung to life with the desperation of a pampered woman. And he fell upon his feet where another would have failed.

On the third morning, he was picked up, half dead, by a small barque, almost in mid-channel. She was the Conrad, which had borne Hardy to Nagasaki; she was then, for the first time, on her way to England. So that, late that night, Edrapol's glittering fingers pulled the patriarchal tassels of his moustache on Newhaven broken wharf. And there he examined the edge of his rusted rapier.

CHAPTER XXXI. THE MEETING

AS FOR THE girl Seward, Hardy was told by his agent that she occupied a flat in Bloomsbury, a flat rather well furnished, where, with a servant of her own, she lived alone. And, without five minutes' delay, Hardy was in a carriage hurrying to the address given.

He doubted if this could be the girl he wanted. She lived, certainly, under another name. And how came Ada, the nurse-maid, to be flourishing in such a style? Morbidly anxious as he was to have her safe and sure in his own keeping, it hardly occurred to him that this very opulence accounted for the reticences and hesitations of her brother with regard to her.

But in twenty minutes he was sure. On a third floor a servant led him into a smug drawing-room, and there, on the wall, he saw an oval coloured photograph: and he recognised the slim bust, and the little Chinese eyes, and the piquant Geisha-girl face, warm-yellow in tint.

At the door, the servant, a narrow-browed, mean-looking creature, had told him that Miss Seward was away; and as he wished to speak further, she had asked him within.

Where, then, was Miss Seward?

She had gone away.

When?

Four hours before.

Where to?

To Dover.

Was that certain?

Quite certain.

But whatever had she gone to Dover for?

That the servant could not say, or would not say.

But was Miss Seward coming back soon?

The servant did not think so. Miss Seward had left her sufficient money to keep her for some time.

Did the servant know much of Miss Seward's private affairs?

She knew something. She and Miss Seward were very good friends indeed. Miss Seward sometimes spoke of things to her. But, of course, she did not know everything.

What did 'everything' mean?

It meant nothing.

Then Hardy began to woo, to implore; then to speak of big matters; to say that all this was important to more than he could name. But the girl smirked, and did not follow that flight. The last thing that occurred to him was a bribe; only in the final moment of his despair did the thought flash through his mind. He hinted at hazard a hundred pounds, and the promptness of the response surprised him.

It was a large sum for a poor girl.

Yes; and all he wanted to know was why Miss Seward had gone to Dover.

She had gone in order to go over to France to the little Chinaman who was in love with her.

And now it was the turn of the servant to be surprised — at the swift energy with which Hardy vanished from her eyesight.

He bore on his breast the initials of this girl, Seward; she was his, his very own.

But he was in this dilemma: that things far more momentous on their surface demanded his personal presence where he was. It needed all the acumen of his shrewd eye to determine which was the main fact which must influence his conduct.

He drove to the nearest post-office, and telegraphed to the Manager of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway.

There was at this moment not a hope left to Britain. The Admiralty had chains of steamers, intercommunicating with each other, and with the south-east coast, whose task was to watch and to report. And the nation now knew that on the morrow of this final-looking, sunless Wednesday was due the horror of ultimate overthrow — the going beneath the wave of the last emerging rock of the old world.

Nor had the general mass of the nation the faintest suspicion of any power in the earth which could save, or even momentarily help, it.

If a heavenly host should appear in mid-sky wrapped in flames of vengeance, then, perhaps, that surge might be stemmed. But though the people were now far from doubting the interest of the gods, their reasons were the offspring of too advanced a period of Time to await any such manifestation.

It was known that a wholly inconceivable number of floating things of every kind were massed upon the extreme northwest coast of France; and that in their passage over to England they would have one of the finest war-fleets the world had ever seen to protect them — against nothing!

And now — in this hour of world-tragedy — the British people offered to the ‘Eyes that regard’ a good spectacle. The panic was gone. In such a place as the City of London there was, of course, no business done; but everywhere else there was business done. Shops were open; post-offices were open; the printing-press throbbed. If a man met a man in the street, one pallid lip spoke to the other pallid consciousness of the dark weather, of a business matter, of a family affair — of everything except the Chinese. The subject of the Chinese in these last days was rather looked upon as being in bad taste. The lower classes spoke of them — but, in general, with splendidly curved lip. With a sublime stoicism, with a regal disdain, Britain waited for her overthrow.

Nearly every one made a point of going about his ordinary work.

In the last resort, the lip remains. It is the final retort of a noble man, of a grand nation, to destiny. ‘The mind and spirit remain invincible...’

What could Britain do now? She could smile.

And by this her pallid smile in that hour, she proved, in truth, her divine right to the Empire of the Earth.

Besides smiling, every man, and most boys, managed to provide themselves with some sort of weapon, sharp or blunt, dull or gleaming, which they laid quietly by.

A gentleman in Gray’s Inn had for a week been training a fine specimen of the British bull-dog to fly at a Mongolian effigy set up in the gardens.

In reality, the arm of England was as strong as her soul; but she knew the strength of her soul, and did not suspect the strength of her arm.

Her arm was John Hardy.

At least he was the main muscle of it. He was as much the West as Yen How was the East.

But what is this shadow that dogs his steps? — something absurd, grotesque, yet terrible?

At eight he had sent the telegram to the railway company. At nine he drove once more from Cavendish Square, leaving a host of orders with an almost permanent committee of naval men who now attended upon him.

And he had no sooner driven away, than a man in wide sombrero was asking at his door if he was at home.

In this man, Edrapol, there was not now, if there had ever been, an atom of venom against Hardy. He was merely the absurd slave of punctilio. In the view of that frivolous old brain, nothing in the world could compare in importance with the importance of an affaire d'honneur, a delicate point, a shade of usage. The thing first of all that a gentleman must do — in every case — whatever happened — was to settle ‘a delicate point.’

Also, he knew the greatness of Hardy. And his vanity was prone, the moment he found himself in safety on English soil, to measure swords with him.

He knew, too, that soon the Chinese must be here also, and then ... what could be done? C'est une affaire manquée. Nothing could be more annoying to a gentleman than an affaire manquée.

It was clear that whatever he did must be instantaneously done. The morrow would, perhaps, not ‘do his affair.’

He took the broad hat from his long-haired white head, and he bowed largely, as old Bobbie himself informed him that Hardy was from home.

Edrapol asked whither he had gone, and the old man said:

‘To Dover, sir.’

Edrapol asked no more. He had brought over on his person a good sum in specie; he had also rings on his fingers worth money. He jumped into a cab, and drove in haste away.

With that noble phlegm of which we have spoken, things in England still, at this eleventh hour, ran, for the most part, their usual course. Few people were moving about, yet the trains went empty, and the show of civilisation continued when its reality was like a spent heart, about to beat its final throb.

So that Edrapol found a longed-for train about half an hour after Hardy's departure; and both engines, flying simultaneously through Kent, were 'express.'

As for Hardy, he reached Harbour Station in his rocking train within an hour and twenty minutes from his start.

He hurried to the Cross Wall, and there had no difficulty 'in learning that the girl had certainly not hired any local craft, nor started from Dover that day. Nor had any craft left Dover eastward for some time.

The natural conclusion was that Ada Seward was still in Dover.

Nevertheless, Hardy spied about the harbour for some time among the steamboats, and pointed out one to a blue-jacket named Brassey, who accompanied him. Brassey was to arrange with her captain; have her fires lit and banked; and Hardy scribbled a note to South Front Barracks, signing his name with the initials P. C. N. S.; it was a request for a small three-pounder and ammunition, which he instructed Brassey to mount for'ard on the designated steamer. He himself hurried to the Royal Ship Hotel, followed by a train, of watermen, policemen, and residents, eager to serve him.

Nothing was so certain as that, if the girl were there, in a small place like Dover, he would quickly know it. In a few minutes fifty men were dissecting the town for him, and very soon he had the whole history of her stay in Dover.

She had put up for two hours at the Lord Warden Hotel, and had then left it, taking her portmanteau, in a cab. In the small period of her stay she had made herself singularly friendly with one of the chamber-maids of the hotel, and confided to her the surprising secret that she was about to set out for Dunkirk. The cabman who took her away was found; and he stated that, having driven for some distance east towards St. Margaret-at-Cliffe, along the high road, his fare had ordered him to turn down a by-road, leading directly to the shore. His surprise was immense when, about a mile from the Upper Foreland Lighthouse, which was burning all day, she again ordered him to stop and take down her trunk. He did so, laid it on the sands, and was paid. The last he saw as he drove away was the girl sitting on the box, with lonely outlook over the dim sea.

Was there no ship in the offing?

There might have been; he could not say. One could not see many yards over the sea through the dark. He was certain that there was no ship with burning lights.

Here, then, was the last link: the chain ending at the girl watching the drear sea from her box on the sands.

It did not, however, need a very vivid imagination to conjecture why she sat there; and in half an hour after hearing the news, Hardy had the North Pier Signal-Light dwindling into nothingness on his port quarter; and the Downs-trotter which bore him was panting and quivering as she had not panted for many a day. He calculated that the girl had, at most, an hour's start of him.

As he passed out between the two piers, Edrapol arrived at Priory Station, and began to make inquiries for Hardy. After a time he heard the truth, but his disappointment was solaced by the information that Hardy would very likely return before morning.

At this time Ada Seward, borne in one of those safe, but rather clumsy, Havre-Antwerp boats, was fifteen miles or so on her way from the English coast.

Some months before this a singular adventure had befallen the girl.

Walking along the street, she had been accosted by a man — a Yankee, as she judged by his goat beard, his lank lounge, and his talk.

He nodded with cool confidence to her, and, with oily modulations, he said this:

‘Well, young woman, I guess you are in luck’s way this time, anyhow.’

In ten minutes he had left her, and leaving her, insinuated in Bank of England notes into her hand. This, he explained, was only ‘to go on with’ for a day or so.

He was not the principal, he said, but only an agent— ‘matter of business’ — in which, to tell the God’s truth, he did not stand in so badly. But he was not the principal in the deal: the principal she would see on the next evening at the hour and place which he named.

The ‘principal’ was a large, pigtailed, silk-dressed Chinaman — a great man in his country.

All he wanted of Ada Seward was to be permitted to buy her grand houses, and carriages, and footmen, and downs, and luxuries. For this nothing, on his honour, in return, save that she should be under his eye, and obey him as a daughter. The Yankee acted as go-between, and Ada thought she would like all this.

So, away now with Pattison’s, and the nursery; and shopping now all day for Ada at Peter Robinson’s, the carriage waiting outside.

She changed her name, breaking with her poor, but proud, relations, who, in spite of her protestations, believed that her foot had slipped. Her brother tossed back the gold she offered him into her face.

Then came proposals from the ‘principal.’ Ada was wanted in China, where wealth, beyond all dream, awaited her. She refused.

Now first she heard the name of Yen How in the matter, and began to understand. That little doctor at whom she had scoffed...

Then came pressure, threats. But apart from the pressure, and the threats, she understood now that she had sold herself into slavery. She was subjected to a most rigorous, unremitting surveillance, like an upper-class woman in China; and she had at bottom a rather touchy, independent pride of character. Add to this surveillance the pressure, the threats, and to these her uneasy consciousness of her people's displeasure, and what she did may be guessed: she collected all the trinkets about her, which now amounted to many hundreds of pounds' value, and she ran away.

It was then that she set up on her own account in the Bloomsbury flat. Already she was too much of a lady to do without a servant.

She hid herself with such absolute craft, that neither 'principal,' nor 'agent,' nor for a long time the agents of Hardy, nor her brother, could find her.

It was on learning this flight that Yen How decided that, whatever happened, none of the women of England must be killed...!

Then, when the end was near, when it was certain that England was doomed, a noble throe leapt into life within this girl. She conceived the quixotic, but subjectively fine, notion of sacrificing herself for her country. On condition that England was spared, she would go to Yen.

And boldly breaking from her seclusion, she presented herself with this proposal before the agent'; and agent and principal, in a room in Portland Street, where the principal lived now in strictest retirement, gloated over this thing.

And they two, with elaborate cautions and precautions, made two voyages to the French coast, one with the glad message in the girl's own writing, from which they returned with Yen How's 'come'; and one to arrange minute preliminaries of the meeting.

And thus it happened that in order to get to France, Ada Seward sat alone on her box on the Foreland sands, and looked across the sea.

She was genuinely confident that she was 'saving' something large and not very definite; and, as she stepped into the boat which quickly made its appearance at the surf, the thought in her beating, yet bold, heart was this: What a One am I!

In order to lay his eyes once more upon this girl at the earliest moment, Yen How was ready to fling to the winds, or at least postpone, a world of affairs which no head but his could surely organise. But the momentum of events overpowered him. He could not go.

He himself chose the safest-looking, tidiest, and smartest of the smaller craft of which the Outer Harbour, the Commercial Dock, and the Naval Dock were now one thick crowded mass.

He had then been at Dunkirk two days, making the Casino des Dunes his headquarters. But when he looked abroad upon that once neatest of cities, and considered the heaped-up horror of its red streets, and the whirling drama of mixed revel and warlike preparations going forward within its walls, he knew that here, at least, his bride could not come.

Standing, however, a little back from the Sea Baths at Rosendael, two miles away, was a lonely villa, backed by the desolate sand-dunes, and within ear-shot of the continual rumouring of the shore. Here, at eleven in the night, almost alone, restless, perambulating, expecting, was Yen How.

He had rescued himself with a sort of stealth from Dunkirk.

He was like some singer, the darling of the world, who yet is the secret victim of drink; and while the plaudits still ring through the opera-house, he, in the inmost recess of the greenrooms, has the tilting bottle at his lips.

By midnight the lights of Dunkirk were well in sight of the steamer which bore Ada Seward. The boat was manned by Japanese, men in whom Yen How had confidence. But she was unarmed.

She was travelling at her utmost speed, and carried only one light — a mast-head light.

This fact made her outré, an object of observation; it was sufficient to hint her identity; and behind her, straining every timber to catch her, came frothing a slightly faster boat.

So that when the boat ahead was perhaps not half a mile from her anchorage opposite Rosendael, the boat behind was five hundred yards only from the boat ahead; and it was then that the former sent a guess-work shot, but a shot aimed by Hardy's own hand, into the stern-works of the other.

The Japanese boat at once shot round, and went steaming in a changed direction, rudderless. Consternation reigned on her decks: over the sea came to Hardy's ship sounds of shouted voices.

The girl, who had been lying on the red-velvet cabin-cushions, rushed on deck. And as she reached it, again she heard the boom of cannon, and screamed.

And all that happened from that moment during ten minutes was a mere horrid whirl to her; there was a scampering of men, and yells, and everywhere a rush of the sea, and a leap into a boat, and a singing in her ears, and a smell like brimstone, and the flash of a bull's-eye in her eyes.

Then she felt firmness beneath her feet, and presently she was crying, half-lying back on cushions.

Hardy, sitting near, eyed her curiously for some minutes of silence. Here was a force greater than a 100-ton gun, great as the moon and the tides; old Astarte sobbing there in a dainty West-end bonnet — the strong sex of Woman.

The presence of the girl, in his power at last, filled him with a certain calm. With her, he felt, he might win.

The sobs died gradually lower. And he said:

‘You feel better now?’

‘Yes — thank you — sir,’ she answered jerkily.

Up to now she had not recognised him.

‘Then I can talk to you. You understand, that it was to get you that I sank the other ship?’

‘Me?’ she queried, sitting up at once in wide-awake interest.

‘Yes. I knew you were going to Yen How, and I wanted at all hazards to prevent you. Whatever induced you to act in that unworthy way?’

‘Which unworthy way, sir? But stop, are you—’

‘Yes — we have met before. But that is not the point. Tell me, why have you been so foolish and wicked, Ada?’

‘Oh, come now, this is a little too much, you know 15 cried Ada. ‘Who are you? And what right have you to take me in this way? I foolish and wicked? It is absolutely untrue; and I don’t think you’d be ungentlemanly enough to treat a poor girl in this way if you knew all.’

‘Well then, tell me all. And do not cry, because that wastes time.’

‘Oh, it is all very well to talk in that way, sir!’ she answered saucily, though her heart misgave her at the look of the face before her. ‘Who are you? I am not aware by what right—’

‘But you are wasting my time. John Hardy is my name, and I have the right of a man trying to serve his country. Tell me now.’

‘Oh, John Har — ! Well, you will excuse me, won’t you? I was not to know that. But was it you, then, all the time, at the music—’

‘Yes. Now tell me.’

‘Why I was going, you mean? Well, if it comes to that, wasn’t I going for the same reason which you say — to serve my country, too?’

‘Is that really so?’

‘It is, sir.’

‘And how?’

‘Well, since you seem to know about me and Yen How — didn’t he give me to understand that, if I came, he would save England from the Chinese? And isn’t that why I am going to him? to make him keep his army away from England?’

At this exhibition of inherent confidence in her power over Yen, this radical, unquestioning trust in the might of her sex, a smile flitted through the brain of Hardy. He said:

‘Then you are not wicked, after all; but only foolish. As I have you in my hands, and as I am going to take you back to England, I will let you understand why. You are right in believing that Yen How is very much attached to you; that is so; I know it well. I believe that his attachment to you is as extraordinary in its force as the man himself is extraordinary. Well now; but can you be so simple as to think that the way to make use of this infatuation for the good of your country is to come and put yourself in his power in this fashion? Supposing he even tried to keep his armies from going over to England and killing us all, he could not permanently succeed, you know; and supposing he succeeded, you have sense enough to know, have you not, that England would be no good at all with the rest of the world full of yellow men? In that case she had better go under, too, like the rest, don’t you think? You would not care to live in such a kennel, nor would I, nor any of us English. So, you see, you are throwing away yourself for nothing. But I, now, have a better card to play, I am thinking! Do you know that I have been searching everywhere for you for weeks? My idea was this: that this vast Chinese people would be no good at all when confronted with the harsh, steady, untiring frown of England — provided we could only get their leader well dead. That is the first thing to do. Yen How is the weak point of all that great host; and you, Ada, are the weak point of Yen How. That is why I wanted to have you safe in my hands all this time, so as to be sure that you were there. If you are in England, I have not a doubt that Yen How will come, like a fish to the bait; and if he comes, as sure as fire we'll catch him. But if I let you go over to him in this way to France, you see, don't you, how that would spoil everything?'

'I see, sir,' said Ada.

'Well, now, in what we have got to do to-night you can help us: we want to let Yen How know that you are safe in England, and in my hands, He must not have any doubt about that in his mind; and as he is expecting you, I suppose, in the ship I have sunk, he will have a doubt when she does not arrive, unless we enlighten him. He will think, very likely, that you are lost with the crew of the ship; and that suspicion may be enough to keep him out of our hands. So, then, I want you to tell me where, and under what conditions, you were to meet Yen How to-night.'

'I can hardly say exactly,' she replied; ' — he is in a house by itself near the shore.'

'Is he alone?'

'They told me that there was hardly any one with him.'

'There is a single light just ahead of us in shore: is that the place, do you know?'

'It may be, sir; I should think it would be. I cannot say.'

Hardy jumped sharply up, and called 'Brassey!' in a shout that made him cough.

Brassey at once appeared — a beardless, Cockney-looking man.

'How far are we in?' asked Hardy.

'About a quarter of a mile, sir.'

'No lights on board showing?'

'No, sir.'

‘Pick three men to go with you and me in the boat; ask if they can shoot at all, and give them the pistols; better look to yours and mine. Tell them to stop speed. And find me at once, Brassey, a pair of scissors, if you can.’

On a side-table in the cabin were pens, ink, and paper. Hardy sat and wrote a few words; and almost as soon as he had finished Brassey was at his side with a pair of scissors.

Hardy at once hurried across to where Ada Seward sat; he muttered:

‘If you do not mind — just one little lock...’

Before she knew, he had clipped a tendril of her light-reddish hair.

He returned now to the table, and enclosed the hair with the scribbled sheet in an envelope, which he directed: ‘Yen How, Europe.’

On the sheet he had written:

‘From John Hardy to Yen How.

‘Hair of Miss Seward, who is in the safe keeping of John Hardy, at 11a Cavendish Square, London.’

A few minutes later, wrapped to his ears in a long black ulster, he was at the tiller of a boat making for the shore.

The sea was calm, and only a slow, rolling bruit from the breaker-line informed with its murmurous monotone the very drear and dark night.

The air was stagnant as the vapid atmosphere of some dead world. It seemed pervaded by a certain visible gloom.

In ten minutes, Hardy, with a spring, was upon Chinese territory. The three men put off again a little from land; Brassey stationed himself on the wet sand, instructed how to act in case of a preconcerted signal; alone Hardy moved forward.

He had in one hand the letter, and in the other a pistol.

Yonder, shining steadily through the murky dark, was a light, which seemed nearer than it was; half a mile along the east stretch of fine sand lay

Rosendael, but invisible, deserted. The noise of Dunkirk could not be heard, but a blurred hint of luminosity marked its situation. A stone's throw away, on the left, stood a row of five bathing-machines. The upward-tending region of sand-hill and dune behind the villa was lost in gloom.

Yet the near was not invisible. Hardy having passed the broad band of level sand, was able to make his way with tolerable precision among the knolls and light, uneven ground. Once he collided with a low backless bench, half sunken askew in a scraggy growth of grass; once and again he stumbled into a hole of sand.

The house was very far. It stood on a slightly raised plateau of firmer ground, facing the sea; and the light seen from the sea was in an open window near the ground. The villa was white, and small; its doors and windows Gothic.

He stole stooping to the window, and looked in. The room, lighted by a lamp, was a species of salon. On a chair in a corner burned a Chinese lantern.

From a window on the right side also he saw ooze a radiance from within, and with cautious tread he approached it also. The casement was latticed, and overgrown with chèvrefeuille. But he was able to observe that the room was gaudily decorated, tapestried with green and crimson silks, in the centre a spread table, laden with fruit and plate of gold. A multitude of coloured lanterns made it a nest of variegated glammers. And here, busy about the table, he saw two richly-dressed Chinese.

He made the tour of the house, and saw no other living thing. All was dead silence and stagnation. He came back to the front window, dropped in the letter directed to Yen How, and turned away.

His way now was downhill, and he walked faster, with less precaution, swinging freely along. He had gone on in this way for perhaps five minutes, when he stopped suddenly short, all eyes and ears. He had heard the distinct sound of footsteps near.

In two or three seconds the muzzle of a pistol was at his forehead, and the muzzle of his pistol was at the forehead of a man.

They peered closely into each other's face.

'Well, you do not fire, and I will not,' said the man coolly.

He was not an Englishman — something in his intonation showed that; yet he spoke English.

He had, in fact, recognised Hardy; but Hardy did not recognise him.

'Is it agreed?' the man said.

'Well.'

'Drop your pistol.'

'You drop yours.'

'And you promise?'

'Yes.'

There was a thud on the ground, and a moment after another.

'Poh! You have lost your chance,' said the man.

Then Hardy knew Yen.

Even though it was a totally different Yen from the pompous pigtailed Arch-Priest, the great Apostle, who had been awaiting, with restless wanderings over the dunes, his tarrying bride. It was a Yen in simple English clothes, with a hard felt hat over his bald forehead, and without queue behind.

The consciousness of failure, of folly, thrilled through Hardy like a pain.

He had, in truth, lost the best possible chance.

'Well,' he said after a minute, 'and you have lost yours, too, Yen How.'

'I will get you another time, boy.'

'If I do not get you.'

‘Well, well,’ said Yen.

They had moved on a few steps — together. There was silence in the darkness. Already in the two men was working the strange law whose operation they were to feel for long hours that night: the law which made it next to impossible to them to tear themselves one from the other.

Yen How hit upon the same half-sunken bench upon which Hardy had stumbled. Hardy put his foot upon it, and leant his elbow on his knee at one end. At the other Yen How sat down. Below them was the undulant spread of weed-patched sand, and the vague noising of the sea.

* * * * *

Yen How, who was smoking, took the cigar from his lips, and said:

‘So you got away, after all?’

Hardy did not answer.

‘How did you get away?’ asked Yen.

‘God, I suppose, let me free, that I might strangle you yet, Yen,’ said Hardy.

‘Poh!’ said Yen How.

Minute after minute rolled by in a silence punctuated by the faint puffing sounds of Yen How’s lips — a quarter of an hour, twenty minutes. Hardy was looking forth with wrinkled, speculative brow over the sea.

Yen How said:

‘Did you have anything to do with the capture of the nine ships?’

‘Which nine ships?’ said Hardy.

‘The Japanese war-vessels.’

‘Go to Hell, and ask me no questions.’

‘I suppose it was your doing, boy.’

‘Perhaps.’

‘What have you done with them, then?’
‘I have them.’
‘Not in Europe — come now.’
‘How do you know that?’
‘I have searched.’
‘Europe is a good big place, Yen.’
‘Big, no. A green billiard-table, my son—’
‘With pockets.’
‘So you have got them — in a pocket — really?’
‘I may. There is no telling.’
‘If you had, you would not try to make me think that you had.’
‘Ah,’ said Hardy, of the two one fathom the deeper.

* * * * *

Caught in a sort of fascination, in a feeble, flaccid species of mutual mesmerism, they could not leave each other. Intense hatred and intense love are, of course, inverse forms of the same thing, and their manifestation is the same — an instinct for contact. A stab, a kiss — these are resultant varieties of the instinct. Through a grating a dog and a cat will maintain a mutual watch, lingeringly, for hours, averse to part. Here was something of that sort — a warfare and an attraction between a whale big as an ocean, and an elephant, monstrous, four-headed, big as a continent.

And as all grand intensities are primal, elementary, and resemblant to the passions of childhood, so the talk of these great men was not altogether unlike the wrangle between two bitter, lingering schoolboys, sitting on a bench, with lumps in their throats — fastened together, unable to part.

There were few words, and a long interval, and few words, and a long interval. So a dark hour passed.

* * * * *

Hardy said:

‘What a beast you must be, Yen, to torture a poor boy like that! What a sad beast!’

‘Poh! You do not know anything. I had worse in store for you than that, boy.’

‘What a damned reptile for God to make!’

‘Abuse away. Your mind is not really first-class, after all. You are the slave of old, popular surface-ideas. A reptile is no worse than anything else, boy. If he is stronger than other things, he is better than them.’

‘Ah, well, if that were so, I should be glad, too, Yen. There is not much to choose between us, now, in that way.’

‘What, you are of the species, too, then?’

‘Something of that sort, perhaps — if venom makes the reptile. It is your own fault. You have made me like yourself. By the Lord, I warn you, Yen How...!’

* * * * *

‘Poh! it is a question of strength, not of venom. You can be as venomous as you like. But what can you do?’

‘Nothing perhaps; and perhaps something.’

‘Suppose you had a fleet to beat me at sea. Do you know how many I am sending over? All at once? You can’t dream. Twenty millions. What could you do with them? It would take you a year to shoot them all. But suppose you did; there will be some more hundreds of millions left. You cannot exclude the innumerable. What could you do with them? Be as venomous as you like, my son.’

‘Ten good men against a hundred million rats — I bet on -the men.’

‘Poh! I bet on the rats.’

‘On the side of the men — science.’

‘Science. What sort of science?’

‘The science of the gunmaker, of the tactician, of the—’

‘Well?’

‘Need I say it?’

‘Yes, say it.’

‘Of the — chemist.’

And at the word Yen How started as though pricked by a goad. He said nothing.

‘But, after all, you are a fool, Yen.’

‘Ah. How so?’

‘Well, now, I suppose you are a learned sort of dog. You know science I daresay; you know history, and on what trajectory the world has run so far. But it seems to me — can it be that you have really never caught a glimpse of the one big, fugitive Thing?’

‘And you, my son?’

‘Yen! sometimes it hits me straight in the eyes in one blinding flash of lightning — a momentary flash, happily, for no staggering eyeball could bear it long.’

‘Ah! And what is it you see?’

‘A tendency in the world — the hell of a current — a secret design, Mr. Chinaman.’

‘Well, suppose I have seen it too, boy, or guessed it? Why call me a fool?’

‘Because this invasion of yours is not in accordance with the tendency so far; and the tendency is jolly strong!’

‘You think the tendency is English in feeling; and I say it is Chinese; that’s all.’

‘I’ll swear it is not Chinese, Yen How.’

‘Well, I don’t care. Tendency or no tendency. Poh! A tree has a tendency to grow, all the universe is trying to make it grow — but how if I come with a saw and cut it down, my son?’

If you cut it down, yes. But if it is older than that old sea there, and has in it the toughness of eternities, and is as wide as the girth of the earth...

A murmur of contempt came from Yen How. But his left eye glanced a moment upward at the darkened heaven.

* * * * *

‘But what is it you are doing here, my son? How if I have you captured now?’

‘You cannot. I have help near. I could more likely capture you.’

‘I would not be easily captured, you know. But what is it you want here, sir?’

‘I received your present of the child’s heart. I came to make you one in return. I have dropped it inside the window of the house yonder.’

‘Ah, what present?’

‘The present of a lock of hair.’

‘Ah, yes. Is she safe?’

His voice dropped low, clandestine, wheedling.

‘Yes, she is safe.’

‘On board your ship?’

‘Yes.’

‘I knew. I heard your cannon. You are a devil for cannon, my son. But I do not look perturbed, I think. A man like Yen How knows how to wait.’

‘Then wait.’

‘I am waiting.’

‘It need not be for long, Yen.’

‘Poh! a day or two.’

‘So soon?’

‘Meanwhile, if you do not want me to strangle you, get off this soil.’

‘Yes — I must be going.’

* * * * *

Another half-hour, and Hardy sprang suddenly upright, a lank dim figure in his ulster. It was not very far from morning, yet no sign of light.

‘We shall meet again, then?’ he said.

‘To-morrow, perhaps,’ answered Yen How.

‘Or to-day.’

‘So true. It is morning now. Say to-day, perhaps, then, boy.’

‘Well, to-day...’

One walked hurriedly away; and the other, sitting there in the dark, smiled above his nose.

As for Hardy, he flung himself upon the cabin-cushions of the steamer as she turned her bows westward, and for four hours slept there, Ada Seward asleep, too, on the opposite side.

CHAPTER XXXII. 'TO-DAY'

SUDDENLY, A BREATH, a murmur, a thrill, a word of Life, ran like an electric wave through the length and breadth of Britain.

By wondrous marvel there were once more solid war-ships in Portsmouth port — ships friendly, belonging to England, not made for England by English hands, come from nowhere! By wondrous marvel ... by the might of the Almighty God ... by His unspeakable favour...

With this miracle was coupled by the people, without knowledge, by mere infallible intuition, the magic name of Hardy...

Early on the Thursday morning the wild rumour spread, incredible, yet believed. And at once the entire nation rushed into undoubting hope, gladly casting off its gloom, smitten with new and strange assurance of its high and worldwide destiny. And all the daily private business of life now, for the first time, utterly ceased, and men stood wondering to wait and watch the throes of Time, agape as though scribbled across the sky in Sanscrit of everlasting red they beheld the signature of God.

As for doubt, with rash faith they flung it quite away. In England — once more — were ships; and in England — once more — a Captain of ships.

At this thought a thrilling heat swept through the blood of every British being.

And there was a rumour abroad that, beside these marvelous battleships — nine, it was said, and more — there lay suddenly assembled that Thursday morning in the inner harbour of Portsmouth, a quite unaccountable crowd of other ships, Atlantic greyhounds, Norddeutscher and Austrian Lloyds, Royal Naval Reserved Merchant Cruisers, prodigious four-masters, tenders, Scotch and Irish coastguard vessels, unarmoured cruising ships, transports, colliers, trawlers, wooden merchantmen of every build, thronging the harbour.

A great unseen ferment and movement, a wide business of preparation, unknown to the general mass of the nation, must have been going forward for many days. But to what end the concentration of all these promiscuous crafts? Clearly, not a fighting end 1

At eight, Hardy stepped upon the Dover Cross Wall; and is it to show how with the awful and momentous is mingled the grotesque, and how 'something infects the world,' there, before him, on the quay, stood a bowing, long-haired figure.

Hardy recognised him at once, and a sound of vexed impatience started from his lips.

Edrapol tendered his shrivelled card. Hardy did not take it. He said:

'I know.'

Edrapol was all bows. He said:

'I take this liberty, monsieur — sir. I find myself without a friend to make me a small service in this country...'

'Well, now, is it possible?' said Hardy.

'You refer to-?'

'To your frivolity, monsieur.'

Edrapol bowed.

'I am here in response to your letter, monsieur. Between gentlemen—'

'I have no time / Is it that you still wish to fight with me?'

'The question is explicit, monsieur — sir. Can you ask? Am I not here to make you a favour, since you were unable to present yourself with me? Such terms, between gentlemen—'

‘But you know, do you not, that it is not legal to fight in that way in England?’

Such a smile smiled Edrapol!

‘Monsieur-!’ he said reproachfully.

‘Well, come now, I will fight you,’ said Hardy suddenly.

Out swept Edrapol’s arms, and down curled his complying back.

‘But not to-day, you understand.’

‘To-morrow — perhaps — the deluge!’

‘I cannot help that, sir. You are, I take it, a great man for rules and ceremonies. Well, then, I keep you to your rules. It is not, I presume, a usual thing in your country to fight duels at a moment’s notice? Well, then—’

‘But, monsieur—’

‘No. I have no time. I am going away to sea to-day. If I come back safe, we fight at the first moment, as I promised. Even if you choose to meet me at my landing-place, which will, I think, be Dover, we fight there. You will easily find me; and I will provide you with a second, and everything. If I return at all, I shall be here by to-morrow week — nine days. I think that is not beyond the usual interval which one takes to arrange preliminaries, so you cannot complain. I cannot stay longer. Bon jour, monsieur.’

Hardy walked away, while Edrapol shrugged, looking after him. With the girl, Seward, Hardy proceeded to the Ship Hotel.

He at once wrote a letter to old Robert Mason, bidding, him come for the girl, recommending her to his strict surveillance, and making certain monetary provisions for her future.

He then despatched four telegrams: one to Portsmouth, announcing his coming; one to the Admiralty; a third to a i Dr. Fletcher of Harley Street, in these words: ‘Send at once the things promised to me on board Hirosaki’; the fourth to one Henrik Bjornson, a Norwegian, living in Parliament Street,

Westminster, in these words: 'Hope you will not fail to be with me by noon.'

He himself made his way without delay to Brighton, and thence onward by the coast to Portsmouth, arriving there shortly before eleven.

Looking abroad from the Hard, the Cumber, the quays of Portsea, the whole harbour seemed a mere endless tangle of masts and rigging.

By this time the four thousand gentlemen who formed Hardy's army of blue-jackets were distributed among the nine new-arrived ships of war, the rank and file partly furnishing their own former officers, and being partly officered by the remnants of the regular service.

The entire still-living crew of the Iphigenia — the 'Hundred and Eighty' — were borne in the Hirosaki, flagship.

We have not spoken of the doings of this gallant cohort subsequent to their departure from Far Eastern waters.

They had found at Hong-Kong some coal-ships which they loaded, and brought forward in their wake. Again they had stopped at Singapore, and doubling the Cape, steamed by night, near by the African coast, through the Straits of Gibraltar; the garrison on the Rock, at a loss as to their identity, concluding that they must be Italian.

They were well provisioned in proportion to their number, and well coaled; so, passing south of Sardinia, they steered northward to M. Dumas' uninhabited island of Monte Christo (which is some twenty-five miles distant from the nearest land), prepared for a lengthy stay, there being two or three coves and bays affording very good anchorage.

The steam-pinnace of the Iphigenia carried a small quick-firing gun mounted on a pedestal for'ard; and Hardy, on leaving his men, gave instruction that any craft which might come near enough to sight the fleet should be chased by the pinnace, and, if not captured, sunk. As a matter of fact, only three small Corsican craft were captured, and their crews retained at the island.

Hardy himself left them in the Conrad, and at the d'Elbe contrived to make terms with the padrone of the Maltese speronare in which he reached England.

The Conrad he left behind, in order to serve as a despatch-boat.

Here, then, during some weeks, remained the Hundred and Eighty under the lazy Italian sky, shooting goats, and looking to their ships and guns. The Japanese whom they had with them they retained till the end of their stay.

At last, with glad hurrahs, they saw the ship, flying the agreed flags, which came to recall them; and on the fifth morning were at Portsmouth.

If it was true, as Hardy maintained, that it was men and not ships which fought a battle, the ships being only the tools of the men, then the Hirosaki was a great fighter. She was gallantly manned.

In addition to this, she was a wonderful tool: the largest effective-tonnaged ship that had ever been launched anywhere; the latest and most exquisite product of the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company.

But with the fleet which we may call British collected at Portsmouth the resources of Europe were not wholly exhausted. Among them, arrived during the night, were four ram-cruisers, a large corvette, two ram-monitors, and five torpedo gun-vessels from the Netherlands, the remainder of Holland's armament having been caught by the Japanese, or being with her East Indian Navy; there were also three small Norwegian torpedo-vessels; also, the first question asked by Hardy at Portsmouth was this: 'No sign yet of the Spaniards?' There was none: the reason being that, as the entire home-navy of Spain left her by America lay at anchor in Lisbon harbour, together with some Portuguese, they had been attacked by a Japanese cruiser-squadron. Not one escaped without damage; yet, as the Portsmouth force passed down Spithead, they were joined by a force of twelve sail, mostly small, consisting of torpedo gun-vessels, all unarmoured.

Thus in this new Armada, the Spaniard and the Englishman, in strange neighbourhood, fought side by side; this last answer of white Europe to yellow Asia being, as far as possible, unanimous.

There could be no doubt as to the day, or even the hour, of the final forward step of the yellow races. Already, at two of the previous night, it was known in London that incalculable masses of men had put off from Dunkirk, Calais, Boulogne, St. Valéry, Tréport, Dieppe, all along that coast, borne mostly in flats with single paddle-wheel astern, in French-barge fashion — the most elementary form of steam motion — requiring from eighteen to twenty hours to attain the nearest point of the English coast.

The front of this floating host must, therefore, be upon British soil at some almost calculable moment during the afternoon.

They were, as a matter of fact, retarded by an event which, though normal, came upon every one with the effect of a surprise: the air, which for six days had seemed settled in a thick stagnation, at about ten in the morning — moved. A sensible breeze sprang up from the N.W., driving the sea-surface in sharply-lined ovals before it.

And at once there was a slight lightening of the murk of the atmosphere.

Near noon a brief meeting of captains, summoned by Hardy, took place at Government House. He had little to point out, except that the battle upon which they were about to enter was with men of different, less nice, morale and training than ordinary European sailors — clever apes — islanders, yet real foreigners on board a western ship-of-war. He tossed his hand, and added: ‘It is true they are flushed with a consciousness of power, gentlemen, and are greatly superior in metal and numbers. But that will not weigh too much with you.'

He also said that when definite orders went abroad on the impending of the contest, it was his will that his purposes should be explained by captains and commanders to every person in the fighting fleet.

He also said that they would be wasting their energies in this battle, unless one man, whom he had reason to think would be there, were killed or captured; and he himself undertook to discover, without fail, in which ship that man was borne.

Immediately a move was made by captains towards ships in the port, and a few minutes after twelve the signal 'weigh' went up.

At the same time a great bustle of preparation was taking place within the harbour itself. Dark smoke left particles of soot on flapping sail. A host of boats flitted to and fro. Never did Gosport, Portsea, Portsmouth, South-sea, and the forts around them, and the still harbour between them, hear so widespread a rumour of rattling chains and hurrying feet, and shouted God-speeds, and ordering voices.

Cumberland and Southsea Castle Forts hooted a volley of blessings and farewells as the war-ship fleet slipped down the flood-tide. A few minutes later the twelve Spaniards hove in sight.

The fleet was also augmented by the Hero, the Nile, the Sfax, the two gunboats taken in the battle of the Channel, patched up now, and three French composite gun-vessels captured during a Mediterranean battle.

They made up a respectable fighting-power: the nine ships being considerably the most powerful of the Japanese navy, and the Hirosaki the most powerful of ships.

Yet it was only the audacity of Hardy that would, with any hope, have led this force against, we will not say the weight, but the numbers, opposed to him; and the havoc which overtook his comparatively little fleet in the battle that followed would certainly, had his judgment been absolutely cool, have been foreknown to him — or perhaps was foreknown.

Since the year 1892 Japan had placed orders with firms all over the world for a hundred and seventeen new ships, making an aggregate of some hundred and fifteen thousand tons, half to be completed by 1902, and half by 1906. At the period of this new programme, she already possessed a very respectable navy, and at the time of the outbreak of the European war, more than one quarter of the new ships were already in her hands.

Hardy therefore opposed a fleet of forty-three ships all told (only eleven being ships of a high class) to a fleet of one hundred and thirty-nine sail, including the Chinese vessels, mostly of extreme modernity, and high fighting power.

His main dependence at this time seems, as he said, to have been upon the comparative morale of the two crews. He* commanded a fleet manned, except for the Continentals, wholly by British gentlemen; the enemy were imitators, acquainted with tactics recommended in books, incapable, he conceived, of originating, incapable of combating originality. He guessed, too, that small as was his force, he happened to have a superiority in one weapon — not in general a very reliable one — the torpedo.

Perhaps trusting to one or both of these things, he contrived to give the impression (though it is questionable if he was as sincere as usual) that, on starting from port, he was without suspicion that he might now fail to account for Asia as he had accounted for Europe.

The breeze freshened, but the air, though lightened, continued murky; there was some difficulty in deciphering signals; and to facilitate messages by trumpet-call, the ships moved onward in close formation, the Dutch to the extreme starboard, the Spaniards to port.

Ten miles astern spread far the great mass of merchant craft.

Alone sat Hardy in the Hirosaki conning-tower, her flag-captain and staff standing on the bridge. The conning-tower stood on the after-part of the forecastle-deck, very strongly armoured, and communicating by a host of knobs, and an armoured tube, right down to the armoured deck, and every part of the ship.

In that hour, so great a travail came upon this poor, troubled soul, that he could hardly bear to live. Here was the Gethsemane of the young man. All the Care of earth burthened upon him; all the floods and the waters of Destiny passed over him. He groaned; the forehead that rested upon his hand sweated great drops. A year ago he had thought himself a simple Hampshire sailor-lad — and see, now, with the cracking thews of Atlas he must uphold the world! (Oh, if it be possible — if it be possible—’ This old cry of passionate agony rived through all his being. That he alone should bear the whole, he — one frail back; that he should be the ordained to shriek in solitary travail with the birth-pangs of the new Future that was to be, and be rent to shreds and atoms by the eruption of his monstrous offspring, this was piteous. To be a Saviour, it seems, is no light matter: the Redeemer from Hell must himself traverse the flames. At all events, the brain upon which what we call civilisation now depended was near to frenzy. That his toiling back could bear the horrid mass at all proved the dazzling splendour of the boy — but he writhed. The weight was strong: his sinews creaked. Also, in that hour of his gloom, his shattered nerves represented to him the world which he upheld as a world black, draped in crape. ‘Oh, if it be only possible...’ Again and again, in groan on groan, he uttered his agony of spirit, longing only to die, to die. And even as he longed, he sprang up briskly, and he rang:

‘Twelve knots!’

A little S. W. of Beachy Head the fleet was joined by the fast private yacht of a gentleman who was acting as scout. He went on board the Hirosaki, and was conducted before Hardy.

The Japanese fleet, he said, were on the way between the Somme-mouth and the Sussex coast, but very much spread out, not apparently expecting serious opposition, and steaming at the rate of perhaps four or five knots. A vast breadth of channel was parterred for league on league with masses of barge-like craft, which, if one might conjecture, were concentrating toward the narrow part of the Strait. Their progress was very slow; but some were by now certainly not more than nine or ten miles from the Kent coast. The gentleman had passed so near to one mass as to see through his glass a distribution of some sort of green pottage in one barge, and what looked like a fight between two Chinamen in another. He had not been fired at. The boats were incredibly overcrowded. He had heard, he said with a smile, that about 70,000 men were massed upon Hastings, and that forty Maxims were in position on the sea-front.

Shortly before four a scout of the enemy directed from beyond effective range the rays of two search-lights upon the British, and at once hasted back to eastward.

By half-past, the British made out a great bank of cloud to eastward. The breeze had now freshened to a moderately stiff gale from the north-west. For the first time for a week, hurrying dark clouds above were visible athwart a gloom of twilight. The sea was curling into fore-running hollows before the British stems, like backing pages, who, with bows and graces, usher in the visitor.

John Hardy's brain, and heart, and life was in his eyes. He glared through his glass like a famished wolf.

The bank of smoke quickly cleared; he could discern forms of ships — eight miles from him, a line abreast — and moving, it was clear, rapidly. Legion was their name. His eyes started and stared; he muttered with his lips.

He gazed for two minutes, crazily, hundred-eyed; then he * started, and hissed a swift ‘By God!’ Then he flew to the communications.

To be signalled to the fleet:

‘Keep speed and formation. Use no torpedoes in combat.’

To his own engine-room:

Full speed ahead 1’

The engines of the Hirosaki instantly quickened their throb and complex turmoil. She forged forward. Her best speed was nearly nineteen knots. She was like an ugly, stout island in a hurry.

The wondering question went pervading his fleet — was he about to fight the entire navy of Japan alone? Was he not rushing like the demented whom the gods destroy into the very mouth of hell?

The Hirosaki, we have said, was undoubtedly the best engine of war that was ever devised and built. She was armoured with Harveyed nickel steel, and her belt, which extended from stem to stern, was over eight feet in depth, and nine inches thick throughout engine, boiler, and magazine spaces. Now, above this belt, her side to the height of the main-deck was covered with 6-inch armour for a length of some 250 feet, enclosing two barbettes; while at each end of the belt there was a curved bulkhead fourteen inches thick between the armoured and main decks; so that a quite complete citadel, 250 feet long, was formed.

Her gun-casemates, moreover, were shielded both on the inner and outer sides, so that their crews worked under a protection almost ideal; while her barbettes, circular in plan, were protected with 14-inch armour, rising to a height of 4 feet above the upper-deck.

With such a tool of war something might be dared. Nearer she went, ploughing in impressive, squat haste straight towards the middle of the interminable Japanese line; and while the rest of the British fleet were still beyond effective range, a sudden rain fell from the military-tops of two cruisers upon her decks.

The Hirosaki did not answer.

With ripped decks and annihilated boats, on she went, straining her engines, every egress from the stokeholds closed by the devoted men who toiled like salamanders in her depths.

Within two minutes from the opening of fire, a shell from the 32-cm. gun of the Akitsusushima (one of the two ships at the point where Hardy aimed to break the enemy's line) had burst through the shield of the fore-barbette, killed or wounded all its crew, and disabled the turn-table.

And now a horror of wonder and consternation spread among the crew of the Hirosaki — at her strange silence — at her frenzied adventure.

Where was Hardy? Was he stricken dumb? Was he dead? Was he dancing mad?

An ashen-faced London barrister in one of the port casemates of the 6-inch quick-firers on the main-deck gasped in a dry-throated whisper:

‘He is dead!’

And Brassey of Kiao-Chau, ashen-faced also, gasped in answer:

‘Bah! what are you talking about?’

The engines roared, the sea whitened, the Hirosaki walked grandly down an arcade of flame and smoke.

She had passed through the first line of the enemy between two cruisers, the Akitsusushima and the Hasidate, which she could have sunk by a mere snarl of her broadsides. Yet she did not speak.

Before her came two more, the Ten-rio, and the Takao; and the two before and the two behind concentrated upon her their fires.

Every one looked to see her sink; certainly, it was only a question of moments — of how many moments the fire continued from such close quarters. The outward appearance of the ship, by the time she reached the second Japanese line abreast, was one of mere ruin and havoc.

The enemy were as astounded at her conduct as her crew. But in a few instants they knew — they thought that they knew.

Twenty or twenty-two cables behind the second Japanese line came a ship of considerable size, alone — that is to say, protected by the whole praeposited mass of her navy. Yet she was a ship-of-war.

As soon as the Hirosaki emerged from the world of coppery gloom into which she had passed, as it were, a living thing, to come forth, but for her central citadel and propelling mechanism, a dead — she turned her bows upon this ship.

The ship was the Yoshino; though powerfully armed, she was one of the ships called ‘unarmoured’; smoking over a map in her cabin sat Yen How.

Hardy had reached him! One well-directed shell, one happy torpedo, and, beyond doubt, the yellow host will be leaderless...

And now, at last, the Hirosaki talks; but she talks in such a sorry, effete, and slipshod manner, that a whole crowd of Japanese captains who are already hastening to the rescue of that one precious ship, laugh in their conning-towers. Was there ever such miserable aiming? such false sight? Not one of the shots takes effect. The Yoshino keeps on her way untouched. The rash Hirosaki has run that appalling blockade of flame in vain. And to complete her ignominy, immediately upon her first feeble effort, she turns tail, and goes blundering in defeated flight to the S.E.

She was evidently the flag-ship of the British, and the fact that she had reserved her fire in her passage through the fleet, and had then singled out, and fired upon, the Yoshino, proved to the Japanese that the British knew in which ship Yen How was borne, and that their one and only object in fighting now was the destruction of Yen How.

The one and only object of the Japanese must therefore be the protection of that one ship, the Yoshino.

It was in order that they might arrive at this very conclusion, that Hardy had made his awful passage through their fleet, had abstained from firing, — and had fired upon the Yoshino.

It was his design that the enemy should be, above all things, anxious to protect her. And he used the Hirosaki for the adventure, because he knew well that no other ship at his disposal could have continued on her way forty seconds through that flaming avenue.

But the on-lookers slandered the Hirosaki's crew in supposing them such very sorry gunners. The same mind which had bid them fire had bid them miss. The Yoshino was needed.

‘The morale of the fighters!’ With the most astounding precision Hardy seems to have divined it. How much of his mind the enemy would guess, and exactly where their guessing power would cease, he appears by some divine instinct to have known infallibly. A European crew, knowing the fame of Hardy, and observing his present fatuity, might have surmised some design, all the more appallingly rough and rude in its results, in proportion to its consummate depth. The Japanese simply read the surface of his mind, and were proud of their reading.

They-concluded that his main design was to destroy the person of Yen How — and it was — they were right. But his thoughts were as much beyond their thoughts as the heavens are beyond the earth.

He goes careering to the S.E., and three very swift cruisers that follow in chase he promptly sinks.

Yonder, at the front, the general battle has begun, and a sound breaks out like the sound of ten million rocks battering in rowdy degradingation down a wooden stair reaching from the moon to the earth. And see how, really, that is good for Hardy — native to the very temper of his mother's womb — the sole rough music in the universe which can make his large spirit dance! It would be hard now to recognise in him the gloomy, cowering, burdened wight, who, half an hour ago, groaned in the Hirosaki conning-tower. His exhilaration is boundless; his face is flushed. If it were possible, joy now would re-dye the hair which grief had blanched. Here is his element, his day — great Thursday — and he, once more, Saxon Thor, red-handed, swinger of thunderbolts, tosser of linked lightnings. The oil of gladness is on his head. He feels his arm, his soul, his ordination. He knows that he cannot fail.

He wheels: — the Hirosaki, left alone, is steering S. — S.W. — W. — then W. by N. What is left of the European fleet, thirty-five craft, most of them already gravely injured, have now changed places with the Japanese, they being to the east, the Japanese to the west of them. Both sides put their helms down to re-form and change. Only a solid phalanx of twenty ships remain in guard about the Yoshino, which is slowly forging ahead in her old direction.

The Hirosaki is signalling. The old starboard half of ships are to follow her in single file; the old port are to watch evolutions of Hirosaki, and follow suit on their side.

Immediately the Hirosaki's bows turn a little to the south of eastward. Nineteen ships follow her with bows a little to the south of eastward. Sixteen ships follow her with bows a little to the north of eastward. At the utmost speed of the craft of lowest power they steam away in these directions.

The yellow men discern that the white are flying. Or is it not rather a mere feint to get at the precious, guarded ship? Yes, that is soon evidently it! for the two files of retreating ships turn south and north, and then in wide curves westward. The Japs are after them.

Between the Europeans are intervals of not more than six cables. The crowd of Japanese come two abreast, the nearest four about a knot astern of the two hindermost Europeans. The Hirosaki leads now the port European limb, the Hero the starboard.

The two hindermost Europeans in the two limbs are the Dutch corvette Van Galen and the British-Japanese battleship Fugi; these are the only direct combatants, and are using stern-guns. In three minutes the Van Galen dives, and the Fugi cranks and stops. The British force is reduced to thirty-three.

So far not a single yellow ship has sunk. Five, in the first charge, have been disabled, the rest only seriously injured by the destruction of unprotected crews. Hitherto they are victors twice and thrice.

They gain upon the retreating squadrons, The average of their speed is greater than that of the Europeans.

Suddenly, after four knots from the start, Hardy turns, and in a short inward curve comes back eastward. The starboard limb, with a short inward curve, follow suit.

And now it becomes quite clear to every one on his side that, whatever his design, he is accomplishing it at a murderous, a disastrous cost. For as the ships come back, they present a long line of broadside to a still greater length of Japanese broadside — at horribly close quarters; and in the sudden, exclamatory, almost momentary, outrage of hell-fire which bursts from both sides, the ships sink fast. The gentlemen of England acquit themselves well; with precision, with tympana that do not quite burst, with brains that do not quite faint, with hands that do not fail. In that loud squall of wrath they send twenty Japanese and Chinese ships to their grave in the two limbs; and they themselves are nine the less. The Japanese can afford the loss. Not they.

And now, in a minute — so fast do they tear along — the hostile fleets are parted. The enemy, all very near together, go on through the evolutionary curves which the British have described, and come following eastward.

They look now for a rush of the British upon the guarded ship, ready to follow. But no rush comes. The British keep on their way almost directly east.

A rush will come. But Hardy intends it to come when the Japs are in a position to intercept and cut him off. His thought, his patience, is far beyond their divination.

On he goes, leading them grandly through the mazes of that tragic, coiling minuet; and they follow, hasting gladly after him, triumphant, blind, fated.

The Pied Piper and his retinue...!

His ships sink one by one. He is aware of it with guilty disquiet. Will enough be left for his purpose? The falling out of each one by the way-side is to him like the taste of the second death.

The Japanese follow, not gaining ground this time, purposely keeping their distance, even increasing it, waiting for the next curve to westward, and the disastrous swift broadside.

And round again goes Hardy, wheeling outward, this time in a broader curve; and outward wheels his northern limb.

[The arrows in the diagram will show the course he took, S being the region of his start, and the dots in the central part representing the twenty ships round Yen How.]

And once again clatters the sudden, exclamatory outrage of hell-fire, bursting from both sides, and Hardy comes out of it leaving behind him four, and the Japanese seven ships.

But the numerical strength of Hardy's remaining ships by no means represents his real strength. He is far weaker than he seems. Twenty-two floating craft are still visible to his eye, but craft so broken and undone, that he knows them incapable of further serious combat. Nearly ninety Japanese are as good for fight as ever.

Once more he is running westward, and the enemy, conscious now of easy victory, follow.

Westward — till his two foremost ships reach the positions marked A and A' in the diagram: and then hard to starboard races his helm. He goes driving sharp and straight with straining engines for the packed group of ships around the Yoshino.

This, then, is 'the rush'! But the Japanese ships, their foremost being at the position marked B and B', are nearer to the Yoshino than the British — are in the exact position in which Hardy, at the price of so much, has led them by the nose in long twining dance in order to place them.

What they will now do, he knows with certainty: they will cut him off. And, in fact, they turn sharply inward towards the precious, guarded ship, in order to intercept, and, with one unanimous battery of their entire navy, finish at once his small remainders.

And thus it has suddenly happened that the whole yellow fleet is packed into a mere bundle of ships whose crews can speak to each other, whose steersmen need be cautious to avoid collision.

And when Hardy sees them so, — herded together by his harsh and baleful forethought, — like sheep driven into the pen-fold, — he knows that the yellow wave is dammed, and the greatest of his works is accomplished.

He could shriek aloud with cruel glee. ...

Abroad roams his eye over the sea at his sinking and battered fleet. And as he looks he sees the foundering of the Nile.

And swift, with concentrated fury, the massed Japanese open fire upon his feeble residue.

At that moment the two limbs of the British are not more than three hundred yards from the front of the enemy.

And at that moment it is that an appalling, horrid, unparalleled thing is happening to the Yellow Men.

Hardy has signalled to his ships to launch among the crowding enemy every possible torpedo in his fleet.

His prohibition to use torpedoes in the combat had led his captains to expect some such final order. They were well ready.

The torpedo was, of course, the most deadly of the then instruments of war. If it exploded beneath a ship, without fail it destroyed her. But precisely the most deadly was also, in general, the most unreliable, of weapons. In general it might be counted upon to explode, not beneath an enemy's ship, but beneath a friend's, or, more likely still, beneath nothing at all. No serious tactician depended upon it.

In other words, it was not a good engine of aim at a given target, for it usually missed the target. Its course was more or less deflected by the waves — many things happened to it.

It was left to the eye of Hardy to perceive that its proper function was not one of aim at all toward a particular target, but one of loose direction toward a general mass. Under such conditions, it might be counted upon to annihilate in an instant all the assembled navies of the earth.

Prompt upon his order, the restes of his fleet, shattered as they were, were able to launch a ripping navy of nine more torpedoes than there were crowding Japanese and Chinese ships. The Hirosaki sent five: one from a bow-tube above the water-line, four submerged. All the other ships were ships with a varying number of tubes.

Three exploded in mutual collision before they reached the hostile fleet.

The rest arrived.

Men clapped and squeezed their hands upon their ears in expectant horror. The sea began to start, and rush, and quake. A swift series of venomous, behemoth bangs — quickenning into ever madder swiftness — and bawling at last into a steady brooding roar of passionate volleyed thunder that seemed to proceed from the very throat of Jehovah — rent the universal air, and split the hearing of all about that sea.

In London, men, three-eared, lifted a listing hand; far over Europe the rumour of it was heard; it was heard in Paris; it was heard in Brussels.

The British ships, shocked at each swift-recurrent detonation, jerked and started in convulsive throes, like dying fowl, upon the spasmodic, kicking water — started, and leapt, and dived, and foundered. And as though in response to some vast upheaval of nature, down upon the sea swept at once a passion of wind, and a furious rain, and a black and total gloom.

Wide over the ocean the floating millions of yellow men heard the staccato of that dread tumult. And many a one imitated and repeated the sound with his lips.

Pop, pop, pop, they went; and pop, pop, pop, they went.

CHAPTER XXXIII. THE 'CRIME' OF HARDY

IT IS NOT our business here to defend what has been called by leisured persons sitting secure in their studies the 'crime' of Hardy.

Napoleon, taking the 'Laws of Heaven' into his own hands, poisoned at Acre a number of his sick soldiers to save them from the hands of a cruel enemy. This, too, raised a cry, and was called 'crime.'

Another of that genus took upon himself to break the old Sabbath, and this raised a cry; but he did not mind.

Personally, we believe that the Great Man has, naturally and properly, these powers; that what he does is right; that the King can do no wrong.

Having cleared the sea of hostile war-ships in that world-tragedy in the Channel, Hardy found himself confronted with the problem of an army which was approaching a long line of English coast — not far off — an army which was not so much an army as a locust host.

What was he to do with them?

He could not set about and shoot them, for that, supposing he had had a large fleet, would have taken him a year, as Yen How said. Moreover, he had next to nothing to shoot them with.

Possibly he might, by spreading out his vast merchant fleet, armed with small guns, along the south-east coast, have kept them off till they starved; and this was supposed by his captains to be the course he would adopt.

But twenty million putrefying, derelict Chinese in barges floating at random in the Channel fair-way for the next year or two does not seem to have been after his mind. And to starve them on the open sea ... even his pitiless heart revolted from that.

Or, they might have been driven back to France; or, seeing that they could not land on England, they might have returned to France on their own initiative. But Hardy did not wish them to return to France, thinking that there were already there a sufficient number of millions to engage the energies of his country for many a long day to come.

And so it happened that with the next morning's light — for at last something resembling a sun was seen, in spite of a furious gale of wind now blowing from the north-west — a strange, new spectacle, somewhere rather south of the latitude of Harwich, was seen — an immense multitude of ships covering the entire circle of sea, crawling painfully northward, each one trailing behind her a long line of barges crowded with men.

Hardy had the twenty millions in tow.

Not one had landed. To this diversion from their purpose they had made practically no resistance. If a Chinaman fired at the tug which came to secure his barge, the barge was promptly sunk by way of stern example. Most were unarmed with fire-arms.

For many hours during the afternoon and night of the battle they toiled by the aid of search-lights, the ships having rendezvous at the N. Foreland, where, at about midnight, they congregated.

And now began the long, toilsome voyage northward.

What made the sufferings of both whites and Chinese worse, was the fact that, from the first bleak sunrise to the last, a heavy wet sea was running in the direction of the gale, and the creaking and labouring ships continually drenched their length in spray shipped over the dipping bows. A monotonous, light rain fell from the 'dark-gray and hurrying sky; and wide over the heaving, stale sea-water rolled down stretches of foaming seaspume, as though the sea, sea-sick of itself, spumed the vomit of its bitter old unrest adown its own weary bosom. Through the cordage skirled in many tones the gale; and salt was in the weird sagas that it skirled, and salt on the drenched decks, and salt in the wet sea, and the world was made of winds and brine.

Ever and again, a ship staggered through every timber, and stopped, tugged from behind by a backward swing of her ponderous following. Then on, crawling, again.

Here the tail led the dog.

Ever and again, pop would go a stout hawser, and away would go drifting to the S.E. the lessening scream of a barge-load of Chinamen.

Northward, northward, in vast funereal procession. And far yonder in the van of all — the Hirosaki, shattered-looking, butting bulkily at the billows, as one who has seen worse things, — and come through them. In her cabin, which is crowded with wounded men, sits Hardy; and near him, in long colloquy, a man named Henrick Bjornson, a Norwegian sea-captain, who can shout broken English. What Hardy's deaf ears cannot make out, the man writes.

Northward crawls the unspeakable procession. It crosses the latitude of Hull, of Edinburgh; it approaches the Norway coast; it is at Bergen, at Christiansund. Always it crawls northward, and the Hirosaki, like the Pied Piper, leads...

On the Tuesday foreday, the Hirosaki, in latitude 67° 48', slackened speed, and, while the dawning was still gray and ineffably bleak, the stragglers of the fleet came in.

Hardy had reached the grave-side now — the side of the one grave which Europe offered him for the burial of his dead.

Here and now a very great stress and sound of stormy winds was abroad, struggling for the held-on hat', blowing long ribbons of rope, and rolling before it billows of the sea.

The Hirosaki trumpeted a semicircular formation, and this for about an hour, from ship to ship, went trumpeted, till it reached the outermost rings of ships ten miles away. And in another hour and a half the vastest curve of ships, stretching north-east and south-west, that had ever been seen by an eye — the horns looking like tiny toys to the centre, and invisible to each other — lay assembled, slowly steaming, or sailing close-hauled.

The morning lightened, but with ever a slow, and drear, and raw melancholy. It was the morning of an execution.

Hardy, with the flaps of an oil-skin hat about his ears, in oil-skins to his feet, stood clinging to a roping aft, facing the strong blast that loaded his breast with spasms of violence, and struggled for the ends of his flapping and quarrelling skirts. And near him, in oil-skins, stood a tall, broad-bearded man, the sea-captain Bjornson.

Bjornson touched him.

Hardy said: 'Well?'

Bjornson took out his watch, held it before Hardy's eyes, put his mouth to Hardy's ears, and shouted:

'It is time!'

Hardy said:

'All right.'

Already in the look of the water around, there was something horribly outré. It seemed as if the sea was getting calm — too calm for the wind that blew. It acquired a certain pallid oiliness in its heave.

Hardy called his trumpeter; he said:

‘Tell the captain of the Umbria that I want a hundred and fifty Chinamen taken on board his ship — at once.’

And down the wind went this command to the neighbouring ship.

And in ten minutes this other:

‘Ships to cast off barges, and follow flag-ship in same formation, west by south.’

At once the Hirosaki put her bow in this direction. The other ships, as their hawsers astern tightened on their new course, slipped them. A thousand hawsers slapped the sea.

The ships moved on. The barges remained.

But not stationary. They, too, moved — slowly — glidingly — right in the teeth of the wind — northward — all of them, over many a mile.

The barges fell into long strings, and patches, and colonies, like trailing sea-weed, always, as they glided, retaining their fixed relative positions.

The men in the barges saw surely that they moved. But what moved them? The crude early-morning blast blew upon their most woeful, fallow faces.

Their rate of motion, from moment to moment, quickened...

There was something now detestably baleful in the aspect of the water. The great waves had died to a glassy, heaving smoothness. Only, here and there in irregular patches over the surface, broke out stretches of vapid foam, or ghastly bubbles. And the ocean went gadding, gadding northward.

This is the first mood of the Maelstrom...

Then a wonder happened. A string of barges shot suddenly askew, and went wildly hasting in a long curve to the east; and another string shot askew in a western curve; and in not more than a minute a hundred thousand barges were flightily ranging in curves of every shape and direction over the sea, flying a while — then slowly stopping — then flying off in new curves again.

Suddenly, all this motion ceased. The sea settled into a lake-like stillness, except for patches of bursting, simmering bubbles on its face.

But with the suddenness of the thunder-clap came a change. The surface rapidly assumed a morose hue of the deepest blue, a blue which was liker black. And at once it began to heave itself up into waves, mountain-high, which danced like the Merry-men in a swinging, oscillatory, up-and-down jig, as if buoyed up by some great submarine power which dandled, and tossed, and danced them. And down the steep sides of these cones of water poured the barges of the clinging, staring, screaming men.

But now again, suddenly, the mood is changed — and a ‘Voice goes forth over the waters, a doleful sound of the sea. The high dancing waves die down, and immediately an awful wide change is taking place — a rapid, intense reorganisation of the whole sea-surface — a breathless hurry and scurry of preparation for some unspeakable drama of the deep. There are tracts of black and choppy sea tumbling in roaring haste one way, and tracts tumbling like herds of ten thousand bellowing bisons another, as if flying across to take sides in some impending agony. And all at once the whole is over: and every wave, and eddy, and barge, and flake of froth slips into the sweep of one mighty, bawling, racing whirlpool.

Within the writhing uppermost ridge of this vast circumference, invisible under a fierce white wrath of shrieking spray, fly with a thousand wings the barges of the yellow men, fly on even keel, fly uplifted, spurned from the polished ebony of the dizzy basin of water. And as they fly, the storm smothers their gasping breaths, and lifts their hair.

And as their speed intensifies to the droning sleep of the spinning-top, their queues stiffen and rise horizontal like darting serpents; and twenty million straight and fluttering pigtails, keeping ever their distances, race in narrowing whorls towards a bottomless, staggering well, a steep epileptic abyss, that yawns, six furlongs broad, within the central space.

Six miles away, his glass at his eyes, stands John Hardy, musing...

* * * * *

Opposite Christiansund, the Illrosaki and the Umbria were very near together; and here a change of crew took place; the entire crew of the Umbria transhipping into the Hirosaki, and one hundred and thirty of the Hirosaki's crew going over into the Umbria.

These hundred and thirty consisted exclusively of 'Hundred-and-Eighty' men of Kiao-Chau fame.

It was a mysterious proceeding, incomprehensible to Umbria men, but readily comprehensible to some of the 'Hundred and Eighty.' These had sworn an oath.

On board the Umbria were a hundred and fifty Chinese.

Murray (he of the Diary) took over with him to the Umbria a small packet which he had received from Hardy's hand — which Hardy, in his turn, had received from a Dr. Fletcher of Harley Street.

The packet contained some hypodermic syringes, and three vials, containing a thick dark-gray liquid...

The Hirosaki then continued on her southward way; but the Umbria put in at Christiansund.

There, on the strand near the town, shortly before morning, they landed two of the hundred and fifty Chinamen. In the right forearm of each of these two men was a tiny needle-prick; and as they went walking toward the town, an ink-black spot appeared on their cheek, and a black froth ridged their lips...

The Umbria then continued her voyage, which lasted two weeks. She stopped at Copenhagen, at Koenigsberg, at Stockholm, at St. Petersburg. And wherever she stopped, she landed two Chinamen with black spots on their cheeks, and a black froth at their lips...

She continued her voyage. She stopped at Amsterdam, at Boulogne, at Bordeaux, at Genoa, at Constantinople, at Odessa, at seventy-five European ports. At each she left two Chinamen with needle-pricks in their forearms.

* * * * *

Well, well, Brassey,' said Hardy in the Hirosaki cabin, his arm flung spasmodically round the neck of Brassey, who had remained with him, 'well, well, boy. I was once — I was once — different from this—'

His arm dropped heavily. Then, suddenly, he pushed Brassey violently on the breast.

'Go away — go away — sir,' he cried.

And in an instant his arm dropped heavily again, his chin on his breast.

He was no longer sane. His hand was thicker than itself with brother's blood. His final hour of darkness and tragedy was hasting to meet his life. All his sky was an ink of clouds. Now again he tarried, cowering, in Gethsemane.

He no longer slept. Now he roamed the cabin like a wild man: now he sat still and languid, his head on his hands, his eyes having in them the senility of old people's. Every five minutes he bent double in paroxysms of moist coughing. Always the sailor, Brassey, was by him.

The Hirosaki arrived at Dover on the Friday evening at seven. A red brand of fever was then on Hardy's brow.

He was taken through the crowd in a close carriage to the Lord Warden Hotel. The news was flashed abroad that he had arrived, and all the bells of England gladly lilted and welcomed his coming. Hardy could not hear them.

For him was neither joy nor sleep. Doctors were summoned, but Hardy would not see them.

He threw himself on a bed; but rose again and paced the chamber in shirt and trousers and socks to a late hour.

At eleven there was a ring. Brassey, who was in an anteroom, received a card at the door from a servant, but said there was to be no admittance of any sort that night.

Hardy appeared suddenly at the inner door of the anteroom; he said:

‘What is it?’

Brassey handed him the card, and Hardy- looked at it.

‘Ha! ha! ha!’ he laughed at once. ‘My friend Edrapol! Ha! ha! ha! Edrapol, my old friend!’

He had wholly forgotten Edrapol.

Behind the ruins of St. Mary’s Church, north-east of the town, at two that morning — they fought.

Here the strong, prone will of Hardy had asserted itself. He had insisted, and could not be withstood by Brassey. Edrapol’s second was a sailor from the Hirosaki, Hardy’s was Brassey; and the weapons used were Hirosaki swords of Japanese design.

A full moon shone. Yonder on the footpath leading from the East Cliffs waits a carriage, which has been coachmanned by Brassey.

It is a barbarous duel. There is no doctor there. Positively only four men are in the secret.

They take places, sword in hand, stripped to their shirts. The seconds take their places too. There are two Admiral Colomb ship-lanterns.

This is a duel without venom on either side. In one mind there is the mere prone desperation of an hour of tragic gloom; in the other a mere coxcombish pleasure at finding once more a sword in his hand, and an antagonist before him.

Only two hearts throb as though they must burst the imprisoning bosom — the hearts of the seconds. The hearts of the principals are cool, though Hardy's body burns with fever.

The moment comes. Hardy coughs; Edrapol waits. Then the swords lift and cross.

And now ensues a three minutes' contest between the most exquisite conceivable science on the one side, and the shrewdest, quickest wit on the other.

Briskly ply the complex, gleaming steels, with feint and thrust and parry, in tierce and quarte and staccado, stab and hew — to the infinite surprise of Edrapol, who finds here a man that can fight, and is glad.

He braces himself to the matter, Edrapol. He rises a la hauteur of his antagonist. But rise as he may, the fame of great Edrapol is henceforth stained, and his sleeve — with a thin trickle of blood.

He flushes somewhat, Edrapol. It is necessary, then, to couper court? He rises to a still greater height. Among the long white hairs of the famous man plays the night wind.

Then there is the sudden 'Ah-, ' and the limp failure, and the strong contrast of red on white, and the sword clattering to the ground. The steel of Edrapol is in Hardy's bosom.

The next morning Britain learned with woe and terror that he was wounded. He lay at the Lord Warden Hotel, and was unconscious; but as to the wound, it was not dangerous. So ran the bulletins.

But by the next night he was tossing in acute hyperpyrexia, and was delirious. Miss Isabel Jay had hurried to his side in almost crazy scare, and about his apartment waited two royal ladies. In one of the anterooms of the suite sat old Mason, stricken to death, swaying his decrepit body from side to side.

Half-hourly bulletins were issued by the royal physicians.

At one time during the second night, Hardy seems to have gone back in imagination to the period of his tortures, uttering fearful screams, and exhibiting signs of the most abject terror. But toward morning, he became calmer under the influence of opiates.

About noon, Miss Jay's hand being then firmly gripped in his, he said quite coolly:

‘A good strong coffin of Harveied nickel steel dropped into the middle of the Channel...’

And there stopped. Nor spoke again till some three hours afterwards, when, lifting up his right arm, he cried in a loud voice:

‘By the Lord, I warn you, Yen How...!’

After this the delirium appeared to leave him. He sank into a quiet sleep, which, however, was made ominous by a throat-rattle, and the venous transparency of his far-sunken eye-lids.

The nation waited on in a bitterness of suspense, humbling itself before the Almighty in anguished prayer for his life, but for his life...

But at seven in the evening the end came. Hardy suddenly woke from his feeble slumber, jerked his body upright on the bed, and as if in answer to some official summons and roll-call, screamed a sharp ‘Here!’ and gasped, and died.

His Calvary was not heroic — without ‘vigour and rigour.’

That the great man of England should perish by the hand of an impossible, very-foreign professional duellist, here was the very irony of Destiny. But so it was.

CHAPTER XXXIV. THE BLACK SPOT

WITH THE DEATH of Hardy the detail of our chronicle must end.

The results of his malignest act of enmity against the yellow race — results far surpassing in horror and vastness those of any of his other acts — he did not live to witness.

It is certain that he could never have expected so widespread a result from the distribution of the injected Chinamen about the European coasts, for the simple reason that he did not know of Yen How's inauguration of the Yellow Gods at Paris, which inauguration was the chief cause of the universality on the Continent of the new Black Death.

As soon as an idol-less Chinaman was griped by the malady, or even saw the black spot on a neighbour's cheek, his first instinct was to rush toward the one place of hope — the temple at Paris. And as he rushed, he went spreading far and wide that winged plague, that more putrid Cholera, dissipating it among thousands, who, in their turn, rushed to infect wide millions.

So within three weeks perished, it is said, a hundred and fifty millions. Europe was a rotting charnel-house.

But in three months the plague was over; and still England found herself confronted with the long, and sometimes bloody, and always tedious, task of clearing out of Europe nearly a hundred million yellow men.

The operations of the two main British armies were long and wearisome. One was led by Lord Wolseley in person; the other by Kaiser Wilhelm. (Wilhelm, having refused to leave the Fatherland on the Chinese irruption, had been seized by the members of a conspiracy initiated by Fürst Bismarck; the gallant man had been brought over bound to England. He was afterwards given the command of the British force which had been recalled from Germany; and this he led with fine success.)

On every spot on the Continent where the British could get a board stuck up, there were boards, offering, in Chinese characters, safe-conduct back to their native land of all Chinese who chose to present themselves at certain ports. And even while the fighting went on, millions of suffering yellow men took advantage of this offer.

After all, John Hardy's idea of the extinction of the yellow man never came to pass. Hardy was wise, but Nature is wiser. The yellow man is in the Scheme:

And since God suffers him to be, He, too, is God's minister, And labours for some good...

But now, this one appalling fact arose upon the consciousness of the British people: that the Continent of Europe was British territory. This meant that all Asia and Africa were British too. And if Europe, Asia, and Africa, then, beyond doubt, America also; for no two Powers, one so vast, the other so comparatively small, could coexist side by side without a formal or informal acknowledgment of the suzerainty of the greater by the smaller. The sceptre of Britain, therefore, stretched from pole to pole,-and from the river to the ends of the earth.

How now would she comport herself, old England? Would her reign be mild, and golden, and millennial? Or harsh, and vulgar, and triste?

Here now was the chance for the rather minor poets of the time to break into measured prophecy, and, with a certain real authority, sing for the nation its august present, and suggest its future. And Mr. William Watson — the man-harp — say Apollo's lyre, without Apollo — he sang:

Now declare me, my love, my sibyl,
The Temple you foresee;
Its technic, and scheme, and glamour,
And the Fabric's summary.

So the lover sitting at the feet of his inspired mistress; and the mistress:

But the technic, and scheme, and glamour
Of the world they now shall use?
Like a purple bed of rainbows
En route with a Corinth of hues!

Like a dew of flocks on the hillside;
Or the flocks of dew at morn:
So harmless, various, off-sprung.
Like a King's Heir, tardy-born.

Like anything mild and pompous,
Like anything based and broad:
Like the ascent with which Sh'lomoh
Went up to the House of the Lord.

Like the minuet's sphere-rhyming,
So cultured, fated, gay;
Like the Voice of God in the Garden
When it walked in the Cool of the Day.

It is the Ergon of all the Ages,
And kin to all Works of Art;

It shall stand in the All-Museum
As Man's contributed part.

For Mr. John Davidson, on the other hand (Gilpin Pegasus-rider he, or say even Pegasus-Jockey, not unacquainted with falls), the throng and noise of martial things — Man's struggle before his triumph and rest — had charms; and, out at the spur of the war, he breaks:

Roll, rotary barytone!
Break up the camp of them!
Weigh now the ramp of them,
Marching to Marathon;
World-quake the tramp of them!

And he insists:

Wide, wide is the song of it,
Martyrdoms, doubtings,
Battle-words, routings,
Mix in the throng of it,
Jericho shoutings...!

* * * * *

But Ares, our man o' war,
O'er-flames us unequal,
Nor doubtful the sequel:
Hark! vague from the van o' war
Rave rumours of triumph...

But in the matter of prophecy, it was the poet, Mr. Francis Thompson, — Miltonic he, if not Milton, seeming sometimes to possess that rarest of human faculties, the power of expressing an idea (or ‘thing-seen-in-the-mind’) in few, wraithly words, suggesting magic — he, in a single line, struck the chief motive of the future. For he says, shortly before the war:

I had in dreams an omen of the Year,
And many shapes foresaw, and divers woes;
In earth and sky was storm — till one clear sphere,
Calm as the moon, arose.

I marked processions; runnings to and fro;
(One gasped his news, and died, arrived from far);
The torch of France, and England’s tramping slow;
And trumpets blown for war.

Then grided the fight — smoke-patched the champaign old;
The roving saddle trailed a gory smile;
And prattling brittle crackles broke and rolled
Far down the thin, red file.

“The people have forgotten God,” I said:
Frowns so superb, a war so vast, they showed:
The rocking nations, brazen-throated, dread, Like Bulls of Bashan lowed.

* * * * *

A Comet in the East, hell’s search-light drear;
Eclipses boding Change; and divers woes:

In earth and sky was night — till one clear sphere,
Calm as the moon, arose.

* * * * *

Then one I saw who steered a boat of air,
A thing with helm complete, and valve, and sail:
He called: “To bring man nearer man I fare:
The gods up here — are well.”

This prophecy of the boat of air was quite worthy of a seer; for that — successful aerial navigation — was, as it turned out, the big matter, the paramount motif of the new century, utterly changing the relations of man with man, and, in fact, making Man a new creature.

When the journey from London to Pekin became a matter of a few hours, and a thing easy to each man, then Man, and each man, might be said, for the first time, to possess the earth.

The immediate result was the establishment, once and for all, of that sole basis of real national culture, and of real individual refinement — ÉGALITÉ!

Upon the practical annihilation of one sort of space followed the annihilation of other sorts of space — of the space, for example, between you and me.

Egalité! Victoria does not despise the Prince of Monaco. Both are independent sovereigns. The little prince does not kneel before the great queen: they are independent sovereigns. When all men were independent sovereigns, then came Culture, and the golden time.

A democracy of kings ... or, at the very least, of gentlemen...

The name of this democracy was — English?

The words France, Germany, Russia, persisted — but only for postal convenience?

No, certainly, that would never do — not in 1899. England, no doubt, will in truth, absorb the world; the Loadstone is within us. But we must change. If the world is to become English, the English must first become worldly. We will not, of course, do as we are — we are in such very shockingly bad form! God will not have his otiose, green world made into a great, base Factory. We are not wild and innocent enough, not simple and archaic and joyous enough. In England, there do not, at present, grow sufficient flowers to adorn a length of sceptre which could stretch across the earth.

Yet here is a question: how came that epithet 'merry' to be applied to our vulgar Yankee-Roman England? How came it?

Is it not for this very reason — that all Man is embryo within us? Man the engineer, Man the conqueror, Man the ruler, Man the Puritan, Man the Greek, Man the Bacchant?

That Bacchant-Greek phase, certainly, is in a state of embryonism 'highly elementary'! Our Oxford professors do not crown their heads with vine-leaves — yet. The vine is not, in fact, an English plant. Yet, lo! one hears already that it is being grown with success in Wales.

Wales — note the locality. Great England! In her is everything. In her also is — the Celt.

This is what John Hardy meant, when, writing from Paris, he said that all which they had there we should have too, in time — and much more, much more. And Hardy was a lad likely to know.

England, indeed, is nearly as old as France. But not so 'precocious.' Just as the French ladies fade sooner than the English, so France has become a modish, sprightly old dowager, while England is yet a bouncing, crude, coarse-handed lass in her teens.

The centuries are not ended; the years of God will unfold themselves.

On the whole, we here, looking up through the Night at the general drift of the stars, read for the earth a good Horoscope. We bet on Man. He is a right clever fellow — honest-hearted — well-made. We lay our money on him — to our last kopek, to our final obol, to our uttermost farthing — we bet it all on him!

His past is good — it is even brilliant. And somewhere within it there peeps and flirts a Secret, which, at certain swift moments of detective luck, shocks and dazzles and electrifies the soul.

We, then, for our part, believe, and cry aloud, and prophesy. Out of the Eater shall come forth Meat, and out of the Strong shall come forth Sweetness.

‘The gods up here’...!

THE END

Contraband of War (1899)

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I.
CHAPTER II.
CHAPTER III.
CHAPTER IV.
CHAPTER V.
CHAPTER VI.
CHAPTER VII.
CHAPTER VIII.
CHAPTER IX.
CHAPTER X.
CHAPTER XI.
CHAPTER XII.
CHAPTER XIII.
CHAPTER XIV.
CHAPTER XV.
CHAPTER XVI.
CHAPTER XVII.
CHAPTER XVIII.
CHAPTER XIX.
CHAPTER XX.
CHAPTER XXI.
CHAPTER XXII.
CHAPTER XXIII.

DECK P. HOCKING LOOKED DOWN AT LAST UPON APPADACCA.

[To face p. 27.]

The original frontispiece

CHAPTER I.

A GENTLEMAN OF SPAIN.

DICK P. HOCKING weighed, stark naked as he was born, just thirty-two stone.

When he put his left hand behind his back, and cocked out his thick, short right leg at Wall Street, with the intention of sending the biddings up, and by hook or by crook of ‘getting there,’ you saw solidity. He was a sort of monument in flesh, conveying a tremendous suggestion of heaviness. He did not look like a man; he was like a Brobdingnagian paperweight.

His right leg was not really short, as we have said; he was, in reality, a tall man, only he looked squat in proportion.

His two jaws seemed to hang on his shoulders.

In addition, he carried a broad, thick beard, and above his superfluously large body a small bullet-head, flat behind, of which the hair was always cut as short as a convict’s.

His face was not an ugly one; it was only a distinctly vulgar one, like everything else about the man.

He was one of the shrewdest fellows in the world. Sometimes, early in the morning, he would leap out of bed, blow through a whistle in his bedroom, send his hoarse, rasping voice through a tube, and do a deal that would set New York and Throgmorton Street talking for a week.

When he took a dislike to a broker, to a fellow-speculator — and Dick P. Hocking was apt to take strange dislikes — it was, in general, woe to that broker or speculator. He had once suddenly appeared on 'Change, and, off his own bat, sent up three months' fine paper 2 and a half per cent., for the purpose of smashing an operator who had unconsciously thwarted him in a Greek Monopoly deal.

It was admitted that the price of silver was a matter depending on the will, or the whim, of Dick P. Hocking. In Washington his backstairs influence was enormous; for who did not know that Hocking, at a critical moment, had thrown his huge weight into the McKinley scale, and that had it been otherwise, things might have been otherwise also?

This powerful man, for whom the world, like some golden (or silver) palace, seemed to have been specially built, had a thorn in the flesh. Other rich men, to show that perfect happiness is not for man on the earth, suffer from weariness, from anxiety, from disease. From all this Dick P. Hocking was exempt. But he suffered from the thorn in his flesh.

This thorn was called Immanuel Appadacca.

Immanuel Appadacca was a man whom Dick P. Hocking had never seen. Yet Hocking hated him worse than poison.

The man whom Hocking had seen, and whom for a long time he thought he hated, was Josef Campos. Then, quite suddenly, by a mere chance, he got to know that Campos, the visible, was only the hand, the agent, of Appadacca, the invisible.

So often had Hocking been crossed and whipped and outwitted by this unseen power, this mysterious deus ex machina, that at last it might be said that the one remaining object of his life was to destroy it.

Who was Josef Campos? Everyone knew.

Who was Immanuel Appadacca? No one could say.

The two known facts about Appadacca were these — that he must be fairly rich; and that he possessed the swiftest ship in which a man had ever crossed upon the deep.

Now, it happened that, about six months before the outbreak of the war between Spain and the States, one Senor Canalejas, a Spanish Minister of Justice and of Finance, had come to the States, and in an interview with the President at Washington, had been told that the desire of America was to see an autonomous government in Cuba, and assistance given to the 'Reconcentrados' — though, of course, the States recognised the sovereign rights of Spain — nothing more.

The interview, however, got abroad. And the consequence of this hint of the President's was an immediate slight slump in 'Spanish' on 'Change everywhere, quotations going down from 57 and one eighth to nearly 55. And the next day Josef Campos was reported to be realizing largely in Mexican Internals, Peruvians, and American Railways.

To meet pressing liabilities? It was an inference!

Hocking snapped his doughy fingers.

Spanish bonds, then, were the weak point of Immanuel Appadacca.

It was not certain, but he was in the state in which men jump at conclusions. It was at least a hint of light in the absolute darkness which had tormented him for seven years.

He already possessed in Cuba considerable territories of tobacco and cane estates. And that night Dick P. Hocking slept in a Pullman, bound for Washington.

He plumped for war, or at least for a war-scare — and he had enormous power.

If he had not a right to determine how Cuba was to be governed, who had?

In the exciting months that followed down crept 'Spanish' on every Bourse in the world. They reached 45; they reached 40.

And the more Dick P. Hocking and a whole train of smaller men under his thumb plumped for war, the more isolated became the position of Josef Campos, and the more guessable his embarrassments.

But whosoever was the brain that inspired him, Campos was well inspired. On February 23, when the anticipation of trouble and the fear of dear money had already led to a heavy fall in high-priced securities, Josef Campos at three o'clock suddenly disposed of a large handful of South American steamships, which were promptly taken up by Hocking; and the whole of the funds realized by Campos were in half an hour invested in Argentine railways.

During the evening the news reached New York that a boat of the Rio-Buenos Ayres line had been mysteriously sunk — by Valparaiso buccaneers, it was said; and the immediate consequence on the opening of 'Change was a slump in South American steamships, and an unwonted activity in the land-traffic market. By the coup Campos realized two millions, and Hocking sunk five, and took it badly.

It was anticipated now that Josef Campos would not hesitate to dispose of the evidently large amount in Spanish bonds which he held. These were daily sinking lower, and it was assumed that so shrewd an operator, seeing the heavy selling from Paris, and probably himself in touch with the Spanish Government, could not remain blind to the rotten financial position of Spain. But Josef Campos sold not a single Spanish bond.

'Suppose I believe in them?' he said to a financier friend, who wondered at his pertinacity.

'But—'

'I have that right, you know. Every man must judge with his own eyes. Besides, I am the servant of another.'

‘Ah — in that case. But could you not advise your chief of the patent facts?’

Campos smiled. He was a tall, thin man, with a brown face and silver-white close-cut hair, though he had not reached middle age. His beardless face was handsome, his manners distinguished, his eyes dark-blue and restless.

‘No,’ he said, when his smile was over, ‘I never advise my chief.’

Yet in his heart he was anxious: confident, in the long-run, in the unfailing brain on which he relied, but anxious for the near present. Again and again, by the receipt of secret information, for which it was impossible for others to account, he was able to startle the market during February, March, and the beginning of April, with successful deals. And yet he was like a man whose backbone is touched with disease — as a financier, he had locomotor ataxy.

‘Spanish’ was his backbone: and ‘Spanish’ was going, going.

Then he did what he had said that he never did, he advised: and he received an answer which he remembered to his dying day.

The next day he received a message from the ex-Queen Isabella, stating that, on the Spanish side, war had definitely been decided upon. This was on April 12. Heat once sent the information to Appadacca.

Appadacca wired:

‘You are very simple. Please discover date of sale of land on Guiana-Venezuela frontier by Calvos. Want to buy. Make private offer.’

Campos knew that the vast piece of ground in question was in the market, or would shortly be; but he rubbed his eyes. The land was of no present value, it would require many millions of money to develop its resources; even if his chief was able to purchase, his fortune was in no condition to be ‘plunged’ in wild speculations of that sort.

But he did not hesitate. He at once attended at the branch firm in Brooklyn, to hear that the Calvos would in no case part under 5,000,000 dollars; but probably would not part at all except by way of public auction. However, the branch telegraphed to the head firm at Caracas that an offer had been made by Appadacca. And by night Richard P. Hocking knew of it.

Now, Hocking had no conception of the motive of Appadacca in aiming at the acquisition of this particular tract of ground; but he knew two things: that Appadacca had never yet, on any single occasion, allowed himself to be out-bidden in any object which he desired; and he knew that the business concern represented by the names of Campos and Appadacca must fall, if pushed.

He determined to bid, to push; it was of no importance to him how high. For the money sunk he even had a plan how to recoup himself.

He was a connoisseur in ships, was Dick P. Hocking. His thousand - ton composite yacht was a luxurious thing, capable of twenty-three knots, and good for the eye to look upon. But she had been designed by hirelings, and the Huelva, which he had once seen in Boston harbour, had been designed by the brain of Immanuel Appadacca.

This ship had seemed to him dainty as a tender lily looking up in surprise at the world from the water-side; lying at anchor in the sea, she conveyed the impression of a young doe the moment before it starts, affrighted, into running.

To put his hands into his pockets, and bulge his broad hips into a greater breadth on the deck of that ship, Dick P. Hocking thought would be a good thing.

And there were precious few things in this world desirable in his eyes which, in the long-run, he did not possess.

He brooded so continuously in secret over this whim that in the end his eagerness to walk the deck of the Huelva took equal place with his eagerness to crush the man who had so often cost him dear.

But though on pleasure he was bent, he had a frugal mind. War was coming; whoever else did not know it, he knew it very well. America wanted ships, and was buying them; and how good a thing would be the Huelva to America in that day! He reckoned on his fingers the millions which she would fetch.

He would charter her to the Government, he promised himself; he would not sell her.

He made a bid by telegram of six millions for the Venezuela-Guiana territory, and this lay for some days on the files of the firm of Calvos.

He had had many friendly relations with the firm, and now, guessing his motives, they did him a good turn — and themselves also. They telegraphed that bidding was likely to be brisk; that it was rumoured that Immanuel Appadacca had suddenly appeared at his castle among the mountains west of La Guayra. He was likely, therefore, to be present in person at the auction; so that nothing less than the personal presence of Dick P. Hocking, or of a fully authorized agent, in the auction-room, would be likely to secure him the territory in question.

Hocking looked about him, rushing through a limited area of New York in quest of certain knowledge. Had Campos sold any ‘Spanish’? No. At what were ‘Spanish’ now? As low as 38. Had he time? Yes — he had even two days to spare.

He telegraphed to the Union at Raleigh Bay, and on alighting from his train at St. Augustine in Florida, met her there. That ponderous bulk could travel, being light and full of motion.

And now events developed rapidly.

First, there came the settled conviction of the public that nothing could avert war; active preparations began in the States, mobilization of troops and militia, registration of volunteers both for army and navy, and the purchase of ships; then the squabble between the Houses; truculent and imperious messages from the President to the Spanish Government; the break-out of a definite war-fire in long-sleeping old Spain; then the resolutions of Congress; and the signed ultimatum.

‘Spanish’ fell to 37 and one eighth.

CHAPTER II.

IMMANUEL APPADACCA.

IT WAS TRUE that Immanuel Appadacca was at his Venezuelan château.

He was writing a Spanish madrigal in an apartment overlooking the sea at three in the afternoon of April 20, when an ivory card, scribbled with the words, 'The carrosse awaits your Excellency,' was dropped through a slit in the porphyry wall upon a table near his hand. He glanced at it, and continued to write.

Here the hot sweltering sun came in in mellowed rays through blue and scarlet-tinted glass, making tolerable to the eye the blaze of splendour with which the apartment was adorned.

From the gaudy mosaic floor to the torrents of copper - coloured draperies that rolled in thick luxury from the entablatures, and the hundred ornaments of gold and ivory and malachite that crowded the not large apartment, there was poured forth a suggestion of princeliness that bewildered the imagination. A soft sound of music, the source of which was not visible, breathed through the apartment.

Far below lay, glittering in bright sunlight, a sheltered bay, readily accessible to the château by steps cut zigzag down the cliff side.

In appearance Appadacca was one of the most striking of men — pallid, with ink-black hair, but under the pallor a certain suggestion of duskiness which could not be readily fixed and described. Some remote ancestor had, in fact, been an Indian squaw, and this trace, mingling with the highest caste of the blood of Seville, still informed his wan visage.

He was rather below the middle height, with a well-knit, compact, erect figure.

The whole man was extremely finely wrought, beautiful in a high degree. Of his face, in moments of perfect calm, the riveting feature was the lips, well-chiselled, pale, and marble in the firmness of their pressure. When he spoke, it was the eyes that caught the attention: they lit up into a species of flaming dominancy.

He had been left rich on the death of his father, but, tiring of a life spent wholly in seclusion and study, he chose to direct from his various palaces about the world what was known as the House of Campos.

In character, in thought, in aspiration, he was intensely Spanish.

At his name, the Queen Regent, the people in the inner circle of the Court, the Ministers, smiled with a certain mild indulgence. His ideas, like the ideas of all men somewhat above the crowd, had in them a savour of wildness.

The question which puzzled him always as a boy was this: Why was not Spain great among the nations? She had been!

She had still all the elements of greatness within herself — a large home-territory, rich in the good things of the earth; her sons were proud and nimble and brave; they had over-run and dominated the world. Yet now Spain had become a byword, a synonym for weakness.

Afterwards, he definitely fixed the origin and secret of this tragedy: Spain had been first made great, and then destroyed, by one of her own sons — Columbus.

He had discovered America, and old America had made Spain the mistress of the world, and new America has made her its reproach.

He saw clearly how this was so: Spain, in reality, was a maritime power, a colonizing force. To her, whose sceptre once stretched over the earth, and whose sons gave their names to continents, there now remained Cuba and the Philippines.

Still, from the Rio Grande del Norte to Cape Horn, all that great world of Central and South America was, in feeling, Spanish, or Portugo-Spanish — in feeling, in speech, in habit, in instinct.

And at the thought of the ultimate destiny of that great continent, even when a boy with ripening thought he shuddered.

Instead of beautiful old Spain of the hidalgos, the Monroe doctrine; instead of the mellow and musical reign of great Ferdinand, the encroaching paw of Dick P. Hocking.

Absorption of the beautiful by the ugly, slow but sure — this was Destiny.

Later on he began to find pleasant the dream of a greater Espana, strong at home, and once more a continent abroad. The dissipation of the little republics of South America, and their aggregation into one vast flourishing Spain — it became his vision.

He had seen all the world. His learning, his beauty, his gaudy and mysterious way of life, had made him a chief figure at courts, at masques, in secret cabals, in the conclaves of revolutionists. From China to Chili he had investigated the world: and nowhere had anything struck his imagination as being so beautiful as Spain, or as being so ugly as— ‘the States.’

The passion of his youth was for the beautiful; its detestation was for the ugly.

Though a Spaniard (Venezuelan by birth) his motive was not patriotism. It was something greater — his ideal of the beautiful.

He conceived that nothing whatever was of half so much importance to the actual world of the nineteenth century as the conservation of the small residue of the humanly picturesque which remained to it.

When the Venezuelan dispute arose, he bitterly resented the interference of America; England encroached, but the United States encroached still more in raising her voice to check the encroacher. She had, he thought no right to raise it.

The outbreak of the Cuban War opened his eyes to one fact — that the chief misery of Spain was her impecuniosity.

Poor nations can no more command the respect of their colonies than poor men of their servants. Cuba broke from her leading-strings mainly because they were fustian.

And now his vague dreams all at once froze within him into definiteness. What was wrong he saw; and how it could be remedied he saw also.

At this time he devised the Huelva.

She was a craft of 12,500 tons, of steel and wood, having a belt of Harveyized nickel-steel, as though made for the express purpose of warfare.

During the period of her building, the ship had been what she was destined to continue — an enigma.

Was she a yacht, or a ship-of-war? While she lay upon the stocks in the Union Ironworks of San Francisco, this had been the question of rare privileged sightseers.

The vague answer to these questions was that she was ‘a composite vessel,’ designed in person by a Venezuelan millionaire for his private use.

Some, looking at her lithe sheer, her entrancing suggestion of swiftness, said ‘yacht.’ Others pointed to an armour belt six feet deep, and three inches thick; to five torpedo-tubes — one in the stern above the water-line, and four below; to the complete armoured deck at the water-level extending from stem to stern, two inches thick on the flat part, five inches thick on the slopes; and they promptly said 'sloop-of-war.'

For the rest, she was constructed on the usual system of double-bottom, connected with watertight flats at stem and stern, thus extending the double-bottom to the extremities of the ship.

If there were no visible guns, there were, at least, visible on her main deck eight casemates, and on her upper deck six, armoured with six-inch nickel-steel of the size usually constructed for carrying four-inch quick-firing guns, and fitted with the usual dismounting and stowing gear.

As to these casemates, a singular contrivance had been adopted. They had been made watertight on the inner as well as on the outer side. The men, therefore, who crewed the possible guns would be protected from explosive shells; and also, should a gun-post get damaged, between-deck spaces would be insured from the irruption of water.

There was no part of the ship upon which the minutest forethought, the adroitest cunning, had not been lavished — and with forethought and cunning, wealth.

Upon her engines, above all, an extravagance of care was expended in their manufacture, in their adaptation. The boilers, twenty-two in number, were of the latest type of Belleville, and the engines triple-expansion, driving twin screws. The thickness of deck over engines, boilers, and magazine-spaces was doubled.

On the day of her launch she lay upon the water a unique thing.

She combined the formidableness of a battleship with the buoyancy of a duck; she was the last triumph of shipbuilding; in the same entity was the lightness of foot of Asahel and the strength of Samson; she was force wedded to frivolity.

There was something almost secret about her building; there was something mysterious about her launching; there was something bizarre and unguessable about her movements.

She was manned by a crew gathered from nearly every region of the globe, gathered by Appadacca himself, and gathered under circumstances the most unexpected, the most outré. One of her stokers was a Chinaman, condemned to death for murder in Pekin, for whom Appadacca had purchased a substitute; another of the crew was a Cockney street gamin who probably owed his rather enviable position to a pair of brisk blue eyes; the captain was a Maltese Mediterranean coaster, a rough man of little education, yet a born sailor, who had fought side by side with Appadacca in a village fray among the Western Sicilian mountains; the first lieutenant was a nobleman of Andalusia, royally connected, poorer than Lazarus, prouder than Lucifer; three were Chilian contrabandists, chosen each of them at a different time, under quite different conditions, with varying motives; there were many races, Irish, Peruvian, half-caste, Catalan, Basque, Arab — but there was no American.

The only hint of nationality on board the ship was to be found in the fact that the predominant language was Spanish. By such men as those called by Appadacca from the world a language was readily learned.

The Cockney and the Chinaman swore at each other in Cockney and in Chinese, and obeyed in ‘the language of the gods.’

Could anyone have looked into the hearts of this crew and seen how there the image of one man lay enshrined and worshipped, he would at once have arrived at some sort of conception of the strong personality which swayed them.

The movements of the ship, as of her master, were incalculable. At the hour of the blowing up of the Maine, the Huelva lay, without her master, in a creek outside Havana harbour; and half an hour after the explosion steamed away. Since then she had appeared neither in Spain nor at Taranto, where Appadacca owned a palazzo, nor at Venezuela.

Sometimes for weeks Appadacca buried himself in the gloomy luxury of a cabin, where a shimmering fleece of liquid-looking cloth-of-gold carpeting the floor mingled with paintings of David, and the uncouth grotesques of old and the chaste carvings of Greece, in a rich bizarrerie of pomp; his presence on board being at such times known only to the greater part of his crew by mouth-to-mouth rumour. Sometimes, again, she cruised for months without him.

Suddenly, on the very day when General Woodford left Madrid, and, at Washington, Senor Polo de Bernabe applied for his passports, the rumour spread through Caracas and La Guayra that the Huelva was lost.

It was the day when the stretch of land contiguous to the boundary line in dispute between Britain and Venezuela was to be disposed of at public auction by the Calvos. Some hours before the sale it was said that the wreck of the ship had been seen upon some rock-islands a long way down the coast, near Cumana.

The details were explicit; the news was eagerly discussed. If it were true, dark clouds must overshadow Appadacca's sky. Spanish bonds were at the lowest quotations yet reached.

Sharp at four the auction was timed to commence; and as the clocks struck, the buzz of the crowd in the room died suddenly into perfect silence. Appadacca entered.

The place was full, many people having come merely to get a sight of the face of this man. It was a third-rate apartment at the back of the Calvos office, without flooring or furniture, save a chair by which the auctioneer stood, and a table with writing materials.

It was a picturesque, somewhat squalid, gathering of men, quite Spanish-American in character — sombreros, ponchos, hide - boots, colours, dirt.

Appadacca wore a tunic of very thick plushy dark-blue velvet, with rough woollen stockings, and a wide hat, pinned with a dagger of gold, the rim rather concealing his face.

On his entrance the sale began without delay.

The auctioneer, in a hurried way, read out the specification, ending with the words: ‘And now, gentlemen—’

By the side of the table stood an old man, the head of the firm of Calvos, and near him Appadacca, holding in his hand a bundle of script and title-deeds.

A hoarse, rasping voice was heard:

‘I offer seven million pesos.’

Appadacca slightly nodded towards Senor Calvos. He said:

‘Eight.’

The crowd parted into a wide lane for the passage of a great bulk of flesh which now moved forward into the small open space. The eyes of Dick P. Hocking looked down at last upon Appadacca as from a citadel.

Hocking said:

‘Nine.’

And Appadacca said:

‘Ten.’

Both were apparently calm, except that Hocking’s chest and abdomen heaved somewhat largely in the taking of his breath. Appadacca, as he callously raised the bid, figure by figure, in the merest whisper, examined one after another the papers in his hand.

Hocking put his left hand into the pocket of his loose, enormous trousers, and he cocked forth his short-looking, ponderous right leg, and, fetching a breath from the gulf of his abdomen, he said:

‘I offer eleven million pesos.’

And Appadacca, turning his leaves, in the merest whisper said:

‘Twelve.’

‘I offer thirteen million pesos,’ said Dick P. Hocking.

Appadacca turned over the leaves of paper in his hand. There was a pause. He frowned a little. He said:

‘Fourteen.’

‘I offer fifteen million pesos,’ said the emphatic, self-sure, gross voice of Hocking. With every bid his stuck-out right leg seemed to lift a little, and his huge body to come an inch more forward.

There was a pause again.

‘Fifteen million pesos,’ said the auctioneer— ‘fifteen million. Is there no advance?’

Appadacca was very closely examining his leaves of paper now. His head bent over them. An eight-sided clock, hanging by a ring on the board partition, ticked half a minute — a minute.

‘Sixteen,’ came from Appadacca’s lips.

‘I offer seventeen million pesos,’ said Dick P. Hocking, heaving his mountain of flesh yet an inch nearer.

These were huge figures. The roomful of people were on the very tiptoe of excitement. Spain and America were on the point of war; and here, they had a sort of idea, were Spain and America ominously fighting out the big warfare in little, just as the old kings used to decide the issue between two armies by the single combat of two chosen champions.

Which would win — ugly, strong, nineteenth-century, Saxon Dick P. Hocking, with his encroaching, ponderous right leg, or picturesque, dainty, small-handed, Latin Immanuel Appadacca, turning the leaves of his papers with the dreamy old air of a medieval student of Salamanca?

Certainly Hocking seemed the favourite of the gods. Appadacca now was looking too closely at his papers. Was he not — hesitating?

‘Seventeen million — going at seventeen—’

‘Eighteen,’ said Appadacca.

Down came Hocking’s leg an inch nearer.

‘I bid nineteen million pesos for this property,’ quoth he.

And as he said it, Appadacca smiled.

He made a sign to the auctioneer that the bidding was not over, and at once he stepped up to old Calvos, the head of the selling firm, ‘You, I think, are Senor Calvos?’ said Appadacca, not even careful to lower his voice to a pitch inaudible to Hocking and the others near.

‘Yes, señor,’ said Calvos.

‘Then I can speak to you and he smiled with ineffable condescension. ‘The parcel of land which you are selling it is my whim to possess. I have now, however, it seems, bid my entire fortune — securities, châteaux, bric-a-brac, even the value of my horses. There is nothing left, señor, except one thing — my yacht, the Huelva. I offer to bid two million pesos more, on the understanding that you accept the Huelva at that sum, should no higher bid be made.’

‘But — señor — the Huelva is — on the rocks!’

‘She is afloat, señor.’

‘She is wrecked!’

‘She is now steaming toward Caracas at the rate of twenty-seven knots an hour, señor.’

‘Can you believe that, señor?’

‘Yes, señor.’

‘But have you not, then, heard the report?’

‘Ah yes — the report. The report is not a true report. The report has been spread abroad by that person, for his own purposes.’

He barely indicated Hocking with his head. Dick P. Hocking was like stolid wood, waiting.

‘So you believe the Huelva is afloat?’

‘Yes.’

‘But with what motive could anyone—’

‘You are not so simple, señor! With this motive: that, in case I should be compelled to offer her as a bid, the amount of my bid might be as low as possible, since I should be bidding a risk.’

‘Is not the Huelva, then, insured?’

‘No, señor.’

‘Well, suppose I accept your offer, señor — say two million pesos?’

‘You will do well, señor. She cost fifteen millions. She is worth fifty. And she should be steaming into Caracas at this moment — she is, in fact.’

‘Well, it is agreed. You have the papers with you? And you will hand them over immediately, if the bidding falls to you?’

‘Precisely so.’

‘And there are no tedious formalities? The Huelva will be ours on the spot? The papers are duly regular?’

‘There are no formalities. She will be yours — as far as she can be anyone’s other than myself, señor.’

‘What does that mean, señor?’

‘It would be long to explain, señor.’ He smiled. ‘May I now bid? I bid—’

Before he could name the figure, there arose a bustle, a pressure, and a hubbub at the door; and a moment after the whole crowd of loiterers broke into involuntary cheering. Two idlers of the town had come running with the news that the Huelva had just dropped anchor in the bay.

For three minutes nothing could be done. The room was a babel of tongues.

Dick P. Hocking shifted his quarter-ton weight from one leg to the other. He was embarrassed.

That Appadacca would now part with his ship for two million pesos was not to be expected. So far the Yankee's scheme had failed.

Old Calvos's face wore a look of dogged shamefacedness.

'So much the better for you, señor,' he said to Appadacca. 'The Huelva, then, is here.'

'You said, señor—'

'So much the better for you.'

'Really? How? I do not see your meaning.'

'You will now, of course, demand more. Oh, I do not blame you!'

Appadacca's lip assumed the faintest curve of contempt.

'I demand nothing, señor. I had already arranged.'

'Oh — ahem! — well, that is only what one would expect from a gentleman. Yes. You adhere, then — ?'

'Yes. May I now bid? I bid — twenty-one million pesos.'

Then there was silence.

The auctioneer looked at Hocking. Hocking looked at the ground. With an arm the size of most legs he made a slight deprecatory wave. The hammer came down.

The land was Appadacca's.

But the ship was Hocking's!

For, half an hour after Appadacca had handed the title-deeds to Calvos, Calvos handed them to Hocking, receiving in return a cheque for fifteen million pesos, and thus clearing thirteen millions by the deal.

Dick P. Hocking stood for an hour at the very end of a small jetty projecting into the bay, and his hands bulged his pockets. Not once did his gaze shift from the Huelva, lying there like a painted ship upon a painted ocean. She seemed to him like a doe the moment before it starts, affrighted, into running — and she was his!

He jerked his head sideward at her as he turned to leave the jetty; and he said:

‘I guess you are the kind of hotel that will put up Dick P. Hocking to-night, my girl.’

At seven he was sitting at a gleaming oval table made of walrus-tusk arabesque in ebony in the cabin of the Huelva.

Man after man of the crew, one by one, two hundred and eleven, came up to him as he sat there; and from a hand-bag crammed with Venezuelan gold pieces he paid them off, adding a month’s salary in lieu of notice. He possessed at times a certain large generosity which even his enemies could not deny him; and till eleven in the night he was engaged in this task. Then, weary, he was led down three corridors to Appadacca’s chamber; he turned on the azure-blue jets of electric light; he undressed himself; he drew on a suit of voluminous silk pyjamas that would have fitted an elephant; and he threw himself on the most luxurious bed of which he had ever dreamed. One by one he had warned the crew that by nine, at the latest, the next morning they must have left the Huelva to their successors.

At the moment when Dick P. Hocking began to snore with the vibratory resonance of a trombone, Immanuel Appadacca, at his chateau ten miles away, in Tunisian slippers, gold-embroidered, softly opened a door. He had in his right hand an antique gold candlestick, and to the shade of crimson silk which mellowed the light he added the shade of his left hand.

In an alcove, concealed by tapestries of black and crimson velvet, was a bed. Appadacca laid the candlestick upon an ottoman, and with exquisite caution drew aside the draperies. In the alcove on the bed lay in careless sleep a female.

She was a girl of seventeen; her bosom was half revealed; her masses of absolutely black hair lay far in vagrant largesse over the bed and pillows.

He looked at her a minute; he stooped; he touched her forehead in the lightest caress with his lips. As he did so, he breathed the word ‘Good-bye.’

Turning to move away, he glanced upon the lithe sleeping form again, and smiled faintly.

‘Little Lola,’ he said; and, again, he added, ‘Good-bye.’

He let the curtains fall together noiselessly as he passed out, and, with the light, went walking rapidly through the house.

In one chamber he selected a key from a bunch which he carried, and opened a cabinet. From this he took two cylindrical objects of the size and shape of an ordinary ruler.

He then ascended a narrow wooden stair to the flat roof of the castle. It was a luminous tropical night, the vault rich with stars; no moon. Appadacca looked abroad for a few minutes — over the mountains above him, down into the gloom of the still bay. The roadstead of La Guayra, on which lay the Huelva, was invisible to him.

He had with him a box of coloured fusees, and striking a fusee, he applied the flames to one of the two objects taken from the cabinet. Spouts of bluish sparks began to fizzle and shoot upward, and in another moment long ribbons of bluish flame went aspiring skyward from his hand, to burst in a cataract of bluish glamour three hundred feet above his head.

He put down the burnt-out rocket, and at once applied a flame to the other; and this time the night was lit up with a vermilion glow, ribbons of vermilion flame, and a bursting cataract of vermilion glamour in the sky.

It was a signal to the crew of the invisible Huelva lying in La Guara roadstead.

Having done this, Appadacca, without a moment’s delay, descended to the suite which he occupied in the castle.

And now, for about half an hour, he busied himself in collecting papers, a cameo here, a small painting there, an ancient Limoges enamel, a cangiar of Tangiers. These he placed in a portable cabinet, which he locked.

He sounded a gong. A black servant appeared.

‘Take this to the boat in the bay,’ said Appadacca, indicating the cabinet.

And as the box left the room, he took from a rack a tiny Venetian stiletto, stuck it in his girdle of silk, and followed the servant.

They descended the steps in the rock to where the wavelets splashed languidly on a rough natural landing-place. There, in a highly-polished shallop, two men rested on their oars. The stern of the boat touched the rock. The negro deposited in her the box. Appadacca sat down in the stern.

Without a word from him, the oars lifted and touched the water, and the light boat leapt forward.

A quarter of a mile out burned the three very slowly-moving red port, green starboard, and white mast-head lights of a steamship. It was the Huelva, which had dropped round hither from La Guayra.

As Appadacca stepped upon her deck, he said to her captain:

‘The course is north by east, and the speed twenty-eight knots.’

At once he disappeared into the cabin.

As the Huelva began to skip the waters with the light step of a young grisette, he stood by his bedside, meditatively gazing at the great bulk of Dick P. Hocking, who, in spite of the flood of light which now poured upon his face, still slept and snored.

CHAPTER III.

DICK P. HOCKING LIFTS HIS ARM.

THE NEXT DAY the two nations which had produced these two men were in a state of war.

At three on that day the Huelva dropped anchor at Ponce, in Puerto Rico.

The first lieutenant landed, and despatched this message by the Domingo-Cuba cable to Senor Sagasta, the Spanish Premier:

‘Immanuel Appadacca requires letters of marque to use Huelva as privateer. Meanwhile will act on private authority of Queen. The Montserrat will be protected as far as Cienfuegos.’

The Montserrat was a Spanish transport-ship, which, since April 13, had left Las Palmas (Canary Islands) with a thousand troops, beside war material, stores, and money, for the Spanish forces in Cuba.

And in an hour the Huelva left Ponce, where she drained the town of coal, and steered directly west.

In a very small room in her cabin, a room which seemed scarcely big enough to contain him, sat Dick P. Hocking. An elbow was on a knee, and his fingers supported his forehead. He was very hungry; his throat was dry. He touched an electric button.

Instantly there appeared before him a bowing Chilian rascal, with a number of parti-coloured ribbons round the sombrero which he held in his hand, and botas vaqueras reaching above his knees.

‘Well, my lad, I guess you can roll your tongue about a bit of honest lingo, though I know a bit of yours, too,’ said Hocking.

‘I spoke already to your Excellency last night,’ said the man, in decent English.

‘Then you tell me this: does this man Appadacca mean to starve me on board my own ship?’

‘Not at all, your Excellency.’

‘I don’t see much victuals coming along this road, all the same, so far.’

‘Your Excellency has only to order what you require,’ said the Chilian, bowing low.

‘Oh, I do the ordering, do I? Well, suppose you bring round a good roast chicken, as thick as you like to make it, and a bottle of —

Have you got any lachryma Christi wine?’

‘Yes, your Excellency.’

‘Well, then, say a “good round capon” — which is poetry — and a bottle of the lachryma.’

‘Yes, your Excellency.’

‘Then move.’

‘I wait, your Excellency—’

‘I see that. But I do not want you to wait. Why wait?’

‘Payment must be made first, your Excellency.’

‘This is a new sort of hotel, then, I calculate?’

‘No, your Excellency. But such are my orders. Payment must be made first.’

And now, for the first time, some suspicion of what was coming, some dim remembrance of stories of extortion practised by the old buccaneers and marooners, the Kidds, and Morgans, and Averys, crossed the brain of Dick P. Hocking. He said:

‘I have got little or nothing to pay with, my lad. Stop a bit — here’s a greenback. I guess that will about do my day’s board anyway.’

‘The price of a fowl is five million dollars, said the Chilian, ‘and the price of a bottle of any sort of wine is fifteen millions.’

And now Dick P. Hocking showed his race — its stoicism, its squareness to events, its genuine large-mindedness, exhibiting itself in a manner so commonplace and remote from display as to approach vulgarity.

This demand for the five million dollars meant, if it meant anything, that he was to be slowly and cruelly starved. But he neither groaned nor showed surprise.

‘Well, I don’t call that a bad deal, my lad,’ he said. ‘No man knows better than Dick P. Hocking that business is business. I make you an offer of four million dollars for a fowl, and fourteen million dollars for a bottle of lachryma Christi wine.’

‘My orders, your Excellency—’

‘Never mind your orders, sonny. My turn may come some day, and — what is your name?’

‘My name is Zambra Adelo, master.’

Dick P. Hocking took out his note-book from a vast breast-pocket, and he scribbled that name in pencil.

‘Now, Zambra Adelo,’ he said, ‘look you, my son: I tell you my turn may come some day — may, mind you — I am not saying will — and I make you a bid of four million dollars for that fowl, and fourteen million dollars for that bottle of wine.’

‘Your Excellency is wasting his breath,’ replied Zambra.

‘Very good, sir. What is the price of a loaf of bread on board this ship of mine?’

‘Three million dollars, your Excellency.’

‘Not dear, considering. Well, you bring me round a roast fowl, a loaf of bread, and a bottle of lachryma Christi wine, and don’t stop to chew your spittle, neither.’

‘If your Excellency will sign these three papers —,’ said Zambra; and he laid the papers on a three-legged stool, and took pen and ink from a shelf.

Hocking, without hesitation, signed.

Now, a fowl, a loaf, and a bottle of wine were not an overpoweringly large meal for a man of Dick P. Hocking’s cubicity. By nightfall he was hungry again; and when, before nightfall, the Chilian had come to clear away the restes of the meal, and had found a piece of loaf and some fragments of fowl, he had asked if he should take them away, for they were Hocking’s; and Hocking had said: ‘I guess so.’

Under that bulging paunch there lay a stomach more high, and a pride more unconquerable, than ever swelled beneath the courtly exterior of grandee or hidalgo.

At all events, the fowls and the wine became a pretty frequent order from the captive locked in the small room. The lowest rate of living possible for Dick P. Hocking established itself at the rate of twenty-three million dollars a day.

On the evening of the 25th, just after sunset, the Huelva sighted a large three-master to the north-west, opposite the Cuban town of Trinidad; and on running in toward the land for half an hour, made her out as the Montserrat.

The war was by this time fairly under way. Nothing heroic had, indeed, happened; two Spanish merchant ships had been seized; recruitment was going forward with considerable zest in the squares of New York, and other American cities; North Cuba and South-West Cuba had been blockaded; the world was waiting for the first serious encounter between the American Eastern squadron which had left Hong Kong and the inferior Spanish force assembled round Manila. Some war-vessels had mysteriously left Cadiz bound west, and excitement as to their unknown destination prevailed in New York. Also it was known that the Montserrat was upon her adventurous way; nor did anyone doubt that she must be intercepted with her valuable cargo before reaching Cienfuegos.

On the discovery of the identity of the Montserrat, the Huelva quickened her pace, and walked up rapidly on the other ship. At three hundred yards, the Montserrat, at a signal from the yacht, put out a boat, and her captain was rowed to receive Appadacca's instructions.

Appadacca, however, remained invisible. The captain of the transport spoke with the captain of the yacht in the cabin of the latter. And this cabin immediately adjoined one of the two apartments in which Dick P. Hocking, dozing most of the day in a sitting posture, dreamed of boiled and roast and stew.

He had now given notes of hand of over sixty million dollars for a few days' scarce rations.

Now, Hocking had started life as a clerk in a Chili nitrate office; he had all his life had large interests in Cuban and South American concerns; he had a very fair smattering of some Spanish patois somewhere in his cute and much-experienced head: so when he heard two voices in colloquy, and this question asked, 'How many American ships are blockading Cienfuegos?' he bent his ear much closer to the intervening door, and the musing, vacant eye of the listener was Dick P. Hocking's.

The answer was: 'Two cruisers, both nineteen knot boats, and crash for you if they get near you!'

It was the captain of the Huelva who spoke, a thick-bearded, brown, short man, with plain, thin hoops of gold in his ears. He added:

‘Here is a paper written by my master himself, telling you how you are to act hand in hand with the Huelva. You will see that you are not really to go into Cienfuegos at all, but only to make a feint that way. We are going to take in your stores and arms now, but not the men till the last moment. The paper will tell you. What we want to know from you is this: Is there anything in the way of prizes going on the seas the way you have come?’

‘There is,’ said the other captain. ‘I had it from a Matanzas sloop in the Bahamas that a big transport would be leaving in four days — that should be to-morrow — from Key West for Havana, crowded with rifles and stores for the army coming to Cuba.’

‘And her name?’

‘The Sable.’

‘Convoyed?’

‘I heard no — alone.’

‘Ah, we have her, then!’

‘Something rich if you take her.’

‘Good! we take her. But time, time, Senor Capitan! We need be in Cienfuegos by midnight. My master has conference with Gomez, the rebel chieftain.’

Dick P. Hocking heard no more; nor did he know that all this concerned him personally. He put up his hands before his eyes, looked at them, and his mouth opened in a desperate yawn.

He was feeling intensely now the pinch of hunger, he, the opulent, the Scatterer; for on the day before he had nothing, nor on this day. Had he, then, ceased to satisfy his cravings for the sake of a few millions? Not he. The fact was that he had no more millions to squander, there being a limit to all wealth. And Dick P. Hocking, with a certain rough honesty that was in him, had blurted the fact.

He had ordered his chicken, his wine, and his loaf. And when Zambra handed him the customary three papers, Hocking had said:

‘Come, you just get me those eatables, young man. I guess “nothing” is about the name of what’s left to pay you with.’

And the result, had he known the character of those with whom he had to do, was what he might have expected. He got no fowl, no wine, and no loaf. He lived upon the sight of his fat fingers; he yawned till his jaws ached.

And larger grew the great empty hole within him.

About an hour after he had listened to the conversation in the apartment near, while he dozed with sideward-hanging head and opened mouth, the door opened. The captain of the Huelva entered.

‘I am from his Excellency to you with a proposal,’ said the man. ‘Can you understand this talk of mine?’

‘Some,’ replied Hocking.

‘Then here it is for you. His Excellency—’

‘Who is his Excellency, my man?’

‘Immanuel Appadacca.’

‘Go ahead, then.’

‘His Excellency has present need of sixty thousand dollars — a mere nothing — in specie, understand. Paper no good. In specie. Well, he means to put you in another ship to-night, if you agree, and get an order from you near the Florida coast for the sum; and on receiving it, you have thenceforth what food you want — everything — free of cost and charge. You agree, I know.’

‘H’m! I don’t say I do, neither.’

‘You will.’

‘You will starve me, you rascal?’

‘Yes.’

‘And if I fall into your views — you feed me meanwhile — you give a famishing man something to eat now, I guess?’

‘No. Everything after; nothing first.’

‘That means, I’m thinking, that I shall have to fast for days, my man, doesn’t it?’

‘Some days.’

‘But I tell you, I’m famishing already.’

‘Can’t help that. Money first.’

‘Yes, yes. I guess I am a business man myself. Dick P. Hocking knows what business is, and likes it. But you are Christian people, I reckon, on board this ship? You belong to a Christian race, I’m thinking—’

‘Money first,’ said the captain.

Dick P. Hocking looked the man slowly up and down from the crown of his head to the tip of his boots. Then he put his hand into his breast-pocket, drew out his leather note-book, and said:

‘Would you mind giving me your name, my man?’

‘My name? That is nothing to the purpose, señor. My name is Silvio Murena. Come, now—’

‘Silvio Murena,’ said Hocking slowly, while he inscribed the name — for future reference, perhaps. ‘I take it that you still refuse to give a hungry man a bit of food?’

‘Come, you trifle, señor!’

For quite a minute Hocking said not a word. He sat regarding the floor, elbow on knee. Then suddenly he heaved himself upright, and out went his right leg, and up rose his mighty right arm; and with a high flush of wrath on his face, he said these words:

‘Well, I guess I call you a cursed bad race of people, anyway, the whole tribe of you! And if Richard P. Hocking’s got the sense in him, if it is in a year, if it is in ten years, to do anything to crush and swamp you out, he's just going to do it, and to that you may lay all there is of you!'

He sat again.

The manner of this huge man was impressive. At that moment he recalled a hundred-ton gun in action — a thing which does not often talk, but when it does, talks things that one cannot help hearing.

The captain of the Huelva looked at him, and was silent for a goodly number of the clock's ticks; then he said:

'But that is talk. The question — do you consent or not to his Excellency's proposal?'

'I consent,' said Dick P. Hocking.

CHAPTER IV.

RUNNING THE BLOCKADE.

THE NIGHT CAME very gloomily. In those tropics it comes almost as suddenly as when one turns an electric button, and the red wires in the globes glower and die out rapidly into invisibility in the dark.

For two hours the sixteen boats of the Huelva and the Montserrat plied busily from one to the other, the ships being now only ten yards apart, the Huelva taking in a goodly mass of Sniders and Martinis, together with some uniforms, ammunition, flour, tins, and other stores. The process was slow, and before it was half over the Huelva ordered steam ahead.

They went forward, the smaller ship with her three lights, the Huelva in darkness. Cienfuegos was thirty miles to the north-west. Ten miles in advance of both went a smart picket-boat, provided with signal-rockets, and steaming zigzag about the sea at the rate of twenty knots.

At half-past seven it was as dark as the gloomiest midnight — a quiet, stagnant night, the sea heaving in flat, pale swells. At that hour the picket-boat sent up a rocket. She had sighted two steamer lights five or six miles to the north-west — the two American ships-of-war maintaining the blockade of Cienfuegos.

The Montserrat contained a thousand land troops; at once she and her convoy slackened speed, and the rapid work of transhipment began; the picket-boat meantime panting back to her parent ship, and both the American cruisers, which had been loitering almost stationary with fires banked, starting in chase toward the locality of the rocket.

By this time the captain of the Montserrat had well digested his written instructions. He was informed as to the exact spot of his next destination, as to the spot at which he was to rejoin the Huelva, as to the conditions under which he was to keep the prisoner who would be committed to his care. The most stringent of these conditions was with regard to food. Hocking must fast till the required sum in specie was on board the Montserrat. It was Appadacca's will — a will which no man had known to relent.

At this time Hocking had received notice of his transhipment. He had brought with him on board the Huelva a black handbag, and into this he had now packed the few things about him — some papers, a toothbrush, a pair of pyjamas. The bag was still not full. He threw it into a corner, and sat again on his hard stool, waiting.

Whether it was the cradling motion of the ship, or the state of hunger in which he lived, he was now in a chronic condition of drowsiness. He had hardly sat again when he began to nod.

But his slumber was of that light, spasmodic kind easily broken by disturbance. There stood an Admiral Colomb hand-lamp on a bracket in the room, giving a dim light; and through his drowsing eyelids he seemed to see, as it were in dream, the single door of the apartment cautiously pushed back.

A figure entered the room. But it had all the characteristics of the figure of a dream, and for a moment or two, which seemed much longer, Dick P. Hocking really subconsciously believed that it was a dream-image.

It was a man rather below the middle height, but with a figure erect and knit. He had about him a black cloak, the skirt of which trailed on the floor; over his forehead and nose was a black mask, but the pallid, chiselled, and hairless lips could be seen.

He must have paused, listening to Dick P. Hocking's breathing, for it was half a minute after the door moved before he entered; then he looked rapidly and, as it were, guiltily round, noticed the bag, stepped briskly and noiselessly toward it, pressed the clasp, and opened it.

At that moment Dick P. Hocking was wide awake. He started; he observed.

The man had a pile of something in his hands, which he was stuffing eagerly, with stealthy haste, into the bag; and Hocking saw what it was, and his avid nostrils smelled.

It was a quantity of bread cut in slices, and between the slices — meat. The whole was wrapped in two parcels of rice-paper; but as one parcel was being forced into the now full bag, the paper broke.

That gruff and rasping voice spoke. It said: 'Well, now—'

The visitor, or visitant, started, and at once turned to hurry away. Dick P. Hocking, in the passion of his gratitude, was up and after him.

Hocking just caught him by the mantle near the door. He said:

‘No hurry, sonny. Just let Dick P. Hocking get your name and address down in this memorandum-book of his—’

Then he started backward. A stiletto, whose luminously-jewelled handle flashed like a galaxy even in the vague light, was at his breast. And as he started backward, the other man was gone.

Hocking, hungry as he was, sat again on his stool, and propped on his hand his meditative brow.

‘Well,’ he said, ‘I’m darned if I don’t call that handsome! and handsomely done, too. “When thou doest thine alms, let not thy left hand know—”’

Then he said:

‘But why in Jericho should the fellow be so mightily ashamed of feeding a hungry man? He looked ashamed, sure enough — or afraid, is it? Well, the world isn’t done with Dick P. Hocking yet, sonny; and if ever he tumbles upon you again, it’s settling off old scores between us we will be, I reckon —’

Beneath that gross front beat a heart strong in generous impulses as it was strong in rancour. He sat grumbling his thoughts of future punishments and rewards; but not for long: in a few minutes the door opened again. He clasped his bag hurriedly, and walked out with it behind a lieutenant.

The last thought to enter his head was that his visitor might be Appadacca himself — Appadacca, who, perhaps, had secretly relented; Appadacca, too sensitive to admit another being into the knowledge of a weakness, too haughty to confess before one of his crew even the possibility of a change of purpose.

In ten minutes Hocking was on board the Montserrat. The two Spaniards steamed forward in the old direction. The two Americans, not eight knots away, came rapidly nearer.

Xagua Bay, at the head of which lies Cienfuegos, now lay about north by west. Its entrance is only three miles wide; the two cruisers were therefore sufficient to maintain an almost infallible blockade against ships of equal or inferior speed. Within the wider part of the bay were mines and two masked batteries, with which the Americans were under orders to abstain from engaging; but outside the entrance the Montserrat ran the risk of almost certain capture.

At the moment when the lights of the two cruisers were judged to be four thousand yards ahead, the Montserrat was commanded by trumpet-call to hide her lights. The Huelva was already in darkness.

Immediately one of the two cruisers hurried back toward the harbour entrance, to checkmate a dodge in the dark by the expected prize. Meanwhile, from each cruiser the beams of two electric searchlights streamed, peering in all directions over the sea.

But before it could be definitely determined by the cruiser which continued her southern course that there were not one, but two ships, with which she had to do, suddenly the three lights of the Huelva appeared in the darkness, and at the same time the Huelva swung round, and went steaming south; the Montserrat steamed north-east; and the cruiser followed in chase after the Huelva.

But it was like a chase between a greyhound and a bird. The officers of the cruiser, knowing the speed of the expected Montserrat, were endlessly mystified to observe the lights they pursued stealing rapidly from them, though their engines were toiling, with every aperture in the stokeholds closed, under forced draught.

On, however, they strained, two miles to southward, then in a wide curve, south by east, south-east, east, hopeless now of overtaking the fugitive thing already quite four miles ahead.

By this time the Montserrat had changed her north-easterly course to one north by west, and when about a mile from the harbour entrance, suddenly showed her lights; the other cruiser waiting there promptly gave chase, and both went racing south-west, the cruiser gaining somewhat on the transport.

This manoeuvre was adopted in order to draw away the cruiser from the harbour mouth, for at once the Huelva, which was about in the course of the transport and her pursuer, put out her lights; and both cruisers a few minutes afterwards started in the wake of the Montserrat.

The chase now would have been short, and already the foremost of the cruisers was about to send a twelve-pounder across the sea, when once more the lights vanished, and instantly reappeared.

But the lights that reappeared were not the Montserrat's. The ship which the cruisers now chased was the Huelva, the transport calmly continuing her way south-west toward her next destination.

And now the great yacht, as it were, took the two cruisers in tow — led them dancing a mile or two in a southerly curve, and then came racing back due north. She passed through the harbour mouth while the cruisers were still two thousand yards to the south.

It was reported next day in all the newspapers of Europe and America that the Montserrat had run the blockade.

CHAPTER V.

SIXTY THOUSAND DOLLARS IN SPECIE.

THAT NIGHT, TOWARD one, a small skiff put out from a creek grown to the water's edge with cocoanut-trees in a lonely part of Xagua Bay. She was rowed by a single negro, naked to the waist, and in her stern sat a man, wrapt in a voluminous coarse brown poncho, who left behind him as he moved a trail of the most delicious fragrance. He was smoking a green tobacco-leaf, moistened in cocoanut-water, and rolled before the first 'sickness' of the plant. It was the rebel leader, Gomez.

One of the points which, as the American-Spanish War developed itself, surprised and puzzled the world, was the inactivity of the insurgents on the island. Now that they had the great power of America on their side, important movements, brisk and energetic enterprises, were daily expected of them. But in vain was any such news awaited.

Gomez was a thick-set, powerful man, but with a surprising activity of movement. His face wore a continual expression of rough good-humour; but in the hard-headed look of his low, broad, slanting forehead was a suggestion of aggressive self-assurance.

The Huelva lay at anchor half a mile from the point of his embarkation; the land-troops had long since been disembarked from her, and a number of boats were even then making the last voyage shoreward with the remainder of her military freight.

Gomez swung himself nimbly up her side by the first end of rope he happened to catch. The captain of the Huelva awaited him. He was at once conducted aft, and into the regions of the cabin.

It was not the first time he had entered it; yet again he started with surprise, and a certain feeling of awe invaded a mind not very inclined to reverence. He was led through a complexity of corridors into a circular apartment, from whose dome hung a vague pink globe of softest light, making black the crimson hangings of Utrecht velvet in the semi-gloom, while the furnishing was of that heavy and rich pomp inaugurated by the Venetian noblesse of the fifteenth century. Gomez had sat down upon a swaying tabouret of silk and augite for some minutes, believing himself alone, when from the dimness of a far portion of the room there reached him a voice.

‘Pray come nearer, Senor Gomez,’ it said.

Gomez leapt up, Appadacca put down a book, and they were face to face.

‘Well, I am glad you have been able to come after all, señor,’ said Appadacca, ‘though we meet under darker auspices this time than ever before. Our sport has ended in earnest, you see.’

‘Sport, your Excellency? Senor, I call the holy Madonna to witness that this insurrection has never been sport to me! Sport, say you? No sport to me, by the great God! Do you call, then, a hundred and fifty thousand starving women and children sport?’

‘No. The sport came first; the hundred and fifty thousand after. I always looked upon you as a person of excellent memory, Gomez.’

‘Well, but, your Excellency, in the name of—’

‘No. Pray calm yourself. I did not wish to see you in order to blame you for anything, but merely in order to guide you for the future. This absurd war is as much, perhaps, the fault of my own rather precipitate crew as it is your fault; they know my private likes and dislikes, and foolishly imagine that they can fulfil my will by acting on their own whims. You have heard of the catastrophe to an American warship in Havana Harbour — However, it is of no importance. But what you must now understand, Gomez, is that the hour is come for a total volte face on your side. Your country is in genuine danger, my friend.'

'Cuba is my country, señor — not Spain.'

'Well, then, since you will have it so, I repeat, your country is in genuine danger.'

'Of what, señor?'

'Of ceasing to be Spanish.'

'And of becoming Cuban, señor?'

'No, of becoming — ha! ha! — American.' Gomez hung his head.

'The idea does not please you, Senor Gomez, I see.'

'I admit that it does not please me, señor. But by the Madonna, I do not know that I should not prefer to see Cuba a Yankee rather than a Spanish land.'

'Come, sir, do not lie to me in that fashion!' said Appadacca sternly. 'If your Mother is cruel, she is at least not disgusting; if she lacerates your back, she at least does not revolt your stomach. And you know it. And in your heart you prefer the cruel to the ugly Mother. Nor is your memory really bad, Gomez; nor have you really forgotten the actual sequence of events — how that the cruelties came after, not before, the provocation which you and I, in our rôle of amateur insurrectionists, gave to them. This provocation, sir, is what I have called our "sport"; and since it has resulted in very serious earnest, I say the time is now come for it to end.'

'Well, I have proceeded so far on your Excellency's counsel and support. I suppose that is what I must continue to do. But what is it you propose, señor? Not that I should disband any troops?’

‘No; what are the plans of the Americans?’

‘The first move which they intend, as far as I understand it,’ said Gomez, ‘is to establish a base in Cuba; and for that purpose they intend to bombard the two forts at Matanzas on the north coast in a day or two.’

‘Then?’

‘Then a detachment of some five thousand troops which are massing at Tampa, most of them, I hear, inured against the yellow fever, will be brought over.’

‘Then will be your chance.’

‘To turn against them, you mean, señor?’

‘I compliment your divination, Gomez.’

‘But your Excellency must see that it is impossible to maintain an army without funds; from these Yankees I await the sinews of war. And having once received their benefits, I am not the man to turn against them afterwards.’

‘Then, do not receive their benefits.’

‘But, señor—’

‘No, I have foreseen your difficulty, Gomez. On the night of Thursday next, at eleven, the Montserrat will be at the Cape de Cruz, having on board the sixty thousand dollars in specie for which you telegraphed. The captain of the Huelva will give you instructions, as you pass up, under what conditions you are to receive the sum. Within another week you shall receive in addition several times that sum; the condition being — loyalty, and, for the present, the cessation of the Sport.’

The two men continued to converse for yet an hour. Then Appadacca touched a button and rose; Gomez was left to ponder drowsily over the interview, his senses being overpowered by an incense of myrrh which languidly fumed behind a drapery in the apartment.

At this time the Montserrat was moving along the Isla de Pinos on her weather bow, steering east.

Avoiding the blockaded coast, she passed midway between Cape Catoche and the westernmost point of Cuba, and then, steering northwest, made for the North Florida coast. By this time her name had been painted out, and the name Caico substituted.

Her whole object in the present cruise was to fulfil the obligation entered into with the Huelva to do Appadacca's bidding, in return for his assistance in taking her cargo and troops through the blockade.

Her captain had, therefore, no sort of animus against Dick P. Hocking; and though stringently fulfilling his orders as to Hocking's diet, admitted him to a certain intimacy. Hocking was allowed to wander about the ship as he chose, and, meantime, with scrupulous economy, he subsisted on his rounds of meat and bread.

On the second night out, during the captain's watch, Hocking being then on deck, and the crescent moon shining in a brand of crushed silver over the smooth sea, the captain said:

‘And as to the war, master, you bet on your own side, no doubt.’

‘Well, I reckon I do,’ said Dick P. Hocking, ‘though there is precious little I know of it so far.’

‘There is little to be known, señor. The Americans have blockaded the island yonder, and captured some few ships. But what they are thinking of in attacking Cuba, and leaving alone the weak point of Spain, is more than a man can know.’

‘Which is the weak point of Spain?’ asked Hocking, looking at the sky.

‘Manila, surely,’ answered the captain.

‘Ah, how is that?’ asked Hocking.

‘Well, one may talk to you, being a prisoner, and so on. It is the thought of the Philippines that is troubling the big heads at Madrid — not Cuba. There are five warships at Manila, and — you would not believe it — they lack the common shot and shell and powder to do their work when an enemy puts in an appearance.’

‘But forts — they’ve got forts, man, at the entrance to the harbour,’ suggested Hocking musingly.

‘Forts! The forts are much in the same way, as I happen to know. And if you knew how we Spaniards fall down before those islands! If harm came to them, there would likely be revolution and military dictatorship, and I know not what, as you’d see. Happily, you Yankees are afraid of the forts, as you say, and daren’t touch them yet. By the time you begin to think of the matter, we’ll be ready, don’t you see?’

‘I do some. But where have you run foul of these facts about the forts and ships, then?’

‘Oh, I! I would know, you know. I have been in the swim in high tides over yonder for the last three weeks on account of my cargo, and have heard the whispering one way and another. Besides, am I not just back from the Eastern waters, where I took out troops to knock Alejandrino on the head?’

‘He another rebel?’ asked Hocking.

‘Ay.’

‘Rebels here in Cuba, and rebels yonder in the Philippines — it looks as if you were about wanting someone to lend a hand to your country some, these days, friend,’ muttered Hocking.

‘Ay, but it’ll be a bad throw for those who try to lend the hand,’ said the captain, with a nod of menace.

‘H’m! Well, we’ll see into that, sonny,’ mused Hocking.

The next evening the Montserrat put in at a deserted part of the Florida coast about seven miles north of Tampa Bay.

All that day Dick P. Hocking had been strangely studious, reading the 'Taçano' of Quevedo, a torn book of rather ancient Spanish which he found in the cabin. He could not understand two consecutive sentences of it; yet he seemed to pore with eagerness over the pages.

He had also found on a shelf in his cabin an old square bottle of small size, and in the bottom of this a little gum, some of it still liquid. This Dick P. Hocking had all the day in his pocket; and there, too, lay a little penknife of fine amber as sharply-bladed as a razor.

He had now consumed the last of his sandwiches, and was again famishing.

At about seven o'clock, while the ship was coasting slowly, well in sight of land, the captain of the Montserrat entered his apartment. Hocking was studying, with glasses on nose, Quevedo's 'Taçano.'

'Now, señor,' said the captain, 'if you will write a note at my dictation — in Spanish, please — to your nearest agent for the amount, the boat is ready, and the first train from Tampa shall take my messenger.'

'I am ready,' said Hocking.

'One moment — I will bring you pen, ink, and paper.'

'Pencil will do,' said Hocking.

He took the slim brown pencil from the pocket of his note-book.

'Bring us a sheet of paper, capitan. Or stay — this will do — this will do.'

In a moment he had torn the fly-leaf from the 'Taçano.' On one side it was yellow, on the other white.

At the bottom of the white side were three lines of print which the captain, bending over Hocking as he wrote, saw without seeing, noticed without noticing. It looked like some announcement of the publisher of the book.

Had the printed words been Spanish, their meaning would probably have entered in a mechanical, unconscious way into his preoccupied brain. But they were English. His eyes rested long upon them, and did not see them. They were so obviously natural just where they were.

Hocking scribbled in pencil:

‘DEAR SIR,

‘You will be good enough to deliver to the bearer of this, without delay, sixty thousand dollars for my account in gold specie of the United States. I have strong personal reasons for writing in Spanish, and for approaching you in this manner. See below — my signature. The matter is very urgent.

‘Yours truly,

‘RICHARD P. HOCKING.

‘To JAMES M. SHERMAN,

‘Halifax, Georgia.’

And as the captain turned to procure an envelope, Dick P. Hocking said to himself:

‘I’m darned if it doesn’t look like getting there!’

The words printed at the bottom of the leaf were these:

‘Tell Gov. Span, ship near Tam. going south at once. I pris. Give money, but capture.’

At about seven two men, able to speak good English, were landed on the coast. They walked to Tampa, and within an hour took train northward, bearing Hocking's pencilled and printed messages.

Few as were the words printed, they were yet a model of the man's measureless patience, his minute acuteness — that patience and that cuteness which had gone to the amassing of his uncounted millions. Upon the cutting-out of those few letters from the thin - leaved book, and the pasting them together in the required order, he had spent fifteen hours, working with thick, buxom, blunt fingers never intended for that sort of labour. He had known well that the least flaw, the slant of a letter, the trace of a joining, and attention would be attracted. And in the end there was not, as a matter of fact, the least flaw, or slant, or trace of joining. Over the whole, when the work was done, he might have scribbled the word 'Thorough.'

By noon of the next day the two messengers were back at Tampa, and their walk slanted to the right under the weight of the cash-boxes which they carried.

At two the Montserrat stood away to the south by east, bound for her rendezvous with the Huelva.

At half-past three she sighted a long bolster of brownish smoke on the southern horizon.

Fearing trouble, she pricked off her course east, and put her last two knots upon her speed; but in doing so, she too poured out a goodly volume of dark redundant smoke.

The day was bright and hot, the sea glassy. The two ships were ten miles apart.

Dick P. Hocking stood near a taffrail astern, looking over the glistening expanse of pale water. He was as content as a man could be; his fists bulged out his lax voluminous pockets, and rattled the few pieces of coin within them; his squat right leg cocked out; between his lips was one of the most aromatic cigars of Havana; he had just been learning what a joy it is to eat. The Montserrat seemed a little kingdom, and he its king.

He watched that growing bolster of smoke; but he could stand beans both ways — good luck as well as bad. His face showed no exultation. He did not forget that he was smoking an exceptional cigar.

The chase intensified to straining-point, but it was hopeless for the trooper. Her highest speed was nineteen knots, and there came tearing after her a thing all guns and tubes and gleaming mechanism, at the rate of twenty-three an hour. It was the gunboat Terror.

A quarter of an hour before sunset — that is to say, within two hours from the start — the Terror was two miles away on the port quarter of the Montserrat, and it was then that a puff of smoke was seen to issue from the warship's beam; a half-minute afterwards a gross hoot of sound; and Dick P. Hocking looked upward to see a raging baleful thing fly quarrelling with itself over his head, to plunge into the sea two hundred yards away in a mêlée of flame and spouting foam.

He nodded his head.

‘Capitan mio!’ he said, ‘this time I guess—’

The Montserrat was now a flurry of palefaced men scurrying wildly about, but she continued her course till, five minutes later, a thing rushed past her bowsprit, carrying it along with it, and immediately her captain was seen at the mainmost shrouds, hurriedly hauling down something. The beat of her engines slackened; the Terror grew large and near; there were boats in the water, and soon a young lieutenant was bowing before Dick P. Hocking.

Hocking was, as it proved, in a considerable hurry to get his feet once more on United States soil. Even while a prize-crew was being got on board the Montserrat, he was on board the Terror, and with him the cash-boxes.

He arrived at Tampa in the early evening, and at once set off northward. He had several things to get off his chest.

The first was to announce that the ship known as the Huelva, a craft passing for a monstrous yacht, but in reality possessing the arms and armature of a ship-of-war, would very likely be lying in wait between Cuba and Key West for the next transport-ship to Havana.

Also, there was not a member of the Naval Committee in whose mind the name of Dick P. Hocking was not of high significance. And to each, in the week that followed, Dick P. Hocking made a point of mentioning one word — the word ‘Manila.’ And that word he impressed upon them all, and told them why. A week later the Stars and Stripes waved over the town.

He had all his life been a busy man, but he had never been in such a heat of business as now in his life before.

He had to send advices in urgent haste to a host of correspondents; certain bills drawn upon them by him at certain dates were invalid, and must be dishonoured; but he found that some of them had already been discharged in favour of the house of Campos.

Also, Hocking in these days was very much in the company of naval experts and builders, and the man’s whole mind seemed open to drink in the details of an entire new science. At an interview with the manager of Cramp of Philadelphia, he said:

‘And now, how long to build? — for that, I guess, is about the main question.’

‘A battleship, in general — two years.’

‘Ah, but we are not discussing battleships at the present. Let us confine ourselves to torpedo-boats. Seems to me they are about what the future’s got to reckon with.’

‘Well, of course that varies, according to the orders a firm has on hand. Nine months — six months.’

‘Six months. Now, I put to you a question in simple proportion. Suppose it takes two hundred men six months to build a torpedo-boat, how long will it take four hundred men?’

‘Something in the neighbourhood of three months, I should guess, sir.’

‘That’s about it, I reckon,’ said Hocking. ‘And how long would it take eight hundred men, if your brain doesn’t break down under the strain?’

The manager laughed.

‘Well, Mr. Thompson,’ said Hocking, ‘there is one thing I want to impress strongly upon you, if we do business together — and just see you don’t be forgetting it, neither — that I am one of the richest men on the face of this globe.’

CHAPTER VI.

A SPANIARD THINKS.

THE HUELVA PASSED out of Xagua Bay soon after darkness fell, not even careful to mask her lights. There was a short chase by the two blockading cruisers towards the south-west, and a blank shell splashed into the sea a hundred feet astern of her. But she ran on her way as unconcernedly as a high-gearred bicycle chased by a stout policeman.

At the moment news was scarce and rare. It was said at Cienfuegos that an invasion of Cuba was impending by an American army of some 20,000 regulars and 50,000 volunteers; it was said that Admiral Dewey had set out with his Far Eastern fleet from Mirs Bay, with Manila as his objective — nothing more. Meantime, as the captain of the Montserrat had informed the captain of the Huelva, an easy prize for the latter was about to sail from Key West with a valuable military cargo, stores, and specie for Havana; and when the captain communicated this news by telephone to Appadacca, and asked if he should prosecute a capture, Appadacca replied: ‘You may.’

And so it was that the Huelva, with close on two thousand tons of coal in her bunkers, steered west, and next morning was making her way leisurely at twenty knots off Cape S. Antonio, the western extremity of Cuba.

Immanuel Appadacca had just cast himself upon a couch, and there lay back, musing. It was in his library, where all night he had been poring over a volume of old-Arab verse-lore. Here no hint of the day intruded, but tongues of blue and green flame, writhing from openwork censers of Etruscan pottery, diffused a species of tinted half-light. The long piles of books were mostly hidden by tapestries of Arras.

He was roused from his thoughts by a sound in a neighbouring alcove — a whistle. He rose and went to the tube. A voice said:

‘There is a large barque on our port bow — has hoisted the Union Jack. She is close-hauled on the starboard tack, wanting to weather the Cape. Shall I’

‘Make her lie to,’ said Appadacca. ‘Do not harm her; get news.’

The Huelva turned her course across the bows of the barque, sent a three-pounder over the sea, and in a few minutes slackened speed sufficiently to get a pinnace out. The barque lay to at her signal.

The first lieutenant took with him one of the crew of the main-deck four-inch guns, a London lad called Roach. And from Roach’s interpreting it was learnt that the barque was from Liverpool, bound to Belize with iron sleepers, and had met near the Florida Reef an American transport, convoyed by a cruiser and two gun-boats, bound for Havana. By one of the gun-boats she had been bespoken, and had learned — news.

The transport was at once guessed by the Huelva’s captain to be the one which the Huelva was seeking. (She was being convoyed in consequence of the warning of Dick P. Hocking.)

Within half an hour Appadacca in his library had in his hand a despatch giving this and the other items of news gathered from the barque.

The chief of these related to the event at Manila.

Eleven Spanish ships, armed with old muzzleloading guns incapable of destroying a sea-fowl at three thousand yards, had stood still to be shelled by exquisitely modern long-range rifled cannon in Manila harbour; old sandbag forts had spluttered ineffectually at the invading fleet through impossible old brass guns. Manila, whose very name was poetry, was at the mercy of a Yankee commodore.

The Spaniards had not killed one single American. They were reported to have injured not one single ship. Some of the shells which they had fired had struck, but they had been blank; they had ricocheted, and harmlessly fallen into the sea. Why, being at long distance with bad guns, and so at a disadvantage, they had not adopted the very elementary tactical manœuvre of coming to close quarters, was not explained. They had died heroically under a perfect tempest of shrapnel, and had done nothing.

And this was at Manila, the land of aromas, the nosegay of ancient Spain, whose name was poetry!

It was a place very dear to the Spaniard. Immanuel Appadacca thought of it as the future domain of Dick P. Hocking, and smiled. Among the nutmegs soon would clank and throb a red-brick factory; through the groves of almond and cornel would scream and rattle the cars of an elevated railroad — I guess.

He smiled. Then, suddenly, he crumpled the paper in his clenched fist, and cast himself face downward on a divan, heaped with llama wools; over his face pressed his small jewelled hands, and through his body passed the slightest spasmodic movements.

He was a man of the acutest mental calibre. He could knit his brows and see far into a fact where many another, even with the aid of glasses, would find only darkness. And as he lay, quivering slightly, he peered deeply into Destiny, with travailing, anguished brain.

Already, from that beginning, he seemed to see the end.

That beauty which he loved, was it not the hectic beauty of the consumptive patient — doomed, doomed?

Or was it not like the beauty of woman, weak, skin-deep, spoiling at the first rough blast, the first unsparing sun; unfit to combat and survive the rude, earnest traffic of the coming centuries?

The Latin races — were they then doomed to go, to pass for ever away?

And leave what behind? Nothing but one vast workshop, side by side with one vast Stock Exchange, and one vast railway-station? Here was a survival of the unfittest! So it seemed to him.

But, at least, the old beautiful was worth fighting for, and dying for, as against the new ugly. And there was at any rate one man prepared to fight and die for it — the name of him, Immanuel Appadacca.

He lay there contending with a thought which rose in his brain. It was a tremendous thought; he was unwilling to give it entertainment, but it persisted, he struggled, and it came back and conquered him.

He leapt up, he touched an electric button, and instantly a dark-skinned man in Moorish robes was bowing before him.

‘You are to see, Ali,’ said Appadacca, ‘whether the holy Father can find it convenient to grant me an audience here within the hour.’

The Moor, making an obeisance, retired backwards.

Appadacca reseated himself, took up the book he had been perusing, and again began to read. In twenty minutes the arras at an angle of the apartment opened, and a tall man of austere and pallid countenance stood there.

His face was very long and thin, and darkened over lip and jaws and chin with an inky indication of shaven hair; the black eyes rather too close together, and downward-looking, and shifting; the forehead narrow, high, and bald at the corners; the chin very prominent. An odour of peace was about him.

A silver crucifix hung on his breast, a rosary at his hip; his lank form was closely wrapped by a surtout, banded at the waist.

Appadacca rose and bowed. And he said:

‘Holy Father...’

The priest inclined his head, and his lips muttered:

‘My son...’

CHAPTER VII.

SAXON V. LATIN.

THE TWO MEN sat near together. The priest, with his long left forefinger stroked gently down and down the smooth part of his crucifix with a slow, clandestine movement. Appadacca had thrown himself into a violet velvet armchair with an appearance of carelessness, yet, in doing so, had slightly shifted its position, so that his own face could not readily be seen, while a pallid greenish ray from one of the lamps shone full upon the priest's wan countenance.

Appadacca said:

‘I have news, Father Pedro. Manila is in the hands of the Americans.’

‘Soh, my son.’

‘You know?’

‘Yes. I had Sancho with me in the chapel, surmising that something had been heard. He told me all.’

‘But the details — they are interesting.’

‘Ah?’

‘Eleven Spanish ships have been destroyed — burnt, sunk, or battered. No American has been killed; it appears that no American ship has been seriously injured.’

‘That is so,’ said Father Pedro, with no sign of emotion, only his downward-looking eyes continually moved, and his finger lightly stroked the crucifix. He waited. He knew well that he had not been summoned to a conference with Immanuel Appadacca for nothing.

‘Yet the sailors who fought on our side fought bravely — one, it seems, might almost say heroically,’ proceeded Appadacca.

‘They were Spaniards,’ said Father Pedro.

‘Yet they effected nothing.’

‘It is strange.’

‘Hardly strange, perhaps. The inference as to cause is obvious.’

‘What, then, is your inference, my son?’

‘That they were badly generated.’

‘It is an inference, certainly.’

‘The old story, Father, you will say.’

‘Ah, perhaps those words might possibly rise to the lips.’

‘Badly generated — badly generated in Cortes and on battlefield, in council-chamber and at sea. And badly, because selfishly.’

‘Do not suppose that my silence means disagreement,’ said Father Pedro after half a minute.

‘Quite so. I say selfishly. But the selfishness will persist to the end: that, assuredly, will be the last thing to die in Spain. Our prominent men seek to be more prominent, and Spain is the victim. The people are devoted; the devotion of their great men is corrupted by the taste of power. And if that persists — and it will — we shall lose; we are doomed.’

‘I follow you carefully,’ said Father Pedro.

‘A man, however,’ said Appadacca — and his face was not visible—’ who was as prominent as possible could not seek to be more prominent.’

‘No; that is so — that is certainly so,’ assented the priest.

‘And the inference you draw, Father Pedro?’

‘Tell me your whole mind, and I will tell you plainly if I am in accord,’ said the Jesuit.

Appadacca threw down a book.

‘A military dictator would be such a man as I have described.’

‘Certainly; such a thought cannot fail to occur to one.’

‘You agree, then?’

‘In the main.’

‘But the consequence would be large, Father Pedro.’

‘Large, certainly,’ said the priest, and a smile flitted over his lips; ‘highly important for Spain, at least.’

‘But I do not see why we should not be quite candid with each other — I mean larger than that.’

‘My son, my son—’ said the priest.

‘The holy Father disapproves. For the present I will say no more.’

Appadacca’s lips closed tightly. Both men were cunning. Appadacca had the human instinct to seek ghostly fellowship with, and consent to, a thought which something within him warned him was monstrous. The priest now divined the thought, and adored it, and wished to conceal his adoration of it; and Appadacca was half doubtful, half divining of the priest’s adoration, and wished to force an avowal of his approval.

‘I have not expressed disapproval of anything, my son,’ said Father Pedro. ‘Of what should I disapprove? What, then, are those larger consequences of a dictatorship in Spain to which you refer?’

Appadacca picked up a book, opened it, and, looking steadily at the priest, said:

‘The greatest war which has yet occurred in history.’

The padre perceptibly started, and his finger paused midway in its descent down the length of the crucifix.

‘May the Immaculate preserve our hands from the stain of blood!’ he said.

Appadacca’s lip slightly curled.

‘They are already stained, Father,’ he said—’ all our hands. The whole present world is in a state of bloody-minded enmity. Is it not written that he that hateth his brother is a murderer? The nations, I think, have been slow to adopt the Christian Idea. They were never so very, very far removed from it as at this hour. The stain of blood, you say? Our hands are thick with it, Father Pedro!’

‘That is in spite of the Church, my son. But you speak of great matters. For what reasons, think you, must a military dictatorship in Spain be followed by the awful thing of which you speak?’

The padre was a man intimately familiar with the inner minutiae of European affairs, and their sequences one upon another; he knew well the answer to the question which he asked, but he asked it for reasons of his own in reference to Appadacca.

Appadacca said:

‘Holy Father, you are aware that the world is at present in the hands of two chief races — the Latin and the Teutonic. There is a third power, the Empire of Russia, which is neither, being Slav; but this power is so much in sympathy, both from its innate affinities and from the force of circumstances, with the Latin, that we may class it roughly with the Latins. French, Spanish, Italians, Russians — British, Germans, Austrians, Americans: there, for the most part, are the two prima facie camps. I say primâ facie; for, in reality, between all those in the second camp who live together with those in the first camp on one mainland there is an affinity, and a resemblance, and a sympathy, which, in a general war, will not fail somehow to show itself. Did I tell you that at Cienfuegos I received a telegram from Cadiz informing me that the crew of the German cruiser Oldenburg went ashore there, and fraternized enthusiastically with the men of our Pelayo? The sailors of the two ships marched through the streets arm in arm, wearing one another's caps. Now, American and German must be bracketed together in respect to race; yet we find German sailors wearing the caps of Spanish sailors at a time when Spanish and American are at war, the fact being that the Germans have now become very much more like the unrelated Spaniards at their doors than like the related Americans far away. Our barque this morning also gives us the news that four German warships are hasting toward Manila with some unknown object, certainly not friendly to America. I have a purpose in saying all this, if you will bear with me.'

'You interest me profoundly, my son.'

'Well, then,' said Appadacca, 'from our second race - camp we must take, for the practical purpose of computing the sympathy on our side in this war, both the German and the Austrian. And you have left two lonely nations, both disconnected with the communism of nations on the Continent of Europe — two only — Britain and America.'

Appadacca paused. The padre drew a deep breath.

'These two nations,' continued Appadacca, 'are, in reality, very unlike each other. There can be no radical sympathy between them: they are too far apart in every respect. America, to a cultured mind, is as much more repulsive than England, as England is less beautiful than the Venice of the Doges; but, unlike each other as they are, they are more like each other than either is like any of the Continental nations, and sympathy depends upon similarity. In a game of universal war, where each chooses his own partner, these two would assuredly fight together: it would be a Saxon League.'

'A formidable combination, my son.'

‘Yes; and possibly it might be made still more so, by becoming, not a Saxon, but a Teuton League — sympathy of blood proving stronger than sympathy of manners, and Germany, Austria, Sweden, and the like, joining with their cousins. On the other side would be France and Russia, Spain and Italy.’

‘But that is heterodox,’ said the padre, with the gleam of a laugh in his eyes. ‘Italy goes with the Teutons — with Germany, with Austria.’ Appadacca smiled.

‘You and I know differently, Father; the rulers of Italy, perhaps — not Italy. The Triple Alliance is dying; a telegram from the Huelva to a certain village in Calabria would, as you are aware, kill it. The first object of an Italian revolution would be the reduction of the cost of the standing army; and with this reduction, or even with the demand for it, the Alliance would be at an end. And it is not far off — probably not a year away. Italians are now paying more than 50 per cent, of all incomes in taxes. How and by whom all that could be swiftly swept away, you and I know. It was not precisely for this buffoonery of government that Mazzini, Cavour, Garibaldi, and Victor Emmanuel gave their lives.’

‘Your Latin races, my son, make excellent soldiers, but bad generals. They are all badly led, to come back to the old point.’

‘Precisely. Their general shall be — Russia.’

‘You say “shall be”?’

‘That is, if a military dictatorship happens to be set up in Spain.’

‘Who would be the dictator — Weyler?’

‘He is a brute!’

‘Polavieja?’

‘He is not disinterested.’

‘Then Martinez Campos?’

‘He would be my choice.’

‘And your choice would infallibly succeed?’

‘Yes. Their great need is money. My choice would be abundantly supplied with money.’

‘Are you still very rich, my son?’

‘Yes: I possess the Huelva and her crew.’

‘But why not call the dictator Appadacca?’

‘I see you consent to the general scheme, Father.’

‘Ah! to discuss is not invariably to approve. But why not call the dictator Appadacca?’

‘No, Father Pedro. That is not precisely in my way; your inner instincts do not admit it as suitable to my personality. With your help, I prefer to direct from the dark.’

‘Direct what?’

‘The apparent anarchy that must ensue during the process of revolution both in Spain and Italy. In Spain there will follow repudiation of the National Debt. And you are aware who will be principally interested in that matter.’

‘France and Russia—’

‘France will claim Ceuta, face to face with Gibraltar; Russia will claim Minorca — at least, it will be persistently suggested to her to do so; nor will the persistence be very necessary, I think. England will protest, and flame. The naval bases of Spain in European waters are the envy, and are destined to become the apples of discord, of the races, to range them in final fight for the possession and government of the earth.’

‘I follow you,’ said Father Pedro. ‘But to state a scheme such as that which you have in mind, and to claim for it the sanction of the Church, whose robes are Peace, and whose tabernacle is Compassion, are two different matters, my son.'

'The Church in your person disapproves, Father?' asked Appadacca insinuatingly, his eyes musing on the priest's face.

'My son, yes.'

'Ah, then, I, for my part, find the sole responsibility onerous; I drop the notion. I thought that perhaps the tacit support of the Vatican, obtained through your great influence, might, in Spain, help forward the initial steps, but — I admit my error.'

The priest blinked. He was a man of intense passions on national questions; he felt that he had said too much, and not enough.

'The end you propose is, nevertheless, blessed, my son,' he said, looking low under his eyes. 'As I understand it, it is the providing of a good soldier with a good general; it is the salvation of Spain.'

'And the aggrandizement,' added Appadacca eagerly. 'It is Morocco, South America, Mexico, and the West Indies, spreading the actual Spain of to-day over the world.'

'I repeat, it is a blessed end.'

'Yet the Church rejects it!'

'Striving to be harmless as doves.'

'And forgetting to be wise as serpents.'

'Have no fear; She is that too — that too.'

'The Latin League of which I have spoken is purely Catholic, Father, and Græco-Catholic.'

'I am vividly alive to it.'

'And the end here, if anywhere, should justify the means.'

The padre smiled.

‘Ah! I am reassured,’ said Appadacca. ‘The Church, come now, is a consenting maiden, using sweet, reluctant, amorous delays. I dare say that you are at one with me.’

The priest stood up, with fixed lips.

‘But,’ he said, ‘make haste! and when you strike, strike home.’

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PHANTOM FLEET.

NOW, IT HAPPENED that one of Dick P. Hocking's chosen satellites was a certain Rev. Silas M. Petersen, of the Methodist Free Church, whose Brooklyn chapel Dick P. Hocking had built; and the Rev. Petersen was often to be found in the company of Hocking, in Fifth Avenue, for he possessed unction, freedom of speech, and a shrewd, practical head of the world — things dear to the cockles of Dick P. Hocking's heart, I guess. So Hocking patronized and sheltered the parson under the warmth of his mighty arm, and the parson lived there as in a pleasant greenhouse of comfort, liking the patronage; 'for,' said he, 'talk as you like, I guess you can't get along without it, any way.'

Now, about the time when the priest and Appadacca were fencing in the cabin of the Huelva, these two others were travelling south alone in a Pullman car, with Hampton Roads in the eye of purpose, where the Union, recalled by telegram from Carracas, awaited them. Dick P. Hocking was taking the Rev. Silas M. Petersen with him on an exciting cruise.

And as they sped along Petersen put his elbow on his knee, and, in the midst of a conversation, said:

'Now, I'll tell you, sir, how these same Latin races, as we name them, strike me—'

Hocking nodded, and leant forward to listen. Petersen, though of goodly proportions, was a very small edition of Hocking, but uglier in figure and face, his legs being very short and his body long, so that he had rather the look of a pig standing on its hindquarters. Over his fat yellow cheek and upper lip a few hairs, which one might count, straggled and curled. His nose turned up, and his thin, falsetto voice spoke all in oily coils and modulations. He leered always downwards and far sideways when he spoke to one.

Often from those fleshy lips came words wonderfully related to the facts of a matter.

‘Well, let us have it,’ said Hocking.

‘Isn’t it just about like this somehow,’ said Petersen: ‘that just as each separate country grows its men and its women, so the whole earth, as a whole, grows its men and its women; only the men and the women of the whole earth, as a whole, are not individuals, but nations?’ Dick P. Hocking, looking at the carpet, nodded slowly several times.

‘Well, now, it’s about striking me,’ proceeded Petersen, ‘that this same Latin race is just what we may name the Woman of the civilized world. They have the pretty ways, the weakness, the excitability, the cleverness, and, I guess, the sharp nails of woman. They can’t kill, but they can get in a good scratch at a man’s eyes — till you subdue them, and train them to fetch your slippers, and darn your socks. And we others are the Man — we Americans, those Britishers — we have about got the enterprise, the independence, and the world-care of the man. And I put this question to you, sir: What is the natural end to a man and a woman brought into daily close relations?’ Dick P. Hocking looked sharply up with a kind of glad surprise, a light in his eyes, and stretching out his arm, he shouted:

‘Marriage!’

‘That’s about what it comes to, I guess,’ said Petersen—’ marriage; and till that marriage comes off in the cathedral of the world, with the angels for bridesmaids, and all the fiddles of God a-playing and making merry, neither that man nor that woman is going to have any idea of what true happiness is about like.'

'Well I'm darned!' cried Dick P. Hocking, with waving arm— 'well, if I'm not darned! Why, that's the very selfsame notion, man, that's been hovering round the back of my brain for the last two weeks — only I didn't know how to say it to myself!'

'That's so,' answered Petersen. 'Only the Woman still has to be fought for, and won. There's going to be some blood spilt over that business, I reckon. She will have to be conquered before she will give in. She's a maid, I guess, used to her freedom, loath to part with her habit of virginity — and her nails are sharp. She will have to be cruelly banged and bastinadoed before she comes round to reason, and then she will love the man for conquering her, and she will be all voluntary service, and tender cares, and she will be mending his things, and be making him smart and handsome like herself, and he will be making her healthy, and matronly, and content, and the mother of the world. That's Marriage.'

'Look here, my son,' said Dick P. Hocking, 'how about that new schoolhouse of yours?

Not roofed yet? Just do me the favour to put me down for another thousand dollars on your list! It's the very thing I've been thinking all the time! And that's just about how we'll have to work it, or else Dick P. Hocking is a fool, and so is Silas M. Petersen! and that's a lie, whoever says it.'

But now the warning change of sound when a train slows into a station was heard; and early the next morning the Union was out of sight of land, steering south-east by east toward the east Cuban coast.

Toward night she fell in, north of the small islands called Cayo Romano, with the American squadron, consisting of the battleships Iowa and Indiana, the armoured cruiser New York, and four gunboats taken from the patrol squadron. They were steaming eastward, bent upon the discovery of the Spanish squadron which had lately left Cape Verde Islands, in order, it was not doubted, to cross the Atlantic.

It was with a view to this Spanish squadron that Hocking himself was now promenading the seas. The speed of the Union was considerably higher than the average of the American squadron. He would serve as a scout, and he would see a battle.

The next day it was heard at Washington that the Spanish ships, consisting of four armoured cruisers and three destroyers, the flagship being the Infanta Maria Theresa, had been sighted off Barbadoes; and this news the Union learned at Porto Plate, in northern St. Domingo.

With all her speed she went on eastward.

Meantime, with the certainty of an engagement now in their minds, the Washington Government hurriedly despatched the battleships Massachusetts and Texas and the armoured cruiser Brooklyn to reinforce the rather deficient American squadron. These three, however, were now a long way behind, needing three or four days to come up with the main body.

These were sighted in the longitude of Andros Island by the Huelva; and at the next noon the main body of the squadron was passed by her on the starboard bow. She was then tearing furiously eastward, having now learnt the news of the advance of the Spanish fleet to meet the American, about to be reinforced as the latter was. Appadacca had no intention that a fresh Spanish squadron should be annihilated by a superior force at that moment: he had other views.

Meantime, the Union, with Dick P. Hocking and his militant spiritual prompter, was heading briskly along the south Porto Rico coast. Then, changing her course somewhat to the east of south, steamed so for half a day, when, an hour before sunset, the look-out man in the top sighted the advancing Spanish fleet. Their torpedo-destroyers were, of course, of considerably higher speed than the Union, and as soon as their number and disposition had been made out, the Union turned tail, and went hasting back northward, hoping to encounter the advance force of the American squadron not later than three the next day somewhere in the longitude of 70, and report.

The night was very dark, and when the day was coming, a dense and dank sea-born haze, white but impenetrable, muffled and blanketed all the ocean and the ship in a mystery of moisture.

But almost instantaneously, as the first horizontal beam of the sun shot in intense radiance over the sea-surface, the mist thinned and vanished into clear, hot day; and at this sudden transformation - scene, the first thing which the Rev. Petersen, in his morning mufti at an aft-taffrail, and with him the watch on deck of the Union, perceived, was a huge ship, seeming to walk the water with the gliding buoyancy of a sea-gull wetting alternate wing-tips in the brine — a ship not a mile from them, bearing down straight upon them.

At her main she flew a flag orange in colour, and bearing in the centre a device in black, altogether unknown to any published code in the world. It was the Huelva.

CHAPTER IX.

CABLE CUTTING.

ALL THE DETAILS of the swiftly-advancing ship became terribly distinct to the crew of the Union as the pure-white smoke of the fog suddenly thinned and dispersed.

She was three-masted, the fore-mast being much the tallest of the three, with a long space between it and the mizzen-mast, sufficient to admit four tall funnels, from the hinder-most of which now swayed upwards a languid streak of smoke. At the first glance the eye detected that she was armed, but though she had no visible ram, there seemed a good difference of length between her upper deck and her water-line; and about her bows, her beam, the lithe sheer and under-curves of her stern, there was a delightful suggestion of clipping levity and grace, which imparted to her the air of some winged sea-horse. Under plain sail and courses, without the aid of steam, she could flit with all that weight through eleven knots.

The Rev. Silas M. Petersen hurried below. Dick P. Hocking was still asleep in his bed. Petersen broke into his room and shook him.

‘There’s a large ship ripping straight down upon us,’ he said; ‘it strikes me the meaning of her is trouble. I reckon it is the — the Huelva!’ Dick P. Hocking lifted his body; his heavy-lidded eyes were puffed with sleep.

‘What’s her painting?’ he said.

‘A bluey white.’

‘Then it’s she.’

He heaved himself from the bed. As he did so, he heard running feet above, and a single bark of cannon.

‘Well, it looks as if they’d got me again this time,’ said Hocking.

‘If we haven’t got them,’ answered Petersen.

‘What’s your point?’ said Hocking.

‘What about those twenty-five Winchesters?’ answered Petersen.

Down upon Petersen’s back came Dick P. Hocking’s mighty paw with a slap.

‘You are the little parson for me!’ he cried.

‘What you have got to do is to hide,’ said Petersen.

‘That’s it, I reckon. But where?’

‘Why, here. And that great chest, there, it’s about made to take those Winchesters.’

At this moment down rushed the Unions captain.

‘You have heard, sir?’ he cried breathlessly. ‘It is that Spanish privateer we met at La Guayra. Do we yield? There is still five minutes’ running.’

‘Yield, yield,’ said Hocking. ‘I am not at home — that’s about all you need remember for the time being. There are twenty-five brand-new Winchester rifles on board this ship; just order a couple of hands to get them into this chest before those beastly pirates get there. And don’t forget ammunition and a good hundred and fifty rounds of shot. And look you, captain, here is the little man whose orders have got to go during my temporary absence. I guess he’s about right for both worlds, and you remember it.’

He pointed to Petersen. And deliberately he lifted himself into the bed again, put out his arm, took a cigar and lit it, drew the bedclothes to his chin, and lay there calm and huge as a fallen monolith of Stonehenge.

By this time the slowing engines of the Union were calling out in two tones long-drawn whines of melancholy rest after dire labour; then, where travail and complex turmoil had been, was perfect quiet. The ship lay stationary on the gently heaving water. Three boats were being lowered from the Huelva, which was now forging slowly through a twenty-point curve.

The Rev. Silas M. Petersen was saying to two men on the poop of the Union:

‘That ship, you may be certain, is in a hurry to get somewhere. I’ll swear — though swearing isn’t precisely in my line of business — that she was at full speed when I first sighted her. I guess what she wants to do is to get at the Spanish fleet the first moment she can. Even if she sends a prize-crew aboard here, she doesn’t mean to wait for them; we can’t keep pace with her. The moment we see the last sign of her smoke, captain, it isn’t in our pockets we’ll be resting our hands.’

The little fleet of three boats came nearer. The Union put out her trellis-work escalier, the eager mixture of tongues in the boats reached her, and in a minute men were hurrying up the steps.

One man, a Catalan giant, with a red bandana tied tight concealing his head from the eyebrows to the neck behind, came up to Petersen, who wore the parson’s collar and a short jacket. The collar perhaps attracted him. He said in rough, broken English:

‘You give our ship?’

‘We yield,’ answered Petersen.

‘What you got here?’

‘Nothing. Ballast, and may be a thousand dollars or so in money, and stores.’

‘Ah, we go to see. You come too.’

The twenty-five who had come on board then scattered to ransack the ship, with the exception of one, who bore in his hand a large official-sized envelope apparently full of papers. Petersen, the captain, and the first officer descended to the cabin with the Catalan, to whom they had handed a bunch of keys, the register, and the clearance; with them also went a negro and two Creoles from the Huelva.

Dick P. Hocking's door was in a partition jalousied in the upper portion, plain varnished walnut below. It was one of a series of doors on both sides of the passage; all were closed, most unlocked. Only Hocking's was locked, and two others of which Petersen had taken the precaution to turn the key. Three locked doors, he reasoned, would be less an object of curiosity than one.

When the Catalan came to the first locked door, he found in his bunch no key to fit it.

'The key to this port,' he said.

Where was it?

The captain was not sure, Petersen was not sure; someone ran to look; but it was weary waiting, and the Catalan appeared in a desperate hurry. At last the key was found; the door was opened; there was nothing worth seeing in the room.

Then came the second locked door. Where was the key? It was not to be found. Three Union men ran to look, and there was more waiting. It was only after the Catalan had flung his hand and said: 'Oh, afterwards I will come to look,' that someone came running with the key. The door was opened; there was nothing worth seeing in the room.

They came to the door behind which lay Hocking. The key could not be found. Again the Catalan flung his hand.

'I cannot wait,' he said; 'afterwards.'

They passed on, searching. They were interrupted by a trumpet-call from the Huelva; there was no time, the boats must be sent back.

The Catalan hurried to the upper deck, and whistled. The Unions fifty-three men and boys were now drawn up in line within each bulwark. They were summarily searched by the twenty-five who came running from below, and everything in the shape of a weapon was taken from them. Four of the twenty-five then hurried into one of the boats, took the other two in tow, and made for their ship. The Huelva began to smoke, and in a few minutes started into running between two long wavering pennants of foam. In twenty minutes she vanished from sight twelve miles to the southeast.

The bow of the Union, meantime, had been turned due north. She was now in what is called the Mona Channel, between Porto Rico and St. Domingo. The prize-crew was in charge; the men of the Union were mostly huddled together toward the fo'castle. What was the new destination of the vessel no one, except the Catalan and two or three of his men, was aware.

At one bell of the forenoon watch, the American squadron was sighted in line abreast at eight cables' interval on the port bow of the Union, heading east by south along the St. Domingo coast near Cape Engano. The Union passed within a knot of them, showing the Stars and Stripes.

It was soon after this that a once Sicilian bandit, happening to pass along the main corridor of the cabin, heard a sound, and stopped to listen. It came from behind a door, and resembled the slow, heavy breathing of someone sleeping. Dick P. Hocking, who had been interrupted in his morning's nap, had let the neglected extinguished cigar slant from his lips, and in the long interval of waiting had lapsed into napping.

The Sicilian listened till there could be no doubt of the accuracy of his hearing; then he tried the door and found it locked; then he started to run upward with the news; and as he started, he dropped with a groan.

A man who had been watching him from behind an angle of the corridor had stepped out briskly and silently, and dropped the weight of a belaying-pin upon the foreigner's temple. He stopped to take a knife with sickle-curved blade from the sheath, and two Colts from the girdle of the fallen man; then he picked a key from a pocket of his clerical waistcoat, and opened Hocking's door.

'It's about time, I reckon,' he said quickly at Hocking's ear, and flew to the chest. Hocking's lids slowly unrolled themselves, and instantly he was alert and up. At the same time three other men, the captain, mate, and engineer of the Union, appeared. They had come aft under-decks through the space of two planks removed from bulkheads. And at once the five, Hocking still in his pyjamas, set to work to load the Winchesters, and then hurriedly passed out, bearing between them the twenty-five rifles and a box of ammunition.

The whole length of cabin was deserted. They passed on till they came to the first plank-space in the bulkhead; and here there was a pause. Hocking could not get through.

The silent removal of the board had been a matter of considerable difficulty to that militant and resourceful person, Petersen. The removal of another at this juncture was not to be thought of.

'All right,' said Dick P. Hocking; 'I'll keep one of the guns, and you go ahead. I'll join you in my own fashion.'

He deposited the Winchesters which he carried on the other side of the bulkhead, and crept cautiously back to the room which he had left. Here, with sideward listening head, he waited.

He waited five, ten minutes. Then there reached him the muffled sound of a great outcry from above. There were shouts, names called, scurrying feet, Spanish oaths, and then, all suddenly, the prattling-, brittle crackle of a musketry-volley, instantly followed by another.

The Americans, twenty-six in number, two of them armed with the dead Sicilian's weapons, had taken their stand just aft of the fo'castle, with a breadth of mast and two considerable heaps of chain in protective opposition; the twenty Huelva men were better shielded, and took aim from among the funnels and deckhouses. The non-combatants of the Union were below; the vessel lay without forward movement on the water.

Abroad on the deck lay in various curves of death and anguish seven bodies — three Americans, four Huelva men. There was a profound silence, save for a hollow sound above the funnels, and the hoarse cry of a flight of boobies afar.

Then suddenly again, from the Spanish side this time, there broke the brittle crackle, the prattling musketry, a whole volley; and as the answer came crackling, the whole forward portion of the ship was rolled in hot reeking smoke and stench, within which men writhed and died.

But now, as the thickness of the powder-fog thinned, it was seen that the Spanish loss was the greater; for at the moment of firing they had exposed themselves unduly, offering their whole bodies as targets, and four had fallen to two on the other side.

There was, however, not the least disposition toward yielding. The Catalan, who was behind the forward funnel, surmising rightly that guns were the Americans' only weapons, hit upon the very best tactical device that could, in the circumstances, be conceived. The thing was to make a rush, and kill at close quarters with knives, daggers and swords.

He called:

‘Everyone this way!’

And at once there began a mixed crawling and swiftly-dodging manoeuvring of the members of his force toward him. The Rev. Silas M. Petersen, lying at full length behind a coil of chain, and observing a flying lower leg, sent a single shot; but it splintered the deck beneath the foot.

‘When I cry “One!” everyone rush and stab in a body,’ said the Catalan. By this time the American muzzles were resting ready pointed, prepared for the first human limb that showed itself. But the interval between the combatants was not large, and a second’s failure to fire on their part might now prove fatal to the whole body, who would be unarmed save for the butt-ends of their not very wieldy guns.

The word 'One' was on the mouth of the Catalan. He had, in fact, begun to say it, when from behind a shot entered his brain. It had come from the shoulder of Dick P. Hocking, who had quietly walked forward from the cabin-region toward this point.

One man only turned to knife him, and he was met by the butt-end of Hocking's weapon, which broke open his chest. Eleven pelted with all speed forward, and as they ran, five dropped. Hocking stood with projected leg, taking a long, steady second aim, his lips pressed firmly together, the morning air fluttering his pyjamas about his legs.

When he fired, there was already an impassioned stand-up mêlée going on between the contending parties. It was two or three chances to one that he would hit one of his own men. But after a long, steady sight, he fired, and a marked Spaniard fell.

It was the sixth gun he had fired in his life. The most craven of his flatterers could never call Dick P. Hocking a brilliant shot. But he was an efficient man; his name was 'Thorough he 'got there,' I guess.

In two minutes the struggle was over. The Rev. Silas M. Petersen's face and pastoral collar ran red, and a long rip went up his palm. He had fought like three, and the last Huelvan that went down rolled together with Petersen in a hissing struggle that was ended by a blow on the Spaniard's nape from the Unions mate. Dick P. Hocking stood contemplating it, and these things he pondered in his heart.

He was once more master of the Union. He dropped the rifle with a bang.

In half an hour, as the Union moved once more southward to reseek the American fleet, Petersen approached him with an envelope, all red. The parson said:

‘One of them had this about him; I guess it was to deliver this that they were taking us northward, and it ought to interest you.’

The envelope under the blood was directed to Joseph Campos.

Dick P. Hocking sat down at a table, and he put his spectacles on his nose, and he opened that envelope.

‘This, I reckon, comes under the head of contraband of war, anyway,’ said he.

The chief bulk of the contents consisted of a piece of parchment, partly printed, and partly written over in Spanish. Hocking made out that it was Immanuel Appadacca’s title-deed to the tract of territory purchased by him contiguous to the disputed boundary-line between British Guiana and Venezuela.

Then there was a letter written in Appadacca’s own hand on vellum. — It gave to Campos certain detailed instructions as to the winding-up of various business affairs in the United States, as to conveying a sum which he named to the rebel Gomez, and as to Campos’ immediate departure for Cadiz, where Appadacca needed him.

But the interest of the letter was in its end. It stated that a certain millionaire, named Immanuel Appadacca, had lately died. He was a Venezuelan, but entertained a profound admiration for England and the English. Moreover, he was a man with whom the mere possession of a whim meant its accomplishment. He had left the disputed Guiana-Venezuelan territory as a free gift to the British Government. The title-deeds were enclosed.

The letter ended with these words:

‘I am about to cut the cable between the two British islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent. You are to spread the report by every means in your power that this act, which constitutes an act of war against Britain, is the work of the Spanish cruisers now in these waters.'

CHAPTER X.

THE CHAMBERLAIN SPEECH.

DICK P. HOCKING sat long, puzzling over this letter. He understood the meaning of the Spanish words, but he did not understand the letter.

Only, he understood that it meant mischief, earthquake, world-trouble. Also, he understood that all this was proceeding from the intellect of Appadacca; and by now he had learnt to reverence the intellect of Appadacca.

He called to him the Rev. Silas M. Petersen. He said:

‘Look here, parson, just let me translate to you this thing.’

And he translated it, word for word. And when he was finished, there was silence for five minutes, until the reverend gentleman, lifting up a clear brow, said slowly and distinctly:

‘It is the sharp nails of — the Woman, I guess.’

‘Yes, I can make out that much of it,’ said Hocking, scratching his head.

‘He says that he wants it to look so that Spain has committed an act of war against England, as I understand. Well, that signifies that he wants England to declare war against Spain, if words have any signification.’

Hocking’s abdomen began to dandle in a laugh.

‘Ho! that would signify a rather sharp bust-up for Spain, wouldn’t it?’

‘It would signify a bust-up — yes,’ answered Petersen, ‘but not a sharp bust-up. Not if Russia, and France, and Germany, and Italy, and Austria, and the rest of Europe took sides with Spain.’

‘Damn the rest of Europe!’

‘Well, condemn the rest of Europe as we may, there Europe stands, a solid fact. And I am only saying that it seems clear to me that that is about what this Appadacca is feeling after. A quarrel between Spain and England at this moment will just signify to the rest that England is siding actively with the States; and just let that word “Alliance” get abroad, and the skies’ll blacken, you’ll see, and there’ll be thunders and lightnings on this earth.’

‘Yes; but don’t you see, parson, here’s the fellow doing something in just the opposite sense to his other act: he’s actually offering this piece of land to England. It’s the motive here that bothers me.’

‘Ah, there I don’t pretend to perceive the inwardness of his deal,’ said Petersen. ‘It looks—’

‘It looks as if he wanted to open old sores between England and the States. You know, parson, that the two nations have forgotten all about this matter very near — the two nations; but perhaps you don’t know that the big guns, the people behind the scenes who run the nations, are a bit sore yet over that same Venezuelan boxing-match. It wouldn’t altogether be sugar-plums and cocoanut-water to Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, if this particular piece of land became British territory, I tell you, sonny.’

‘On the other hand, he is aiming at throwing the two nations into each other’s arms by his cable-cutting. He is either a fool, or a precious profound sort of rascal—’

‘Stop! I have worked it out, parson,’ cried Hocking, dropping his fist on the table. ‘No, no, the man isn’t a fool; he’s a man worth fighting with and conquering, is this Appadacca. Wait — wait. It’s a case of going one better, is it? All right, Mr. Senor, with your beastly jokes. Don’t you surmise what he is after now, parson? He wants to make England look so that she seems allied with us, by snarling at Spain; but he doesn’t want it to be a firm and cordial alliance. Between the two friends, just at the critical moment, he throws this bone — not enough, perhaps, to bar the alliance, but enough to make them snarl at each other behind the scenes while they are openly snarling at the common foe. This darned fellow means mischief all round.'

'You've hit it there!' said Petersen.

They nodded at each other.

'Yes; but this particular bit of land belongs to Dick P. Hocking at the present moment,' said Hocking. 'These title-deeds are contraband of war, if anything is. First I got the ship and he got the land; now I've got the land and he's got the ship, I guess. We'll see how we go on.' By noon the deck of the Union had been cleared of the dead, and the five wounded were being tended in cabin-berths. At three o'clock the American squadron was again sighted at the southern end of the Mona passage. A boat of the Union was sent to the flagship, and information given as to the latitude in which the Spanish ships had been seen, and also as to the sailing of the Huelva in the direction of the Spaniards.

It was therefore without much hope of finding the enemy that the Americans continued on their way. Towards sunset of the next day their scouts came in with the announcement that the Spaniards had undoubtedly turned back. Twenty-four hours afterwards Europe learnt that the Spanish cruisers and gunboats were coaling at Martinique, and a few days later at Curaçao.

The Americans, on their part, turned back also. Some of their ships were detailed to watch the Cuban 'Windward' Channel, some hurried to the east end of Cuba to watch the Yucatan Channel, lest the Spaniards should pass that way to fall upon the few unprotected ships maintaining the blockade of Havana; the rest of the Americans proceeded to San Juan.

Then followed the bombardment. The Americans, entering the bay, poured a red rain upon the wretched forts intended to protect the more wretched town. The San Juan guns were manned by amateurs, untrained enthusiasts, local warriors; their shots fell wide or short, they did little damage. In England the newspapers printed in bourgeois type ‘thrilling’ details of this ‘terrible’ affair. But the important point of the engagement was announced in small nonpareil in sequestered corners. It was this: that at every shot which inflicted an insignificant damage upon an American ship, the crew of a small French cruiser in the bay sent up cheer on cheer.

At this time it had been resolved among the ladies of New York to import no more Parisian modes; and popular feeling against France for her supposed partisanship with Spain had gone so far, that members of the House of Representatives were declaring their determination to oppose any money vote to enable the United States to take part in the Paris Exhibition of 1900.

It was at a time like this that a British Minister of State, and a member of the Cabinet, threw his bomb.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in a public speech, spoke of ‘alliance’ between the English-speaking races.

It was to be presumed that he spoke with authority, with responsibility. And if so, his words were great in import. It meant the complete upsetting of the balance of power of the world. It meant that Britain would be far stronger than any present combination of force in Europe; it seemed to invite all the various combinations of force in Europe to become a single combination of force — to put all their weight on the other side of the see-saw — if they were not to be hurled and scattered into the air by this tremendous aggregation of weight.

And at once the Continent took fire. The island threatened to become the dog; the mainland was dwindling to the tail. Can the tail wag the dog? Look well to it, ye Powers.

Whether the British Government was aware how events connected with the Spanish-American war were already tending to bring about a European combination against the Saxon race, without the aid of outspoken speeches, is unknown. With the aid of outspoken speeches, it was certainly not far off.

Even the Swiss and Belgian press cried out in scare.

On the next morning there was a hurried meeting of the Cabinet Council at Madrid. For one Power to offer alliance to a second at the moment when that second is at war with a third, was not unlike an act of hostility committed by the first against the third.

And to make the cloud darker, just at the beginning of the Cabinet Council, General Martinez Campos had handed him the following telegram:

‘Huelva will be at Cadiz during the week, when I hope to confer with you for your guidance. British cable about to be cut will be cut by me. — APPADACCA.’

At the Cabinet meeting it was resolved that at once the Spanish Government should make representations to the various Powers, beginning with Russia, as to the speech of the British Minister, and its obvious effect in upsetting the balance of power in Europe.

And that night, under a dulled moon stooping her head through sombre trails of cloud, a party of men landed on a rocky coast at a southern headland of the island of St. Vincent. The occupant of the stern was wrapped in a flowing mantle, and as the boat’s bow touched the gravel where the surf came with spasmodic lap, he was lifted out by a man who stood knee-deep, and deposited on the dry sand. Ten of the twelve who formed the crew then walked along the edge of the curving coast-wall, searching the ground, that cloaked figure last.

In five minutes someone whispered, 'Here it is!'

He pointed to a thick cable made of layers of netted wire, alternating with gutta-percha, which ran down a hillside, then along the sands, then dived to its dark bed within the deep. A man lifted an adze.

But before it fell, the cloaked figure cast a hurried glance behind. He had heard a footstep. The next moment a fat hand was laid lightly on his back.

'Don't you do that,' said a voice.

The other's face paled with passion; he said not a word.

'Look you,' said Silas M. Petersen; 'I came all the way over the mountains from Castries to-day on horseback, purposely to stop you in this affair, for I knew beforehand all about it, you can bet. And I can stop you, for behind those rocks are twenty men, well armed. Well, but I don't mean to stop you. I have about come round to the view of my kind friend and master, who wants you to work your will in this deal, and take the consequences. Only, hark you, I am a preacher of the Gospel — and stop — are you a priest? You are! Then we are birds of the same quill, I reckon. It's peace and goodwill we are both after, I guess. That's what we are there for, you'll say: to do the will of the Lord Jesus Christ, who said, "Blessed are the peacemakers." Then I counsel you, stop this business, brother. I won't prevent you, but, if you love your country, and your own life, stop it.'

Down, once, twice, thrice, fell the adze.

And from the priest's curved and pallid lips fell one word, the murmured word:

'Vermin!'

And Silas M. Petersen, as he turned away, he, too, with a certain disdain, said aloud:

‘Pride goeth before destruction, my man, and a haughty spirit before a fall....’

CHAPTER XI.

IN DEEP WATERS.

THE HUELVA COALED at Martinique. She left the south end of St. Lucia, where the cable was cut, without the least suspicion on the part of anyone on board that the Union, with Hocking was at Castries, near the north end.

During the night of the seventh day the Huelva's pinnacle was throbbing up the Solent with Appadacca in her stern. Late the next afternoon he was closeted with the Prime Minister in an inner apartment at the Foreign Office.

At this time the Anglo-American rapprochement was looming large. It was in everyone's mouth.

There was, indeed, the faintest suspicion abroad that the British Prime Minister himself was not so passionately enamoured of alliance as some of his lieutenants, as the mass of the nation, as the mass of Americans. Since the beginning of the movement he had made speeches, but on that subject had remained austere mute.

It was known that, in general, he had the strongest personal antipathy to the Yankee; but it was supposed that one man, even if he were strongly inclined that way, would be unable to withstand the set of the national currents. Already, in fact, a meeting to settle preliminaries had been arranged to take place in New York between the American Secretary of State, the Assistant-Secretary of State, Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, and Sir Louis Davies, the Canadian Minister of Marine.

The mightiest affairs, however, depend upon the wills and motives of individuals.

‘You tell me a strange thing, señor,’ said the Prime Minister.

‘It is, however, true,’ replied Appadacca.

‘And the title-deeds, you say, should be in our hands — when?’

‘Within nine days at the furthest.’

‘It is by no means certain, you know, that our Government will see its way with absolute clearness to accept the gift. I do not conceal from you that we are, most of us, in no mood at the present moment to give any cause of jealousy to the people of the United States. We recognise their war as just and magnanimous—’

‘Their very justice is unjust.’

‘Ah, you think that—’

‘Their very magnanimity is mean.’

‘There are those who say so.’

‘When a whole nation gives itself up to one object for a whole century, my lord, and that object a base one, you will find at the end of that century, if you observe them narrowly, that their very pity is tainted, their very truth is false. They will have generous impulses, but their very generosity will be a self-deception. In nothing, nothing, will they be quite sincere, except in their greed, in their selfishness. In this matter of Cuba, you have a nation whose sole motto is self-interest, whose very soul is corrupt with it, whose very name has become synonymous with callous greed — this is the nation which you find exclaiming, with a kind of fictional belief in its own words: “How admirably magnanimous a one am I!”’

‘I follow you, señor. You, however, miss my point. I did not say that this war is magnanimous. But I said that we here in England — the mass of our nation, magnanimous itself, and judging, of course, only by the first outside look of things, which is all they ever get to see — that they regard it as magnanimous.’

‘And this view of theirs—’

‘Makes our position with regard to this otherwise most acceptable gift of land a far from certain one. You are, I presume, the executor—’

‘Informally, yes. The real agent for Senor Appadacca in the matter is a Senor Josef Campos, the head of the house of Campos in New York, of which your lordship may have heard.’

‘And Campos—’

‘Will be in England, as I can say positively, within eight days. He should be now, in fact, at Cadiz.’

‘Then I shall wait the coming of Senor Campos with some impatience. The matter, of course, is sufficiently momentous to call for the summoning of a Cabinet Council; but nothing can be done till I have in my possession the title-deeds to lay before my colleagues. But this gentleman, Appadacca. You knew him, of course? I seem somehow, or somewhere, to have heard the name.’

‘He was the son of a nobleman of Spain. Your lordship probably heard of him in connection with his armed yacht, the Huelva.’

‘That is so. Now you say it, I remember. And the Huelva — will she continue her mysterious voyages?’

‘I cannot say, my lord. If she does, you will be certain to hear of her.’

‘But stay. I was very much puzzled a few days ago by reading in the newspapers that a British steamer had reported in New York having sighted some Spanish ships of war near the American coast, when everyone knew that no Spanish ships were in that neighbourhood. Then, if I remember right, two other ships came in and reported the same thing afterwards. It struck me at the time—’

‘That the Huelva might have had something to do with it?’

‘Just so.’

‘It is quite possible, my lord. The captains’ imaginations magnified one ship into a fleet; or else the swiftness of the Huelva’s movements, perhaps, during the night, and her appearance at unexpected points, led them into the belief that it was not one, but several ships which they sighted.’

‘And the cutting of the St. Lucia-St. Vincent cable? Have you any suspicion that the Huelva was involved in this matter?’

‘On the contrary, my lord.’

The Prime Minister shot an under-glance at Appadacca’s face.

‘How so?’ he said.

‘Has your lordship, then, reason to think that the Huelva was in those waters?’

‘It has been hinted to me.’

‘Oh, in that case — but with what motive? Her owner, on the one hand, dowers the British Government with one of the vastest estates in the world. Is it likely that, on the other, he would leave behind him a crew ready for the first act of unprovoked hostility within their reach?’

‘Was it, then, señor, an act of the Spanish cruisers?’

‘That I admit, though with reluctance, is more probable.’

‘Ah — I note the admission.’

‘The matter, I hope, is not acutely serious, my lord?’

‘It is acutely serious, señor. I give you my word that the affront will not be permitted to pass from sight without due and proper repentance on the part of your country. The unfortunate affair of the Maine was, you know, the direct motif of the present war; now comes another similar act, different in form, but identical in a certain spirit of lawlessness, against another nation.

One could almost swear that the two acts were performed by the same hand.'

'However, they were not.'

The Prime Minister swept a swift, downward hand on his beard.

'Well, you appear to be more familiar with the details of both matters than I, señor,' he said. 'Are you about to proceed to Spain?'

'Yes, my lord.'

'Then, you should give them this hint over there: that what is called the British Lion will bear a large amount of horseplay with his tail — until he feels a twinge of pain. And then he is very apt to get up, and pile roar on roar in a way that frightens everybody into a disinclination for any more play during a century or so.'

'I will do so, my lord. Personally, I find the roar of the lion exhilarating. I have hunted him in Somaliland with some little success; off my own camel, assisted by a French, an Italian, and a Russian fellow-huntsman, I have captured — four.'

Once more the Prime Minister swept his In Deep Waters 131 hand down his beard, in a manner characteristic of him. He said:

'You were quite an international party, then. The secret of your success seems to me to lie in the fact that you were united, while the four lions did not fight together. The four, joined into One Big Lion, might have been able to make short work of that international big-game expedition, I fancy.'

Appadacca rose.

'The title-deeds shall be in your hands within the time mentioned, my lord,' he said. 'Well, then — good-day, señor.'

They parted.

CHAPTER XII.

THE TITLE-DEEDS.

IMMANUEL APPADACCA AT once telegraphed to Cadiz:

‘To CAMPOS. — Have you arrived? In any case send me word immediately on receiving this.’

He received no answer that night. He was annoyed, but remained in London, in the confident assurance that the next morning he should receive news from Campos, whom he had ordered to Cadiz. The order, written with his own hand, was in the breast-pocket of Dick P. Hocking.

So were the title-deeds of the frontier estate, without which Appadacca must seem either simpleton or impostor in the eyes of several people.

He had engaged a suite of apartments at the Hotel Métropole, though his stay was only for a clay. He would soon, he knew, be in pressing need of money in specie without the arrival of Campos. He rose early the next morning; there was not a word from Cadiz.

He sent at once a telegram to New York:

‘Have you received my instructions and the title-deeds?’

He waited four, six hours. At last the reply came:

‘No; thought there was something wrong. Await instructions.’

Appadacca wired:

‘Charter, if you can, swift craft for Cadiz, and bring all specie at your disposal.’

Then, with knit brow and set lips, he drove to Waterloo. The steam-pinnacle of the Huelva awaited him at an agreed point of the Hard at Portsmouth.

About two o'clock in the morning he stepped on the deck of the Huelva, and at once disappeared below. The bows of the ship turned west, smoke poured from her funnels, and the early break of dawn found her stretching, like a racehorse in the final heat, at full speed across the Atlantic.

Appadacca whistled to her captain at about eight o'clock.

'What is the speed?'

'At the moment thirty-three, your Excellency.'

'How is the wind?'

'On our starboard bow, west by north.'

'I depend upon you, in any case, to arrive within the time I have prescribed,' said Appadacca.

Now, quite five days previously Dick P. Hocking had walked up Pennsylvania Avenue; for, after the cable-cutting, the Huelva had spent three days in forerunning the Spanish Squadron, and contriving its safe arrival at the protected port of Santiago de Cuba, a feat of strategy which, had it been unassisted by the incalculable movements of such a ship as the Huelva, would have fully justified the exultation with which the news of the squadron's arrival was received in Madrid.

Hocking reached the shaded park, and entered the White House. He sent in a card marked 'Urgent: ten minutes.' One of the bamboo screens swung back to admit him, and he found himself in a scrupulously business-like apartment, in the presence of the President. There was a cordial hand-shaking; a massive chair uttered creaks of distress beneath Hocking's weight.

‘I have not much time for palaver,’ said Dick P. Hocking. ‘Look here, I have had written out for you a description of the present position and so on of our fleet, and the reason why they haven’t come aboard those Spaniards yet. The worst enemy America’s got at the present moment is not any Spanish squadrons, but one Spanish ship, President; and that, I guess, is what you will be finding before long — that is, if I don’t come in somewhere. But what I’ve got to show you chiefly is this little piece of beastly joking. Just you look at that.’

Hocking slapped down the parchment title-deed of the Venezuela estate, and a translation of Appadacca’s letter to Campos. Then there was silence for five minutes. The President’s eye ran eagerly through the words.

‘This means mischief, I calculate,’ he muttered.

‘It meant,’ said Hocking; ‘it can’t mean any more. That parchment is now in the pockets of the United States, and so is the piece of land it represents.’

‘It isn’t, Dick P. Hocking,’ replied McKinley.

‘Look here, don’t you fancy that you are going to get us into any hot places more than we are in already. That parchment will come in handy later; it won’t go rotten in your drawers, may be. Right now I beg to decline it with best thanks.’

‘Well, I am not saying that you don’t know your business.’

‘No; you are too cute a man. Look you, Dick P. Hocking, we have got to be getting along slow speed and fog-sirens piping these days in this country! The motto on the doorplate of these States has been: “Hands off, thanks, and let’s go our own way in our own way.” And a sound motto it was. Now, all that is about over, I guess. We have got mixed somehow in the thick of the row, and the Almighty only knows what it’ll run to. Here’s a document, now: that's a note from the Italian Government, my son, protesting against the blockade of Cuba as insufficient.'

'Protesting? Why?'

'International Law, Dick P. Hocking. It's a spell of international law now that we're in for, I guess, and the isolation's off, and every little effete Punch and Judy show of a State in Europe's beginning to criticise their betters, because they see that we've been dipping our finger into their dirty little international law pie. Well, and do you know what?'

'No.'

'Then I'll tell you: The world's about in for a new era of things right now. There, on the desk, you see a telegram which gives me to know that an old man is lying at a place called Hawarden, in the West of England, just at his last gasp. That old man's name is Gladstone, and another way to spell Gladstone is P-e-a-c-e. When I say that one is at his last gasp, I just mean that the other is too.'

'Yet he retired long ago.'

'Don't you believe that. There wasn't anywhere for him to retire to, you see, except under the pavement of Westminster Abbey. While he was above it, he was there just the same, I reckon; and everybody knew he was there, and everybody was afraid of his frown, and of what he would say if they went crooked any. Retired — no! He wasn't a snail; he was a force.'

'And you think — ?'

'I think that things look — bad. I reckon that France and Russia are building too many battleships; I think that none of those big old nations are strong enough to keep up their swaggering armies another five years. I reckon that England is the best hated nation on the face of the earth; and I reckon the States is in for the row, and has got to take sides whether she wants to or not.'

‘I can tell you one thing,’ said Hocking: ‘it will be a war of races.’

‘That’s so.’

‘Saxon against Latin.’

‘Something not far off.’

‘We and England—’

‘I reckon that’s about the combination. If between us we aren’t good enough to boss the world—’

‘But—’

‘Well?’

‘Hasn’t England everything to gain, and we nothing, by an alliance at this moment?’

‘That’s so. But there isn’t going to be an alliance at this moment. The States wait. But when the day comes, it isn’t a matter of small advantage to one or the other that we shall consider, but the general good. Meanwhile, you can see why I tell you to keep your title-deeds in your portfolio. They would be exploding in mine.’

The same night, toward morning, Hocking arrived at New York. His first care was to telegraph to the manager of Cramp’s shipbuilding works, Philadelphia, desiring a further immediate interview; his next was to ascertain the movements of Josef Campos during the last few days.

‘Has he been realizing largely?’ he asked.

‘Apparently not,’ said an agent.

‘Has he chartered any ship?’

‘I could dare bet no.’

‘Then he hasn’t heard yet. Appadacca wants him badly, and will telegraph. The thing now is to keep him here a prisoner.’

‘How could that be managed?’

‘We shall see. Here, parson, just come and help on this little conference.’

What was certain was that Appadacca, from the instructions given in his letter to Campos, needed ready funds for the prosecution of his schemes. And during the next day several eyes kept sharp watch upon all the transactions of Campos.

Then came Appadacca's telegraphic summons; and the fact of its arrival was known to Dick P. Hocking with a certainty as absolute as though he had read it. The deals of Campos revealed all.

Campos sought next to obtain a ship; and there, with a shock of dismay, he found himself foiled. None of the Transatlantic boats sailed for two days, and his orders were instant and urgent. He was instructed, moreover, to leave by a privately-chartered boat, but no boat could he find to charter.

After a day's scurry among the shipping agencies of New York and Brooklyn, a confidential clerk came to acquaint him with failure.

'There is some mystery in it, you may be certain,' said the clerk.

'A plot of Hocking's?'

'That, and nothing less.'

'We shall obtain a ship at Newport?'

'If all the disposable ships at Newport have not been got at in the same manner.'

'Then at Boston or Baltimore?'

'Would it not be better to telegraph your dilemma to his Excellency? Boston, I firmly believe, and Baltimore, too, will offer us nothing.'

And with this suggestion Campos at once fell in. — He telegraphed to Appadacca at London. He got no reply.

Appadacca was on his way in the Huelva. His powers of divination had led him to suspect that, supposing his letter and the title-deeds had reached the hands of Hocking, Hocking would adopt the very ruse which he did in fact adopt with respect to Campos. Hence, in the act of telegraphing for Campos, he felt fairly certain that Campos would not come. He was ignorant that the ship captured by the Huelva in the Mona Straits was the Union, or that Hocking was on board of her; but he had a suspicion amounting to certainty that documents so important to himself, once miscarried, could hardly fail to reach the hands of Dick P. Hocking.

During two days the brows of Josef Campos were a continual wrinkle of vexation. The whole man grilled with suppressed rage.

At last he lost restraint. He went to Hocking's office; Hocking was not there. He went to Fifth Avenue; Hocking was not there.

'Where is your master?' he asked of a footman.

'He is at Bellevue for some days,' said the man.

Bellevue was one of Hocking's country seats, half-way between New Haven and Providence — a very lonely pile, overlooking a stretch of sea, and standing in its own wide parks.

'I am going at once to Mr. Hocking's seat of Bellevue,' said Campos to his head-clerk.

'In two hours I shall return. Meantime, if there be sudden news from his Excellency, you will not fail to follow me.'

He took train, and in an hour was at Bellevue. Dick P. Hocking had just ended a conference of three, consisting of himself, an agent from Cramp of Philadelphia, and an agent from the Union Works of San Francisco. By this time he was something of an authority on the technicalities of torpedo-boat and torpedo-destroyer building.

'Show Mr. Campos right in,' he said to the man who made the announcement.

And while Campos was coming, he blew through a whistle communicating with the Rev. Petersen's apartments; and even as Campos appeared, he was whispering into Petersen's ear:

‘I don’t know that it will be necessary, but it may — I’ll see. If it is, I’ll whistle twice, and you’ll know what to do. Sit down, señor — sit down,’ he added.

The brow of Campos was flushed with anger.

‘Why this unlawful persecution, Mr. Hocking?’ he said.

‘The weather is beginning to warm up at last, señor. Which unlawful persecution do you refer to?’

‘There is no necessity to beat about the bush, Mr. Hocking. What you have done I know well. I come to inquire into your motive, that is all. Why do you seek to prevent me from leaving this country?’

‘Well, now, that’s talking straight out, and I like a man who talks straight out. I’ll tell you:

I have happened to tumble on the fact that your master, Appadacca, or whatever he is to you, is making for some queer mischief, in which he can’t very well get along just now without you. So I keep you.’

‘I see. Mischievous which concerns you personally?’

‘No, no; not particularly me. But when a man gets to my age and weight, he begins to think of other things besides his own five-cent affairs. Appadacca isn’t going to get along anyhow with Dick P. Hocking pulling the other way.’

‘But you speak precisely like a simpleton P cried Campos in surprise. ‘You might as well try to check the momentum of Niagara, as seek to balk the purposes of the man against whom you are absurdly ranging yourself. He is a gentleman — a prince! I tell you, for I know.’

Dick P. Hocking’s abdomen dandled upward in a laugh.

‘Don’t be frightening me now, señor,’ he said; ‘if I faint in your arms, you’ll be sinking under the strain, I reckon.’

‘But it is ridiculous!’ cried Campos in a high pitch of voice. ‘You are merely wasting good money in keeping me here. You merely retain me for a day or two — you might guess that. The Huelva is now on her way to America to fetch me.’

‘She’ll have hell’s bells knocked out of her bottom if she comes anywhere across New York Harbour, señor.’

‘If, perhaps.’

‘But you are sure she’s coming, eh?’

‘Practically — a telegram of mine to his Excellency having remained unanswered.’

‘Oh, very good. But when she comes, I’m darned if she finds you!’

‘I do not follow you.’

‘I am going to ask you to be my guest for the next three days or so. I promise you that you will find Bellevue a more hospitable place of residence than I found the Huelva.’

‘You mean that you will keep me here by force?’

‘That’s what it comes to, I reckon; as your head man kept me. All’s fair in war, for that matter.’

Hocking rose and blew twice through the telephone whistle.

‘However, you will bitterly regret this, you ruffian!’ cried Campos.

‘I don’t say it’s impossible, señor. But look you, I will act above-board to you; you shall know at least that I have an honest motive in this affair. Just cast a glance at that.’

As he spoke he had opened a cabinet, taken out the title-deeds of the Venezuela estate, and Appadacca’s letter to Campos, which was attached to the deed by an elastic band. He handed the letter to Campos.

‘Now tell me if you call that a right piece of business,’ said Hocking.

Campos read the letter.

‘But how — how, in the name of Heaven, did you obtain this?’

‘Well, you see, your master was sending it to you in my own ship, which he had seized with his beastly Huelva. I simply got back my ship by killing the crew he sent aboard. Both ships are mine, if it comes to that. And the land’s mine, too, you may bet. But he can keep his beastly Huelva till I’m ready to deal with her.’

‘Thank you. You have made much clear to me. And I am your prisoner, you say — for how long?’

‘Call it prisoner, if you see fit. Guest is what it is. And for as long as you choose. Four or five days, any way. Till then I guess you don’t find many open exits from this house. If you’ll follow me, I’ll point out your lodging for the time; and if you’ve a conscience, as you have, no doubt, I guess you won’t be saying that I’m exceeding what a man should do in the case.’

‘But, in Heaven’s name, what right—’

‘Oh, right enough, right enough. War’ll come; it’s coming faster than any of you think, and plenty of it, and loud. Only Appadacca shan’t make it come any quicker than it wants to, if what Dick P. Hocking says goes any.’

He rose, nodded his head, made a motion, and stepped forward. Campos glanced rapidly round the room, and, smiling, followed.

Campos was conducted to a third floor. He was ushered into a complete suite of five rooms luxuriously furnished. One of them looked by three windows over a sloping lawn at the back of the house, the lawn plunging steeply twenty yards away into a large-treed park.

At about midnight, when the house was absolutely quiet, Campos went from room to room, searching in the drawers of the looking-glasses and the ornaments of the dressing-table for pins. He found a few.

From the top of a sofa he took a bright-yellow Japanese cloth. In his pocket was a dark-red handkerchief, which in shadow had quite the look of black. With the pins he had found he pinned the handkerchief in the central space of the saffron cloth. He had now a flag with the Huelva colours.

The night was very still. He opened a window, and there was hardly a breath. To the inner and upper framing of the window he attached the cloth by means of his last three pins, leaving it to hang; and immediately behind it he moved a table, on which he placed a lamp. The jalousies he left open. As seen from the garden, the light made quite luminous the colour-contrast between the dark red and the light yellow.

Campos sat near the window. The time passed.

At half-past twelve he began to nod. At one he rose, pacing restlessly. At half-past one he was fast asleep. Near two he heard something resembling a whistle. He looked out cautiously. There was a man below, looking up.

The night was dark, but not too dark for Campos to recognise the general form of this person. It was not an enemy; it was a friend — his clerk, Francisco. Campos lifted the lamp, and showed his own face in clear light.

Francisco talked. Campos could not hear.

‘A little louder,’ he said in a strong whisper.

Francisco could not hear.

‘I do not hear you,’ he said in a strong whisper. ‘The Huelva has arrived.’

‘It is impossible to hear,’ said Campos.

‘What do you say?’ whispered Francisco.

Campos took down the cloth, unpinned the handkerchief, took from his pocket a penknife, and began cutting both cloth and handkerchief into very thin strips. He held up the lamp to show Francisco what he was doing. When he had obtained about forty strips he tied them together, and he lowered the string with the words scribbled on a note-book leaf:

‘I am a prisoner.’

After a few minutes the string was tugged. He drew it up. It was tied round two leaves of telegrams, and a note from Francisco.

The telegrams were from Appadacca.

Francisco said:

‘I received telegram summoning you to join Huelva at Halifax (see telegram). Wired that you were probably a prisoner, and where, and reasons why you were there. Received telegram ordering me to convey to you instructions at all costs to secure title-deeds to land. This urgently wanted. You to be rescued to-morrow night (see telegram). Let me know if you will be able to secure title-deeds.’

And Campos, having carefully read the note and the telegrams, pondered for a minute. Then he wrote on a leaf:

‘To your question — yes.’

And this he lowered.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE NIGHT.

THE MAN BENEATH the window moved down the slope of the lawn into the forest. Josef Campos drew up the string, hid it, put out his light, and went to bed.

In Bellevue he fared quite sumptuously the next day. No repayment of Huelva starvation here, but, on the contrary, a rather crude plenty — the wines good, but not recherché; the fish costly in species, but indifferent in specimen; everything large and liberal and decent, nothing exquisite and high-toned.

‘Here is a being,’ thought Campos, ‘who can speculate better than he can dine, and fight better than he can eat.’

Dick P. Hocking would have admitted it with pride, but Campos thought it with scorn.

Perhaps the only implements of perfectly civilized man will be the table-knife, the fork, the curling-tongs, and harmless varieties of the plough, such as the needle, and the needle’s wife and helpmeet, the thimble. Meanwhile, blessed is the man who has handy the Maxim, the Martini, the Nordenfeldt, and the Tape-machine.

But though Campos missed his chef, and the good things nibbled in the Huelva, he dined largely; and his sense of gratitude did not sufficiently realize the fact that he was a prisoner, or it might have been greater. The suite of apartments in which he found himself formed a sort of flat, of which the rather massive hall-door was double-locked.

He spent the entire day in devising his escape.

It was necessary for him, by midnight, to have the title-deeds to the Venezuela estate in his hands, and to place in the window his lamp as the signal that he had them.

Reviewing the whole matter now, he saw that his promise to obtain them had been rash; that his attempt to obtain them must necessarily be as ticklish as possible — if he was able to make it at all.

He waited. By half-past ten the house was quiet. He stood at the locked door, listening. No sound. Dick P. Hocking was an early elephant — to that fact he attributed his ‘success.’

At a few minutes after eleven Campos set to work. He took off his boots, and lifted a small table into the passage, or narrow hall, ended by the door. He put the table against the door, and on it he stood.

His plans were formed with all the adroitness characteristic of the Southern Latin races of Europe — an adroitness in which, in truth, as the Rev. Petersen said, there is something feminine, something of woman’s wit.

As one of the plats sucrés of his dinner, he had had a thick-crust, rather doughy apple-pie, and a large piece of that crust he had secreted. Of this, when he found himself alone for the night, he had managed, with the help of water, to make a mass which formed an excellent adhesive paste.

He had also been provided that morning with a copy of the rabidly anti-Spanish Journal, and a leaf of the Journal he now tore into an oblong about two-thirds the size of the pane of orange-coloured glass which stood above the upper horizontal joist of the door. This leaf he glued with his paste to the inner surface of the glass. He got down from the table, washed his hands, and waited a quarter of an hour.

He was in a state of great excitement. His hands trembled; but his purposes were quite definite and clear, and he proceeded to their execution without hesitation.

He had on one of his fingers a many-faceted and very large diamond of the purest water. He remounted the table, and with an edge of the diamond cut the glass round the edge of the pasted paper, taking care to cut the bottom of the oblong flush with the timber above the door.

With such scrupulous care did he proceed that it was twenty minutes before he gave a sharp inward pull at the paper, of which he had left an unpasted border for the fingers. The oblong of glass cracked, and came slanting inwards upon his two arms. He coaxed it, it disengaged itself wholly; he deposited it on the table; in a minute he was a free man on the other side.

He began to run with thievish care through the darkness; he heard a clock in a passage strike with dreadful loudness a quarter to twelve; he was very late.

He knew exactly his way to the cabinet which was his aim; he had noted it minutely on his passage to his quarters.

He slid swiftly down some broad-carpeted stairs, along two passages, then, with the slowest caution, he turned a handle and entered a bedroom. Now there was sound — the loud slumber of Dick P. Hocking. At one end of the chamber burned a nimbused veilleuse in feeble loneliness. Campos saw Hocking lift his stiff beard, and scratch the neck beneath in sleep.

He passed through by another door, then across a dining-room, stumbling over a chair, and down a corridor, and half-way along this he stopped and tried a handle.

He had luck; the door opened.

As he entered, a feeling of security and success possessed him. He knew even the tool by which he would be able to do his work. It was a short, sharp-pointed poker of brass, which lay with a larger one in the fireplace. But even as he went to seek for it he started: the melancholy gong of a clock in the room clanged and shivered. It was twelve, and Appadacca was as punctual as the moon and the tides.

He set flurriedly to work: struck a match, found the poker, struck another, found the lock in the cabinet, and in a moment the point was working and rummaging in the hole.

He evidently knew his way; his work was deft, swift, and almost noiseless. With a little pop and outburst the small square door flew back. Campos inserted his hand and felt the papers, and as he did so started. Suddenly the room was full of light.

He spun like a wind-smitten weather-cock, the papers gripped like death in his hand; and there at the door he saw in nightshirt and fat, short trousers, and slippers too big for him, the Rev. Silas M. Petersen, holding a lamp, gazing at him.

They faced each other, Campos very white, Petersen looking far sideways on the ground in a severe, surprised, judicial way, quite cool.

‘This, I guess, is what you’d name knocking pieces out of the rights of hospitality, señor,’ he said.

And as he said it, Campos was at him. Seizing the parson by the arm, the Spaniard dragged him into the room with a sudden tug which brought Petersen stumbling, and sent the lamp flying from his grasp.

And in the darkness Campos rushed to the key, turned it, and put it into his pocket; then to another door nearly opposite rushed, turned the key, and put it into his pocket.

At the same moment Petersen was whistling through the telephone-tube; and almost as soon as Campos had secured the second key, a responsive whistle whiffed in the room; and Petersen cried:

‘Here right now, sir! The Spaniard is here purloining the deeds!’

He had hardly screamed the words, when he flung himself upon Campos.

There was a hint of obscure light in the room through a half-open window, though the night without was dark, and rain was falling in sullen, heavy drops.

Campos no longer had the papers in his hand. He had with a swift movement deposited them beneath a chair; but the aim of Petersen was one of the large door-keys quite palpable in the trouser-pocket of Campos.

And now ensued a panting struggle among tumbling chairs and the cracking lamp, Petersen heaving and slanting the slim body of Campos in the strain to effect a throw, and Campos, grinning with effort, forcing Petersen backward by the hair on both sides of the temple. It was only when it was clear that the parson was much the tougher of the two, and the floor was dancing from side to side under Campos’ struggling toes, that, at the moment before his fall, the Spaniard made a sudden effort and lurch toward the window, and away went both keys flying through the air.

Outside a gruff, rough voice was heard.

‘Hi, there! What’s the meaning of this? — you and your beastly jokes! Open the door, there!’

‘The man has thrown away the keys. He has the title-deeds—’ began Petersen, and stopped suddenly in wild surprise.

A singular sound was heard from some short distance. It was a sound of cannon — the steady, sharp jabbering of a quick-firing gun.

In the room was silence, without it no sound, save that panting, intense bang-bang, bang-bang. The three men stood listening, Hocking, with sideward head and frowning brow, his heavy eyelids making small his eyes.

Then all at once there was a cracking row, the ripping of woodwork, and the ponderous downfall of something.

‘His friends, I reckon,’ cried Petersen, ‘breaking in the front-door! You should call up the servants and — quick — the villagers!’

The ‘villagers’ consisted of some three hundred operatives, engaged on the steel-works of Hocking and Dorst at Chickville, a mile and a half away.

By the time Hocking could turn to run, there was audible a scattered tread of feet in the house below.

As he panted along a passage, he met about ten servants, some of them women, cowering and inquisitive.

‘Every Jack of you,’ cried Hocking, ‘get pokers — anything you can grip — ah, some of you have already — and knock the bottom out of that door. And you, Jane, get right to the village, and tell the men to come with any weapon they can grip.’

He himself snatched an iron bill from the hand of a girl; some ran to seek clubs of wood in the kitchens; the rest followed him to one of the locked doors, and at once a battering hail of strokes began to bump upon it.

Above the noise was heard the voice of Josef Campos crying shrilly in Spanish:

‘Hi! hi! I am here!’

The sound of the straggling, wandering footsteps had died in this tumult, though, in reality, they had come nearer; but for a time the invaders were unable to locate the spot. The loud bombardment of Hocking and his servants continued; the door began to start and spring inward at the continued stress of blows. Presently outside the other door a quiet voice said in Spanish: ‘It is here.’

And instantly at this other door began a second furious hammering, and the

THE REV. PETERSEN, WITH A DIVING RUSH, PASSED THROUGH IT.

[To face p. 139.]

two, raging

together upon the two doors, filled all the house with uproar.

It became a question of moments which of the two sets of besiegers would succeed in forcing entry. They were separated from sight of each other by a wall.

It soon became certain, however, that the later set of besiegers were both more numerous and were battering with heavier implements — with the butt-ends of their rifles, namely; and in perhaps three minutes at this door there was a crackle and crash, and two shoulders which had been urging together near the lock tumbled in with the sudden flight of the woodwork.

Now light from two ship's hand-lanterns streamed in. But as the door flew inward, the Rev. Petersen, with a diving rush, passed through it, and, before they could seize him, drove beyond the small crowd without.

Someone said above the noise:

‘Senor Campos.’

And Campos said: ‘Your Excellency.’

‘You have the deeds?’

‘Yes.’

‘Then to the shore instantly with them.’

It was then that the second door crackled and burst in. Dick P. Hocking, huge in his pyjamas, appeared.

A man with a mask over his brow and nose said in a hurried whisper to Campos:

‘Quick! Take the men with you.’

Campos was already at the door, the deeds in his hand. The man in the mask stood in the way of Hocking. Campos slipped through.

As the man turned to follow the last of his own side, Dick P. Hocking sidled with a swift movement, and barred his way.

‘Guess you don’t,’ he said.

At this time there was very little light in the room — only that of a very small bedroom lamp, held by one of the servants. The whole of the individuals composing the other party had gone, taking the ship's lanterns. The man in the mask was left alone with Hocking and the servants. He found his passage barred.

The Huelva party — for the Huelva lay in the offing — consisted of twelve. They had brought with them a small quick-firing gun, mounted on a pedestal on wheels, with which they had demolished the hall-door, on missing the preconcerted signal which Campos was to place in the window.

As they came down again, Campos in their midst now, their first thought was of the gun. It had been left on the lawn when it had been used. But now it had vanished.

They scattered to seek it among hedges and tree-clumps, and in this fruitless task spent some minutes. And even while they were so engaged, they heard a tramp of running feet and a shout.

The Rev. Petersen, on making his escape, had rushed down to bring Chickville out upon the invaders. He had only stopped to wheel the gun into a hidden grotto at the edge of the park; then, as fast as his short legs could carry him, set off for Chickville.

He met them half-way, coming. They had been roused by a servant from Bellevue. Petersen put himself at their head. They were forty workmen, who had hurriedly snatched some sort of weapon, and rushed out half-dressed.

As they entered the open space of lawn, they sent up a shout, and were joined by the servants of the house, who issued from a side-door. And the whole body scattered in twos and threes, making for the individuals of the Spanish party, who, too, were scattered in search of the gun.

The Spaniards, outnumbered and hopelessly demobilized, took at once to their heels, firing as they went. All round the undulating spread of lawn rose thickly-wooded land, and into this, at various points on one side of the house and the other, the thirteen vanished, three of the Chickville workmen having first fallen, dead or wounded.

The only course now open to the Spaniards, who had no preconceived signal for meeting, and were lost to each other, was to make their way, each man for himself, through the trees toward the seashore. And Petersen, imagining that precisely this was what they would do, hurried with his following down in that direction, patches of smoke breaking out at odd spots along the edge of the trees.

They reached the shore with the loss of only one man more, however. Then looked for the boat; and could just discern it a cable-length from the shore, well beyond their reach. Yonder, over the water, a red port-light.

As for the Spaniards in the wood, they found themselves cut off from the boat, and without the power of mobilizing themselves in the absence of either leader or signal. This thought occurred to some, 'Where on earth is our leader?'

Appadacca was face to face with Hocking. They were alone. Hocking was opposing the egress of Appadacca.

'Guess you stop here, you rascal,' Hocking said.

'I warn you, however, that it is dangerous to oppose my passage,' said Appadacca.

'To the devil with your warnings! And be marvelling at my mother's gentleness in not cleaving your head with this chopper right now.'

'You refuse me passage?'

'Refuse! Ay; you and the race of you, with your beastly jokes.'

He said it with ineffable contempt.

Appadacca did not reply, or his reply was a red flash of something in Hocking's eye. He had struck a fusee, which filled the apartment with a rosy glare.

It was now that Dick P. Hocking for the first time saw him clearly. And, seeing him, he started. Here was the mask, and the very cloaked-figure of the man who had one night mysteriously fed him in his hunger.

He was so possessed and impressed by the recognition that for the moment surprise kept him from interfering with the proceedings of the unknown man; and during that moment Appadacca had lighted a small rocket, had rushed to the window, and was holding the spouting and soaring flame out in the open night.

It was seen by all the Spaniards on both sides of the house, most of them being now far down in the neighbourhood of the shore; it was seen also on board the Huelva, and from her two boats at once put off.

And here was the signal which the Spaniards needed for their renewed mobilization. Immediately each man, knowing that each of the others would do that very thing, rushed from his lurking-place, the whole making half toward the house, and half toward the centre of the lawn at its back; and near here they met, and went running toward the spot of the rocket, where some belated sparks still slowly fell. Behind them came the hue and cry of the villagers and servants from the shore.

Campos had joined in this run; he borrowed a clasp-knife from one of the sailors. In his breast-pocket were the title-deeds.

At the moment when the Spaniards entered the house, the struggle between Appadacca and Dick P. Hocking was nearly over. It was fought with a cat-o'-mountain fury in that dark room, the Spaniard showing his teeth, the American heaving in persistent, unconquerable effort. There came a moment when Appadacca, freeing his right hand, buried a small curved cangiar in the American's shoulder, and at the same instant was impelled backward by a heavy blow in the chest. As his back staggered against the wall, the whole weight of the American pressed over him; his right hand was gripped in Hocking's left, and Hocking's iron bill was held aloft, ready to descend.

TWO MUZZLES POINTING AT HOCKING'S HEAD.

{To face p. 165.

Appadacca seemed at his mercy. Yet the bill paused before it descended, and when it descended, descended harmlessly.

‘Now we are about quits,’ panted Hocking.

And while the clock might tick twice, there were rapidly-approaching footsteps, light in the room, two muzzles pointing at Hocking’s head.

Appadacca, the mask still covering his face, held up a forefinger. The muzzles dropped. Hocking hurriedly scratched his chin, hesitating, pricked, puzzled.

And now came near the sounds of the running villagers, and the shrill voice of Silas M. Petersen was heard.

Appadacca saw Campos, and said angrily:

‘What are you doing here?’

Before he could receive a reply, an indescribable mêlée, fought with every manner of weapon, commenced. In the packed passage outside the room there were crackling guns and shouts, and cracking heads, and the smiting of clubs on the partition, and struggling feet, the men of the Huelva fighting like tigers, the men of the village like veterans.

It could not, however, have lasted more than two minutes, when from behind the villagers there came a fresh crackling of musketry, with dying cries, and loud confusion rolled in smoke, and smell of burning wood. Then there was a shout from Josef Campos, crying, ‘Back! back!’ and the gruff growl of Hocking, ‘Stop fighting!’ And in a minute each man was running for himself, and the corridor shot out tongues of flame.

The Spaniards hurried down the stairs, and out to the front of the house, which was the end furthest from the shore.

There they formed, and at a quick march set out for the beach. The three boats were waiting now near the surf.

Behind a tree near by crouched Petersen, who had escaped from the house by the back. In the stern of one of the boats sat a lank, cloaked figure.

The Spaniards began to jump into the boats. Appadacca had already been lifted into one of them and been rowed away; five men only were left on the shore; one of them was Josef Campos.

He happened to be standing by himself a moment before being lifted into the third of the boats, when from behind a tree near a swift figure darted out upon him with such intense impetuosity that, before Campos knew of its advance, he was on the ground. With such skilled precision had Petersen chosen his opportunity, that his feat of consummate audacity was successful before he was even perceived by anyone. He had the deeds in one hand, and in the fingers of the other the windpipe of Campos, stifling his cry.

But as he leapt up, Campos shouted; and the lank figure in the boat had a night-glass at his eyes.

‘There, there!’ he cried; ‘pick me down that man quickly, one of you!’

Petersen, as he ran, dropped. The smoke cleared, and the priest, with the glass at his eyes, said:

‘Let him be brought on board the Huelva, if he still lives.’

The three boats passing over the sea, weltered through a red of blood, thrown abroad by the flames of Bellevue.

CHAPTER XIV.

ORGANIZING A VICTORY.

APPADACCA HAD PROMISED the British Prime Minister that the title-deeds should be in his hand on the ninth day. In spite of the fact that it had been necessary for the Huelva to coal outside Halifax from a collier which she molested, and for him to regain the deeds by grim fight, he was able to present himself at the Foreign Office during the afternoon of the promised day.

At this time he was alone in England, the Huelva being already far on her way to San Sebastian. In a room of her cabin sat the Rev. Silas M. Petersen, and opposite him on a couch reclined Father Pedro. Petersen's wounded leg lay on another chair, his trousers pulled above the bulky roll of white bandaging.

'The books I have given you,' said the priest, 'I shall expect you to read with all the intelligence at your command.'

Petersen nodded.

'I'll read them,' he said. 'Guess the look of them is a trifle heathenish, all the same.'

'I have taken this interest in the salvation of your soul,' said the priest, 'because you once quoted a passage of Scripture to me, with little comprehension of its meaning, I fear, and because, in fact, I choose to do so.'

‘Well, I am not for saying that your meaning, though mistaken, is not a praiseworthy one,’ said Petersen.

‘If difficulties should arise in your mind as you read,’ went on the priest, ‘you will apply to me. By faith, and prayer, and humility, every obstacle will be found to vanish.’

‘That’s so,’ said Petersen. ‘Myself, I guess I’ll count the time on board this yacht a well-spent season if I am made the blessed means of plucking you from the burning, old gentleman, and guiding you into the way of a real and saving faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.’

The priest looked at the man under his eyes, stroking down his silver crucifix with his forefinger.

‘That, however,’ he said, ‘is hardly the spirit in which I wish, and expect, you to peruse the works which I have selected for your correction and conversion. The grace of humility — constant prayers for that I recommend to you as your first and chief orison.’

‘Right you are there. Don’t you go thinking that I am saying that I need it any less than you, old gentleman. I guess the old Adam is in about all of us — not a bit more in you than in me. If I could only put you in the same way of squelching him which I have found to the joy of me heart—’

The priest rose. He could not hide the nausea on his curling lip.

‘Don’t you be going right now,’ said Petersen. ‘There is that verse in the third chapter of St. John which I want to lay before you—’

The priest stalked three paces, stopped, and turned. His face was severe, his lips pressed.

‘You must pray for humility,’ he said.

‘I will,’ said Petersen; ‘I will pray for humility to be given to you.’

‘And I, on my part, will pray for it for you, sir. And my prayer will be answered, for you shall be humbled.’

‘Those only who exalt themselves shall be humbled, old gentleman. That’s the promise, and self-exaltation isn’t in my line of business, any way. You think I exalt myself, when I’m only working for your immortal soul’s good; and there’s where you mistake me. However, we’ll be understanding each other better later on, I reckon.’

‘Meantime, it is my will that you read—’

‘I will; and on that you may rely. The verse is in the third chapter, beginning, “Except a man be born—”’

Father Pedro was gone. Petersen sat and commenced to read.

The next morning the Huelva reached San Sebastian. Father Pedro made haste toward Madrid, where he had three long private interviews with Senor Sagasta, Martinez Campos, and the Queen, before he again set off northward for Paris.

On the third noon he was closeted at one of the Government offices in the Place de la Concorde with M. Hanotaux. He presented an informal letter from the Queen Regent.

‘What you have in mind, señor,’ said the Foreign Minister, ‘is on the programme of destiny. I speak frankly. It is too momentous to be brought about by any one man or nation, to be hindered by any one man or nation. Events have prepared it — it will be.’

‘But when, monsieur?’

‘The apple falls when it is ripe, señor.’

‘Or it may be plucked.’

‘That is an alternative, certainly.’

‘By the time the apple is ripe, monsieur, Spain may be no longer there.’

‘Yourself have said that it may be plucked, señor.’

‘How?’

‘Nothing can be done for Spain till she does something for herself.’

‘What, monsieur?’

‘She must organize a victory.’

‘One?’

‘One will be sufficient.’

‘And with what motive?’

‘This: a recovery of her collapsed prestige. Europe will not intervene on behalf of nothing, will not be urged to union and movement on behalf of nothing. Spain must show herself something — a virile, living, more or less successful nation — before she can command our overt sympathy or aid. Let her do this, and that will be one step — perhaps the only one necessary — towards the plucking of the apple.’

‘I follow you. But this victory, monsieur — is it possible, practicable?’

‘Oh, distinctly. It needs only organization.’

‘If you will hint to me in what direction—’

‘When will you see Senor Appadacca, Father Pedro?’

‘Soon. Within three days, if necessary.’

‘He is—’

‘In England.’

‘You should telegraph to him, and tell him you heard me say the word “Santiago.”’

‘Then you think — ?’

Hanotaux bowed.

‘I think the situation at least promising, Father.’

‘But the blockading ships greatly outnumber the blockaded.’

‘Not greatly, I think. Add to the side of the blockaded such a tool as the Huelva, and such a brain as her master’s, and, if I am a judge, Spain will vindicate her right to existence in the eyes of Continental Europe.’

‘Then I shall at once fulfil your recommendation, monsieur,’ said the priest, rising.

‘Well, then, Father Pedro, I counsel haste, while the situation is in statu quo — and this time there should be no failure.’

Father Pedro within the hour wired Appadacca from Paris a long telegram in cipher. It arrived at a moment when Appadacca received also the news that a telegram had been sent from New York to the London Foreign Office, warning it of the fact that the gift presented to it by the supposed dead man was, in reality, a bait offered by a living person called Appadacca, for motives inimical to both the British and American nations. The information was conveyed to Appadacca by an under-secretary in a cold note of a few lines. He recognised the hand of Dick P. Hocking. And when the telegram from Don Pedro was placed before him, he had already said to himself that very word—’ Santiago.’

At this time Commodore Schley had been already five days blockading, in the landlocked harbour of Santiago, five first - class Spanish cruisers and two destroyers with the battleships Texas, Massachusetts, and Iowa, the cruisers New Orleans, Marblehead, and Brooklyn, and the torpedo-boat Porter. Santiago had, in fact, been the point to which the long dodging and manoeuvring of the Spanish, aided as it had been by the great yacht, had been directed. The entrance was only a little over a couple of hundred feet wide, was long and winding, thick with mines, and dominated by forts with modern guns.

Appadacca replied to Don Pedro’s message in the words:

‘Shall await Huelva’s pinnacle on the Hard at Portsmouth on Thursday night. See Sagasta, and make necessary arrangements.’

It was necessary for the priest to return to Madrid. There he had left Silas M. Petersen on Petersen’s parole to make no attempt at escape.

On the second day they travelled together to Valladolid, by which time Petersen had won from the priest, by means of a particular display of interest in the doctrines of the Church, the fact that Santiago was the point of their next aim.

And at Valladolid, Petersen, as he sauntered on a tour of inspection round the town, sent this telegram in an easy figure-cipher:

‘To DICK P. HOCKING, New York. — Have reason to think that situation is about to be forced at Santiago. Take steps.’

CHAPTER XV.

SANTIAGO.

BY THE TIME the Huelva reached the neighbourhood of Santiago de Cuba, Admiral Sampson's squadron had unexpectedly joined Commodore Schley's — unexpectedly, both to Schley and to everyone else.

Sampson had been guarding the Yucatan Passage, when he received sudden sealed orders by a despatch-boat from the Navy Department. The truth was, that the message from Valladolid, communicated by Dick P. Hocking, had caused a stir at the Navy Department: 'The situation about to be forced.' At the game of 'organizing a victory' both sides could play.

As for Dick P. Hocking, he had conceived the bold idea of himself some day fighting a naval battle; meantime, he had a strong will to see one. The Union got under way.

So it came about that by the time the Huelva reached the neighbourhood of Santiago, there were some twenty ships of war of various sizes blockading the narrow harbour-entrance, and prepared for any counter-move.

In two days it was given out in New York that the destruction or capture of the Spanish squadron was certain. That they could escape from the harbour — that they could even hold communication with the open sea — seemed impossible.

The harbour mouth, as we have said, is not more than two hundred and fifty feet wide at its narrowest; along the canon it was defended by forts like

Morro Castle, and Forts Estrella and Socopa, some fitted with quite modern guns, some of the batteries masked. There were lines of torpedoes. The entire winding passage was said to be mined. Within, the land opens into a wide spread of still water, capable of holding craft of the draught of a 14,000-ton battleship. Further inward, the town spreads far upward, rising in terrace on terrace of lovely landscape to the blue distance, where it is backed by the towering ridges of the Sierra Maestra chain.

During the day the American ships coasted slowly within two thousand yards of the shore.

At night the smaller craft were left on guard, and the big cruisers and battleships retired to the deeper sea.

For this there was a pressing reason: with the Spanish fleet were two destroyers, extremely fast, and in the night terrible to the imagination.

Yet seven days passed, and nothing happened. The destroyers lay at anchor. Over Santiago brooded a horrible silence, a baleful uneventfulness.

In the brain of Admiral Cervera must be a thought, a design. But what?

He had received a telegram dated from Cadiz stating that the Huelva was about to sail for Santiago.

The Cadiz squadron was waiting idly, daily expecting instructions from Cervera to sail in order to reinforce him. Yet from Cervera came no word. In his silent self-sufficiency there lurked a certain mystery, a hint of terror.

On the eighth evening of the blockade, the Huelva lay ten miles to the south by west of Santiago. Her engines almost stopped. She showed no lights. Immanuel Appadacca, wrapped from nose to heel in indiarubbers, ascended the broad stairway to her upper deck.

The captain of the vessel awaited him, and at once preceded him toward the fore-part of the ship. There a boat of strange shape, very slim and long, resembling a huge shark in hue and form, hung ready to be lowered. She already contained five invisible men, and near her, in the dim light, stood the lank figure of the priest. As Appadacca passed to the gleaming boat, Father Pedro lifted his right hand, bowed his head, and muttered an orison.

As soon as he had stepped on board the boat, Appadacca, too, disappeared. Rising from her flush deck a little forward of amidships was a small erection, an oblong box of steel, capable of containing a man. It was a tiny conning-tower. Within this Appadacca took his place.

The boat slid downward, and as soon as she touched the sea, flitted off, precisely in the manner of a fish, the water washing freely over her scudding deck.

She made toward the coast. In ten minutes she sighted the lights of the American warships, then proceeding to their deep-sea stations for the night; in twenty she was right among them.

They were jerking white searchlight beams in wide erratic arcs all over the sea. Yet they did not detect the hurrying boat, passing sometimes within a cable-length of some forging ram; for the fish-boat had put her fins into play, and sunk ten feet beneath the surface.

Even at this depth her speed was nine knots. Her motor was electric, supplied from storage batteries.

Every few minutes Appadacca rose from his dark course for an observation of distances and directions; then immediately sank again.

He passed through the line of smaller craft near the harbour without having been observed. He entered the canon. Here he rose. The forts had been forewarned of his passage.

In a few minutes he was on the deck of the Vizcaya, and was conducted to the Admiral's quarters, where he was awaited.

'I congratulate you upon your passage, señor,' said the Admiral, a plump and hale-looking man, with gray hair and cultured bigote.

Appadacca bowed.

‘Our conference must necessarily be hurried,’ he said. ‘The Huelva lies yonder, and may find it necessary to show her heels to those people. Before then I should regain her. What, Admiral, are your intentions?’

‘They remain the same, señor, as those with which I came here originally. Santiago needed a third line of defence. I supply it.’

‘It is, however, a rôle full of danger.’

‘It may be, señor.’

‘Fuller, perhaps, than you realize. It is the intention of the Americans to land some twenty thousand land-troops and marines with siege-guns; in such a case they will deliver a combined attack from sea and land, and, beyond doubt, block the harbour entrance by means of a sunken craft. In that case, you would be a prisoner, between two fires, and the end would be worse than destruction. It would be capture.’

‘Never capture, señor. Be sure that I have sufficient dynamite on board my ships to blow them up.’

‘Still, I have something better to suggest.’

‘And that is — ?’

‘Not defence, but attack.’

‘Willingly — if it be practicable. They, however, are twenty, and we are seven.’

‘Eight — with the Huelva’

‘Ah, yes — that is so.’

‘The suggestion is not primarily mine.’

‘Whose then?’

‘M. Hanotaux’s.’

The Admiral’s eyebrows lifted.

‘And it is known and approved in Madrid?’

‘Of that you may be certain.’

‘And what is the direct motive?’

‘It is necessary to the friends of Spain that Spain win at least one victory — the greater the odds against her the better.’

‘Then, señor, let us win it. I, at least, am ready.’

‘Victory, however, is essential. There must be no failure here. Before the attempt we must have the certainty.’

‘But how to get the certainty?’

‘By means of a little thought. It is Thought, in the end, and not metal guns which, in every contest, prevails. In that we all agree. Yet thought is almost invariably the last thing to which men resort.’

‘You have a scheme, señor?’

‘It is here,’ said Appadacca, laying a pencilled paper on the table.

The Admiral bent over it, and as he bent, he smiled.

‘This seems to me most admirable!’ he said.

‘Do you advocate to-night as the time?’

‘Why not at once?’

A flush gradually overspread the Admiral’s face. He rose and held out his hand to Appadacca. Appadacca had the trick of inspiring men.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE BATTLE.

FOR OVER TWO hours a continual bustle prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the Spanish ships. Collision mats were got ready; water-tight doors were closed; on the cleared decks preparations were made for rigging torpedo-nets. By the time all magazines were opened, and ammunition and projectiles got out, the ships lay with fires banked, and steam at a very few minutes' notice.

It was ten o'clock. Yonder, up the terraced hill, blinked Santiago through a thousand dim and sleepy eyes of light; silence was in the air, made deeper by the vague drone of the mosquito, the West Indian moscon, and the rare firefly. The air was black and hot. With every movement of the sea, luminous mists of phosphorescent lights danced and twisted and disappeared on its surface. The noise of preparation on the ships died down, and all was still. As for Appadacca, he was reading, fifteen miles away, in the library of the Huelva.

Then there was a quick panting of small engines, a clank of chains. Captains of cruisers and commanders of destroyers had returned from a conference in the flagship. Boats were swung up, and in ten minutes there was movement on the water.

The ships passed down the narrow channel, the two destroyers leading. The unarmoured Reina Mercedes, a rather lame duck, was left in the harbour. At three hundred feet from the entrance they were sighted by a passing American torpedo-boat. When the foremost of the Spaniards emerged, signal of their coming had been flashed among the Americans.

The first object of Cervera was to escape injury from this small flotilla, in order to engage directly with the heavily-armoured ships under the conditions as to sea-room and other things arranged with Appadacca.

At the harbour mouth one of the destroyers turned sharply to port, the other two to starboard; the four cruisers, the Cristobal Colon, Vizcaya, Almirante Oquendo, and Maria Teresa, steered south at only a cable-length's interval, the Vizcaya leading. These were all ships of twenty knots, as modern as they were fast, with 12-inch armour-belts, plated decks, turrets firing two 28-cm. guns, with ten Hontoria 14-cm. guns, and eight 57-mm. quick-firers. The Americans had present no equally good combination of speed, power, and modernity.

At a thousand yards from the harbour entrance the cruisers had acquired a speed of twelve knots, while the position of the steam-cones told that they had power to spare. Every moment their rate accelerated. At nine hundred yards from the region of the Americans they were racing forward in line abreast.

Still no sound; the American ships are greatly spread out; three having gone racing eastward, four westward, to deal with the two destroyers, which else, with their high speed, will elude the blockade; only three are left in the centre of the American line to oppose the advancing cruisers.

The tactics of the Spaniards are to be silent for as long a time as possible, lest the big ships outside hear the rumour of the row. But suddenly, with one venomous exclamation, the stillness is over; the Texas has launched a needle of steel from her bow tube above the water-line. From her the centre of the advancing Spanish line is not more than two hundred yards away; the torpedo plunges like a slim, athletic diver, and goes darting steadily, as if with headstrong design, straight for the ram of the Cristobal Colon. The sea is smooth, rolling in oily heaves. In another moment the torpedo is at the central armour-belt of the Colon; it has touched, and runs, but as lightly as a piston glides in its cylinder; there is contact without impact. In intense haste the needle glides sternward along the glassy metal, until it reaches the region of foam around the screws. The port-screw strikes it, and it utters its awful bark.

The stern of the Colon jumps a little upward, but without injury. The explosion is ten yards astern.

At that moment, along a line of five miles, the night breaks into smoky glare and blustering, rolling hubbub.

But in the centre the row is so short as to resemble an exclamation. The four cruisers have broken the American line — the Maria Teresa with shattered fore-armoured tube, and the torpedo-boat Texas dipping by her broken bows.

Yonder, east and west, the American boats are crowding in pursuit of the two swift destroyers, training their lights and guns upon them as they rush at twenty-five knots through the whitening water. And there the sound of the battle congregates into two crowds of quickcracking uproar, while from the outer sea the massive armaments of the Americans, pouring hurried masses of dense smoke from their funnels, come hasting in, in two lines ahead, at the noise of the fray.

That the four Spaniards can hope to live for five minutes in the presence of this accumulation of power seems like a madness. The Massachusetts is a 10,000-ton ship, with two barbettes, carrying 13-inch guns; the Iowa is an 11,000-tonner, with four 45-ton guns. None of the Spaniards are over 9,000 tons, and they are four to ten.

On the weak side, however, is audacity, design, and the Huelva.

On board the Huelva there is a strange something swaying in the faint night-breeze near the second funnel. It is a great oatshaped bag, made of twilled Lyons silk, coated within and without with gutta-percha, and it contains hydrogen gas, obtained by passing the steam from a small boiler through a furnace of coke and anthracite. Over it is a net, and attached to the net a hoop, and attached to the hoop a cubical wicker-work basket, capable of containing four men.

And since the four men who will now occupy it must necessarily — almost necessarily — die, the crew of the Huelva is drawn up on her upper deck, and her captain, passing before them, puts the case, and demands volunteers. Appadacca and the priest are standing on the poop. Some hundred right hands go up. The captain thinks a minute, and puts his hand on four shoulders.

At that moment the priest spoke, as if smitten by a sudden thought.

‘But stop,’ he said; ‘we have a prisoner, señor. We may therefore save a life.’

Appadacca smiled, rather contemptuously.

‘Does he, then, remain unconverted, Father?’ he said.

‘As unconverted as an ape. The man belongs to an impossible race.’

‘But his life is a life also, is it not? Have we the right — ?’

‘A prisoner may be made to perform forced labour with justice. The man is joined to his idols.’

‘Ah! I see — joined to his idols; therefore he must be — Well, I naturally do not care what you do with this person, Father Pedro.

He is your prisoner, you know. If he no longer amuses you, destroy him by all means, if that is your whim.’

The priest at once went forward, and spoke some words to the captain. The captain descended into the cabin. As he did so, out, from hardly four miles away, broke the huge clamour of the meeting ships. The Huelva had need of haste.

The Americans were steaming directly north in two lines ahead at some eleven knots, the Iowa leading the port limb, the Marblehead the starboard. The Spaniards came south at fifteen knots, making an aggregate passing speed between ships of twenty-six knots, or nearly half a mile a minute. Yet in that swift by-rush of the ships — two of the Spaniards on the outside of the port limb of the Americans, and two on the outside of the starboard, and each ship belching a broadside within the space of four minutes of some 11,000 rounds of quickfiring and machine shot and shell — not a single unprotected man or gun on the Spanish ships was fit for further work. The crews in their military tops, as in the military tops of all the Americans, were no more; and from the stern-works of the Vizcaya a wide, sparkling fume, thronged with ascending points of light, went as a beacon through the night. The ships turned, re-formed, and prepared to charge.

At that moment it was that the American officers became aware of two things: First, that one of the enemy's ships was flying; and, secondly, that an electric light was passing and pouring, first upon one ship, then upon another, downward from mid-air.

At this sight the heart of the boldest quailed.

But it was to the running ship that Admiral Sampson first turned his thought, in spite of the impending doom above; and out from the Brooklyn at once went the trumpet-call, ordering two of the cruisers in that limb to join her in the chase of the escaping ship. The speed of the Brooklyn was twenty-one knots, at least one knot faster than the speed of the fastest of the Spanish cruisers.

The three ships, labouring under all steam, went churning to the south-east, one of them rattling as they did so the ribs of one of the port Spaniards which came within effective range.

But which of the Spanish cruisers was it that they chased? They did not know. And they were hardly half a mile gone when wonderment seized the rest of their fleet, for there, certainly, returning to the charge, were the four battered cruisers!

And now began to be revealed to all the whole inwardness of the scheme of Appadacca; for yonder in the starboard line of the Americans are only two ships left to fight two, and in the port line, above the five, hangs in the air a thing which will surely speak.

It is a thing which can make its way in the air even in the face of a light breeze. It is fitted with an electric light arrangement which can throw its rays in a circle five feet wide directly downward on the deck of a ship, and its car is packed with dynamite shells, whose steel casing contains liquid oxygen and blasting gelatine.

Positively now, unless the small flotilla further in shore speed at once to the aid of their ships in deep water, it seems that there is no hope for the concentrated fleet of America. But the small flotilla have their work cut out in dealing with the rushing destroyers, which are eluding and attacking them in incalculable conflict.

Suddenly, just as the big bow-guns of the ships begin to bark in the renewed attack, there hoots a sound which drowns every other, a sound at which the palefaced inhabitants of Santiago, listening in horror to the thunders of this hideous night, start with an intenser shiver. One of the shells has dropped from that evil, soaring thing directly above the engine-room of the Iowa; there resounds a series of heart-appalling shocks, hurrying at last into a roaring and raging rattle, as a spout of red and yellow flames bursts high and far over the sea. The two fore-port magazines have been ignited, and, as the ship lurches and dives, the thing in the air sails onward a score of yards, and manœuvres above the Vixen.

But what is the astonishment of Admiral Sampson when he finds that the further he chases, and the greater the agony of haste with which he urges the Brooklyn, the further seems to steal away the ship he follows. When he starts in pursuit, a barbette shot from his bows bursts a hundred yards ahead of the flying ship; seven minutes afterwards she is beyond effective range.

The Admiral, gazing abroad over the waters, is puzzled, but determined. He will follow her, he says, to Hell — igoland; and as he goes tearing on this wild-goose chase, the navy of America behind him is being annihilated.

It is a question of minutes.

Suddenly, at a moment when the wide uproar of the spouting and thundering Iowa is beginning to sink into a sullen muttering, a new, sharp sound breaks from the dark upon the Admiral's ear. It is a trumpet-call from a lightless ship travelling briskly in the opposite direction, two cable-lengths on his beam; and from the sonorous throat of brass came these words in vibrant distinctness to the Admiral's ear:

‘Don't follow her, Sampson! it's the Huelva!’

The throat was the throat of the trumpet, but the words were the words of Dick P. Hocking.

The Union had arrived just in time to see the battle.

Straight onward she went, smoothly walking the water, dangerously near to the region of shrieking shell and white sea-thrash, and the quick jabbering of Nordenfeldts and Gardners, and balls of flying flame. At this time the Spaniards were for the second time turned outwards to the Americans, and the Americans for the second time shoreward to the Spaniards, all the Spaniards still afloat, and the odds four ships and the balloon to five ships.

But the balloon, cruising high up in darkness, except at the moment of action, when it cast its intense instantaneous fan of radiance, had an effective value of quite five or six other battleships.

At the moment when the slow, distant firing once more quickened into a sudden thronging outrage of hell-fire, bursting from both sides, dazing the brain and splitting the ear, the Union was perhaps two thousand yards to the southward of the southernmost American ship, and was still forging slowly ahead to the northward. She had a searchlight playing, and Dick P. Hocking, in pyjamas, had his eyes at a night-glass on the poop.

His soul was in his gaze; his lower jaw hung open a little. Here, truly, was man's work — no child's-play — a thing which a man might do. A kind of crooked smile distorted his gaping mouth. It was a sight one might pay to be at — a thing a man of force and intelligence might set about himself, and take a pride in doing right well. He looked, and he saw a flame burst from the forecastle of the Cristobal Colon, and go waving aft like a plume; he saw the Vixen throw her humming screws into the air and her nose into the sea, as a duck when it dives; and immediately afterwards he saw an intense light shoot downward upon the deck of the Massachusetts, and he made out the form of the balloon. It was sailing on the land-breeze in the direction of the Union.

A shell broke into glare ninety feet from Hocking, and sent a splinter into his aft skylight.

Hocking hardly noticed. He had lifted a Winchester which had been leaning near, and had put it to his shoulder, the muzzle pointed upward.

He was in no hurry; he took his time. He cocked his right leg, and drew it in, and cocked it again. His left eye was shut tight. Then he pulled the trigger, and as he pulled it he muttered:

‘You and your beastly jokes...!’

Like a creature which has received a deadly hurt, the balloon uttered a shriek, heard indistinctly by the men in her car. At that moment it dropped a shell, but it fell into the sea.

The car was seen to protrude its form into the region of smoky glare; then the hoop and strings; then the now lax and flaccid silken bag. Floating hopelessly, with languid abandonment, at the mercy of the wind, it drooped downward and outward. When the car touched the water, it was about two hundred yards from the Union. Her boat was out, ready to rescue.

The balloon floated quite steadily for a minute, then with an absolute suddenness disappeared.

At the same time the battle was over. The three cruisers which had hurried after the Huelva reappeared, long before they were looked for by the Spaniards. The Spaniards at the same moment saw the two sources of hope upon which they relied cut off. The Huelva was no longer pursued — the balloon was in the water. Without hesitation the four cruisers, one of them very low in the bows, turned for the harbour at full speed, firing only stern-guns. They found the passage clear, and immediately on entering it were followed by the destroyer Terror, which, with the Pluton, now at the bottom, had accounted for five of the American small craft.

The forts now opened fire to cover their retreat, but, with the inefficiency of Spanish forts, did no one any hurt. The Massachusetts, growling her last growl as the last of the Spaniards disappeared beyond a curve of the canon, withdrew sullenly to the outer sea.

Meantime Dick P. blocking's abdomen was in agitation, heaving with laughter. Up from the boat sent to rescue the balloonists climbed the Rev. Silas M. Petersen, streaming with brine.

‘Parson!’ said Dick P. Hocking. ‘This can’t be you, man! Why, I’m darned if it ain’t a case of Jonah and the whale’s belly!’

‘Guess you ain’t far out there,’ said Petersen; ‘though sharks are more in the line of business of these waters, I reckon.’

‘But it can’t be you! Is it you?’

‘That’s about what it comes to.’

‘Then — you — are — the little parson for me!’ cried Hocking, shaking his hand crazily; ‘that’s about all I can say!’

CHAPTER XVII.

THE CHASE.

IT WAS NECESSARY for Dick P. Hocking to return immediately to New York. During the night he received from Admiral Sampson a despatch for Washington, and set off eastward before break of day. He was perfectly serene, having no suspicion that his presence there was known to any enemy, or that he had been watched.

To his chagrin, the next morning at breakfast he received the news that the Union hardly had coal in her bunkers to take him to Tampa. It was either a question of returning to the fleet, or making for Cape Haytien. He was now a considerable distance out from Cuba, so he went about, having determined upon the other route homeward.

He coaled at Cape Haytien, and was not more than half an hour from the harbour when on the port bow he sighted the smoke of a big ship.

All on the Union were very much on the qui vive; an eager look-out was kept. The rate of approach of the other vessel was phenomenal; one seemed able to see her growth on the horizon. Before the Union herself could have been visible to the other, it was definitely made out that the other was the Huelva.

And now Dick P. Hocking had searchings of heart. He had felt the keenness of Appadacca's sting, and for various reasons, at this precise juncture, he was averse to feeling it again.

He called a conference in the cabin — himself, Petersen, the captain. Petersen said that, in his opinion, the Huelva had seen the Union on the night of the battle, and surmised the share which the small vessel had had in the determining of events. He would not be surprised, he said, to find in her master the petty spite of a woman. The Huelva was seeking the Union.

‘Then what to do?’ queried Hocking.

What not to do Petersen knew. They must not think for that day of the ordinary route to Tampa. The Huelva would be upon them before nightfall; they must pursue, while still unobserved, their eastward course.

So eastward the Union went.

At Savanna, Hocking heard by telegram from an agent in Cape Haytien that a fishing-boat of the port had been stopped by the Huelva, which had demanded news of the Union. The boat had given it. The Huelva, was therefore on her way eastward in search of the Union.

Then again there was conference, anxious heads laid together. Petersen lived studying the map. He gave his voice, and Hocking agreed, for proceeding still eastward, to find perhaps a hiding-place among the islands of the Lesser Antilles. When the Huelva shot further eastward than they, then they would return on their westward course.

For three days the Union neither heard of nor saw the Huelva; she prepared to retrace her long détour. They were seven miles to the windward of the island of Nevis when, in a new laying-together of heads, this step was agreed upon at an early hour of a bright tropical morning.

However, they had hardly come to this decision when there was commotion on deck, a series of calls from bow to stern, and all the signs of that excitement among sailors when the monotonous deep brings forth a sensation.

Dick P. Hocking and Silas M. Petersen ran at once above.

It was towards the south-east end of Nevis, on the windward side of the island.

Hocking, Petersen, and the captain of the Union put glasses to their eyes, turned to the north-west, and mused. The pennant of smoke in the distance acquired distinctness; it grew rapidly.

‘Say,’ said Dick P. Hocking, ‘is that thing there the Huelva? Yes or no?’

The Rev. Petersen slowly lowered his glasses, and he said: ‘Guess it is, this time.’

A sound of vexed impatience came from Hocking’s lips.

‘Darn the thing!’ he said. ‘Isn’t anything to be done, man? I’m not over keen on falling into that liverless Spaniard’s hands right now, either.’

Petersen did not answer. He stood thinking a minute; then he ran towards the chart-room.

In less than two minutes he reappeared.

‘Guess there’s a chance,’ he said. ‘What’s your very best speed, captain?’

‘I’ve seen her do her twenty knots before this,’ said the captain.

‘Look at that darned thing, how she’s growing up there like a prickly-pear tree,’ said Hocking.

‘We may play her a trick yet,’ remarked Petersen.

‘Come, the parson’s got something in his head. What’s the colour of it, parson?’

‘Yonder, right ahead of us, is Redonda,’ said Petersen.

‘Well?’

‘Just put this ship in my hand right now, and though it isn’t what you might call in my line of business, I’ll answer to bring her through.’

‘Here’s the little man that’s right for both worlds, capitan mio! A fe de caballero!’ cried Hocking enthusiastically. ‘What he says goes aboard this craft, I guess.’ And he added in a lower tone: ‘But he’ll need to be precious cute to get out of the clutches of that ship this day, all the same.’

Petersen and the captain rushed together to the bridge. The captain, meanwhile, touched the electric knob, ordering full steam. The Union poured over the sea a wide hovering incense of black.

On board the Huelva was a very powerful telescope, specially designed and constructed for her conning-tower. At about the time when Petersen and his captain were consulting together on ways and means, the captain of the Huelva called down to Appadacca in his cabin:

‘A ship ahead, which I believe to be the one we are looking for.’

Appadacca answered:

‘It is important that she should be captured.’

‘Right, your Excellency!’ cried the Sicilian, and at once the whispering run of the steadily-clipping ship increased in speed. There was then an interval of perhaps fifteen knots between the vessels.

The chase began in earnest. The bows of the Union pointed straight upon Redonda, which appeared as a mere faint dream of blue in the delicate haze of the distance.

Down beat the tropical sun upon that peculiarly deep and steel-like blue which the sea of those regions assumes. Hocking lay at his length in a deck-chair, in pyjamas, smoking, peeping now through shuddering eyes at the glowing ball of flame above, now at the growing pennant of smoke across the heaving waste of water.

And as he looked he groaned, and the heavy lids of his eyes drooped lower in a sulky frown. But no one could have told by regarding the man that within he was all a-tingle with apprehension.

The bell went clang-clang, then again after two seconds clang-clang: four bells in the forenoon watch. The Huelva was ten miles astern. Her hull now was visible through the glasses.

But now, too, the azure mirage which had been Redonda began to be no longer azure, nor a mirage; streaky opal zigzags of rock lined its face, and one saw that it was not a cloud, but solid land.

The Rev. Silas M. Petersen walked the bridge; his hands trembled with eagerness. Would he not be too late? The waving pennant of the Huelva's smoke was like a brag of invincible speed. The captain ran to the engine-room stair, and, calling the chief engineer half-way up, cried:

‘For Heaven’s sake, get every inch you can out of her!’

The sea whitened round the toiling Union. The Huelva stretched like a greyhound bent upon a leveret.

The island towards which they were hasting was a mere rock, rising with craggy sides from the water, conical in shape, and uninhabited, save by boobies, and three men who live on its summit for the purpose of collecting the guano of the innumerable sea-fowl which haunt its shrubless sea-wall. The three men are lifted and lowered from and to the sea by a basket-and-crane arrangement high up on the face of the rock. From the summit a view (which the present writer has twice enjoyed) is obtained for many a mile over the sea as far as the coasts of Nevis to the north and Montserrat to the south.

By the time the ravines and indentations of the rock had come to seem to the Union near and real, the Huelva was five miles astern. The great ship sent up the single signal in the common code:

‘Stop!’

The Union kept on her way.

There was a minute’s silence of fear and awful expectancy, and at the end of it one of the nine-inch fore-barbette guns of the Huelva sent out a rush of redness. Then came a shell travelling in silent swiftness along the water; a ball shot with extraordinary precision from a distance usually beyond effective range, making right in the wake of the Union, bound without fail for her poop. Certainly the crew of the Huelva had among them at least one perfect marksman.

But the shot, fired too far off, dived into a wave twenty yards astern of the Union. The rock was two miles ahead of her.

Dick P. Hocking, standing now with Petersen on the bridge, said:

‘Parson, this time, I reckon—’

‘They’d better look lively about it, then,’ answered Petersen. ‘They’ve got exactly seven minutes and a half to do their work in. If they linger, they’ll lose the deal.’

‘But how, man — ?’

‘Wait — you’ll see.’

The Huelva was evidently reserving her next shot for closer quarters. It was quite four minutes before it left her bows. She was then within four miles astern of the Union.

And the shell came with the same appalling precision of aim, crying that peculiar busy shriek of large shrapnel fired over water. It was clearly meant to annihilate the screws and rudder of the Union, and it struck.

At the moment of impact, however, the Union was on the point of mounting a wave, her bows up, her stern low; the shell caught the extremity of her upper stern-works, and sent the woodwork spouting and hovering sixty feet into air, like a scattered group of black sea-birds.

That was all. When the burst of uproar was over, the flash and smoke out of the eyes, and the wreckage a hundred yards astern, it was seen that rudder, steering-gear, and screws remained intact.

‘Now, at last, I guess we’re safe,’ said Petersen.

‘Believe me, parson, I don’t understand you!’ cried Hocking. ‘How safe?’

‘Well, they can’t have that gun ready for another shot within four minutes, I reckon; and unless they fire upon us from their broadside, or from a military-top, they’ll find us under cover next round sure enough.’

‘Under cover? Where?’

‘Behind the rock.’

‘But they’ll come behind, too, I guess?’

‘Then we’ll be on another side when they do.’

‘But—’

‘That’s so.’

‘Yes; but they are miles faster than we.’

‘Not in dodging round that rock, sir.’

‘Anywhere.’

‘But not there.’

‘Why not?’

‘Because the inner of two circles is the smaller, any day. We can get in nearer than they — so the chart says, and so the captain says.’

Hocking’s eyes opened wide, and his mouth.

‘Well, I’m darned if I don’t think you’re right!’ he cried after half a minute, and he shook Petersen’s hand in a grip that meant many things.

As he did so Petersen clutched him, cried, ‘Look out!’ and skulked behind the railing. A rain of machine-gun shot fell ripping and smashing upon the quarter-deck.

‘Hard down!’ cried the captain at the same moment.

They were at the rock. In perhaps half a minute the Huelva was hidden from the Union by a bluff. The small ship was not two cable-lengths from the shore.’

Even within few yards of the narrow strip of sand the water is deep; but the bottom shelves very gradually outward, so that for a considerable distance to sea the rock is unapproachable by such a ship as the Huelva, with draught of twenty-five feet. In order to steam round the rock, it was therefore necessary for her to traverse a distance some three times greater than that necessary for the Union, and her speed was not nearly three times greater. When the Union found herself under shelter she slackened speed.

Presently the bow of the Huelva was seen, far out, peeping round the brow of a headland, but by the time her whole length emerged the Union had disappeared behind a curve of land. They went steaming round the rock, hiding and seeking.

And all the length of that tropical day they resembled two persons dodging round a table. Sometimes the Huelva slackened speed and waited; and presently there, stealing forward far within, would come the Union; and before a volley could leave the broadside of the great yacht the other had turned and disappeared. Sometimes, again, the Huelva would fly in circular career with all the power of her travingling engines, but always the smaller ship could beat her in the revolution of the rock.

Moreover, the Union had a three-pounder on board with which she could readily have sunk a boarding-boat. But no such attempt was made.

It was towards one bell, second dog-watch, when the sun's lower rim had touched the horizon, that the Huelva turned her bows finally away.

And as she did so the Union for a minute or two stood boldly out, and on her main stood arrayed in signal-flags these words:

‘Next time I will do the chasing.’

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE 'JANE RICHARDSON.'

THE UNION WAS not more anxious to be out of her imprisonment round Redonda and to be away than was the Huelva.

One went toward the north and east, the other toward the north and west. The man whom Appadacca was anxious above all others to see was M. Hanotaux; the man whom Hocking was bent upon seeing was Cramp, of Philadelphia.

He determined that Immanuel Appadacca had been leading him a dance long enough. He had begun it seven years before, and he was doing it still, with his beastly jokes.

Hocking spent three extremely active days at New York, transacting a world of business connected with the general running of his house. What kept him back longest was the getting of the Jane Richardson to sea.

She was a 5,000 - ton steamer, rather old, barque-rigged — for the most part a Rio and Liverpool trader — one of the makers of the house of Hocking. She was off now to Rio, and she had on board three hundred thousand pounds in gold specie. On the third day Dick P. Hocking saw her drop down the harbour past Fort Wandsworth into the Narrows. And at once, with Petersen, who meanwhile had preached a thrilling discourse at Brooklyn on the horrors of war (by an eyewitness), he set off for Philadelphia.

He knew that there was something there for him to see. What there was for him to see was two boats lying quietly in the Inner Dock — black, ugly things, low in the water, with the curve of a ram indicated at the water-line; small craft, one a hundred and forty feet long, one two hundred and twenty; and within one three tubes, and within the other, five. Besides these, there is a third on the stocks — the biggest of the three — a cross between a torpedo-boat and a destroyer. A yard from the rudder of the first is painted on her side the large white figure 1; in a similar place on the second the figure 2; on the third the figure 3: 1 and 2 have already had trial-trips, and the speed of 1 is twenty-five, and of 2 twenty-eight; the speed of 3 is estimated at thirty-three, her indicated horse-power being four thousand eight hundred.

And on the dock-quay stood Dick P. Hocking, right hand in pocket, left behind his back, leg projected, with slanting, contemplative head. He looked up at the short mast with the crosstree, and his eye followed it to the hull; and from the low stern to the high stem his eye travelled along the lengthy rake of beam. And on his left Petersen stood, and looked with slanting head; and on his right, Cramp, with slanting head.

Twenty men, leaning over the side of No. 1, and twenty-three over the side of No. 2, got a signal from Cramp, and understood who it was that was inspecting them; and they sent up a cheer.

And Hocking said:

‘That’s about something like what I wanted. And No. 3 — I request to know the earliest date at which she can be put to sea?’

‘Say Thursday,’ said Cramp—’ four days from now.’

‘Coal and everything?’

‘Fifty-five tons of it.’

As they were leaving the yards, a telegram was placed in the hand of Dick P. Hocking.

It came from the captain of the Jane Richardson, which had put in by order at Charleston. It was a rather lengthy communication; it ended by saying:

‘Strange man came on board during my absence in port, and got from first officer all information as to cargo, etc., under false pretences, apparently. Guess from description disguised Spaniard. Apprehend danger, perhaps groundlessly.’

Dick P. Hocking handed the telegram first to Petersen, and then to Mr. Cramp.

‘Guess that ship could do with a bit of convoying,’ he muttered with a nod.

And Petersen nodded, too, and Cramp was serious.

‘You both look like agreeing with me,’ said Hocking.

‘It has that appearance,’ assented Cramp.

Then, what you’ve got to do is to make those four days three, or even two, if human nature can screw itself up to it.’

Cramp speculated upon the ground.

‘Can’t be done, sir!’ he said with decision.

‘It can, if I make it worth your while; and I will. Three days at the outside, and there’s fifteen thousand dollars over and above the contract. Why, man, a million and a half in solid gold is at stake here!’

‘Well, I might shake hands on three days, perhaps; but it’s a risk, I guess. As it is, no dockyard on this earth ever turned out ships at the rate we’ve run these. But I can only try, that’s all.’

So they went forth, and drank champagne: and as they were drinking, Immanuel Appadacca, on the other side of the ocean, was drawing on his gloves at a window in the salon of his suite in the Hotel de l'Athénée, Paris.

Behind him sat Josef Campos, nervously turning the leaves of the Figaro. He turned them to the end, and began again from the beginning. He wanted to say something which he found it hard to say.

Appadacca turned to go. He bowed as he passed Campos, with a 'Buenos dias, caballero.'

Campos coughed.

'Am I wrong in thinking that you have something to communicate?' said Appadacca, stopping.

'Senor, we are — very — pressed for money,' answered Campos, coming straight to the point.

Appadacca laughed.

'Excuse my levity, Senor Campos,' he said, 'but you said the words with such an air of seriousness!'

'But — is it not, then, serious, señor?'

'Is it? It may be. I never gave the matter a thought. But I will; you may rely upon me.'

'Thank you, señor.'

'Meantime, the time you choose is inopportune for the discussion of a matter of that sort. I cannot wait; I am about to meet the French Minister. Pray refer to the subject again. Good-day.'

His close brougham was at the door. He drove south-westward to the Foreign Office, where he was awaited. He was soon closeted with M. Hanotaux.

Hanotaux continually stroked his straggling imperial, and there was rather an underlook in his eyes as the conference proceeded.

'It is necessary for me, monsieur,' Appadacca said, speaking French, 'to know how far and how near is the intervention of Europe in this war, before

I can take further steps.'

'The intervention, I fear, is where it was, señor,' said M. Hanotaux. 'You know of that natural condition of very cold water in a glass or cup: the least shake of the vessel will make it shudder into solid ice, but in the absence of the shake, it remains liquid an indefinite time.'

'The naval affair at Santiago, and the loss of the Americans therein, does not, then, affect the European situation?'

'It was nearly a great victory, señor,' said Hanotaux with a bow. 'Certainly, it was organized with consummate skill; but the results, I must say, have not struck Europe with the vividness which your generalship richly deserves.'

'You compliment me too much, monsieur. The affair was entered upon at your suggestion. Is another attempt necessary?'

'It would be difficult now, señor.'

'Nothing is difficult, monsieur.'

'Still, there are other points upon which the activities of the friends of Spain might at this moment be more profitably directed.'

'And those are?'

'Firstly and chiefly, the prevention of the invasion of Cuba by land-troops — or, at least, the retardation.'

'And why, monsieur?'

'Because — because — . I tell you that there's not a single State in Europe which is not secretly and strongly on the right side. Germany, it is already known in diplomatic circles, is prepared to interfere — actively, if need be, if only in Manila. Of France and Russia, of Italy and Austria, you have no doubt. Even in England, I assure you, the middle and upper classes favour Spain. It is only the rabble and the base press of that country which have had the bad taste to range themselves on the queer side. As for Germany, well, Italy, of course, is her ally, and Italy is the cousin of Spain. You may be sure that Italy, if it be suggested to her, will do all the spurring of Germany which may be necessary; in fact, none is necessary. But I say this: Spain must not make it too difficult for her friends; she must not show herself incompetent. She must not permit herself to be invaded — at least, not just yet.’

‘You have now told me the why, monsieur,’ said Appadacca, ‘but as to the how? The invasion of Cuba is regarded as more or less inevitable.’

‘It may, however, be retarded, till the friends of Spain decide together upon their course.’

‘And how?’

‘By means of a real phantom fleet.’

‘Ah? Pray be more explicit.’

‘You know how many phantom Spanish fleets have lately been seen near the coasts of America and in other parts of the world. Suppose, immediately before the embarkation of American troops for Cuba, a well-authenticated phantom fleet be seen in the distance. Since the troops must necessarily be unconvoyed for lack of warships, there I think you would have a perfectly sure method of delaying the embarkation for some considerable time.’

‘But “well - authenticated”?’ said Appadacca.

‘Yes; hence I say “a real phantom fleet.” The ships must really be seen by perfectly trustworthy witnesses, for the effect of a mere report would simply be nil. Meantime, while the mysterious fleet was being seen, the Spanish Premier might persistently declare the Spanish ships to be at Cadiz — which would be perfectly true, but which would be at once supposed in America to be perfectly false. The mysterious fleet would thus be infallibly assumed to be Spanish.’

‘Precisely, monsieur. But since this phantom fleet is, as you say, to be composed of real ships — and since the Spanish fleet at Cadiz is unready to put to sea — where, think you, is Spain to procure this phantom fleet?’

‘Ah, that is the business of Spain; I merely make the suggestion,’ said M. Hanotaux, stroking his barbiche, his mouth a little open.

‘I might also make this further suggestion, that such a thing as the borrowing of a fleet has been more than once known, señor.’

With such delicacy had the suggestion been led up to, that Appadacca was now expecting it, and showed no surprise.

‘If we must borrow, monsieur,’ he said with a bow, ‘it is surely from France that we would choose to borrow.’

‘And if France is to be a lender, señor, it is surely to Spain, above all, that she would choose to lend.’

The two men were all bows and smiles.

‘We, however,’ said M. Hanotaux, ‘are in this unfortunate position, that the present Government is, from hour to hour, uncertain of its tenure of office. Very soon, in fact, it is certain that a crisis will come; M. Méline will resign; a new Ministry will be formed. Nor am I sure that I shall then be asked to retain my portfolio of foreign affairs; and the Minister of Marine is in the same predicament.’

‘I follow you closely, monsieur.’

‘It results from those facts that we must be in a position at any moment to give an account of our stewardship. The cost of an expedition of French ships on a service not French would therefore necessarily be defrayed by the nation benefited. The Ministre de la Marine assures me that the cost on the whole, including loss of home-service and expenditure, would amount to six hundred thousand francs.’

‘You will not, pray, be at all concerned as to that, monsieur,’ said Appadacca. ‘I, personally, undertake to be responsible for the amount, and will refund it as soon as ever it becomes due, tendering you, in addition, the most earnest, the most profound thanks of my country.’

Shortly after this the interview closed. Appadacca had no sooner reached his hotel than a telegram, dated Rome, was handed him. It was from the priest, Don Pedro, who had been sent first to Turin, to conduct negotiations with the Canon, and thence to the Vatican, with which he had been in correspondence through the Pope’s Vicar-General. Father Pedro wired in cipher:

“Interview with Cardinal Parocchi quite successful. Germany certain. No cross-currents. Vatican and Crown pull together here. Immediately necessary for what you surmise — nine hundred thousand lires.’

Appadacca, still gloved, read the telegram standing. To Campos sitting in the balcony he threw it.

‘There, señor,’ he said, ‘is yet a further call upon your resources. Will you be also good enough to add to the nine hundred thousand lires, say, six hundred thousand francs, which will be due from you to the French Government within, let us guess, a week.’

Appadacca threw down his hat, and began to draw off his gloves. Campos came before him, standing with pallid, agitated face.

‘Senor!’ he said, ‘is it that you persist in mocking me after my long service? or do you assume the rôle of the ingénu out of mere merriment?’

Appadacca with a quick movement confronted him, surprised.

‘What do you mean?’ he asked.

‘To be quite frank, señor,’ said Campos, ‘it is rather a question with me how to pay our current expenses, our hotel and travelling bills, than the meeting of monstrous Governmental demands such as you mention. To myself, at least, I seem to deserve some sympathy from a faithfully-served master.'

'And I give it you, señor,' said Appadacca. 'I think, however, that I remember reproving you, and this very day, for taking with so ponderous an air what cannot be a matter of supreme importance.'

As he spoke a footman entered with a telegram. Appadacca glanced through it, and flung it to Campos, saying carelessly as he left the room:

'See, señor, how Providence opens for you interesting methods of repairing your collapsed commissariat. I will even assist you in the matter.'

The telegram was from Charleston, and came from one Fernandez.

It described the cargo of the Jane Richardson, the sum she carried in specie, her destination, hour of sailing, course. Her owners, it said, were the house of Richard P. Hocking, of New York.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE PRIZE.

APPADACCA LEFT PARIS hurriedly that night, directing his course toward Madrid, where he arrived incognito, and at once made his way to the house of Senor Sagasta.

The interview was hurried, Appadacca merely indicating the prominent, if secret, part he was being called upon to play in directing the destinies of the country — the sacrifices he made in wealth and, what to him was far more, in time. He said quietly, but in a tone which implied the will of steel, that when the right hour came, and the need for his open guidance, he would not fail to present himself as the leader of the leaderless country; and, for so long a time as he chose, would expect to be recognised as such by whosoever in the land was unwilling to feel the hand of iron beneath the velvet palm.

And at once, when he was certain that he was well understood, off he set by special train for the Bay of Algeciras, wherein lay his well-loved ship.

Here he met Campos and the priest.

He was intensely eager to join her, to be away. In spite of a certain nonchalance which he affected as to all mundane matters, such as money, not only to Joseph Campos, but even to himself, he was in reality of a perfectly practical nature. His calculations had the exactness of a ready-reckoner, and many a time the hard, close-seeing eye of Dick P. Hocking had found the eye of Appadacca a mile the shrewder.

He calculated in the luxury of his library the means of catching the Jane Richardson with all the astuteness and the caution of an old miser.

And he did not fail.

By the time the Jane was at the Bahamas, the Huelva had reached the latitude of the Canaries. And the two ships were converging sharply in a southerly direction, when Dick P. Hocking, commanding his flotilla of three, set out from Philadelphia; and with him, borne in No. 3, was the Rev. Silas M. Petersen.

The object of Hocking was twofold. It was, in the first place, to convoy the Jane Richardson; in the second, to see the Huelva in the air to the dance of torpedo-music. But in order to see her in the air, it was necessary first to see her; and the sea is wide. He expected to have a search of at least some weeks.

Meanwhile, with eager pump of the mighty engines in his small craft, he pushed on south in search of the Jane, his great bulk wrapped in oilskins, and he for the first time learning what a joy and a misery lay in ranging the ocean in a tearing torpedo-boat.

But with wondrous quick adaptability he became quite a sailor, growing in few days to tolerate the fearful vibratory heave of those toiling and swaying flanks.

He feared danger from some Spanish ship-of-war, without precisely thinking of the Huelva, and on without pause he drove. As for Petersen, he had the air of one born in a destroyer.

When the Jane was at Trinidad, the Huelva was in the longitude of Cayenne, not six hundred knots from her, and Hocking's flotilla was near St. Kitts. He knew that the Jane would put in at Port of Spain, so from the Lesser Antilles he wired her not to leave that English port until he joined her.

But the message was just too late; the Jane was gone.

And the next day at three p.m. she sighted the Huelva on her port quarter, and was in turn sighted by the Huelva, which rapidly drew near.

CHAPTER XX.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

AT THE MOMENT when the ships came within each other's ken, each appeared like a tiny-tail of gray only just deeper than the gray of the sky on the far horizon.

The Jane was steering about south-east, the Huelva south-west.

The captain and first officer of the Jane held steady glasses to their eyes on the bridge, and the mere speed with which that brush of gray afar grew darker upon the vision was enough to spur suspicious alarm.

Presently the captain growled.

'What do you make of her?' he asked.

The first officer shrugged his shoulders.

'What I say,' said the captain, 'is that she is after us, and a foreigner. That's enough for me. I have three hundred thousand sterling on board this ship. Here's to run for it.'

'Not much good, apparently,' answered the first officer, 'by the way she's raging along there. What a devil of a speed!'

'There's night,' said the captain, 'and luck — confound her!'

And he rushed to the communications, and trilled down to the engine-room, 'Full speed ahead!' At the same time the Jane's bows swung round eight points to starboard.

And she had hardly done so when the Huelva, certain now that she had found what she sought, bounded, like a courser at the spur, under the yet more quickened travail of her engines.

But the captain of the great yacht walked his bridge with too eager a step; his hands in his pockets, his brows knit. His dark countenance was anxious.

He did not expect — he was not prepared for — a long chase. Half an hour before, an ominous message had come to him from the engine-room. He continually dived his head inside a door, and looked at the clock.

The Huelva ordinarily consumed about a ton of coal in six knots; but the three thousand five hundred odd miles which she had traversed since leaving Algeciras on this money-hunting voyage had been performed at enormous speed, with heavy smoke continually pouring from her funnels; nor, owing to the urgency of her master, were her bunkers quite full at the moment of departure.

The chase had lasted half an hour, the two hulls being now clearly visible to each other, when the captain of the Huelva groaned. His eye had long been haunting some dark clouds on the southern horizon, and with that hurry of preparation characteristic of the sudden, passionate tempests of the West Indies, these now rose, and went ranging in haste across the sky, while half a dozen darts of rain fell upon the ship.

Her captain took pen, ink, and paper, and, in his imperfect handwriting, stated the case: Should he continue the chase? The chief engineer had reported that there were not more than forty tons of coal in the bunkers. In ten minutes all the sea and sky would be wrapped in midnight; the other ship, if she knew her business, would be certain to dodge. Should he fire now, though they were well beyond effective range? Should he cease the chase till after coaling in Trinidad? He was at a loss.

He sent the note below. It passed through five hands, and at length reached the deep-shaded library and the eyes of Appadacca.

Appadacca, at this foreboding news, started. The Jane was absolutely necessary to him. The money-claims upon him, both in France and Italy, were pressing. He wrote on the back of the sheet, after a full minute's deep meditation:

‘Continue chase. Report to me in ten minutes.’

As the captain above read these words, suddenly the two ships were hid from each other. A passion of wind and water swept down upon the sea, shutting the ships in an isolation of storm and stinging white rain. The sky was quite black. And at once, with the first rush of the wheeling gloom, the Jane's bows turned four more points to starboard. She was running straight back for the southern end of Trinidad.

That she would dodge in the darkness, the captain of the Huelva well knew; but he calculated that she would dodge in the most divergent direction, and so turned his bows about north, while in reality the Jane was heading nearly east.

In half an hour the storm cleared somewhat, and then the two ships had so far diverged as to be invisible. The Huelva was running with a line of Trinidad hills showing faintly on her port bows; the Jane was lapsing from the heaving outer sea into the absolutely smooth water of the Gulf of Paria.

Trinidad approaches the mainland of South America closely at two points: at a south channel called the Serpent's Mouth, and at a north called the Dragon's Mouth; between these and the mainland and the eastern coast of the island lies the placid gulf.

While the Jane was passing north into the Serpent's Mouth, Dick P. blocking's flotilla of three was passing south into the Dragon's Mouth.

The Huelva was scouring the sea for the Jane, and the three torpedo-boats were scouring the sea for the Huelva and the Jane. And while the Jane and the three boats were making along the east coast, one north, the others south, the Huelva was making along the west coast, northward.

As the sun, a marred blotch, was disappearing for the day, the chief engineer of the Huelva sent up formal notice that he had only twenty-eight tons of coal in his bunkers. The captain rang half-speed.

At this time the flotilla of three were at anchor in Port of Spain. There the intelligence was received that the Jane had gone on southward through the Serpent's Mouth; so, after surrounding his craft with lighters, which worked through the night, and taking in about seventy tons of coal, Hocking, while it was yet dark, towards morning, set out to continue his southward search.

And because the Jane, fearing that the Huelva might be tracking her in the dark, had put out all external lights, the three boats which sought her passed her at an interval of two knots on their starboard side toward the south end of the island, they faring south, she north: her object being to pass through the north channel, and then resume her course, on the chance of eluding the Huelva by the long dodge.

By ten o'clock a.m. she was out in the rough sea once more. The storm had lasted through the night with lulls and outbursts. The morning on the open sea was murky and bleak; it was as though the wind was visible and shut off the distance. Five miles away, unseen, the Huelva was cruising slowly in search of the Jane. —

Something like despair reigned on board the great ship. She had steamed very slowly through the night, yet things looked ugly. At last the captain sent down word that he had only sufficient coal to take him to Port of Spain.

Then only Appadacca yielded. The ship turned her bows southward, and in ten minutes sighted the Jane, now so near as to be within range of small gunshot. She was recognised, and at once the Huelva, with glad haste, sent her bark across the water.

The Jane instantly turned tail, and as she turned became the target for some three hundred rounds, which shattered the sea-surface all about her into a frothing chaos, and shivered her bulwarks. Also a wide smoke arose from her stern-works. And at once she slowed, and waited.

The Huelva steamed near and put out a boat. Her captain and five men went on board the Jane; there were confabulations, gesticulations, oaths, on the bridge; but within a quarter of an hour the boat returned with the specie stored in coffre-forts.

Things looked well now on board the big ship. But we are never certain for what to thank the gods, since in their good is ill, and in their ill good. The Jane was the bad genius of the Huelva. She made Appadacca decide not to put into Trinidad for coal. In the bunkers of the Jane was plenty.

Rut the process of transhipment was bitterly slow, and Dick P. blocking's flotilla, though steering at the moment of capture in an opposite direction, was swift. All the boats of both ships were employed in the work; but the sea ran high, and the Huelva avoided frequenting the smooth channel of the Gulf with the Jane bearing witness beside her. The slow work went on. A boat was swamped, another broke her bows against the Jane's side; two of the Jane's had been powdered by four-inch shell; all were more or less small. So passed the day; at night, with such a sea, it was impossible to work. A prize-crew was stationed on board the Jane. The next morning the slow labour recommenced.

The object of the Huelva was to get in merely sufficient to take her to Grenada or one of the near islands; in the last resort, Martinique. The loose way in which the regulations as to contraband of war had been fulfilled in the West Indies since the outbreak of hostilities left no reason for doubt that coal would be obtained in plenty. Moreover, the Huelva's letters of marque did not make her strictly a combatant.

Slowly rose the tale of tons: sixteen, eighteen, twenty, enough to take her to Grenada; not half enough to take her to Martinique. It was decided to ride through another night, get in thirty tons, and start.

All this time the two ships lay rather out of the route from Barbadoes, to the east of Macaripe, with the bold profile of mountainous Trinidad showing like some vague and distant mist.

And once again, as the sun rose upon a less fierce and boisterous sea, the flotilla of boats went plying with their little loads. The Huelva had stowed just twenty-three tons, when her captain put down a glass, and rushing to the telephone, whistled. He said:

‘I notice three steam-craft from the southeast making straight this way.’

‘What are they?’ asked Appadacca.

‘I will tell you in three or four minutes. They seem small, but strange somehow. Shall—’

‘Get up steam.’

In six minutes the captain of the Huelva made out that the three boats were war vessels, and that they carried the American flag.

The men working in the boats scurried at the call of the siren on board their own ship. There was confusion, pattering of feet, crews organizing themselves to places, the voice of the captain, and the cry of electric bells. The Huelva's lofty bows walked round to northward, holes here and there gushed trickles into the sea, puffed whiffs into the air, while vast foam-billows rose and rolled before the advancing ram, as the ship began to foot the deep. And on in her wake came the three torpedo-boats.

They had proceeded south and east to a point which, according to the news received at Trinidad, it was certain that the Jane could not yet have reached. They concluded, therefore, that they had passed her. They turned back to cruise in search, and off Point Baja fell in with a barque which had passed the Jane toward morning the day after her first rencontre with the Huelva; the Jane was then steering northward in her flight.

If the Jane were doing anything so unaccountable as to be sailing northward, then it could only be that she was being chased. So reasoned Hocking and Petersen, and at once they set off northward, also along the eastern Trinidad coast.

And as soon as ever their glasses turned upon the Jane, she was recognised by them, and near her unmistakably lay the Huelva.

And as the Huelva turned and steamed away, one of the fleet of three hoisted four flags, and the three smothered themselves and the sea in a coverlet of smoke.

And leaving the Jane there with a message from Hocking to go on to Port of Spain, the four passed on northward, the foremost seven or eight knots from the hindermost.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE CHASE.

DICK P. HOCKING had said that the next time he would do the chasing, and he was doing it. Yet he might have sought the Huelva all over the broad face of the sea and never have found her; but the Jane was the decoy-bird which had revealed her.

He had no knowledge of the Huelva's fatal lack of coal. He simply dared with the three comparatively tiny craft he commanded to oppose himself to that tremendous power which he followed.

Torpedo-boat against battleship; the novel, the original, against old use-and-wont; Saxon against Latin.

He followed.

His boats were literally robed and drowned in white from stem to stern, their ribs rocking in horrible, heaving, vibratory fits. Like a creaky chair too frail for the weight that bestrides and rocks it, so these creaked and rocked at the throbs and impulse of their pumping - engines. They were all of very high speed, and within ten minutes it was clear that they gained upon the Huelva, till the captain of the Huelva himself noticed it, whereupon she quickened her run to the utmost, and stole away somewhat from the boats.

But at a disastrous cost. She could do a good pace under sail alone, but now she was heading in the teeth of the prevailing West Indian wind, the north-east. There was, therefore, no question of sail; she depended solely upon steam, having twenty odd tons of coal.

Appadacca knew that he was being chased by ships carrying the American flag; he knew his lack of coal; but he continued in the deep recesses of that part of the ship which formed his sanctuary, preoccupied with matters as trivial as possible. During the first halfhour a dark-hued violin was at his shoulder, and he was uttering, in the dreamiest slow undertone, that resembled a sigh, one of Bach's fugitive fancies; then, his mood changing, he leapt up, drew a drawer from a cabinet, and laid before him a collection of stones, the delicate wine-tone of amethyst, gross copper-green of augite, with sardius, and chrys-oberyl, and thulite, and that blue-stone with which the denizens of Ararat ward off dropsy. He held them one by one in tenuous fingers beneath the rosy light of a central lamp, searching the secret of their hues. He set about arranging them in sets.

Behind him ploughed the ugly snouts of Dick P. Hocking's torpedo-boats with steady forge.

The Latin was playing prettily; the Saxon was working vulgarly.

It was Appadacca himself who had given the order to fly. Fear was not in his nature; he was pride incarnate. He made the quick resolve, on learning that he was pursued, to seek out these particular boats on the first possible occasion, and ruthlessly batter them from the face of the sea. But for the moment he had pressing engagements in Europe. Till they were fulfilled he shunned a conflict.

And Hocking, clinging to a davit of No. 3 near the one mast amidships, stood looking abroad on the sea. Hardly anything of him was visible save his stiff fan-beard; the rest was wrapped away in oilskins. He looked like a big wine-butt covered with a tarpaulin — from which peers a head.

A knot behind came No. 2, and still a knot behind No. 1. All their for'ard hulls, except their stems, were invisible under foam. The water went clipping backward and upward from their rams with the brisk hiss of syringe-expulsion, while behind they left a region of spotless churned milk. Their crews for that day made up their minds for biscuits and cold things; cooking was out of the question.

But by noon the Huelva had grown very small in the north distance. By one, when the coast of Grenada was made out by the big ship, the little ones had vanished, and the big was all but invisible to them.

It almost seemed to Dick P. Hocking that he was enduring this hardly tolerable life in mid-ocean on board that pulsing boat in vain. But he bated no jot of his speed. At two o'clock Grenada was well in sight. At three the little flotilla divided, one passing by the eastward coast and two along the westward, to meet at the north end.

But the eastward boat quickly spun round, and hurried back south and then west and north to rejoin the others. She had, to the surprise of her crew, sighted the Huelva; nor could the Huelva have been sufficiently near to make her out. This was the news with which she went straining back. It was boat No. 2, on board of which, at this time, was Petersen.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE BATTLE.

THE HUELVA HAD passed to the eastward of the island, though St. George is on the west, for the reason that the east is never used on the northward route to Martinique, to which island she had the appearance of being bound. She thus hoped to elude the pursuing boats. At the moment when she was sighted she was all but stationary in the water; a ton or less of coal was all she carried.

The hours passed. Four o'clock, five, six. She waited for darkness. The sea, as generally round Grenada, was very unsettled. The Huelva rode the slow, big swells with a gallant nonchalance.

And now the sun dips, and, as his last segment disappears, it is night.

There is a sound on board the Huelva, the rattle of electric wires. She prepares to make for St. George. As her lights gleam abroad, already overhead is a black vault of stars.

But besides the stars there are other lights which claim attention this night — three more on the sea, yonder to northward, suddenly appearing, and they draw fearfully nigh.

Have ships life? So sailors tell. And, if life, then an instinct of death? So, too, runs the tale. The Huelva, as she is in the act of moving round to south, drives her head into a swell with such sudden and sullen fury, that the heavy rush of water breaks the arm of a man against the armour of the bow-gun, and souses all her forepart in a drenching baptism. A singular act for her.

There are certain conditions of the atmosphere and light in tropical countries in which things remote seem more remote than they are. When their nearness becomes evident, it does so with a certain effect of surprise.

And a feeling of surprise it was with which the captain of the Huelva all at once became aware that the three lights were within a knot of him. He made haste to communicate that fact to Appadacca, who, indeed, already knew that he was again being followed.

Appadacca replied:

‘Husband your coal. Make ready for a battle. Rig torpedo-nets — now. I will come on deck.’

He entered a species of boudoir, and in a moment came out masked and cloaked. He rang the bell communicating with the priest’s suite, and sat with knit brows till the priest appeared.

‘Excuse me,’ said Appadacca hurriedly. ‘It is necessary for me to tell you that I am about to be attacked by some small American ships of war. You will not be alarmed? I hope not. I am so sorry for the inconvenience, for your sake. At least, you will not now be taken by surprise, if anything serious should happen.’

‘Do you anticipate anything?’ asked the priest, his face very white.

‘It is within the possibilities, holy Father.’

‘Then, my son, you shall have my prayers—’

‘Thank you. I cannot stay—’

‘Do you, then, direct the battle in person?’

‘Yes. Farewell.’

He was gone. Up he went, with steady, stately step, up to the hurricane-deck, into the conning-tower.

It was a good-sized room, cushioned and velveted within — without, gleaming nickel-steel. In the fore-surface, a circular glazed window, giving view of a wide reach of sea; around, a multitude of knobs and telephone-mouths, communicating with engine-rooms, gun-casemates, and every part of the ship.

Now there was no more flying. As he entered the conning-tower, Appadacca ordered his helm to port, and as the intense moonshine of her two searchlights shot shimmering over the water, the Huelva ran to meet her enemies.

They were not quite two minutes apart, and at the end of the first, Appadacca tinkled the bell connected with the fore-port casemate on the main-deck. The light was shining full upon a torpedo-boat not eight hundred yards away, and, following instantly on the rattle of the knob, the Huelva sent out the sharply-punctuated, jabbering row of a four-inch Hotchkiss over the water.

The sea, however, was so unstable, and the target so small in size, that only one shell told, carrying away a cowl. And herein was manifested that shrewdness of Dick P. Hocking which had given him riches, that when advised to have torpedo-vessels built for him, he had stuck manfully to his boats, pointing to an account which he had been studying of the blowing-up of the ironclad Blanco Encalada on the Chili coast by two small torpedo - craft. 'The smaller,' he had said, 'the better. Smallness, strength, speed, and tubes — those are my sentiments.'

And now he had all this, his tubes numbering twelve.

The three boats came on in a line abreast, No. 2 in the middle, No. 3 to starboard, No. 1 to port, with an interval of half a mile. The Huelva almost immediately upon her first outbreak passed between No. 1 and No. 2. And as she did so, trailing her lights on her two enemies, with a unanimous battery of both broadsides she sent forth a red thunder that shook her frame to its keel.

And at once mast and funnel disappeared from No. 1, and, as the Huelva sped past, the crews of the starboard guns sent up a cry of pride, for the boat's bows were seen to be as low as her stern had been.

But meantime two eighteen-inch Whiteheads, with a speed of over thirty knots, are making for the great ship. On each side one is marked, with outcry, with alarm; and wide, wild eyes follow the hurrying run of that bruised water-weal, and catch glimpses of the fatal, struggling, buffeted, yet headlong steel. Appadacca's eyes turn from one to the other with patient, eager scrutiny. It is an awful moment.

Suddenly he orders helm to port, for he has noticed that the port torpedo slackens, while the starboard races steadily through and over the impeding sea. So long is the agony of suspense that there is time to shoot from the military-tops, but no shot takes effect. The Huelva turns to port, and at once arises the outcry that she is making straight for the port torpedo, which has been deflected by a wave; and as she returns to starboard through a frothing curve, the starboard torpedo is shooting close upon her; and an instant afterwards it is observed, with heart-shrinking terror throughout the ship, that both torpedoes have been caught in the stern-wake of the vessel, and are converging, with absolute, inevitable certainty now, upon her. Then from every bosom bursts a sigh as the swift catastrophe comes; the torpedoes, rushing in the ship's wake, both of them, close. They meet — they clash; and four hundred pounds of guncotton rend the air with a bang of venom at which the heart faints and the whole sea-depth trembles.

But the Huelva is untouched, and torpedo-boat No. 1 has disappeared.

With that rude self - sureness which distinguishes Americans, the crews of the torpedo-boats had not been chosen, except in the case of their commanders, for their special knowledge of torpedoes, or special skill in handling them — only for their general skill and intelligence. Hence the torpedo of No. 1 had actually been fired from beyond range, which in no case exceeded 700 yards, and was about to cease its motion when taken into tow by the Huelva's wake.

And now it is only two to one; and Dick P. Hocking's brow wears a frown, as does the brow of Petersen. The result is not so sure as it seemed.

One torpedo beneath the keel of that ship will suffice; but to get it there?

The boats were fitted with a system of double lanterns, electrically worked by a keyboard, for signalling; and, as the Huelva came raging back to the south, Hocking signalled:

‘Give her all possible torpedoes this time.’

At that moment the Huelva's captain was speaking to Appadacca in the conning-tower. Coal at that pressure could not last two more minutes. He had told the engineers that if the ship could not keep speed she must be destroyed; but —

And again came the boats to meet her, port and starboard; but this time at such close quarters, that no sooner had the machine-guns in the tops commenced to crackle than every living thing on the decks of the boats was mangled, and their whole riddled surface presented an aspect of havoc. Still, as the Huelva was prone to pass between them, at a distance of less than 400 yards from No. 2, a navy of five ripping steel-needles set out to reach her, shot rather at random, but all in a fair way to intercept and end her. The first, by the merest agile seamanship, and a slight sheer to port, slipped astern ten yards from the screws; a second was caught by a wave, and tossed aside in a whiff of spray; a third was caught in a net. At that moment the speed of the ship was furious; quite suddenly she seemed to hesitate, to give in, to lapse, to pause. The fourth touched her port beam, and there, for half a minute, hung swaying; the fifth struck her after-armoured tube to starboard at the level of the belt.

At that supreme instant, while expectation stood in silent horror, there burst a hissing shriek from the boilers of No. 2, and men were seen wildly leaping at random over the side, through a wide seething of white steam; but instantly afterwards this explosion was lost and a thousand times drowned in two monstrous, deep-throated shocks, swift-succeeding, which were like the death-sobs of the fated vessel. From both bow and stern, high and wide over the sea, she cast her mighty fragments, while at once the speed of the wreck stopped totally, and she was seen to have settled evenly lower all round her hull.

She was still in brilliant light; and as the only boat of No. 3 capable of floating came near from the rescue of the men of No. 2, only four of whom were found, Dick P. Hocking, sitting in her stern, saw, standing on the bridge, a figure which he had twice in his life beheld — a man in a mask and mantle, a man to whom he owed a debt, whose name he did not know.

The next moment the man was hidden from sight, the ship being now one heaven-high cloud of angry steam, proceeding from her quenched and screaming fires. In the sea were hundreds of men, who had plunged into the water to escape the unexpectedly swift doom of the vessel.

She left them not much time. Her bow lurched down to port, then, as if she were being tugged opposite ways by spasmodic strings, she jerked herself sternwards to starboard, and in that position lay wobbling a little, as if to settle herself to comfort, the seas breaking all the time over her bulwarks; and so remained an incredibly long time — perhaps three minutes — till she suddenly skipped forward, dived, and disappeared.

MEN WERE SEEN WILDLY LEAPING.

[To face p. 252.]

And once more, at nearly the last moment, Dick P. Hocking saw that cloaked figure; and he leant forward, and he lifted his right arm, and he said:

‘You see that man standing there high up on the bridge? Ten thousand dollars to every man in this boat if he is saved!’

But the offer was met by the men with a certain sulky dissentience.

‘Saved, Mr. Hocking, sir?’ said one. ‘It wouldn’t pay you or me to go an inch nearer that ship now. No salvation for him in this world.’

‘Does every man in this boat refuse?’ cried Hocking, in a voice that equalled the shrilling steam.

No answer.

‘Come along, parson; we’ll do it together!’ roared Hocking. ‘It’s my own boat, any way, I guess.’

And he manoeuvred himself ponderously forward, pushed away an oarsman, and in a trice was doing stroke to the bow of drenched and scalded Petersen.

And never in his life did Dick P. Hocking come so near so huge a danger. As the boat drew nearer the ship, she was suddenly dragged into the influence of a vast wheeling basin of sea. She twisted, shot, and in an instant went careering with intense speed round the area of the sunken vessel’s suction. Happily, at a hopeless moment, there shot from No. 3 a light, illumining a whole section of the whirlpool; and, as the light glowed red on the water, Hocking, before he knew what he had seen, or realized what he did, so swift was his action, had put out his hand and grasped the collar of a man.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE MARRIAGE.

TORPEDO-BOAT No. 3 entered St. George with a crowd of castaways, picked up beyond the region of the Huelva's suction. Among them were Father Pedro and Josef Campos.

Hocking, on removing the mask from the face rescued in the whirlpool, had seen with a profound shock — with a throe that was half wonderment and half gladness — the face of Appadacca. As for Appadacca, he remained in a faint.

Hocking found at St. George a steamer, which he chartered for New York, and with him took Petersen, Don Pedro, and Appadacca.

As for the war, his interest in it was over. He knew now how it would end; if not this time, then the next time; if not this century, then the next century, or the century after that.

It would end as the quarrel of Appadacca and himself had partly already ended, and partly was going to end, in victory for the Saxon, and in the Marriage, as Petersen had said, ‘with all the fiddles of God a-playing,’ between the Saxon and the Latin.

Even yet Hocking did not carry his idea of marriage in his own private case without difficulty; there was the pride of Appadacca, the haughtiness of the priest. But Appadacca was really conquered; he and the priest between them could not muster ten cents in ready cash; and Hocking left no humility untried, no intercession unmade, to bring about ‘the marriage.’ One day Appadacca said:

‘Mr. Hocking, you have carried your point. In your way you are stronger than I. I admit myself conquered — with gladness.’

‘Well, now you are talking, sonny,’ said Dick P. Hocking.

And so it falls out that the house of Hocking has now changed its name to ‘Hocking and Appadacca,’ and that, whereas Hocking is the man for the big idea, the gross conception, Appadacca can plan the details of its execution with fine skill, proving himself in very truth a ‘helpmeet.’

The execution itself is left in the hands of Campos. Appadacca does not live at New York, nor anywhere in ‘the States’ — neither, for that matter, does Hocking, for where Appadacca is, lo, there is Hocking also; and Appadacca is mostly in old seigneurial chateaux, breathing an air of ancient peace and culture and loveliness, where one, of one’s self, gets to feel that a human creature, having the same external form as Plato and Shelley, and, in fact, made in the image of God, should never, never say, ‘I reckon, guess, and calculate.’

A distinct improvement is perceptible in Hocking’s whole manner of speech, of bowing, of carrying his neck, of bearing about his abdomen.

His body is getting narrower, because he eats less, and eats better; his head broader, because he cannot be got away from the side of cultivated Immanuel Appadacca.

And Appadacca is getting in many ways wiser, stronger, truer to Nature and the facts of life, because he cannot be got away from the side of level-headed Dick P. Hocking.

Only, between Father Pedro and Petersen there is not quite the same harmonious reciprocity; for these are theologians, seeking not so much to find truth, as each to prove that truth is on his side — neither suspecting the possibility that Truth probably inhabits quite other regions than the small elbow-room at his ridiculous side. However, even Petersen and the priest have derived mutual blessedness from the union; they follow Appadacca and Hocking from château to château, and discuss; but in their discussion is a note of greater suavity: the priest is less arrogant; the parson less rawly obstinate and impossibly hideous. In time they will find out that both are eternally right, and both barbarously wrong; and for each reason they will learn the secret of Love, which is the secret of Life.

THE END

Cold Steel (1899)

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I
CHAPTER II
CHAPTER III
CHAPTER IV
CHAPTER V
CHAPTER VI
CHAPTER VII
CHAPTER VIII
CHAPTER IX
CHAPTER X
CHAPTER XI
CHAPTER XII
CHAPTER XIII
CHAPTER XIV
CHAPTER XV
CHAPTER XVI
CHAPTER XVII
CHAPTER XVIII
CHAPTER XIX
CHAPTER XX
CHAPTER XXI
CHAPTER XXII
CHAPTER XXIII
CHAPTER XXIV

CHAPTER XXV
CHAPTER XXVI
CHAPTER XXVII
CHAPTER XXVIII
CHAPTER XXIX
CHAPTER XXX
CHAPTER XXXI
CHAPTER XXXII
CHAPTER XXXIII
CHAPTER XXXIV
CHAPTER XXXV
CHAPTER XXXVI
CHAPTER XXXVII
CHAPTER XXXVIII
CHAPTER XXXIX
CHAPTER XL
CHAPTER XLI
CHAPTER XLII
CHAPTER XLIII
CHAPTER XLIV
CHAPTER XLV
CHAPTER XLVI
CHAPTER XLVII

À MA PETITE FAFEMME,

LINA,

QUE J'AIME BEAUCOUP.

After this work was printed off, it was pointed out that the title, 'Cold Steel', had already been used for a work on swordsmanship by Captain Alfred Hutton. The title, however, by Captain Hutton's courtesy, has been allowed to stand.

CHAPTER I

THE FORDS

‘YET THEY LIVE again in the dreamer’s brain,
As deeds of Love and Wrong,
Which pass with a sigh, and seem to die,
Survive in the poet’s song.’

BARRY CORNWALL.

THE literary historians have not always recorded the most interesting, or the most important, facts of history. They tell us of the Battle of the Spurs, but not of the incidents of Luther’s youth; of the Edict of Nantes, but not of the case of Bessie Ford.

Yet these unrecorded were more interesting and important than those recorded events.

As for Bessie Ford, she was like a pebble dropped into water, round which float out and widen slow circles; only, in her case, instead of the circles fading as they widened, they still gathered depth and height, they filled a sea, till at the horizon they rolled away in sombre billows, mountain-high.

Bessie Ford lived the most intensive part of her life during the second reigning decade of that strong English monarch, Harry VIII.

Let us state at once that the whole motive and mainspring of her life lay in a sister, called Laura Ford. We say ‘called’ with special meaning, for it is doubtful if Ford could have been the girl's real name. It was more probably Garcia, or Gomez, or Perez.

Bessie was a girl of humble though worthy class, born in Hampshire, both her great-grandfather and grandfather having been noted in their small world as good Lollards, men who walked with God in this their journey, and His, through the great Deep; her father also having been for years a chorister in Winchester Cathedral. But once, when she was three years old, some Spanish noblemen connected with the Court came, with retinues, on an Autumn visit to my Lord Bishop of Winchester. And to the Episcopal Palace Bessie's mother, then a widow, often took eggs and butter to sell.

And so (as we suspect) it came about that, whereas Bessie Ford was a girl of quite plain and homely seeming, her sister Laura, four years younger, was a creature of simply gorgeous world-loveliness, flamboyant as sunset, Spanish in type.

At the age of twenty Bessie came to great London to work. It was at the invitation of mine host of the Bell in Eastcheap, who was the uncle of her mother. Laura then was seventeen years, and half a head taller than Bessie; she looked in her heeled cordovans like a young birch in Spring sprung lithe from the hill-side. And Bessie loved Laura foolishly, and was infinitely proud of Laura, and lived in a constant tremble and trouble of fear for Laura.

Bessie was slim and quick, with a perfectly erect back and neck, her hair being nut-brown, and combed flat in two clean curves over a great broad forehead. Below this dome of brow was a rather small triangle of face, but very chastely lined. Her brown eyes were small and grave, with little eyelash, and set far apart in the head one from the other.

By her labours at the inn she was able to keep Laura living almost luxuriously in a lodging near the Whitefriars; and since Laura could not, or would not, wholly be made a nun, all Bessie's musings among the gallants at the bar were of the perils, and the abominations, and the tribulations of Babylon.

There was one name at which, above all other names, she started: it was the name of Henry, the King.

One night she dreamt that the King, passing on horseback through the streets, looked up and saw the face of Laura at her window. And Bessie leapt from sleep with wild eyes, and rushed, crying out, toward the door....

Already the fame of the King as the dragon-gallant, the Blue Beard of his female subjects, had spread through England.

Bessie, being lately come to Babylon, did not yet fully recognise the difference between its dimensions and those of a country-villager. It got into her head that the danger of a meeting between Laura and the King was always imminent, just about to culminate; and she divined, with woman's instinctive accuracy, that one glance of those royal eyes at the face she cherished would be enough to ruin all her Hope in life.

She could not dream that there existed on the earth any Beauty comparable to that of her child; and, perhaps, in fact, there did not.

King Henry became Bessie Ford's nightmare. He loomed upon her imagination as a vast monster, girleating; his name changed the colour of her face.

Besides this big dominant terror which never left her, she had a hundred others. She used to listen with eager ears to the many love-adventures recounted in the inn, if haply she might catch that name of Laura.

She had not been two months in London when, already, she knew that Laura had a lover.

This one, however, did not excite in her any unqualified terror. She had looked into his face, and seen it honest and gentle; but he was young in his nonage, and very poor. Her dream, her ideal, for Laura was — Marriage.

His name was Mark Bonner.

He began by passing very often along an alley in the Whitefriars, and glancing at a certain casement; and across this casement, sometimes, a Face with a daintily-built head of black hair would saunter with a musing, coquettish slowness.

Bonner was a scholar, and eighteen. The future held in it for him this vision of glory — the Bachelauriat of Arts. He had heard of Aristotle, and dreamed of him; he had read Terence; he knew Cicero by heart.

He attended classes at the new Paul's School of Master Colet in threadbare sarcenet doublet. In odd ways he eked out a livelihood, hanging often about the courtyards of my Lord Cardinal, and running errands.

Wolsey knew his face, and once, in the clock-yard at Hampton, had honoured him with the memorable favour of a glance.

Mark Bonner bought a new velvet bonnet at a frippery-store with his last angel, and set it jauntily on. He began to pass and repass in the Whitefriars, shot to the reins.

He had a very spiritual face on his lank body. The forehead widened as it went up, and the chin lengthened down into a delicate, quaint point. His thin lips were like the scarlet rouges of kermes on the stained Greek marbles and ivories, and his eyes were large and luminous, and swam in melancholy.

And Laura from that overhanging small-paned window could divine all this.

CHAPTER II

THE HEART-CRY

‘SORROW WITH SORROW sighing, hope with hope Exulting, heart embracing heart entire.’

POLLOK.

BEFORE the second month Laura began to pout. She had on her upper lip a downy growth of just-visible black hair, which added a poignant something of humanity to her divinity — one of those striae which enhance and ravish. When she pouted in her sulky way, this hinted moustache made her little thick pale-rose mouth an object of foolish worship.

She pouted, and decided that she was neither a nun, nor a nursery-flower, nor a King’s-prisoner.

She began to steal out in tentative promenades to the top of the next byeway and back.

Once she knew that she was being followed by a warded warrior, and took to her heels; once she was chuckled under the chin by a marshalman, and reddened; once she was seized and kissed by a hostler, and meditated on it all the day.

But she continued her walks, and daringly extended them. Of all this she said not a word to Bessie.

Once Mark Bonner saw her picking her steps in the mud of the street. Here was that for which he had wildly hoped. But instead of being in heaven, he was rather in Hell. He could not address her: his tongue clave to the roof of his mouth. As he brushed by her with hung head, she saw his white face and the trembling of his veined white hand.

The next clay she received a love-poem with the last line of each verse in Latin. She could by chance read the English tongue, but Latin was far beyond her. Still, she conceived a great reverence for the scholar, and a week later a jolly Augustinian, who came to collect abbey-dues (for the house was within the manor of the Hospital of St. Barts), told her with a fillip that the meaning of ‘Te dulcem meam amo’ was this: ‘I love thee, my sweet one.’

Twice more they carefully met, and hurriedly passed, like ships on the sea, without voice; but the third time Laura, with ice-cold hands and bounding heart, laughed a challenging giggle to herself, and Mark, hearing it, stopped, hesitated in the throes of a thousand indecisions, and turned; he whispered huskily to her in a throat so parched that the words were lost.

However, he walked by her side, and when they parted, he uncovered and laid his lips upon her hand.

Rising and looking from her window in the dead of night, she saw him standing there below; and the lonesome gleam of the rare candle-light of the alley showed his uplooking face.

After that they met daily, and a great mystery was revealed to Southern-blooded Laura Ford. Within these two began to stir that Spirit which from the seed brings forth the Harvest. Then suddenly it was as though a great Sun dazzled their eyes.

‘How lovely you are!’ he said.

‘And you also,’ she replied.

Laura's face was washed in morning dew. They fell to speaking in a language that resembled song rather than simple speech. At this time they did not know each other's name.

Onward from the Fleet down to Westminster was mostly open field and tree-land, varied by the palaces of my Lords Essex, Arundel, Somerset. And hither, as evening fell, and hardly a hay-cart drawled in sight, they wandered, or halted by the river, or whispered their intense secrets under bowers of the ducal grounds.

'Faith, here is the thought that gives me pause — if I had never seen you!' he said.

'That would not have been possible.'

'Faith, but 'twas by sheer hazard of my good star!'

'What would you have done?'

'I? I should even have died! By the Rood, what could I have done? You are my very life!'

'What, you love me so, sir?'

'Stars of the Night, bear witness!'

'And always — from the very first sight you had of me — I knew that it was so with you.'

'From the first sight, and before.'

'How — before?'

'Oh, long I have known you. When a little boy, I saw once your face in a clear running brook of the wood; I have divined you in my reading of Helen, the Greek; I have foreknown you in miraculous dreams of the night. Nothing in the earth is potent, sweet, which does not resemble you. In the faces of newborn children, and in the smells of dungs and flowers, and in the corn-shocks of harvest, and in all the motions and method of the World, I have had hints and presages of you, oh, my dearest dear!'

She looked at him with eyes in trance.

‘Our Saviour — what a music ’tis you speak. ’Tis surely so the angels in heaven chant, sir!’

‘You love me?’

‘Ah — I cannot speak such words as you—’

‘But you love me? You love me?’

‘Ah—’

Her sigh fainted in the anguish of its utterance; she was in torture for lack of expression; her fulness was a pain. She reached up her pale pouting mouth in abandoned offering to his. Then, after awhile:

‘But my sister — Our Saviour! she will sure, sure, wot!’

‘And how, prithee?’

‘She even will!’

‘Is she gentle and good?’

‘Oh, she is very good, my sister. But—’

‘You must tell her.’

‘An I dare!’

‘Let me.’

‘Is it that we will be married?’

‘Why, my pig’s-eye — yes.’

‘When?’

‘Ah, when! I lack substance! When the wind shall fill my sail! I have twice attracted the great Cardinal’s eye; and he is, you know, the patron of poor scholars. Like you poverty?’

‘No.’

‘Not?’

‘No.’

‘But to me it were heaven with you.’

‘I like not poverty, I. Have you seen the interior of a great palace? I have, at Winchester. Oh, the mighty mansion-house, the gaudy menials, and the bravery! I like that. An I had that, and you also, then were I happy indeed.’

‘But of the two you prefer — which?’

‘I like both.’

‘But you prefer — which?’

‘Why, you.’

‘Crowned saint!’

‘But my sister. Our Saviour! what shall be done?’

‘I will speak to her.’

‘An that be indeed the best—’

‘Why, yes, as I deem it.’

They rose to walk homeward, and on the morrow Mark Bonner was at the Bell. He stammered his tale. But under the considering eyes of Bessie Ford he felt the sensation of scrutiny, and chill reception.

CHAPTER III

‘CROM ABOO’

‘THERE CAME A certain lord....’

SHAKESPEARE.

THE Bell was full of uproar.

From the dim winding street, paved with oval pavers and grass-grown, one descended by three stone steps through a hooded doorway into a room so sombre that for a time the eye saw nothing.

Some faint light, however, came in from a passage which led to a yard at the back.

In the front, at the centre of the four gables of the house, stood a post bearing the sign of a black Bell on a red ground.

It was three in the afternoon.

A horseman came eastward. A noise of revelry went out to him as he approached. He had been in London five weeks, and each day had made the Bell his haunt. But to-day he hesitated.

He had in his holster two letters of high importance. One was to the Governor of the Tower of London, one to my Lord Wolsey. Both were from the King, writ with his own hand. The latter letter contained thoughts, arguments, State-secrets, which King Harry, for a new province, would not have had an eye other than his Cardinal’s peruse.

The noise of revelry came out to him, but the horseman went past the Bell, going eastward to the Tower.

He was a man of very great size, standing six feet above his spurs. His russet-leather jerkin covered a heroic swell of chest, a broadsword hanging at the buff-belt, and on the other side a pair of pistols, and a dudgeon dagger.

He went past the sign-post — and turned again.

On his broad, massive face was a smile now. It was a genial face, clean-shaven over-all; with humour in the lines of the mouth, whose ends were lengthened into two little folds; and phrenological bosses on the forehead. That forehead was white, but the expanse of face was ruddy and tanned, and crossed with many a hack. Surely, Garrett Oge Fitzgerald had been in the wars.

He was a bastard son of a bastard branch of the great Geraldines of Kildare, his great-half-uncle being even then the King's Deputy at Dublin. Yet Garrett Oge was the possessor of one only harry-noble in his slop-pouch.

He called 'Hi!', threw his reins to the hostler, and, as he sauntered with his laggard gait into the parlour, waved his arm round, and cried:

'Crom aboo!'

It was the war-cry of the Geraldines.

He was received by a shout of welcome, and a lifting of the six-hooped pots.

Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, in the midst of that uproar, touched with his finger the slit in the murrey taffeta lining of his riding-cloak, to assure himself that his letters were there; he had taken the precaution to remove them from his holster to his person, and he was not a cautious man.

New brooms sweep clean: he had that morning, after five weeks' care and contradiction, been admitted into the King's Guards, one harry-noble, as we say, being left in his slop-pouch.

He cried above the din:

‘A stoup of your spiciest canaries, mine host! Who's for drinking with me the King's health? Ah, little wench—’

He touched Bessie Ford under the chin.

Very singular, certainly, is the secrecy of the Heart Between these two — little Bess and big Fitz — there subsisted some natural affinity, some mutualness of Terror and Longing, Hope and Love, indescribably vague, yet deep, deep, real as Life and Death — perhaps the affinity between two Valours. Yet if such was suspected by either, it was very dimly, and by Bessie; certainly not yet by Fitz.

Sometimes, bearing the tankards, she would giggle clandestinely at his jokes and quips; and he would throw his head back and look at her, smiling lordly approval of her appreciation.

‘He is a one...’ she would say to herself.

‘But the King's health?’ cried a mercer of London Bridge. ‘Adding two and two to make four, one would say that Master Fitzgerald has e'en won his entry into the King's service at the last.’

‘Uds daggers, my masters, the King has e'en won his entry into the service of Master Fitzgerald, an that's what you would say!’

So said Fitzgerald, and the laugh rang high. Now all were happy, having in their midst a tongue that bred merriment; and the tongue itself was happy, having before it a pot of mulled sack, sunlight-coloured, placed there by silent, assiduous Bessie Ford.

As Fitzgerald poured down his first draught, a hand fell upon his shoulder, and a voice said in the lower tone of friendship:

‘What, Fitz—’

‘What, Mac, my good friend and ingie! Beshrew my heart, but I saw thee not before.’

‘Is it so with thee? Is it true?’

‘About the King? Ay, true as a cup of clary is bright.’

‘Fitz, I congratulate thee from my heart.’

‘Congratulate the King, Mac.’

‘Both. Fitz. But tell me the manner o’t, lad. How did the King take to an unthrift and scant-o’-grace like thyself?’

Their voices were now higher raised. From the tables over the redstone floor, from the black-oak corners, gathered the revellers, pewter flagons and tankards in hand. As for Bessie Ford and the tapster, they plied busily between spigot and tables, and every faucet of the sack-butts flowed. Master Somers, mine host, a heavy old widower, lolled drinking muscadine at a table with his guests.

‘Well, it was on this wise,’ said Garrett Oge Fitzgerald. ‘For four weeks, as you wot, I have been loitering at the levée-time in the antechamber at Westminster; but never a chance had poor Fitz in the busy going-and-coming, and that shoulder-rubbing of great dukes, and Corinthians, and gallants. Oh, ’tis a brave show there o’ mornings, my masters — ambassadors, princes, courtiers, Frenchman and Spaniard, doublets pinked with Venice gold, and inlaid foils that water a fighting-man’s mouth. And says Fitz to himself, “How through all this bedizenment shall a poor soldier of fortune arrive at the King’s eyes to show his proportions?” For it was even the King himself, I deemed, that must needs see a man like me, and no linsey-wolsey captain of the service. So I dallied from day to day, till yester morning a great lord with lackeys and much ado comes sauntering through, and what name should I hear announced but my very own—” Garrett Oge Fitzgerald.” It was my great-uncle, the Deputy, whom, God wot, I never saw afore. If now, I thought, I can get that name sent in on my own count, and so slip in to the King, all’s well. So next morning, with a high head, I gave that name to a myrmidon. He eyed my apparel, but said never a word from his scorning lips, nor did he cry me out, while many another came and went. So I, at the last, was slouching down the great staircase, when into the courtyard came a lady. She was unattended, her face had an aspect forlorn, and she was all in robes of black. I was not such a chuff as not to divine in her the Queen, and she had no sooner put brodequin from the coach than I was there to her assisting. She drew from me somewhat. “Would you see the King, madam?” said I. “Yes; and who are you, sir?” says she. “Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, madam,” said I. She bowed and smiled, leaned on my arm, and in two minutes the Queen Katherine and Oge Fitzgerald were cried together. The King was walking to and fro, hands behind, and on his brow sat thought. He turned and saw us, and “Ha, coz!” cries he, “how goes the morning with you? But this is strange companionship — you and my Lord Fitzgerald — Ha, sirrah! who the pestilence art thou?”— “Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, sire,” said I reproachfully. Gallant he is, the King, when he frowns and puts on kingly anger, tall and massive, cocking one well-turned leg afore, with a face large and strong, not unlike mine own, my masters, and a way of twisting his lips aside and gnawing the pout at a corner. Just so he contemplated me, now gnawing his wry-pushed lips, now drawing in a moustache-end with his tongue to gnaw, meditating upon me, angry; and very chill and threatening is the regard of his eyes, and severe, and hard to bear without a pallor, my masters all. And he says, “So, cullion,” says he, “thou wouldst mock at me, then?”

“Far be that from me, sire.”

“What is thy name?”

“Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, sire.”

“Ha! again thou liest.”

“It is you, rather, sire, for that is even my name.”

“Hi, there, my Guards!” cries the King; “thy neck for this, caitiff!” Before I was fluttery, but now cool as a gaze-hound’s nose at the near bracing danger. Three minions ran with drawn swords, but I spoke: “Your Majesty is really astray, for that is my name in baptism. ’Tis true I bear a bar-sinister on my coat, and ’tis true the Lord of Kildare claims my identical name, but without my approbation or consent. The Queen here will bear me out: she straightway scented me real and only Fitzgerald, sire.” I had no sooner said, than back went the King’s head in a shout of sudden laughter. The Queen, methinks, is no longer favourite there, and her foreign mistakes and ineptitudes become food for scornful mirth. But for me, I was saved, and—” Unhand him, knaves,” says the King; and to me: “What is thy true name, sirrah?”

“Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, sire.”

“Thou hast served in the wars, methinks?”

“In the Low Countries, sire, and in Ireland.”

“Art thou leal and trusty?”— “Try me, sire!”— “Thou deservest for thy audacity either to taste the Tyburn tippet, or to enter the King’s own service: what think’st thou?”

“I seem like to do both, sire, taking the least exalted first.”

“Thou appearest Kildare to thy tongue’s-tip, villain. Send me thy name in an hour.” And so, my masters, was it that I come to have in my cloak here two letters — one to my Lord Wolsey, and one to the Tower — letters of high and solemn import, writ by the King’s own hand. Already he hath in Fitz the confidence of old friendship. A right royal personage is he — do me right, my masters all — and here's to him!

‘But thy tongue, thy tongue, Fitz, runs too furiously fast,’ whispered his friend Macdonald. ‘Gad-a-mercy, man! hast thou no inkling of prudence?’

CHAPTER IV

THE FATAL ACT

‘GREAT GOD! WHAT perils do environ The man who meddles with cold iron!’

‘HUDIBRAS.’

‘Te, soror, nunquam volo esse securam, sed timere, semperque tuam fragilitatem habere suspectant.’ — ST. AUGUSTINE.

AT this reproof Fitz looked up in demure surprise. He had the massive, staid face of a statesman, and the simple heart of a child. He was a man more loved than respected, Fitz, till his white forehead flushed, and he chanced to draw his sword: and then he was much more respected than loved.

As for Macdonald, he was a fellow built on a smaller scale, but well-knit, agile, yet weighty-looking. Between the parting of his moustache one saw how the upper lip pressed like strength itself upon the lower, and the bright brown eyes glinted shrewd and hard as cold steel beneath the lowered lids.

He was somewhat of a dandy, with an eye to his apparel, for his doublet was laid down with two galoon laces, and on his head was a slouch hat with drooping feather, and in his Turkey-leather sword-belt a poniard of Milan arabesque-work: a fellow neat, and wary, and canny, a Scot, having a care for his life. He had fought both at Guinegate and Flodden, and was a Wolsey-man.

His eyes saw many things, and as Fitz spoke about the King's letters, he had seen the start and the slow advance toward the table of a man who, he was sure, was a foreigner — a tall man, muffled in a black riding-cloak, wearing the plumed bonnet of a hidalgo. He was all in black and silver — a silver buckle, a silver brooch, a silver hilt to his rapier — and what one saw of his regular-featured face proved him Spanish.

'Tush, comrade!' said Fitz to Mac; 'care killed a cat. The King knows to whom he trusts his letters. I say, my masters, 'tis whispered among the Guards that the King is in love again.'

'By my sooth!' said a gruff botcher from the Cheap, 'Tis the forty-fifth tale of kingly love within a month!'

'Ay,' answered Fitz, 'a damsel and a half a day.'

'And who is the new Lindabrides?'

'A certain Mistress Anne Boleyn.'

'Gramercy! that is an oldish tale enough,' observed mine host.

'He hath fallen in love with her afresh, forgetting that he had done it afore,' said Fitz: 'I heard the news as new.'

'New, quotha!' cried a tipsy reeve of the Abbot of Paul's, 'why, the fame of her has long been everywhere: she's the cream of dainty moppets.'

'Tush!' cried Fitz.

'You gainsay me? Why, is she not known for the prettiest piece of femaledom in all the breadth of England?'

'Tush!' said Fitz 'By the Mass, here's a paltering fellow talks like a new-returned from the Spanish Indies! He knows not the fame of Mistress Anne!' said a King's Pursuivant, loitering here with a King's-warrant in his doublet-breast.

‘In faith, I’d give not one peeled codling for your Mistress Annes!’ said Fitz, and looked round challengingly.

‘Come, Fitz,’ said Macdonald, with laughter in his eyes, ‘Tis clear thou hast been following thy master’s ensample, and hast been caught by one fairer, for thou hast a beam of prejudgment in thine eye. The Lady Anne is indeed fair, for I have seen her.’

‘Tush, tush,’ said Fitz.

The eyes of Fitz were directed upward upon one black ceiling-joist, and they were full of tasty musings, and on his lips was the smile of pleased remembrance. Looking up, he uttered this judgment slowly, with calm authority:

‘The King never, never saw a lovely wench.’

As he said it, a mug, dropped by Bessie Ford, smashed upon the tiles, spilling costly wine of Alicant.

‘Come, my masters, draw near — Master Fitzgerald hath e’en an adventure upon his tongue!’ cried the mercer.

‘Provided it concerns not any of the great folk, Fitz,’ whispered Macdonald warningly.

Fitz suddenly took his eyes from the ceiling, and, smiting the table, cried:

‘She is the rarest, the gloriousest, the gaudiest little perroquet that ever flashed from bough to bough!’

‘Who, then?’

‘The damsel which is mine.’

‘What, already?’

‘She will be to-morrow at this time.’

‘And her name?’

‘Her name I tell not. Bah! why not? — her name is Laura, an you would wot.’

‘Laura — what?’

‘That I wot not.’

‘And you rencountered her — where?’

‘In the Whitefriars — in the hiddenest nook—’

‘When, though?’

‘Three days since.’

‘And you had speech with her?’

‘Troth, yes. Oh; ’tis the shrewdest minx! coy, yet sly, showing impudent blushes, pouting compliances. She would speak, and yet would not; she would say “No,” and mean “Yes.” Oh, ’tis the naughtiest bit of purity!’

The poor little chamberlain of the Bell Inn tripped over someone’s foot, and sent flying a stoup of good Sheres wine; it was the second bit of broken crockery within two minutes.

‘Why, Bessie lass,’ said old Somers, now fuddled, ‘what make you there?’

The little face was white; a string of rowan-tree berries about her low-clad neck wavered with strong agitation. She hid away her face.

‘But what is thy plan, Fitz?’ said Macdonald.

‘Wilt thou — ?’

‘I never make a plan, Mac, till I am in the carrying out thereof.’

‘But you swim in the tide of luck, my master,’ said the crafty-eyed Pursuivant, pushing out his ivory wedge-face; ‘for you may e’en present this beauty before the King’s Majesty. Nay, frown not like the devil o’erlooking Lincoln Town—’

‘The first duty of a King’s Guard is to guard the King,’ answered Fitz—’ and from presumptuous follies above all. Count upon Fitz to do his devoirs there, my master.’

‘But the manner of thy courting, Fitz?’ said Mac, feasting upon his friend’s free - tongued simplicity; ‘tell, tell.’

‘Oh, ’twas in an alley: there she tripped, stepping with shown instep and fragile ankle. And “Mamsel,” ko I, “sure for a lock of that soft and black-brown hair I would carry you all your journey in my arms.” And she: “’Tis useless, sir, to waste your timè, for I have a gallant whom I love, and a sister whom I fear.”

“Uds daggers, mamsel,” I riposted, “that knot were easy cut: for the gallant whom you love shall wed the sister whom you fear (or I will wed his costard to my poniard), and you, well rid of both, shall wed with me.” She laughed, and, “Our Saviour! ’tis a witty solution, sir,” ko she, “and a most hasty proposition.”

“Mamsel, I am a Fitzgerald of Kildare.”

“I suppose ’tis a noble family, sir, with mansions and demesnes?”

“It is, mamsel.”

“Still, ’tis useless: I know one which, though poor, I prefer to all your quarterings — though he be not so great and manful, I avouch.”

“Do you affect a great and manful man, mamsel?”

“Well, sir, young maidens are pleased by such men.”

“Then, here is one for you, mamsel — the very thing — this sounding chest, this fair brow, this sword, mamsel.”

“Our Saviour, sir!” ko she, with tittering, “you retail your points like a frippery-man: yet I say not ’tis unhandsomely done.”

“Thou art the choicest morsel, mamsel, that goes uncooked in Europe.”

“But you, sir, must needs munch other sweet-meats: for I am not for you.”

“By the Mass, the choicest morsel thou, the daintiest minx, the cosiest pig’s-eye—”

“Thou me not, prithee, sir, for I am another’s—” and she laughed the mockinigest mavis-laugh. “By blood and nails, thou shalt be mine, mamsel!”

“In faith, not by fair means, sir,” says she. “Then, by blood and nails, mamsel, by foul!”

“Our Saviour, sir, you fire quickly; I swear you frighten me!”

“Wilt thou say me a yea?”

“Faith, you make me laugh and cry together, sir. Only by force could I be won by you.”

“Where dost thou dwell?”

“That will I not declare, sir; ’tis true, I pass hereby each day about this hour.” I left her then, and tracked her to her domicile. And this was the manner of our first courting-time.’

‘But thy scheme, Fitz!’ said Macdonald; ‘wilt thou be using force, thou gamesome gibbet-carrion?’

‘Force, ay, and this very night.’

‘What! and whither wilt thou bear her?’

‘To an old grand-dame’s, where I have made terms in Billingsgate.’

‘But by the damsel’s will?’

‘Nay, but by force.’

‘Oh, thou merry gaol-crow, Fitz!’

‘Nay, ’tis honourable. Steal a broad-piece, and thou art felon; steal ten thousand, and thou art exchanger; steal that most precious, a woman, and thou art gallant.’

‘But how wilt set to work? — thou most frolic villain!’

‘I will set well to work; for I shall have drawn sword in hand.’

There was a square black-oak post, upon which for one moment Bessie Ford staggered and leant. But by a power of will which was hers, she kept from fainting.

‘A drawn sword, sir, say you?’ said a voice — the voice of the black-dressed stranger.

‘Ay, sir, I said that,’ said Fitz, looking round and up.

‘Bah! your whole tale of the girl is a mere currish fantasy of your invention,’ said the stranger.

Fitz’s little gray laughing eyes opened wide, looking about the room in amazement.

‘Uds daggers, my masters,’ he said, ‘here is a gentleman who gives the unprovoked lie to a Geraldine.’

Macdonald whispered low:

‘He seeks for his own ends to pick a quarrel with thee: answer him not, or fell him with thy fist.’

Fitz took no notice.

‘Say you that I lie, sir?’ he asked, turning in wonderment on his stool to face the stranger.

‘Yes. You lie.’

‘Crow aboo!’ cried Fitz, springing up, a brand of red on his forehead, his sword half drawn.

‘Fitz, Fitz,’ said Macdonald.

‘But surely the gentleman is not in his serious earnest?’ said Fitz; ‘are you in your serious earnest, my master?’

‘You lie.’

‘Then, by Christ’s wrath, I spatter your brains for it!’

Fitz’s quick blood grilled. He looked now a very noble species of giant, his big head thrown back, and his mantle hanging from a shoulder. But he said quietly enough:

‘Draw, sir.’

‘Hold!’ cried mine host, drunk now; ‘all combats in the back-court, my masters, I pray you.’

The stranger waved a courtly invitation toward the passage; and at once the whole roomful of fuddled men made in that direction. Fitzgerald, on the way, hurriedly undid his cloak to disencumber himself, and flung it casually upon a table. The King and his letters had clean vanished from that heated brain.

Through the passage they trooped — mine host, too, the tapster, the hostler — out into a wide court paved with dislocated flags, a well-and-bucket in a corner, some hens and a cock, some stables, and sweet water wimpling leisurely, like melted diamond, over the pantiles of the gutter. Here had been the last scene of many a man.

‘Ready, sir — draw!’

It was begun at once, without ceremony.

The foreigner had retained his mantle, and wrapped it thick round his left forearm as a shield. He was nearly as tall as Fitzgerald, though much more slenderly built. And from the very first passes it became clear that he was an antagonist of great skill.

Macdonald drew in his breath. He had an eye of clearest judgment: and Fitzgerald, he knew, had in him a quart of the Bell’s strongest canaries. But if Fitz fell, there would be a second trial of skill: Mac secretly examined his own edge.

Clash, clash, with a continual motion, to and fro, back and fore, at the lithe-sheering hips of the fighters. The revellers stood around, with breathless comments, eager peerings.

Always the stranger smiled. He parried Fitzgerald's strong strokes with a wrist of steel, and ever with the same precision. The face of Fitzgerald heated, and suddenly, at a quick foin made high up by the foreigner, down the left cheek of the Geraldine came winding a scarlet thread. Sure, Fitz was drunk.

'Steady, Fitz, steady...' whispered Macdonald.

But steadiness was soon no longer part of the game. Both men's mouths were open now. The combat began to stagger like epilepsy, hither and thither, within some four feet of area. The crowd opened wider, stooping forward, hands on knees, souls in eyes.

Fitzgerald had not got in a scratch. The fight, from moment to moment, became brutal. The Geraldine had met the Devil. In his surprise, his rage of incredulity, he grew crazy for blood, hacking with the fury of a man extinguishing a flame. The rapier of the stranger must have been tempered in Damascene forges to resist that operating, imperious blade; and his science was fine. Yet he, too, was amazed: never had he encountered wrath so shrewd and quick as the wrath before him now.

Wider the combat staggered. There was a rip of cloth, a spout of blood, wet red on the paving-tiles.

The stranger's rapier had entered the left upper arm of Fitzgerald and, with swift outward wheel, torn through the flesh; at the same time he staggered over a cocked-up tile-edge, and Fitzgerald's blade plunged into the mass of cloth round his hand, to come away with a long ripping noise of rent fabric, in time to strike into air the rapier making prone for his heart.

Chink, chink, they go afresh: but now the combat fills the yard, and the spectators are cringing against the wall, and on its top the hens and cock look on silent, with round, sage, sideward eye — alternately bent — as though, forsooth, the right may have seen wrong, and lo, one now must try with the left. Fitzgerald's redness has turned to mottle, and on both sides coolness is gone, and they rush round, stooping, with murderous stare, and an audible humph of their gasping bosoms. The sallow face of the foreigner is now a face of mere wild ecstasy. He darts anew upon Fitzgerald, and in a moment of opportunity hacks between neck and shoulder; Fitzgerald feints a hew at the head; up goes the parrying rapier; Fitzgerald makes the tierce thrust, and enters between the third and fourth rib; back comes a second time the wild rapier between neck and shoulder, and up flies the broadsword in a tardy attempt at parry; now the stranger has him: the broad breast is undefended; the stranger foins at quarte; the rapier is in prone career for Fitzgerald's heart; but he lurches backward — the rapier pricks his abdomen; and at that instant the flapping rags of the stranger's cloak are in his eyes. 'Hew, Fitz, hew!' hisses Macdonald. Fitz hews. His blade, feeble now, drops upon the stranger's skull. The rapier leaps far, with clattering fall; there is a thud, a head strikes the flags; Fitz falls upon the stranger, and immediately leaps up, and with wry mouth — laughs a little, awaked from a drunken nightmare.

But that poor heart in the dimness of the parlour yonder! It was worse with her than with the stranger lying in his blood.

She, a girl from the country — a simple wench — and what a thing was this which she was about to do!

The hand she held out fluttered like reeds; there was a panic stare in her eyes; her breath came raspingly, like the breath of Fitz in the court.

For her, a simple country-girl, fresh come to London, ignorant of the unguessably vast consequences of her act, it was an awful deed to do! — a thing more daring than the leap of horseman into some bottomless chasm.

But she did not hesitate at all She saw the fall of the stranger; she saw Fitzgerald stand, hale and hearty — she saw him laugh. He was the man who that night was to despoil her nest and ravish her life. She put out her hand.

Oh, Fitz would have quite other cares, altogether different sorts of occupation that night, than the abducting of innocent damsels! He would clean forget the very existence of Laura Ford!

Out went the little fluttered hand. That brow, with its clean, chaste curves of hair, was wrinkled with the horizontal lines of wide-eyed scare; her little nose was pinched; her little heart seemed beating itself to death. But never in the bosom of Cœur de Lion, or aggressive dragon-fly, beat one bolder, more audacious.

She did not hesitate at all. Her hand was in the cloak of Garrett Oge Fitzgerald. She glanced once crazily round the room: it was wholly deserted. She touched the letters, held them, drew them out.

Then she ran, hunted by terrors.

Here was the mortal act of her life.

CHAPTER V

THE ALCHYMIST

‘LANDS HE COULD measure, terms and tides presage.’
GOLDSMITH.

THEY came trooping back into the sombre, low parlour. Instantly, the duel ended, their wild interest died down into mere dead indifference. The stranger was left lying with upturned face.

‘Well, well,’ said the Pursuivant, fumbling at papers in his doublet-breast, ‘late I am this day. This comes of loitering and lingering. Yet one half-pottle-pot of bastard, mine host, and then away on the King’s business.’

‘What, so early gone, Master Pursuivant,’ said the mercer, ‘when good-fellowship only begins to warm? And whither away?’

‘A neat’s tongue, mine host, an you love me, shouted Fitzgerald, above the din of tongues, doing on his cloak, ‘and with it a warm culiss, or such a thing as a dish of spitchcocked eels.’

Mine host went hobbling with bustling cares, burdened with orders, somewhat sobered.

‘Where’s the lass? Where’s Bessie Ford, John?’ he went asking. ‘In faith, ’tis ever so — few hands to many needs. Is she above-stairs, then — ?’

“Tis the alchymist, Calvo, whose arrest I go to make,’ said the Pursuivant. ‘I should e’en now be at London Bridge with my warrant.’

The air was full of tongues. Cups left half-empty were being drained.

‘But the man is not deptif said the Cheap botcher.

“Tis pity he be left weltering like a stabbed ox without chirurgeon’s aid.’

‘But Calvo! What, the alchymist?’ cried the mercer. ‘Why, ’tis a name known over half England. And wherefore arrest him, prithee?’

‘Witchcraft, friend,’ answered the Pursuivant dryly. “Tis a deadly one, a dark and evil one, this Mauro Calvo. A man long suspected, and over him the King’s sword has hung this many a day. And to-day, by my sooth, it falls.’

‘Truly, I believe you,’ said a scrivener of the Jewry to the botcher; ‘the man needs chirurgeon’s aid. Hi, mine host! — the man is not dead that lies yonder.’

‘Softly, my masters,’ answered mine host; ‘each thing in his own time. Seen to he shall be, and by Master Bygood, of Bishop’s Gate, the druggist. For as fair a gentleman was he as ever spoke, and here hath lodged five nights, paying his shot like an earl — but each thing in his own time.’

‘Yet ’tis a strange happening, this warrant of arrestment,’ said the mercer, ‘for Signior Calvo is a fellow in high favour among the common folk o’ London, and hath been known to tell them things that came afterwards to pass like Holy Writ. Sure, ’tis a wight of strange foreknowledges and wisdoms, my master.’

“Tis even wherefore his skin shall burn. ’Tis an unclean beast, having conference with spirits of evil, a fellow which vanishes before your very eyes — pah! But three days shall see the faggots crackle round his members.’

‘But—’ said the mercer.

He got no further. A terrible outcry of alarm — a shout as of horror — came from the table where Fitzgerald had seated himself. He had touched the slit in his cloak, and he had made — a discovery.

‘By God’s death...!’

He drew in his breath. The first swift thought that flashed upon him was this: that he was even on his trial — that this was his first day in the King’s service — that he had yet been strangely trusted — that now he had been weighed in the balances and found most woefully wanting — that the letters were gone!

He stamped. He flushed with imperial rage. Then he sank to his seat, faint. All his left arm and shoulder was soaked with blood.

‘Fitz, Fitz, what hast thou?’ whispered Macdonald.

Fitzgerald pointed to his cloak. At his shout a hush had fallen upon the war of tongues. Macdonald looked round.

‘Who has left this room?’ he asked.

It was discovered that three of the revellers had gone away after the duel.

‘No man now shall depart till he has been searched,’ cried out Macdonald.

The news spread consternation. The landlord paled. Each man seemed to see bent upon himself the intolerable frown of King Harry for his mere presence at such a sacrilege.

All came forward readily, parading the innocent nooks of their apparel from ruff to hose. Fitz did not look. His head leant on his hand, and on his nose were the wrinkles of pain. Macdonald cried:

‘They have, then, been abstracted by one of those three, else by one of the inn-keeper’s myrmidons. ‘Sdeath, mine host, your house must even be searched.’

A movement was made toward the staircase behind the bar. But Macdonald returned, and whispered to Fitz where he sat:

‘Tut, man, mourn not like a nun in Holy Week. At what hour was the letter to be handed to my Lord Wolsey?’

‘Before Vespers.’

“Tis not now far from that. Here’s my counsel, Fitz: Leave the tracking of the letters to me; I wager odds that I recover them. But before then, my Lord Wolsey, expecting the letter, and not receiving, will send messengers to the King, or the King, for some cause, may send messengers to my lord, and so will thy case be declared, and all thy fat be on the fire. Now, thou knowest the little hedge-lane of yew and holly-bush that leads from the south postern of the Westminster Palace wall. Thereby must messengers both to and from the King pass, and ’tis my counsel that thither thou hie, and there take stand, with drawn sword defending from any soul to pass this way or that, if it be not over thy body. Quick, Fitz! and there await till I come.’

Macdonald had his hand on the shoulder of Fitzgerald, his face stooped to Fitzgerald’s; and the thing, being an affair of desperate action, pleased Fitz. He sprang, nodded to his friend, and with fresh energy swung toward the outer door. Macdonald heard the clattering hoofs go galloping into faintness and silence.

Then he rejoined the party of search. They were near the top of the stairs.

That little fluttering heart beat with a more poignant ecstasy. She heard them come. She stood listening in her own bed-chamber — the letters in her hand — her eyes wide.

It was certain that with such an army of searchers the house held no hiding-place. To tear the papers would mean discovery of the shreds, to burn them she had no fire. But even so, the thought of destroying the King’s letters never occurred to her: to that immensity of daring her mind did not rise; she was a simple country-girl, full of awe. The steps came nearer, hunting her down.

She fell to her knees, and, with eyes turned white to heaven, prayed to that Mother who was a Virgin.

But the steps had rounded the corner of the corridor which led to her chamber; they seemed to be making straight for her. Her forehead struck the floor, so low she doubled.

But she sprang, all wild and white, for the steps were very near. Apart from heaven, on earth there remained for her but one refuge now — the refuge of Mauro Calvo.

Mauro Calvo was a man who knew, in addition to other things, the Future; for this was revealed to him by the stars of night. To very many, for the sum of two groats, he had told the future of their lives; and to Bessie, who had quickly heard of him, he had twice told the future of Laura Ford's life.

One of Bessie's nightly tasks, as she lay pondering many things in her head upon her bed, was to harmonize those two futures which Mauro Calvo had said that Laura should live. Laura could not live both, yet, so strange is the mind, Bessie had not the least doubt of either.

Bessie believed that Mauro Calvo was the profoundest soul who ever deigned to walk this earth, and perhaps was not very far wrong. At all events, she had strong confidence in his wisdom and goodness.

And they were very good friends, she and Calvo. Calvo forgot in an hour many a face of his pilgrims: but he remembered the face of Bessie Ford.

Bessie did not know that the pile of faggots intended for Calvo's roasting was already dry, though Calvo himself, being a divining man, well knew it.

To him the thoughts of her panic turned. When the steps were nearly at her door, she slipped through another into a tiring-room, thence down a winding stair, and so to the front-door of a gable. And down the street she went running with hasting pattens, in that pretty hatless freedom usual then everywhere, and still in France.

London Bridge was near; it was a street broad at bottom, narrow above, where sombre old gables left an irregular line of sky. Here was market, and money-changer's, the mercer, and the stout, capped apple-woman. The bridge lay upon sixteen very large blocks of masonry, some of them hollow, with windows. Within one of them was a Chapel of St. Catherine; within another, the twelfth, nearer the Surrey side, was the laboratory and den of Mauro Calvo. At high-tide the surface of the river ran half a foot above his head.

Bessie Ford, still running, traversed three-fourths of the now-quiet bridge, and sped into a dark doorway on the west side. She ran down a passage. From above, through the still evening, there came to her with unreal vagueness the scolding of a housewife.

Four steep ladder-steps led her to some very narrow and high stone steps, the descent of which involved a series of downward jerks. At the bottom, where the darkness was absolute, she tapped at a locked door.

In a minute she was admitted into a narrow room, reeking of the brews which sent their chymic fume from a den still beyond.

An azure flame beneath an alembic on a tripod gave some light, which was hardly augmented by the yellowish blotch in a lanthorn of horn on a stand.

Before Bessie Ford stood Mauro Calvo. And he said:

‘Surely, now, it is you. Why, I knew you would be coming.’

CHAPTER VI

THE MESSENGER

‘IN THE DEEP dungeon of some Gothic dome Where night and desolation ever frown.’

BEATTIE.

CALVO poured a piggin of Malvoisy wine from an earthenware cruche, and held it to the lips of Bessie. She gulped a throatful. He seated her on a stone stool, held his ear a moment to the simmering alembic, and sat on a small table beside her.

He was a man of forty-five, but looked older. The underlids of his eyes were drawn down awry, the left showing a triangle of the red flesh, but the shapeless, goggle eyes were full of a sage calm. Whatever hair he had was concealed by a close-drawn skull-cap of black cloth, which, however, left visible a broad prominence of pallid brow. He was dressed in hopelessly begrimed black velvet, with pantofles.

‘But the letters you hold in your hand,’ he said—‘surely they are King’s letters!’

There was a shout and ado of some overboiling crucible in the eastern apartment, and Calvo rushed away. In a minute he was by her side again.

With heaving breath she told her awful tale — why she had stolen, why she had brought the letters to him to keep. Calvo heard with sideward head, one side of his face screwed up to listen. She ended with these words: ‘You told me — you told me — that she should be — married.’

‘Did I say that, now?’

‘Well, so she shall,’

‘But — when? I cannot wait, sir. Oh, I shall die if she be not married!’

‘As to when, now. The stars are not quite precise as to the when, you see.’

He spoke in a rather absent way. At that moment he was not thinking of Bessie Ford at all. He was thinking of himself. The profound man had an — idea. He was walking on the road to the stake. These King’s letters, if they contained secrets, would surely save him. And as he listened with absent air, he mused.

Not that Mauro Calvo feared the actual stake, or the King, or the Church, or the powers of the land. On his side was Nature and her secrets. He could escape. But the laboratory of a scientist is not made in a day, nor was it pleasant to be molested, and driven out, and hunted by the myrmidons of Power.

‘Never fear,’ he said, absently patting Bessie’s shoulder, ‘she shall be married; that is quite settled.’

‘But, Master Calvo, to-morrow — the next day — this man will outlive the loss of the letters, and return to thoughts of taking her off! I took the letters but as a temporary device. Oh, sir, I could not bear to live through another day—’

‘But I thought it was the King which you feared—’

‘But did you not promise me that the King should never, never see her — ?’

‘I think I did, I think I did. Oh, well, all will be right, never fear.’

‘But to-morrow, sir! if the man should re-think of her to-morrow?’

‘He will not.’

‘Oh, he may — he may.’

‘Never fear.’

‘I cannot bear it!’

‘Then, what would you have?’

‘Let her be married to-night — this self-same night!’

‘How! — to-night? That cannot be.’

She fell to her knees with clasped hands and pleading eyes, and, weeping, she said:

‘Help me! you can do whatever you will: pity a poor maiden in her sore tribulation, for that pity which is Above! You cannot say me nay — see, your hand is on my head, and your heart is most fatherly kind. Help me, sir! I have heard tell of such things — by a dispensation of the Abbot. Say that she shall be wedded this night!’

She was engaging the whole attention of Calvo now. His hand passed and repassed over the smooth glossy convex of her hair.

‘Well, well, weep no more. If I can — But to night, say you? Have you, then, a lover ready to which to wed her?’

‘Yes, sir — a student of goodly dispositions — a poor lad — but a husband none the less.’

‘Well, I will see to it. Have you any money?’

‘I have fifteen hoarded crowns,’

‘That is ample. I will disburse the fees, and you shall disdamage me after. I know a good frater of the Crouched Friars which pays me frequent visits. Trust me, he will do your affair. He shall be here with cross and book immediately after Compline, and ’tis your part to bring the maiden and her lover hither at that hour. So now, you see, you have not prayed the diabolist, Mauro Calvo, in vain.'

He looked momentary kindness, and again rushed to right some crisis of his brewing cauldrons. And she, on his return, put her lips to his hand with the fervour of a dévôte.

'Good father to me you are, sir! May the prayers of all the distressed return upon you with blessing!'

'Well, well. He touched her cheek, and 'Away now, away,' he whispered bustlingly.

He closed the door behind her. For a moment he stood near the light, the letters in his hand, hesitating. He looked aside, thinking. Then he smiled. With a bistoury he cut the silken thread of the letter to my Lord Wolsey.

He read it, and coolly he said:

'Just the very thing.'

He went at once to the stairs, toiled a little way up, and began to call, 'Tommy! Tommy!'

Above he occupied the topmost stage, where was his observatory and optic tube. Tommy was a child of the house and a quirister in St. Catherine's near. He was also a messenger pressed into the service of Calvo, his great reward being an occasional sight of the' simmering stews, of the entanglement of retorts and twisted tubes, of gaudy chromes, and clotted precipitates, and working menstrua, and hissing limbecs, and festering fermentations.

By the time Tommy appeared, breathless and wideeyed, Calvo had written a note. He said:

'Thou wilt take this note to Thames Street, Tommy, the number 12, and ask for Master Mark Bonner, into whose hands thou wilt deliver it.'

While Tommy was gone, the skirt of his buckram cassock, leather-belted, flying behind his legs, Calvo stood leaning sideways upon a shelf, inditing two letters, one to his friend, the frater, one to the King.

‘If the King’s most gracious majesty would deign to guarantee to his slave, Mauro Calvo, free immunity in the performance of his lawful occupations from the persecutions of the King’s myrmidons, then Mauro Calvo would undertake to keep privy in his own bosom certain momentous secrets written that morning by the King to my Lord Wolsey, secrets of which he, Mauro Calvo, by his science, had knowledge.’ So wrote Calvo.

But in so writing, though his reasoning was good, he hardly took into account the clearness of King Henry’s mind, or the fury of his rage, or the implacability of that will of steel.

Henry was a perfectly enlightened and materialistic person. To tell him that Calvo had discovered the secrets by his science, was an insult to that strong intelligence.

As Calvo finished the letter, Mark Bonner stood panting within the room. Here he had often stood before, drinking with greed from the lips of Calvo that for which he thirsted — Knowledge.

‘Thou knowest Brother Bruno of the Crouched Friars, I think, Mark?’ said Calvo.

‘Yes, worthy master.’

Mark had reason to know. Many a day he fed free at the Friary ‘frater’ when the wolf was at his entrails.

‘Then thou wilt bear this letter to him; with this broad-piece thou wilt buy a ring for a bride’s finger, which the good brother will marry here to-night, and with the other letter thou wilt then make with speed to the Westminster Palace, burrowing as near the King’s person as thou canst before delivery. ’Tis urgent, Mark, and I wish thee a soon return.’

Mark bowed, and was gone, both he and Calvo being ignorant of the fact that he had been sent to purchase his own wedding-ring; or that Garrett Oge Fitzgerald stood with drawn sword, three wounded men lying about him, in the path where Mark must needs pass.

At this time Bessie Ford was at Mark's lodging, waiting for him. Mark was from home that night.

She waited half an hour, walking, standing, muttering orisons, under the high projecting garret where Mark lodged. Stepping back, she could see far up his broad, low window-leaf, criss-crossed with leads, stand open, and hanging from the sill a trunk-hose, drying. She wrung her hands, mourning, 'Oh my! oh my!'

If things should go other than she willed that night, of all nights! If the Destiny which infects and shapes the lives of men were against her! and on that night! She tapped again, and left a message for Mark: he was to meet her beneath the river at Calvo's. And off she went, running. The night now had come.

If the wedding, after all, should lack a bridegroom...! That would be hard.

Her bosom strained with the stressful prayer of her lifted heart; on her lips was a constant mutter of prayer.

'Virgin,' she said, and again, 'Virgin.' Only a Heavenly Maid could comprehend the cry of her pure heart.

She had not yet seen Laura. On leaving Calvo, she had hurried back to the Bell, and in a few words had told mine host that she must even be absent for some hours that night — willy-nilly, she must. In her fear of all the world concerning Laura, she had not even acquainted the simple good man of her sister's presence in London. She distrusted his tongue among the gallants of the inn. Her outings o' nights, when she went to Laura, she explained in various ways, never, however, uttering direct falsehood.

From the Bell she had gone to Bonner's lodging; thence she hurried to the Whitefriars.

She ran up some low, broad stairs, with massive brown-oak banisters, to the first landing — to the second — to a half-open door: and she cried an 'Ah!' of joy. Laura was in her arms.

'Thou didst not expect me?'

'No.'

'Kiss me!'

Laura kissed her 'Again.'

Laura kissed her.

'Oh, harder 'n that — longer 'n that.'

Laura kissed her harder and longer, minutely obedient.

'I did not expect thee. This is not thy night....'

'No. Laura, thou wilt be married this very night.'

'In truth?'

'This night.'

'Whom to?'

'Oh, sweetard — art not very sweet? Dost love me, Laura? But what a query! Why, to Bonner, sure!' Laura clapped her hands a little. The prospect of marriage so near was agreeable — marriage with Mark Bonner above all.

'Art glad, Laura?'

'Oh, I like being married, I!'

She clapped her hands a little.

'But—' she said.

'Well, sweetard?'

'He has nothing.'

‘I know it. But he is learned: he will be a wise and worthy man, Laura. I predict it of him. Oh, thou must love him, love him always more than life itself!’

‘Oh, I love him, I. But he has not a noble to buy me a fore-part,’

‘Nay, but for the present he shall live with thee here; and what I earn will nourish you both.’

All this time it never occurred to Laura to question the cause of this sudden marriage. She simply acquiesced in a pleasant thing, confiding in her sister’s devices.

‘But — ah, Laura,’ said Bessie, ‘I have need to scold thee warmly, minx, for a thing. Dost talk with strangers? — nay, nay, I cannot scold thee. I have pined so to see thee! How much dost love thy Bess? Come, kiss me more, girl, girl, and tell it me in mine ear!’

Laura, in the act of kissing her, cried:

‘But — !’

‘Well, pig’s-eye?’

‘I saw him not one half-hour ago, and he said naught of this marriage.’

‘Who?’

‘Master Bonner,’

‘Oh!’ Bessie leapt up. In her lover-like preoccupation with Laura she had half - forgotten her quest of Bonner, as the mind in moments of awful stress is sometimes captured by trifles. ‘Oh, then, thou hast seen him? Methought perchance thou hadst. Faith, I was in so great scare, seeking him high and low.’

‘He is easy found,’ said Laura. ‘He was on his way to the King’s Palace with a missive, and stopped midway to have speech with me,’

‘Then I must even go thither — now. Perchance on the road I may meet him.’

‘Why, and I, too,’ said Laura.

‘Haste, then! All will yet be well.’

She lifted her eyes in a prayer of praise.

A minute or two afterwards the sisters were hurrying together westward through that lane in the fields which is now the Strand.

CHAPTER VII

HOW A WEDDING UNDER THE RIVER FELL OUT ILL

‘THEN SHALL THOSE creatures all forlorn Warie the hour that they were born.’

LINDSAY.

‘Il n’y a guère d’homme assez habile pour connaître tout le mal qu’il fait.’ — LA ROCHEFOUCAULD.

AT that precise moment Mark Bonner stood confronted with Garrett Oge Fitzgerald.

It was in the hedge-lane of yew and holly-bush leading from the south postern of the palace-wall.

Mark came whistling, his bonnet far back on his fall of golden ringlets. There was a moon. But he did not see the three wounded men in his path, though there, standing huge, he saw their wounder.

‘Hold!’ said Fitz. ‘What make you, sirrah?’

‘I am a messenger to the King,’ answered Mark.

‘From whom?’

‘I may not say.’

‘Then return to him that sent you, and say that Garrett Oge Fitzgerald bars your way.’

‘I may not pass?’

‘That may you not.’

‘Nay, but I must.’

‘Then pass.’

‘Sheathe first that ominous-looking sword.’

‘Nay, friend, I am in no humour for jests to-night, by my halidame. Go thy way in peace.’

‘Wherefore may one not pass?’

‘I will tell thee, lad. There is a danger that the King receive to-night unpleasant tidings. Now, I am a King’s Guard: and ’tis the first duty of a King’s Guard to guard the King — from unpleasant tidings, above all. So go thy way unpricked, lad.’

‘Then I will tell you from whom I have the letter.’

‘From whom?’

‘From Signior Mauro Calvo.’

‘Who’s he?’

‘The great chymist of London Bridge.’

‘Ay, I recollect. No, lad, no letters from any wizard-men to the King to-night.’

Mark was confounded. He could not rush upon a sword. He turned back upon his way, hesitatingly, uncertain what to do. Finally, he rested his foot upon a fence-bar, and leant upon the top, whistling, looking at the moon.

He heard near footsteps, turned, and saw Bessie and Laura Ford.

‘Ah, this is happy meeting!’ cried Bessie.

‘What make you here?’ asked Mark, astonished.

‘We shall be married this very night!’ blurted Laura, with one hand-clap.

‘Say you — ?’

Bessie took Mark aside, and explained how all was ready, and what her will was.

‘In Signior Calvo’s studio, say you?’ asked Mark.

‘Even there. Is he not as a father to me and mine?’

‘Then ’twas my own wedding-hoop I have purchased!’ cried Mark. ‘Oh, the abounding of my lucky star! I bless thee, sweet Bess, I thank thee from my heart!’

‘Then come, for the time is not far off. Hast thou delivered thy letter to the King?’

Bessie glanced timorously at that awful palace. Even its exterior was to her a terror.

‘Nay, I have not delivered it, inasmuch as a pestilent outrageous fellow stands yonder to prevent me with drawn sword.’

“Tis pity. Yet must thou come now. From whom was the letter?”

‘Even from Signior Calvo.’

‘Say’st thou — ? from him? Oh, ’tis most great pity thou shouldst return and not deliver his missive!’

To Bessie, in the poignant grip of her gratitude to Calvo, this seemed a monstrous indelicacy, to return to the enjoyment of the alchymist’s favours, leaving his will undone.

‘But why art thou debarred?’ she asked.

‘Faith, the knave is somewhat incoherent. He would guard the King from unpleasant tidings. He stands yonder at the turn of the hedge.’

‘But sure, in Master Calvo’s missive would be no unpleasant tidings; ’tis rather some request which he tenders,’ she said musingly. Then suddenly: ‘Come with me — for a woman’s son tongue may more persuade than a man's strut. And 'twere most great pity to return, having failed Master Calvo.'

She had wondrously little dread of cold steel: all her terrors being for another, and moral in their character.

They went forward, she and Mark before, Laura walking listlessly a little way behind, not knowing nor caring why she went. Mark flung back at her a 'Sweet!', and she smiled.

There, standing, was Fitzgerald. But Bessie was quite near to him before she recognised him. Suddenly she screamed. Fitz, hearing footsteps, had looked round, and recognised both Bessie and his sweetard, Laura. In an instant Bessie had turned, seized the hand of Laura, whispered an impassioned 'Run!', and was gone with her sister flying down the path. Fitz was after them.

He was a man whose mind could bear the stress of only one impulse at a time. While it lasted, he forgot all else.

The race was intense, though Laura was weakly and no runner, and Fitz's long legs were rather weary; but he meant to overtake them, and ran hard. On the whole, however, they distanced him at first. Behind all came Mark Bonner, running, and wondering why.

Suddenly the race ended. A man had rushed into the path from a by-way, and in his course collided heavily with Fitzgerald. They fell together. It was Fitz's friend, Macdonald, come to report the final failure of his search for the letters.

Mark Bonner, meanwhile, had stopped, and seeing the fall of Fitz, and that the two girls were now safe, took to his heels in the direction of the palace, and almost as soon as the two men were on their feet, had entered the postern.

'But is't thou?' said Macdonald. 'What cherry-pit is this thou playest?'

'Tis the little perroquet, of whom I told thee to-day, that I chase. She came strangely near me of her own will, and flies yonder with little Bessie of the Bell. Hast found the letters?'

'No, no. But Bessie of the Bell, sayest thou?'

'Ay.'

'Phew!' went Macdonald, pondering with eyes glinting close.

'What of her?' asked Fitz.

'Tis she hath the letters, sure, blockhead!' cried Macdonald.

'How makest thou that?'

'I think only of the fact that she is in visible friendship with the pretty moppet whom thou this day blurtedst thy will to steal. Tis clear enow: she hoped to do thee some injury for thy misbehaving to her friend. Never once did I suspect her. But now I recollect — I saw her not at all after the letters disappeared, though we searched the inn thorow. She must e'en have slipped away, bearing them somewhither. Quick, Fitz! we must after and track them.'

At once the two men took to running. The girls, by this time, thinking themselves out of harm, had fallen to a panting, rapid walk. Within ten minutes the men spied them afar; and they, too, slowed their pace, clinging to the shadows, wary of their footfalls, tracking the girls at a distance of some forty yards.

On by the orchard-wall of Essex House, crowded with blooming espaliers, and a ghostly whiteness of blossomy fragrance, and on by the shafted-windows and oriels of the Knights Templars, through the desert loneliness of black tree-shadow, and broad, white moonlight.

Suddenly Laura Ford thought that she would like to be married in a hat.

'Well, then, Laura, thou must e'en run fleetly to get it,' said Bessie, 'for the hour is near, by my credit. Heaven grant that Mark Bonner be not tardy...!’

And at once they doubled down a dark alley in the Whitefriars. To the men behind, this sudden run seemed precisely like purposed flight: and cried Macdonald:

‘They have spied us, and run, Fitz. After them, lad...!’

They, dropping caution, started the chase with loud footsteps; and at the same time Bessie Ford exclaimed:

‘Oh, my mother, we are still pursued!’

The girls redoubled speed, spurting like gaze-hounds. But Bessie’s wits did not forsake her: she knew that Fitzgerald knew the abode of Laura; to that abode, therefore, there must be no return now. Down another alley she darted, dragging panting Laura, and into the first open doorway. Here all was dark and still. They waited in a corner of the hall, hardly daring to breathe their laboured breaths. In a little while they heard the two men run past.

The men, missing the quarry, made for Laura’s lodging. They ran up the stairs, alarmed the household, demanded her room, and searched it. But by the time they had finished, Laura and Bessie were well on their way through Paul’s to London Bridge.

Fitz and Mac descended and stood in the alley. Whither now should they turn, what do?

‘Whither away now, Mac?’ asked Fitz.

“Tis a vile business, this,” said Mac, at a loss.

They hooked arms, and strolled listlessly down to the river’s bank, pondering on emptiness. To Inanity there is no solution, nor can the Void be added up.

Here they remained a long time, perhaps an hour, strolling to and fro, watching the darkly-bushed banks, and the broad play of the rippled water into which the moonshine beat and sweltered.

“’Tis a filthy business?” said Mac.

‘By now the King knows,’ said Fitz.

‘Most like.’

‘I knocked on the head three several messengers from my Lord Wolsey. There will be the very devil to answer for, Mac. Beside, there was a fourth —’

‘Who?’

‘A messenger from a wizard-man of London Bridge.’

‘Say you — ?’

‘But hold! why, this same boy was with the maidens!’

‘And this fellow who was with the maidens bore a message from Calvo?’

‘He did.’

‘Gadamercy, Fitz! why saidst thou not this before?’

‘How so?’

‘Uds daggers! ’tis clear that ’tis the wizard hath the letters! Know’st thou not this man? He is called Calvo, and not a wench but holds in reverence his dark powers. ’Tis to just such an one that the girl would have borne the letters for their keeping; and if his messenger was with her, s’death! ’tis not a long guess. Come, Fitz — to the wizard’s den, lad!’

They took to their heels eastward with new impulse.

Meanwhile, in the den beneath the river, Bessie Ford and Laura waited, and Brother Bruno and Mauro Calvo waited. All was ready, but a bridegroom lacked.

Had the Fates in whom she trusted not been against her, Bessie would ere now have seen her sister’s finger hooped, for the hour was well past, and she lifted her eyes, and her hands were damp in one intense, long clasp of fear, and Brother Bruno showed fervent impatience, and Mark Bonner did not come.

Calvo went about, decocting his brews, holding vials to the light, adjusting a still, smelling a fishy jelly, seeking ever to bind volatile Hermes, who would not be bound. And now he would tap Bessie Ford on the cheek, saying:

‘Never fear, never fear....’

‘Pray he come anon,’ said Brother Bruno. ‘Even a Crouched Friar cannot subsist without eating,’

He was a portly bonhomme, Brother Bruno, with an asthmatic throat-groan, and a depth of abdomen equal to his breadth of shoulder. He drained at a gulp a piggin of Calvo’s wine, and sat his broad overlapping bulk on a stool with short-winded sigh. The long cross of his order heaved in spasms on his chest. Bessie Ford noted the signs of his growing unrest with a wan agony.

‘Oh, Something is against me, sure!’ she muttered.

Calvo expounded a scientific theory to Bruno, who did not care, holding a test-tube and tiny balance before the friar’s eyes.

Laura noticed her sister’s careworn face, and leaned, and said:

‘Don’t fret! he will come...

It was really she that held Brother Bruno. His eyes fed upon her. Here was the gayest flash of womanhood those epicure looks had yet blinked at.

‘And he should be the happiest groom, too, in the King’s realm — he should, yes,’ he said. ‘Wherefore comes not the mumping knave?’

Would he never, never come? A slow hour drawled away.

Bruno rose to go.

Mark, meanwhile, was coming, swiftly, on horseback; and with him, swiftly, on horseback, was coming King Henry the Eighth.

Mark had sent in his letter to the King after half-an-hour's waiting in an ante-chamber; and as soon as ever Henry read the words, he ordered the messenger to be detained.

King Henry at this time was in the first fulness of his vigour; the blood ran red in his veins; and never was a King more vividly a Man.

He had the power of deliberation in the midst of his most arrogant passions. The first thing he saw on reading Calvo's letter was that Calvo had his letter to Wolsey, and had read it. That letter, then, lay open: and it contained secrets which, for a large part of his kingdom, he would not have another eye peruse. Like lightning, he resolved that he himself, and no other, must recover that open letter; also, that the eye which had read it must never see another sunrise.

All the time he thought thus coolly, his face was the very expression of royal rage.

He had expected some despatches from Wolsey in answer to his own, and understood now why they had not come. He remembered, too, the messenger he had employed — the newly-tried Kildare fellow. This gibbet-crow, then, had proved miscreant...

The King sat again at his escritoire, and took up some paper-of-state, to finish its perusal; but as he read, he cast it down, and smote with his fist, crying:

‘Well, by the Splendour of God...!’

He went stalking to and fro in the chamber, stretching his sculptured, close-clad legs.

‘Tell three Guards to await me in the palace-court with two saddle-horses,’ he said to a gentleman-in-waiting.

He resumed his striding. He tossed up a breath of bitter laughter on the words:

‘By the Splendour of God...!’

In about ten minutes he reappeared from a withdrawing-room, bonneted and muffled in a cloak. In the anteroom he cast a casual eye upon Mark Bonner as he passed, and said:

‘Lead the way to this Calvo.’

Mark was trembling like aspen.

The cavalcade set off, with a lanthorn. Mark led. They went galloping, the Guards behind. In fifteen minutes King Henry was jerking down the steep stone steps of Mauro Calvo’s dark den.

The door was half-open. It was pulled back. Laura and Bessie Ford leapt up, expecting Mark. Bruno was just about to go.

For Mark they saw King Henry. The first face upon which the King’s eye rested was the face of Laura Ford.

He started: and immediately turned his look away. The light was very dim, and came only from the yellow blotch of the horn-lanthorn.

Mark and the Guards entered. The arms of Bessie Ford were trembling in visible up-and-down jerks like spasms. She knew the King, and had seen him look — and turn his look away.

As for Calvo, he stood erect, near the further door, eyeing the King with calm, goggle eyes. Here were two kings, and not one. Though Henry’s visit was sudden as thunder-bolt, and the reason was readable in his face, yet Calvo did not flinch.

Why did not the King speak? He had his outstretched finger covering the alchemist, and on his tongue were the words: ‘Arrest me that stinking rat!’, but instead, he turned his head, and said:

‘La, mamsels, what make you here...?’

His face wore a coarsely sheepish expression of some dawning, sly purpose.

Bessie Ford, cold with horror, had cringed and backed, as from some deadly snake, toward the further end, instinctively near to the protection of Calvo, drawing her sister with her.

At that moment, Fitzgerald and Macdonald came bounding into the room and saw — the King! Fitz hung his head, as the King's hard eyes rested a moment upon him.

Again the King's finger went out, and this time he said:

‘Seize me that lousy stinkard!’

Even at that moment of his peril Mauro Calvo's eyes rested upon the face of Bessie Ford, and saw its anguish. And, even at that moment, he had room in his brain to pity her. He remembered that the thing which she feared had come upon her.

Suddenly, as the Guards moved to seize him, the room was in nether darkness. At a mere touch of his finger the lanthorn had gone out.

A dagger now at his heart would not have surprised King Harry.

‘Quick — light...!’ he cried.

The Guard who had carried a lanthorn had deposited it on a step outside, where he had stood to light down the King. He rushed out, and perhaps within a minute after the darkness there was again light.

But where was Mauro Calvo? He was gone. And where were Bessie and Laura Ford? They were gone, too.

The men rushed into the inner room. They ransacked it; in rushing search they tapped the walls; they looked toward the ceiling; they looked at the floor. The wizard had vanished on the devil's wing; the girls had thinned to air.

Harry wry-pushed his lips and gnawed the pout at a corner, meditating with scowling brow. He took in with his tongue-tip his moustache end, to gnaw.

His first words were a surprise: they showed that the centre-of-gravity of his interest had changed.

He said to Mark Bonner, speaking very low:

‘Knowest thou that maiden?’

‘Which, sire?’ faltered Mark.

‘The taller.’

‘Yes, sire.’

‘What is thy name?’

‘Mark Bonner, sire.’

‘Find her, and tell me where, and I will make of thee what thou wilt.’

He turned to Fitzgerald:

‘Well, villain — my letters!’

Fitzgerald said:

‘I deserve to be hanged, sire.’

The King lowered his voice:

‘Sawest thou that maiden even now?’

‘Yes, sire.’

‘Art thou truly a shrewd fellow?’

‘I believe it, sire.’

‘Then prove it Find her, and thou hast my favour. What is thy name?’

‘Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, sire.’

‘I remember. An thou hast need of a full purse, bear this ring to my Chamberlain.’

He turned to Macdonald:

‘Fellow, thou art in my Lord Wolsey’s service, I see.’

‘I am, sire.’

‘And a comrade of this knave here?’

‘

‘Yes, sire.’

‘I know thy face. What is thy name?’

‘James Craigie Macdonald, sire.’

‘A Scot?’

‘Yes, sire,’

‘Then a shrewd fellow, I warrant,’

‘It is like, sire,’

The King’s voice dropped:

‘Sawest thou that maiden even now?’

‘Yes, sire.’

‘Tell my Lord Wolsey that the King takes thee henceforth into his service. Find her, knave, through whatever difficulty, and thou reap’st a fair harvest. Go first to my Chamberlain with Fitzgerald and Bonner, and have thy purse well filled. But find her — fail me not an thou lovest life.’

‘I will do what trying can, sire.’

‘And thou?’ he said to Fitzgerald.

‘Why truly, sire.’

‘And thou?’

He turned to Bonner.

Bonner did not answer, though he felt himself, willynilly, one of the League formed by the King.

But the King did not notice his silence, and at once went fumbling from the room.

CHAPTER VIII

THE FUGITIVES

‘FREEDOM ALL SOLACE to man gives:

He lives at ease that freely lives,

And should think freedom more to prize

Than all the gold in world that is.’

BARBOUR.

WE have said of Bessie Ford that she was more important than the Battle of the Spurs; also that she was like a pebble dropped into water, round which float out and widen slow circles: only, in her case, instead of the circles fading as they widened, they still gathered depth and height — they filled a sea — till at the horizon they rolled away in sombre billows, mountain-high.

From her partly sprang that Reformation which shook the world.

Let us follow, circle by circle, the widening reach of her life, and watch its culmination. Of this she is worthy: for really heroic was the Virtue of the girl, and great her passionate unselfishness, and her strong patience, and her pious valour.

When Mauro Calvo vanished from King Harry, as it were on the wing of Sathanas, taking with him Bessie and Laura, in reality, of course, Satan had nothing to do with that matter. The escape was effected in the darkness through a hole which did not at all seem to be there. On one side, the wall slanted inward toward the roof, and in this wall was a circular window near the bottom, shut with a slab of stonework. The inner surface of this slab was coated with cobalt, and touched a ledge in the wall, coated with loadstone, then called 'Lydian-stone'; the slab was thus kept in place by magnetic force, and it was only necessary to present an artificial magnet to its upper edge to cause it to fall by its own weight upon the palm. On its hidden surface was a handle, and Calvo had no sooner whispered Bessie and Laura, and pushed them through, than, himself following with a bag, he replaced the slab with perfect noiselessness, and left the wall impenetrable.

The fugitives groped their way up some steps in the thickness of the wall. At the top was a similar window, opening inwards, and before the window a little boat, lolling in the thick shadow of London Bridge, fastened to a staple.

They hurried in. Calvo pushed off, and plied an oar.

In the middle of the river he stopped, and looked up at a black sky, crowded with stars. He thought of his optic tube, quite lost now to him, and was pettish.

'Well, now, you see what you have brought me to,' he said.

Bessie Ford's hands were clasped in a passion of gratitude.

'Sure, my good father, may the good God—' she whispered.

'Yes, yes: but you see what you have brought me to now, don't you?' he said.

In reality, of course, Bessie had not brought him to anything. This sudden separation from his retorts, and alcahests, and alchemies had been occasioned by his own letter to Henry; and even before that letter, as he knew, his doom had been settled. But upon poor Bess he poured the blame.

Laura leant her lovely forehead upon Bessie's shoulder, which trembled. Calvo, looking up, observed old Aldebaran and Bootes, and the drifting planets.

‘Mumping chuff, that King!’ he said. ‘What, i’ God’s name, to do now?’

There was silence.

‘Sure, Master Calvo,’ suggested Bessie, ‘my uncle of the Bell would not be slow to give hiding to so good a friend to me as you.’

‘The Bell, is it? Are you going back to the Bell?’

‘Why, yes, sir, as I suppose.’

‘Very well. Go your own way, go your own way. I have nothing to do with you, you know — nothing at all — you are to remember that, prithee. But did you see that chuff of a King look at your sister?’

‘Alas, Master Calvo, yes.’

‘And did you understand the full meaning of that look?’

‘Alas, alas, yes, sir.’

‘Well, then, take my word for it: before morning he’ll have all London searched to find her.’

‘Oh, holy Mother!’

‘Go to the Bell, if you like, and take her with you. That will be the first place his paltering priors will hie to, be sure. But ’tis no affair of mine, you understand. As for me, ere morning I shall be far enow from London.’

‘Then — then shall I be left fatherless in good sooth, my master!’

‘Well, well, don’t start, don’t start crying.’

‘You foretold me, sir, that the King should never, never see her!’

‘Did I say that, now? Well, he has seen her, you see. The stars mean not always what they say, young woman. But never mind — I can’t abye the crying, you know — we shall see, we shall see.’

He patted her head.

There was silence.

‘Do you mean that you will be taking us with you into the country, sir?’
Bessie asked with timid voice.

‘What! encumber myself with two young women — perfect strangers to me — in that way?’

‘By my credit, no, that in truth would be asking a world too much, Master Calvo.’

‘It would, it would. Gramercy! I am not your father, I suppose, hey? And I without a groat to buy myself a platter of firmity withal! No, no, no — what are you talking about? You go your way, and I go mine. Only, whatever you do, don’t cry, don’t cry.’

Listlessly he patted her head, his goggle, misshapen eyes wandering over the sown and straying firmament.

Laura lifted her fatally-fair face to make an observation.

‘I don’t like the country, I,’ she pouted.

‘Why, Laura — sh-sh-h, dear,’ whispered Bessie.

‘Hullo! here’s another of them,’ said Mauro Calvo. ‘What! you like not the country, hey? Well, into the country you go, then. ’Tis you, with your face, that’s the cause of all. What! not like what your sister wishes, hey? Into the country you go!’

Bessie’s heart bounded. By the side of Calvo she felt an arm of mighty protection underneath and about her. She divined continually that his heart was fatherly and his brain potent; and that both were hers.

She waited. He had taken the oar again, and was paddling toward the north bank, in the direction of the Old Swan steps.

Presently he spoke good words: he said:

‘Have you any money?’

‘Why, yes, Master Calvo; fifteen hoarded crowns in a coffer at the Bell.’

‘Very well. Go and get them, and make a bundle of them with some clothes. Take your sister with you, and get into the house secretly, letting nobody at all know that you are there. Give heed you be not followed in the streets now, and look out for me in an hour. I will give three whistles. I am going now to get horses for us.’

Bessie Ford whispered into Laura’s ear:

‘Isn’t he good,’

The boat’s prow touched the green old slime of the steps. The sisters went running, hand in hand, northward. Calvo glided into darkness still further eastward in the skiff, past Botolph’s Wharf toward Billingsgate.

CHAPTER IX

THE SPANIARD

‘AND UP AND down they pace with frantic air,
And scorn a comforter, and will despair.’

CRABBE.

LONDON now lay well asleep, and the watchman’s lanthorn dawdled, blinking, through a glum, cemetery quietude. Only yonder, in Bridewell, was there sound and movement, where a soirée went forward in the palace of Queen Katherine; and also, close by, in the Bridewell Palace of my Lord Cardinal of York, was light, and some stir, and the smiting of a horse’s forefoot.

Eastward, in the yard of the Bell, were also four moving feet, Bessie’s and Laura’s. They descended, with stealthy trepidations, some steps to the cellar-door, of which Bessie, the inn’s chamberlain, kept the key in a hip-pouch. Through a trap-door they ascended to her room, and here, within five minutes, groping without sound, Bessie had busily pinned together a little bundle.

Laura sat on a bed on the floor, embracing her knees. Her left lid had a droop, making the lovely brown brightness of that eye smaller than the lovely brown brightness of the right, and this droop gave to her beauty a certain melancholy, purely Spanish, when she held her head sideways in a brooding moment. So now she sat, woefully meditating.

There was yet an hour to wait for Mauro Calvo. Bessie sat by Laura with the bundle, and presently there was low speech.

‘Well, Laura girl, it has really come to that — the King has seen thee,’

‘Is it that we shall go back again into the country?’

‘Why, certes, as thou know’st. Do not fret now, nor be cruel.’

‘I like being in London, I.’

‘But thou wilt like the country also, sweet — Be sweet and good, now — oh do! Shall I not be with thee always and always? — and Master Calvo, also?’

‘What, that old lobcock—’

‘Laura, sh-h-h! Oh, Laura!’

‘But is it that I shall not be married any more with Mark Bonner?’

‘Why, yes, of course, of course, if the good God shall be our friend. But not now! That King, Laura....’

Laura’s hands met gaily in a single silent clap.

‘I saw him looking at me!’

‘Laura, thou didst?’

‘He is very big and handsome, the King.’

‘I hate him! Oh, I hate him, hate him!’

‘He had five big rings on his left hand, and round his neck was a baldrick thick with balasses.’

‘But that look, Laura! Didst thou see it? Oh, there was a world of evil in that look! There was no good in that look of King Henry!’

‘They say he is a great one for pretty girls, the King.’

‘But let him beware of one pretty girl, Laura Ford! If that man meddles with thee, I will kill him. Thou hear’st me? I will kill him — God forgive me!’

‘Our Saviour! thou art not jealous of the King, Bess? Phew! I would not desert thee for him, not I! Phew! — thank you, sirs — not I!’

Bessie wrapped her in a passionate kiss. Never could she quite believe in her actual possession of so glorious a thing as Laura. Laura seemed ever on the point of taking everlasting flight from her arms, and every rare word of love uttered by her sister made her glow, and she treasured it long, like a rare coral, in her memory.

‘But,’ said Laura, ‘how came the King in that old hoball’s den?’

‘Oh, love, speak not so of Master Calvo, I prithee! he came, ’tis clear, to arrest Master Calvo. And I suspect ’twas because he knew, someways, that Master Calvo had the letters.’

‘Which letters, Bess?’

‘Why, the letters of the King which I took from Master Fitzgerald.’

‘Thou took’st some letters?’

‘Ah, thou dost not wot, I forgot. I will tell thee all.’

So she told how, to save Laura from the Irishman, she had stolen from his cloak the King’s letters, while he fought a wager of battle with the foreigner in the Bell’s yard; and how she had taken them to her good ingie, Mauro Calvo; and how, perhaps, as she divined, the King had heard of this, and come and seen — and seen —

And she had hardly finished the tale when both leapt to their feet with stifled cries. For there before them, holding a light, a bandage round his bruised skull, in a déshabille of camisole and hose, stood that very foreigner with whom Garrett Oge Fitzgerald had done battle.

He put finger on lips, and bowed low.

Almost before his eyes could rest upon the lovely face, Bessie Ford had cast over it a capote lying near, and pushed Laura toward the tapestry. And at once she stepped toward the stranger, puffed out his taper-light, and stood pale, in challenging expectancy before him.

‘Mamsel,’ said the gentleman, ‘such precautions, by my faith of a caballero, are unnecessary with me: from me you have nothing to fear.’

‘Then what make you here, sir?’ said Bessie.

‘I come to serve you.’

‘How wot you that we have need of service, sir?’

‘Troth, lady, I have been put to bed in the neighbouring chamber with my broken skull, and the door lies open. I avouch that I have harkened to the most of your palabras, having heard the name of the king oft repeated by you.’

‘The King, sir?’

‘Why, yes, the King. If now I say that the King clearly seems no friend to you, and if I add thereto that I, at this hour, am no friend to the King, then it ensues that you and I are friends,’

‘But, sir, I know you not—’

‘Nay, but if I tell you who I am, then will you know me better. I am the servant of the King of Spain, sent express to England to search into certain allegations respecting the King in relation to Queen Katherine, who happens to be aunt to my master, the King of Spain. This is the real truth, on my faith of a caballero; so now you see that I can be no great friend to the King of England, who is no great friend to you,’

‘But, sir—’

‘Nay, nay, lady, I tell you candidly that I have need of you. Again I vouch you assurance that no hurt is meant you; but the Infanta of Portugal and the daughter of Ferdinand is a personage of some importance, even in this currish land. And you hear? — that is one lock secured. I am going to leave the house, and you will wait here till I return. And now the other,’

The Spaniard, as he spoke, had rushed from one to the other of the two doors, locking them and seizing the keys. In a minute he was heard in the next room, fumbling, striking a light, hurrying on his clothes.

Bessie Ford's wild eyes wandered round the blank darkness for help or hope. And she wailed:

‘Oh, my mother, what is this? Master Calvo will come, and we locked in! Oh, sure, sure, Something is against me, sure—’

CHAPTER X

THE CIRCLES SPREAD

‘AH! THEN AND there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,’ BYRON.

‘He was a man of that magnanimity and prudence, understood so well which way men were to be wheedled or destroyed...’

MACHIAVELLI.

THE Spaniard cautiously butted his way toward a front gable-door, drew the bolts, and went running down the slumbering Cheap toward Bridewell.

At this time, King Henry, long since grown tired of Spanish Catalina, his dead brother’s wife and also his own, was playing the gallant with a maid-of-honour of Catalina’s Court, Anne Boleyn. The answer of Anne, who had guile and unbounded ambition, was a persistent: ‘No — I have a fancy for passing through the gate of Marriage.’ Whereupon King Henry, whose will, once roused and crossed, was like a West Indian cyclone, said to himself: ‘Anne I must have, since I will it: but how?’ Suddenly it occurred to him that the death of the male heirs borne him by Katherine was a dispensation of Heaven for his sin in marrying a brother’s wife — a superstition with which this potent mind so impressed the English people, that, in an amusing form, it remains part of our social life to this hour.

The word Divorce accordingly arose in the kingly brain. And on the subject of Divorce he began to write argumentative letters to my Lord Cardinal of York, receiving in reply argumentative letters from my Lord Cardinal on that very subject.

Unfortunately, a nephew of Katherine was the Emperor Charles V., of Spain and Austria, the most powerful of monarchs: and in close league with him was — the Pope.

Now, a whisper of how matters stood was in the air, and Katherine had written letters to Charles, her nephew, full of complaint and despondency: the King no longer cared for her, the King, the King, the King. So Charles had sent over, in reply, a secret agent, the Condé Christoval Alvarada d'Ossorio, a redoubtable fighter and courtier, instructed at all costs to gather furtive information.

The Condé Alvarada d'Ossorio, hearing Garrett Ogè Fitzgerald boast of secret letters of the King in his riding-cloak, fought him in the yard of the Bell, hoping for a glance of those letters, and had been knocked on the head.

In fact, one of those letters did relate to Queen Katherine, and the King's tender conscience, and the killing charms of Mistress Anne; and it contained that word Divorce. So that when Calvo wrote to Henry his veiled threat of publishing this letter, he knew well that were its contents just then to meet the eye of Charles, its effect would be an instant conflagration of war between Spain and England.

Alvarada, however, had been balked of a sight of it by the great sword of Garrett Oge. He lay bruised on his bed, when, lo, there had come voluntarily to his ears, from the next room, yet another tale of Henry's vagrant passions.

Down past the Cheap, past Paul's, he went running toward Bridewell.

Now, it happened that that night was the eve of the Vigil of St. John, on which day the standing and marching watches, levied from each ward, with mayor, sheriffs, and waytes of the City, filed past the King and Queen — a great day. And because this was the eve of that Vigil, the masque at the Bridewell Palace was nocturnal, in contrast with the mid-day functions then everywhere usual.

In a hall of the palace sat Queen Katherine on a daïs. The hall was gay with green birch, long fennel, orpin, St. John's wort, and white lily, in honour of the occasion. A band of minstrels in the great cave of an oriel played the tabouret, the virginals, the lute, the rebeck. And before the Queen a refulgent crowd of flushed beauties and priests and nobles danced that more stately gavotte, the pavan.

At that time the sun was hot, and the heart of Europe young. Women knew how to be born beautiful, and men admired them with gusto; also, everyone's tongue ran free, and extraordinary things were said.

But the Queen was a contrast to her surroundings. The Spanish melancholy was upon her. She had taken to wear the sad-coloured fabric called Lombardines; and though her placard was an embroidery of diamonds, and her vest brocaded gold, and her cloak a crimson velvet of Genoa, ermine-furred, yet she remained a figure of grief. Her ears continually awaited a sound which did not come. She expected the King.

After a long time he came. He had returned to the Westminster Palace after the fiasco in Calvo's den; and then, with a 'Pah!' of disgust, he remembered his Queen's masque.

He threw on a Russian masquerade, and as he stepped into a whirlcote, accompanied by the Earls of Essex and Fitzwater, he hissed to himself, 'Christ! 'tis a luscious bit...!'

Presently, Queen Katherine's straining ears heard a sennet of hautboys and trumpets, and the herald-cry:

'Henry, King of England and France, and of the provinces of Gascoigne, Guienne, Normandy, Anjou, Wales, and Ireland!'

The Queen arose, and stepped down. The dance ceased. In the lane that formed, two eyes — the eyes of Anne Boleyn — waited for a meaning glance. But no glance came. Henry walked through, a plump and stalwart figure. He took the Queen's hand, saying listlessly: 'Ah, lady mine.' He sat sideways by her, sticking out a straight left leg. And presently, with a slap of the hand, he cried: 'Dance it, then! dance it! Let the music knock it!', and sat listlessly again, his head on his hand.

At once the hall slid into rhythmic movement to the lilt of the lively canary-dance.

Once Anne Boleyn, tripping near the royal seat, armed her eyes with an under-glance of coquettish flame; but at that moment Harry was taking from a cup-bearer a goblet of gingered ypocras, and did not even glance at her. Her eyebrows lifted, and her flush turned to mottle.

And once again she came: she was a girl of bold heart, prompt to action, iron in purpose — qualities which she concealed under the levity and abandon of a Parisian dancing-girl. She was like a rock invisible under foam. Dancing slowly near, she said to her partner, loud enough for the King's ears:

'Sure, to-night the King is glum. Gogsnouns! he hath the sweating-sickness, sure.'

Henry, starting at the prick of the challenge, cried:

‘God! the Lady Anne is observant to-night. Sweating-sickness, quotha! Ha, mamsel, can you see beneath my clothes, then?’

‘Why, sure,’ said Anne, ‘a king is oft a naked thing to his female subjects’ eyes.’

A ribald jest leapt to the lips of Henry. But, instead, he waved her wearily off, saying:

‘Nay, nay — go to — none of thy banterings to-night, lady.’

Anne wheeled away with a raging heart. Those simple words were to her nothing less than a huge calamity, the shattering of a thousand dreams. Suddenly, at the brusque rebuff and dismissal, a whole fabric collapsed — all seemed lost. She went dancing down the tiled floor a crushed and wounded thing, with white face.

She was a girl of twenty, French in manners (having lived at the French Court as maid of Queen Claude), with a far out-push of kerchiefed bust; with solid embonpoint; with frizzy, straw-coloured hair; neither tall nor short; with a low, broad brow; and a delicate, freckled nose; and a broad mouth, having character in its pressure; and a brownish mole on the firm-fleshed short upper-lip.

As for Henry, the face of another filled his brain that night — one far lovelier than Anne, who, too, was lovely.

Five minutes after the King the Condé Alvarada d’Ossorio arrived at the palace, running. He handed to a gentleman yeoman an écrin containing half a ring; the yeoman, mounting the stairs, gave it to Anne; Anne, kneeling, presented it to Katherine.

On the face of Katherine was a broad smile: she had seen the King’s rebuff of Anne, and was happy.

She took the écrin without opening it, though Anne had already peeped into it, knew whence it came, and waited for a message of reply.

Katherine said:

‘Do not wait, lady.’

And she called another maid, in whom she had perfect confidence, and whispered:

‘In the salle d’attente below you will see a nobleman with the wyvern of Aragon in a silvern brooch. Bid him watch for the King’s departure, and then await me in the palace-orchard.’

Anne was now walking down the brown-oak hall, fierce at heart. Making his way through the crowd to meet her came Monsignor du Ballay, the French Ambassador, a portly, tall Churchman (Bishop of Bayonne), who could use his sword.

To no one in the world was the progress of Henry’s love-matter with Anne of greater interest than to him. His soul sweated elaborately to advance it. For Henry was the balancing element between Francis, the French king, and Charles, the Spanish: into whichever scale he threw his sword, that scale must sink. If Henry mortally offended Charles, France would be supreme. Hence Du Ballay loved Anne like the apple of his eye: and a minute since he had seen her coldly dismissed by Henry. He went urging his way towards her, meaning to drop a hint of what Anne well knew — that that rebuff was not without some specific cause; that Anne, for the love of Heaven, must keep both eyes open, nor harbour despair.

Anne, on her part, had every intention to keep both eyes open. Before Du Ballay could reach her, the trusted lady-of-honour whom Katherine had sent down to the Spaniard, passing close to Anne, whispered airily:

‘Guess you, child! — a secret meeting with the Condé d’Ossorio in the palace-orchard!’

Instantly Anne resolved to be there. She started straight for an opening in the storied arras; and after her Du Ballay urged his way.

She did not see him, but in a dim corridor, hearing following footsteps, and anxious at once to conceal herself in the orchard, she took to her light heels. Du Ballay, quickening his heavier pace, was only just in time to see her fly down an outer escalier of wood, bowered above in jasmine. Still eager to have speech with her, he, too, descended. But she was quite lost to him now. He went rummaging through the rank vegetation of the manor-close.

A few minutes later Harry rose brusquely from his seat, said bonsoir to the Queen, and stalked with discontented brow from the hall.

Immediately the Queen, too, rose and left it.

Now, the grounds of the Queen's Bridewell Palace abutted upon the grounds of the Bridewell Palace of my Lord Cardinal of York, nor was there any definite boundary between. Wolsey's was a magnificent place, once belonging to Henry's VII.'s Empson, and given to Wolsey by Harry. Its grounds contained twelve distinct gardens, and an orchard.

Toward ten that night Wolsey had come hither from Hampton. At the moment when Anne concealed herself in the Queen's orchard, he was walking in the spiced and blossomy air of his close, under the star-lit, black sky.

Clad, in Cardinal frock he walked — cassock, rochet, and mosette — both hands flat on his chest; stout as an old woman, with the quick-planted steps of a vexed old woman; on his fat-necked head sat the four-cornered baretta of red, and on his frowning red brow sat — Deliberation.

The Divorce I the Divorce! — that now constantly recurring word: this was the burden of his thoughts, of his angry musings.

He was dead against it. He saw that it must fatally offend Charles; and Charles was the Pope's friend, and Wolsey aimed at becoming, some day, Pope. At least, if Henry's will must have its way, if Spain must be against England, Wolsey decided that, as a set-off, France must be gained. He had therefore determined that the Duchesse d'Alençon, sister of Francis, must replace Katherine, since Katherine had to go. As for Anne Boleyn, he detested her, he detested her name. She was his obstacle, his danger, his evil Fate.

Suddenly, as he walked there in the garden, a fresh hope came voluntarily to him — a Hope in the person of Laura Ford.

An old pistoler came running from the mansion, in buckram cassock, with the words on his breath:

‘My Lord Cardinal—’

‘What is it?’ said Wolsey.

‘James Macdonald, one of your Grace’s ewerers, hath importuned me to crave speech of your Grace for him.’

‘Go away. You see I am meditating,’

‘He said ’twas urgent.’

‘Get you gone.’

‘Well, well—’

The old man turned to hobble off. Wolsey said:

‘Is it that young Scot which I sent with letters to Stirling Castle?’

‘The same, the same—’

‘Send him here.’

In three minutes James Craigie Macdonald, the good friend and ingler of Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, was bowing before Wolsey.

Wolsey continued his vexed old-womanish walk of short, decided steps, hands on chest, his stubby nose in air, and his bright eyes calm, deliberative; and Macdonald, like a towed boat, followed.

Their steps went toward the orchard, where hedges were high and the foliage thick.

After some time Wolsey said:

‘Well, what have you?’

At this time Du Ballay was still seeking for Anne, hopelessly now. His steps had unconsciously led him into the Cardinal’s grounds, and hearing near the voice of Wolsey, he stole closer, stooped with a grimace behind a shrubbery, and listened.

Luck is the finishing touch of the perfect diplomatist; to peep through the right hole in the nick of time — here is the art of Courts.

At that very moment Anne was straining her ears to catch the Spanish talk of Katherine and the Condé d’Ossorio not far off.

‘What have you?’ said Wolsey.

‘I came to acquaint you, sir — the King would have me leave your service straightway, and enter his,’ said Macdonald.

Wolsey stopped his walk, and examined Macdonald from head to foot.

‘So. What for, princex?’

‘He has imposed upon me a special devoir, sir,’

‘What devoir?’

‘Must I needs acquaint your lordship’s grace?’

‘Art not my sworn man? Give it me,’

Macdonald, eyeing the ground, waltzed his steel cap round his forefinger. He was now in armour.

‘Come, Scot, you keep me waiting. Give it me, man,’

‘An I enter the King’s service, I keep his secrets,’ said Macdonald boldly.

‘Palterer! a murrain on thy trifling! Come, sirrah, give it me, now — into my ear—’

‘Gogsnouns! I would liefer not, your Grace,’

But of the two Wolsey was the more cunning, and the less honest. He said:

‘Then, marry, thou wishest expressly to displease me? Dream’st thou that I do not already know, and do but try you? The matter relates to a wench,’

The guess that a secret of King Harry’s related to a wench was not a very far one; but its confirmation of Wolsey’s reputation for omniscience conquered Macdonald. He said:

‘In faith, my lord, it doth,’

‘What wench?’

‘Her name, I learn, is Laura Ford,’

‘When and where did the King see her?’

‘Even now, in the den of the alchymist — Calvo — under the river,’

‘So — so. He was there: in the den of the alchymist — Calvo — under the river. Yes, I knew — I knew. And there he saw her — and her name is Laura Ford. And thou, Scot — hast thou, too, seen her?’

‘I have, my lord,’

‘Is she — art thou a fellow which know’st a pretty wench when thou seest her?’

‘Marry, my lord, why, yes,’

‘Is she hitting? Doth she spank the eye?’

‘Bread and salt, my lord, she doth,’

‘She is spicy, eh? Thou hast seen her. She tickles the regard, eh, Scot? She’s a cockle, a solace, a peppermint — eh, fellow?’

‘Bread and salt, my lord, she is!’

‘Hast ever seen the Lady Anne Boleyn?’

‘Why, this thrice, my lord,’

‘Then tell me — reflect first and then answer me: wouldst thou liefer cuddle, varlet, the Lady Anne, or this Laura Ford?’

‘Why, Laura, my lord, twenty times o’er, since you ask me. I tell your Grace, ’tis the curiouset, the flashiest moppet I ever laid look upon.’

‘So. ’Tis fair and good. So. And now tell me: when the King saw her, how looked he?’

‘Faith, he looked, sir, like one dazzled.’

‘He did? He looked like one dazzled, did he? Oh, ’tis fair and good. Yes — go on — tell me, Scot. And what happened?’

‘Before the King could have speech with them, Mauro Calvo darkened all the den, and vanished with the maidens.’

‘Maidens, thou sayest? There were more than one,”The other is sister to Laura. She is called Bessie Ford.’

‘Is she lovely, too?’

‘Nay, but plain and homely.’

‘Ah: one or other is bastard then. Are they girls of the people?’

‘Yes, my lord. Bessie is chamberlain to the Bell Inn in Eastcheap.’

‘The Bell Inn in Eastcheap. And when they vanished thus, what said the King?’

‘He momentarily formed a league of my own self, one Fitzgerald, and one Bonner, a lad, to hie in search of the maiden on his behoof.’

‘Is he not a Prince of most royal will? — prompt in purpose — eager in action? He is in earnest, then, in this matter. But stay — hast found the girls?’

‘Nay, my lord, we have had scant time for that; we have but hied to the Westminster Palace to fill our purses and procure us horses. We go now to the Bell, where there is some small chance that the maidens are, and on the way I stopped to tell you that I am now, by your good leave, no more your man, but the King’s.’

For half a minute Wolsey, intensely thinking, said nothing. Then he spoke:

‘I grant thee the leave thou cravest, Scot. But do not yet set out: thou wilt wait in the palace with thy friends for half an hour, till I have further speech with thee.’

Macdonald bowed.

But to Du Ballay, listening behind the shrubbery, this question occurred: ‘Why the half-hour’s delay?’ And when, Macdonald having disappeared, he saw Wolsey instantly go trotting in heavy haste towards the mansion, he guessed the natural answer. The half-hour’s delay could only be due to Wolsey’s purpose of himself seizing Laura Ford before the King.

Now, since Wolsey was as much the enemy of Anne as Du Ballay was her friend, whatever was his design in seizing Laura Ford, it was clearly a design inimical to Anne. And this, to Du Ballay, was a quite sufficient reason to make him hie from the spot as if pursued, with the purpose of himself anticipating Wolsey in the capture.

His palace was near, in the chase north of the Knight’s Templars. He, too, in heavy haste, went trotting through the Queen’s manor-close with agitated cymar of white damask-silk, out into the open lanes, and so home. Within ten minutes the horses of himself and four men-at-arms were clattering eastward through the startled Cheap.

As Du Ballay hurried from the Queen’s palace, the Queen, in her orchard, was saying:

‘Yes, you will seize this girl, my good Condé. Poor King Henry! — he is frail in this way. And I, you know, am only a woman — I cannot bear another infidelity just now.’

‘If she is removed, the Lady Anne Boleyn remains,’ said Alvarada bitterly.

‘Yes; but I have a notion that the Lady Anne will whistle in vain after her flown eyas, if one were to guess from what I have witnessed to-night. The dear changeling no longer hankers after that hussy. Let us deliver him from this new temptation, and he may be again my own good lord.’

‘To seize the girls I need help: it was therefore that I came to your Majesty.’

‘Yes; help you shall have, and now, since the girls, having fled from the King, will instantly be chased by him. The valiant Sir John Perrot, who is my very good friend, and Lidcott, and James Burdet, shall be with you. You will send the lovely girl across the seas, good Condé, far from my lord’s sight. Separate not the sisters, I prithee, and provide well for their sustenance. Come, come.’

But in the thickness of the foliage there listened one whose lips curled at the Queen’s shallowness. ‘How little,’ thought Anne, ‘must this woman know her husband, when she imagines in this fashion to cure him of a passion! An he doth not possess Laura Ford, he will hunt her with mad and growing vehemence to his dying day!’

And Anne had no intention that Henry should hunt Laura to his dying day: she willed rather that he should hunt herself. And that, she saw clearly, he would never do till the day when, like a gnawed bone, he flung Laura Ford aside, a discarded thing — since there could be no question of marriage between the King and Laura. And in order to hasten that day, she, Anne, would have the girl in her own hands; would present her, a free-will offering, to her King. And since Katherine was hasting in the opposite sense, surely, on her part, too, there was need for haste.

She went tripping, with held-up skirts, stealthily treading, through the lanes of the close.

She darted, prone as an arrow, through the intricacies of the palace, and in the dancing-hall, with hasty breath, said at a young man's ear:

‘Percy — quick — come here!’

She led him into a corridor. He was the heir of the Earl of Northumberland, broad-shouldered, bow-legged, a lad of twenty-two, blue-eyed, with hair of flaxen silk. With him, a year before, Anne had had a flagrant love-affair, nipped by Wolsey. She panted:

‘Thou art to go — quickly — sans dallying — and a buss for thee, boy, on the lips, you hear? — if thou succeed'st — to the Bell — in Eastcheap! Two girls — locked in a room, I think — thou must seize and bear them away with thee — anywhere — but quick. Take three or four with thee — and fail not. An they be not there, hunt them — hunt them — far and wide! Fail me not, Percy, coz, an thou lov'st me! The Bell in Eastcheap — now!’

Percy squeezed her at the waist, dashed back his hair, and rushed away. He ran, dodging his impassioned way among palfreys and whirlcotes in the lane before the palace; and in a very few minutes was clattering eastward, with four men, through the Cheap.

About the same time three Wolsey-men galloped from the Cardinal's palace. Alvarada, with three Queen's-men, had already galloped from the Queen's palace, and Du Ballay's five from the Ambassador's palace.

If Anne was profound, Wolsey was more profound still, and knew his King. His reasoning was this: ‘The King will continue to love this Laura Ford, to the exclusion of the Lady Anne, up to the week after he gets her into his hand: that week Anne will regain her power. The King must not, therefore, get her into his hand, but I, Wolsey. And lest the King's flame for Laura, by the lack of fuel, grow cool, I, having her, will continually reincite him by sights of her, by new hopes of her, under such conditions that he shall see only, and hope only, but shall not handle. She shall elude him like a Jack-o'-lantern; he shall stretch out his hand for her, and she shall not be there. Thus will the influence of Laura grow, and be permanent, and the defeat of Anne be permanent also,'

So reasoned Wolsey: and hence it was that at the moment when his gallopers had set out for the Bell, the King's seekers, Fitzgerald, Macdonald, and Bonner, still sat in the Cardinal's salle d'attente, holding their chins, waiting through that 'half-hour' of the Cardinal's command.

Till Garrett Oge, lifting his great big body, and releasing his chin, said:

"Tis wearisome this. Is it meet, my masters, that a Geraldine should wait on a Cardinal?"

"Tis a nice abstract proposition in Logics," said Bonner with a smirk.

Garrett Oge Fitzgerald laughed. In a single hour the face and words of this slim student-stripling had grown exceeding pleasant to the warriors fancy.

"Tis a proposition in Theology, boy," said Garrett Oge: 'I call it a Cardinal sin.'

'Still, we must needs stay,' said Mac.

'And wherefore?' replied Fitz.

'Since the Cardinal bids us stay.'

'But the King bids us go, Mac.'

'The Cardinal is the King's king, Fitz,'

'He is therefore a King with but one subject, and his kingdom is contracted to a point — say a Cardinal point. Thou and I are withouten his bounds, Mac.'

'Still, Fitz, maugre that — caution, lad! The Cardinal's wrath is red.'

'His frock also, and his nose. Yet they burn not, Mac,'

‘Which,’ said Bonner, ‘proves the maxim of the Schools, that the converse of every true proposition is not true: for though all mice have tails, yet are all things with tails no mice, as when big Sir John Perrot personates the devil in a pageant. So are all burning things red, yet all red things burn not.’

Fitz laughed, intimately tickled by this quaint personality. And ‘Yea, boy,’ he cries, ‘but though our red Cardinal burn not now, yet burn enow, my troth, he shall — down yonder. But that apart, Mac, I say thee this: that this day twice hath the King entrusted me the executing of his will. The first time I failed him like a base-born tyke: this time I have no intent to fail him encore. Why wait we here, Mac? Come, come, let us begone!’

Macdonald said:

‘By my faith, thou hast reason. If thou art bent upon going, I am with thee,’

Fitz jumped up.

‘Come then, Cardinal or no Cardinal Come, boy, come...,’

Bonner wondered why he was going, and what would be the end. Yet he went — with a hand on Fitzgerald’s shoulder.

Their horses were in the courtyard. In three minutes they were galloping past Paul’s eastward.

As soon as ever they entered Eastcheap, they were aware of a tremendous hoop-hoop and to-do in the neighbourhood of the Bell. There was a block of armed men on horses. There were shouts, threats, brandished swords, rearing steeds. There were flaring cressets. There were bangings and batteries at the doors of the inn, startling the night. There was the nightcap of the round-eyed landlord, who savoured still in his nose the savour of midnight snores, popped in amaze from an upper window.

Fitz and Mac drove spurs into their horses' flanks, and dashed toward the fracas, Fitz crying to Bonner:

‘Keep close to me, boy! Crom Aboo, by God!’ And out with a rushing sound leapt his sword.

Thus, as round a pebble, did the circles widen round Bessie Ford and her strong Virtue.

CHAPTER XI

THE STORM OF THE BELL

‘MIT STÜRMEN SICH herum zu schlagen...!’

GOETHE.

MOST of the five parties — the King’s, the Queen’s, Anne’s, Du Ballay’s, and Wolsey’s — come to seize Bessie and Laura Ford, were astonished at the presence of all the others at the Bell.

They were nineteen: the King’s three — Fitz, Mac, and Bonner; Du Ballay, with four French knights, on steeds caparisoned in goodly trappings with purples; hotheaded young Percy of Northumberland, sent by Anne, with three stout livery-men; the Condé Alvarada, with the ferocious huge Sir John Perrot and two Queen’s-men; and, lastly, three blood-hounds of Wolsey, gentlemen of his bed-chamber, gallants famed for tilting at the quintain, running at the ring, or jousting in single combat.

Of all these, Alvarada alone knew that the girls were locked in a chamber, and where. The keys of the chamber he had in his doublet.

The first to arrive were Du Ballay and his knights. They commenced to pound at a door of the Bell, but before the landlord had time to start from bed, the Spaniard with his three dashed up. Now, the Spaniard, on leaving the inn, had left one of the gable-doors unfastened, though closed, and on arriving made for it. His surprise at seeing some men thundering at another gable-door was increased when he was promptly attacked by those men. Du Ballay wrongly surmised that these were the Wolsey-men whom he expected to come: and at once spurred, and, with waving blade, drove upon Alvarada, who had dismounted.

Alvarada was on lower ground, having descended two of the steps leading to the door. He parried a blow at his head, and ripped his skilled rapier along the horse's throat: and at once the animal dived prone on kneeling knee, pitching the stout Churchman into a bundle of defeat in the depression before the house.

Meantime the hoofs of seven horses were striking fire-works out of the smooth large cobble-stones, for the four Frenchmen had spurred at the three English, and were plunging in circular fight, with hacking blades, around them. In another minute Alvarada had leapt to his saddle and joined the affray. After two passes he pricked a French knight through the gorget, and sent him rolling, and towering Sir John Perrot, one of the fiercest of fighters, cleft the helm and brain of another, in spite of the heavy armour then worn. The French were now reduced to two, and the mêlée would have been short: but at that moment young Percy, with his three henchmen, armed each with the bow-and-arrow, spear, and demi-lance, arrived on the scene; and feeling his big sorrel mare go wheeling at a blow on her polished haunch, Percy cried 'Northumberland!', hurled up his short battle-axe, and commenced to hew at whom he met.

His men joined in, and the fight was general. A persistent chopping clash, mingled with struggling hoofs, spattering sparks, was heard over an area of fifteen yards of street. And now the landlord's head was out, and down the double length of drowsy households night-caps craning from high gables peered beneath the held-up rushlights.

The fighters, for the most part, wore black masks, or visors, and were unknown to one another. Alvarada, quite unarmoured, was parrying the fierce brusquerie of Percy's onslaught, and Sir John Perrot had shattered the arm-piece of Bishop Du Ballay, who had risen and fought on foot, when Wolsey's three gallants arrived, and galloped right into the brawl before they could rein impetus. Two, attacked at the same moment, set to work with instant briskness, rising in their step-ropes. The third, their leader, upon whom Wolsey had impressed the need for urgent haste, forged beyond the region of the chopping chaos of steel, and leaping into the depression, began to pound with far-echoing hubbub at a door.

While the landlord still peered paralyzed upon this entangled nightmare, yonder, to westward, was raised the cry of 'Crom Aboo,' — and the sword of Garrett Oge was in the air.

Instantly he divined that those fighters were battling for the possession of Laura Ford — some of them, perhaps, sworn-men of Wolsey, who in that case had played false in bidding Fitz and Mac tarry at his palace. And partly for the King's sake, whom he had already once that day failed, he galloped forward with something like enthusiasm.

Partly for the King's sake, and partly — so complex are the workings of the mind — for Bessie Ford's. For now Garret Oge knew somewhat more of Bessie Ford, and at the thought of her jerked his head with reflective twist. At least, if the lovely sister were to be torn from the plain, he, Fitz, himself, and not another, should tear her, and for no other than the King himself. So resolved Fitz.

In a moment he was in the fight, his hand against every man's, his potent broadsword raging everywhere, like the very tooth of pestilence in his hand — sure token of coming death.

And ever and again, even in the thick and acme of his contests, he glanced about him to note where young Mark Bonner was, and how the stripling fared.

With two swift-successive downward cleaves he sent to heaven a gallant of Wolsey and a gentleman-waiter of Queen Katherine.

His curvetting horse, brought down from a rear by the forward impulse of his last hew, slipped on the smooth pavers, and in the midst of a clattering fracas of sparks was struggling to right itself, when Fitz was impetuously attacked on the left hind-flank by Sir John Perrot, who was helmless, and on his face a mask of blood. Fitz, twisting sideways in his heaving saddle, received the first blow obliquely on his tingling elbow, and the quick rain of the next three he received with agile parry on his sword-edge in a clash, clash, clash, of three distinct musical notes. The next moment four front-teeth of Sir John lay loose in his bubbling mouth, and at the same time Fitz was attacked simultaneously, in front and on the other flank, by Alvarada and young Percy.

His position now was dangerous: for though his helmet was of good Milan flutes, and his corselet strong ring-mail, he wore neither visor, gorget, armpiece, nor greaves, while, of his assailants, two were armed cap-à-pie, and all were terrible in fight. Macdonald was engaged some distance away, and as for Bonner, though he had been given a sword, he had not drawn, but sat haloed in golden ringlets beyond the region of battle, musing on abstract things.

Fitzgerald was already winded, when he found himself the centre of this tempest of steel. His energy might have succumbed, but a street lantern showed him dimly the general lineaments of the very Spaniard with whom he had that day fought in the Bell's yard. At the sight his rage of effort redoubled. He executed a swift demi-volte to the right, with a hack at Percy's haunch which drove the Northumbrian mare at full shock upon Sir John, whereupon Sir John and Percy engaged; and Fitz, with demi-volte to the left, had the Spaniard vis-à-vis. And now, round wheeled the two horses, head to head in stepping dance, with little runs and curvets, spattering sparks, as the blades went chink; but before the event up came Macdonald at a steady canter, and joined against the Spaniard.

If Fitz fought like a storm, Mac fought like a rock — without heat, without fail, with the pressure of his upper lip visible between the parted moustache, and eyes that glinted intense, like cold steel, beneath their lowered lids.

But before he could bring his horse into position to aim a single cut, there was an outcry from the inn. The Wolsey-man, who had been thumping ineffectually at one of the gable-doors, had moved on to thump at another, and that other was the one left open by the Spaniard. He perceived that it was open, and shouting, ‘Jack! Jack! an open door!’ in he dashed. This Alvarada heard, and, fearing the loss of all his plans, slid hurriedly from his horse, leaped the depression, and slipped within the house.

At this moment Mauro Calvo sat on a mule serenely regarding the affray. He had just arrived, having come, as arranged, for Laura and Bessie, leading by the halters two jennets, procured by the contrivance of Brother Bruno.

At once the disappearance within the inn of the two Wolsey-men and Alvarada was the signal for a general rush. The fighting-men left alive leapt from their saddles, and, with here and there a mutual cut, made for the inn, squeezing and shouldering through the doorway.

And Mauro Calvo said:

‘Well, now, a murrain on these cattle. This will never do for me, young women. Go ye your way, and I go mine. I’m off.’

But he muttered very low, as if ashamed:

‘Though ’tis a worthy soul, that Bess. A spirit, I fancy, of uncommon chemistry.’

CHAPTER XII

CALVO'S BAG

‘IN THAT WIGHT’S pouch were oddish ends,
Strange relics, gews, and witcheries.’

OLD TALE.

IN turning, however, Calvo perceived Mark Bonner, who lingered in the street.

‘Well, what make you here?’ he asked.

‘Faith, master, I have the smallest notion,’ answered Mark with doffed cap.

‘Who are these brawlers?’

‘They are King’s-men, as I surmise, come to attaint the person of my sweetheart, Laura: yet, strangely, they hew one at the other in the way you see, having, as is like, more sword than sense.’

‘That chuff of a King? What! so soon would he be at that poor Bessie Ford?’

‘Tis Laura he would be at’

‘Laura, yes: but who cares aught about Laura. ’Tis of the poor little sister that I think.’

‘I pity both.’

‘That mumping chuff!’

‘A King is a King.’

‘Were it not for one thing, I’d—’

‘Prithee, Master Calvo, if you can succour them—’

‘Believe me, I have a mind — yes, I will. Have her he shall not, the chuff!’

At once he turned his mule, and before the house gave the three pre-arranged whistles, hoping for an answering face at the window. But no face came. There came only into the street the vague uproar that filled the house. He dismounted and made fast his animals to the inn’s sign-post. He cried, ‘Come, boy,’ and taking his bag, smuggled from his river-den, entered the inn.

The searchers by this time had spread themselves over the upper floor, searching blindly, each for himself. Only Alvarada had exact knowledge of where the girls were locked, and held the keys. He, however, had no idea of opening the locked room in the presence of so many opponents, only stationing himself near to watch.

The fighting had, for the moment, ceased in the dispersal of the searchers; till young Percy, wild with hot wounds, running with held-up battle-axe and torch, found himself stopped by a locked door, and commenced to hew the woodwork; for Anne had told him something of ‘a locked room.’

Alvarada at once stepped out, and, at a run, inflicted a rather foul stab from behind in the crevice between humerus and back-piece; and even as Percy turned to fight, he commenced, finding himself thus wounded, to bawl, ‘Clubs! clubs!’ — a cry of the period meaning ‘help’ — in order to summon those of his henchmen who searched behind him.

Fitz and Mac, who were running past, attracted by the row, rushed into the room. Percy had stuck askew in a sconce the pine flambeau, which, at the inn-door, he had snatched: and Macdonald, seeing the chopped door, cried: 'Here the girls are, Fitz, my brave! Kill first these cullions!' and commenced with his bill to batter at the door.

Fitz turned upon Percy and Alvarada, but at once two of Percy's Northumbrians, together with three other fighters, including Sir John Perrot and the Bishop of Bayonne, dashed into the room. The mere sight of Macdonald heaving furiously at the door made that door the centre of interest for all, and a hot mixed scrimmage, wild as it was hot, and bloody as it was wild, began to transact itself within the small apartment.

At the open door stood Mauro Calvo looking with calm eyes. Three men had already fallen when he shut the door upon them all.

The struggle round the locked door led him, too, to the conclusion that the sisters were probably in the room beyond it. To reach them, therefore, he must pass through that door, and before any of the fighters. He laid his bag on the ground, and opened it. It was a goodly sack made of thin russet-leather, and bulged by the mass of objects with which Calvo, foreknowing his expulsion, had long since stuffed it. Its top was opened and closed by a running string of pigskin.

The air of the very limited space in which the combatants fought already grew foul with their passionate breathing: the room was thickly tapestried round; there was no window, and the only ingress for air consisted in the two key-holes. Against one of them the face of a dead man, fallen in a sitting posture, pressed; and the other Mauro Calvo stuffed with tow from his bag. He then quickly bored a hole in the door with a gar; into the hole he inserted the pipe of a baggy sort of bellows made of Spanish foot-cloth; and this he began to work.

At that moment, for the third time that day, Fitzgerald was engaged with Alvarada; while Macdonald, jammed in a corner, was defending himself against the bill of a Wolsey-man and the demi-lance of a Northumbrian. As for Percy, he had fallen from loss of blood; and big Sir John Perrot, his sword shattered, had grasped Du Ballay round the middle, and was heaving and slanting the equilibrium of the portly bishop to effect a throw. But now the breaths of the fighters grew wondrous short; they gasped in an agony of effort strange in fighting men; their contortions acquired an extravagance of cat-o'-mountain fury; their faces grew crimson, then black; their eyes bulged; the room was full of raucous breaths, of the heaves of groaning and despairing bosoms.

Sir John and Du Ballay fell together, a thumping mass of carcass, and, having fallen, did not move. Macdonald, with a last sigh and gasp, resigned himself to die; and as he resigned himself, the bill and the demi-lance failed, too, and the three men dropped together. Down upon the skull of the Spaniard sped the avenging blade of Fitz; but the sword failed, and Fitz failed, and the Spaniard failed: and together, with a dying gasp, they dropped like lead. And over the room in limp oblivion lay the bodies of the warriors; and without, Mauro Calvo, with steady, calm pump, worked his implement.

Anticipating by over a century the famous invention of Otto von Guericke, Calvo, darkly working in his temple beneath the river, had contrived an air-pump of rude, yet effective, construction. When he was certain that hardly any air was left in the chamber, he opened the door. The door opposite was already half-demolished by sword and axe-hack. Stepping among the prostrate men, Calvo muttered 'Silly cattle,' and with one thump of his back against the locked door, was in the next room.

Bessie stood holding Laura by the hand. In her face was awe, even despair — hardly fear. Suddenly she uttered a cry:

‘Oh, bless God!’

‘Get you gone,’ said Calvo. ‘Have you the bundle? You will find two horses in the street below: away on them, and await me in front of Essex House. Get you gone now, get you gone.’

He spoke calmly, like a calm god to Bessie’s ear.

Even as the girls picked their way among the fallen warriors, there was a stirring among them, and a rubbing of dazed eyes, and a rising on the elbow.

Bessie noticed Fitz lie stricken there. But the girls were already well on their way before Fitz, the first to recover, leapt to his feet.

At that time Mauro Calvo, shouldering his bag, was going through the rooms of the inn, methodically, without haste, calling:

‘Hi, there, hi! landlord, mine host! Hi, hi!’

Presently, in a high garret, he came upon the old fellow hiding in an ague.

‘Why, sir, sir!’ cried mine host, ‘what may betoken all this battery and morris-dancing in an honest house-of-call at this blessed hour of the night?’

‘That you may discover for your own self, friend,’ replied Calvo. ‘All I need tell thee is that your niece is in danger, and I am her friend, I being that Mauro Calvo whom you know. Therefore is it that you will not fail in the following mission: You will seek out one Brother Bruno of the Crouched Friars, and deliver him a letter which I shall now hand to you, with a message from me that he expedite the same, without delay, to the address in the Kingdom of France thereon writ. You understand? — Brother Bruno of the Crouched Friars.’ Mine host was all bowing compliance, while Calvo took from the well-packed bag a cista, containing ink-horn, pen, a seal, black resin, and parchment. And leaning sideways against a buffet to write, he muttered: ‘Now, Master King, let us see whether we cannot pit against thee an antagonist worthy thy steel. Never met such a mumping chuff in all my life!’ He wrote:

‘To Francis the First, King of France, from Mauro Calvo these presents.

‘The most surpassing maiden in the world, of whom Mauro Calvo, it is now four years gone, prophesied to Francis the First the dominion and jouissance, is now in the Kingdom of England. She is to be found in the cathedral-city of Winchester, or in that environ, and standeth in instant peril of capture at the hands of Henry, King of England, Wales, and Ireland. Mars being in conjunction with Sol in the Fourth Shamaîm, and Venus retrograde in the Sixth House, it is betokened that around the maiden shall spread conflicts; nor, save by prowess of arms, can she be won.’

Mauro Calvo re-read his letter with smiling lip and scornfully-wrinkled brow, and he said:

‘That will fetch the other chuff over,’

He handed the letter, sealed, to mine host With quickened steps he descended, mounted his mule, and rode westward. The fighters were still searching in the inn, and with them Mark Bonner, who, in the dark and confusion, had lost trace of the sage.

CHAPTER XIII

AT HOUNSLOW

ΠΟΙΗΣΟΝ ΑΜΠΕΛΟΥΣ ΜΟΙ!

ANACREON.

IT was not long before the searchers in the inn, no more barred by any locked door, decided that the girls were no longer there.

‘Phew, comeradoes! but I could drink well a pottle of posset,’ gasped Fitzgerald, staggering out to the street.

‘Well, Fitz, hast had thy bellyful to-night, lad?’ asked Mac, staggering too.

‘Nay, Mac, but would have it, as I say. Posset, ye saints, browsed of warm cow’s milk and boon Porto, well sugared and cinnamoned! How good! Or a draught of ypocras, or ale — even ale. Oh, my lusty throat!’

‘Fitz, lad, never had I a heavier arm.’

‘Nor yet I. I have brained — how many? — five: one for each sense, to give it wholesome appetite. But, by the Holy Rood! — where is that boy?’

‘Which boy?’

‘Why, the boysie Bonner, sure....’

‘Faith, I know not.’

‘He is killed!’ cried Fitz; ‘sure, sure!’

‘Nay, but he lives, for there is he.’

Bonner appeared at the doorway, sauntering out. Fitz ran to meet him, and threw an arm round his shoulder.

‘Why, boysie—’ he said in a low voice.

‘I live to tell the tale — in hexameters,’ said Mark.

‘What are hexameters, boysie?’

‘Verses with six feet.’

‘But six-footed things do crawl, boysie, and thy verse should go brisk, like the action described,’

‘Nay, but verses, unlike other polypeds, go not on all feet at once, you perceive, but hop-wise, foot by foot, which faculty is called their Scansion,’

‘Then are they like hopping zanies, or saltimbanques, boy, and should be away with,’

‘Nay, but—’

‘Come Fitz! — come!’ cried Mac from some distance. ‘What now, Mac? Hast found some posset in the street?’

‘Nay, but some traces of the fugitives, perchance,’

‘Sayest thou ——?’

Fitz went to the spot.

‘See there,’ said Mac, ‘the red hoof-prints of two horses that have trod in blood, and gone off close together, galloping — thou observest their length of stride? If the maidens were verily in the inn, and have escaped, then this must be—’

‘Hath anyone seen aught of Master Calvo?’ asked Mark.

‘What! was the wizard here?’

‘Even he,’

‘And in the inn?’

‘Why, yes,’

‘Then ’twas that cozener that rescued them!’ cried Mac—’ Fitz, man, to horse!’

‘Hold, Mac: I leave not a goodly inn full of fluids behind me, with my weasand dry as a corned rey—’

‘Ah, but there ’twas not the real Fitzgerald that spake,’ said Mac, ‘but a thirsty weakling. Come, Fitz, be whetting thy manhood, man, and leave thy throat to wet itself. Our devoir to the King — and those vile black-riders within, who will be out anon — and we without a moment to throw away —’

‘Well, then, an you put it so—’

Fitz’s nature, prone always to drop back into pleasant sloth and dalliance, stiffened at the reproof of the harder-souled Mac, and he ran promptly forward.

Four of the nineteen horses which had lately thronged the street now strayed, insolently cropping the grass-grown pavers with lowered neck, and a swagger pose of one projected fore-leg; the others were dead or fled. Three of the four, with a mere fling-away and pretence of flight, accepted capture. Fitz cried:

‘Come, boysie, haste thee!’

And they mounted just in time: for even as they rode away, the searchers came trooping from the inn, and someone sent after the riders a random bullet.

At the door one Wolsey-man said:

‘Yon flyers were e’en fighters in the inn: whither away are they in such haste?’

‘Ay, whither?’ answered the other: ‘after the maidens, marry, most like.’

‘Gogswounds! ’tis even so, or I’m a beggar’s brat! Let’s after!’

‘No steeds.’

‘Pah! then home for steeds o’ God’s name let’s hie!’

These two started westward. In another three minutes the same reasoning was agitating every brain of the searchers, and westward for steeds became the mot d’ordre. In twos and threes, far-scattered now on their divers ways, they went running with prone trot through a London dead and buried in slumber.

Meanwhile, Fitz and his fellows, galloping past Somerset House, had encountered a watchman callously sauntering with steps that tolled through the hushed midnight. The riders drew rein.

‘Hast seen, Master Watchman, a pair of females and a man on horseback pass this way?’ asked Mac.

‘Two females on horseback,’ said the deep-voiced watchman, who had learned observation from solitude and the stars, ‘and a man on muleback. The females wore neither porringer, coif, nor bonnet, the man a skull-cap of black silk; and they made haste toward Westminster.’

“Tis they, Fitz! Give rein—”

They were off, cantering; Fitz and Mac abreast, Bonner behind. At Westminster, from a club-man sleeping forlorn on a doorstep, they learned that twenty minutes since the fugitives had taken the way to Hounslow village. And they were off, cantering through open Middlesex country now, under open heaven.

‘Why should I be constrained into the chase of my own sweetheart and wife-that-is-to-be?’ observed Mark Bonner, his mass of golden hair jumping in measured spasms on his galloping shoulders.

‘Poor boysie! Yet is it better to be constrained into a chase than chased into constraint, as thou well might be,’ said Fitz.

‘Wife that was, not is, to be, lad,’ added Mac; ‘what is a King if he hath not right to the person of his subjects?’

‘I refer you for answer to “The Republic” of Plato,’ said Bonner.

‘Wah, Mac — there is a hard nut for thee to crack!’ cried Fitz, delighted, his bossed and blue-white brow pouring perspiration down his tanned face.

‘A truce to thy Plato, lad,’ said Mac. ‘The King is in his earnest about this Laura, hark ye. And have her he will, and droightly, say I’

‘Have her in her entirety he cannot,’ answered Bonner: ‘for her mouth I have already kissed so sore, that she will bawl an it be but touched,’

Fitz slapped his thigh.

‘Is it not a philosopher?’ he cried. ‘Doth it not take his whipping gaily, the boy, in light scorn of all things and Kings? But nay, nay, Mac, I fall not wholly in accord with thee. If the boy loveth his Laura, and Laura loveth her boy, ’tis a nice question, meseems, to which Laura belongeth, whether to the King, or to the boy,’

“’Tis rank heresy, Fitz: she belongeth, certes, to the King,’

‘Well, have it so. But that Bess—’

‘What of her, Fitz?’

‘Is she verily sister to Laura, as thou saidst, boysie?’

‘Why, yes,’ said Bonner.

“’Tis Bess I think of, Mac,’

‘What of her?’

‘That lass, many a time in the tap-room of the inn, I have chucked under the chin, man — lightly done it! — mockingly done it! — and knew not what I did, nor whom I chucked!’

‘Ay, ’tis a lass built of strange timber,’ assented Mac.

‘Of old English oak, methinks, Mac — tough as hell, and sending back the sledge that smites it with a bounce. And I have chucked it under the chin!’

‘Twas a bold deed that, the taking of thy King’s-letters, Fitz; and one worthy a stout heart, I avouch.’

‘But, Mac, consider that flight with her sister from the King! Consider what of rough old virtue is thereby betokened! Sure, man, there’s not a ladyship of the land which, having a daughter with Laura’s face, but would have hurried her hie to Court, that she might incur the honour of becoming what thou wot’st to our jolly Harry. And Bessie Ford — a country wench — Oh, ’tis incredible! Oh, it troubleth the eyes!’

‘Ay, faith, ’twas seemly done; yea, I avouch, ’twas virtuously achieved.’

‘She ran from the King, Mac.’

‘That did she, Fitz.’

‘She tumbled not to her knees, Mac, when the King beheld her sister, to thank God that now should she have waving oak-lands and a thousand livery-men; but she ran in fear, Mac — she took to flight—’

‘Oh, I avouch, I avouch— ’twas virtuously achieved— ’twas seemly done.’

‘Ha! ha! ha! ha! and I have chucked it under the—’

A ‘phoo — o!’ of spasming laughter puffed between the hand that rushed to cover Fitz’s down-bent mouth. But in a moment the redness of his laugh turned to mottled pallor, and he said:

‘Rude grampus I must have been! Pah! I have shame on it—’

‘Nay, Fitz,’ said Mac, ‘but thou takest the matter with too much unction, coz: being apt, I observe, to run into extremes always, goring prone like a mad bull for one red point, nor seeing a whole business in its entirety. Sure, our main concern is not now to prate about the virtues of this Bess, but to catch the maidens for the King.’

Fitzgerald put spurs to his horse, and said nothing.

After some minutes, passing through Hounslow, he drew rein at the sight of moving lights in the Cross Hands.

‘Nay, Mac, no more to-night, no more,’ he said; ‘I feel three burning smarts on my body, and my throat screams for a cup of clary.’

‘And my belly is void for neat’s tongue and capon pasty,’ said Mark Bonner.

‘Well, well, ye are like two boys,’ answered Mac. ‘But as you will: who knows if we shall not find our quarry even here?’

Fitz set to pounding the door with his dagger-handle. The landlord of the Cross Hands popped his head out o’ window, and cried:

‘What! more o’ ye this night?’

‘Fitz,’ whispered Mac, ‘I’ll lay a ban-dog to a beagle that they are in this very inn.’

Fitz made no reply.

The moment the landlord appeared at the door, Mac slipped a broad-piece into his hand, and, whispering, said:

‘We pay scot and lot, mine host, and command a goodly collation. But first we need to know — have a pair of bare-headed lasses and a man in skull-cap arrived at you but now?’

‘Why, even so: they are just a-feed in the pantry yonder.’

‘And to the pantry how many doors?’

‘But one, opening upon the inn-buttery.’

‘Fair and good. Say naught of us to these good folk on consideration of yet a rose-noble for yourself, and conduct us to this buttery anon. Give us there what cheer you have with speed, and our steeds send to stable without unsaddling. And as we feed, seek us out a length of rope for money’s worth, we prithee. Fitz, we have them, lad!’

‘Have them or no, to me ’tis pretty equal, Mac. Hast any Alicant in buttery, landlord?’

‘Sh-h!’ said Mac; ‘talk low. And while we feed, since feed we must, and mine host seeks rope to bind the wizard, prithee mum, now. For if the wizard scents us here, ’tis a miscreant full of tricks. Bonner, make but one wilful sound, and I stick thee.’

‘Well, Mac — but hast any Alicant in buttery, landlord?’

‘Why, a pipe or so in cellar, my master.’

‘Then up with a brimming flagon, quick.’

They followed mine host to the inn-buttery, with soft tread, and, in the midst of casks and cupboards, sat lolling in poses of abandoned weariness round a deal table. Mine host spread a soiled portpane, and busily laid on good cold viands: caviare, a haunch of veal, stuffed yern, and roasted byster, with oats-bread. The three, cutting with knives and feeding the gorged mouth with forkless left fingers, set to work. Under the table Mark Bonner swung a jubilee leg, and hummed inaudible madrigals. His head presently dropped to the massive shoulder of Fitzgerald, and so, reposing sideways, ate gladly. And Fitz, inwardly conscious of the resting head, ate gladly also.

‘But,’ cried Fitz suddenly, ‘a murrain on that landlord! Wilt never bring that Alicant, mine host?’

‘Fitz, Fitz!’ hissed Macdonald bitterly, ‘this is crazy folly.’

Bessie Ford leapt, blanched, to her feet. She whispered to Calvo:

‘I have heard the voice of Master Fitzgerald in the next room! We are lost!’

‘You are certain of his voice?’ asked Calvo, still munching.

‘Oh, quite, quite....’

The landlord bustled in, closing the door. The trapdoor into the cellar was in the pantry; he lifted it. Calvo said:

‘You descend for wine, mine host?’

‘Why, yes,’

‘For guests?’

‘Why, yes.’

‘Wine of what sort?’

‘Alicant.’

‘What! you keep Alicant?’

‘Even so.’

‘Sure, I did not know. Bring me also a flagon.’ The landlord descended. Calvo hurriedly took from his bag a three-ounce vial.

Mine host re-emerged with his vesper in one hand, and two tapering pewter flagons, held by the handles, in the other.

To reclose the opening, he laid the flagons on the floor; and as he led the door, stooping, to its drop, Calvo, leaping from the table, approached him.

‘Which is mine?’ he said.

‘Either.’

Calvo took one flagon, emptying, as the door dropped, his vial into the other. The vial had contained a distillation of essential alcohol.

Fitz, as he drained his first cup, nodded the remark: ‘Boon and heart some, this!’

And Conner, draining his, hummed quite aloud. Fitz’s arm went round Bonner’s head, and he knocked the head against his corselet, saying: ‘Boysie.’

Mac drank with much more deliberation, pondering his flavours; but even his eyes swam.

Fitz drained another cup, and cried aloud:

‘Ha! ha! ha!’

Bonner another, and threw himself frankly on Fitz’s breast, sobbing.

In the other room Mauro Calvo said to the girls: ‘Now! You will dart with all your legs through the next room; the door is right opposite; we make for the stables. Our animals stand saddled, and the knaves can’t follow us, being drunk. Our landlord is against us — we must not tarry here. To Kew, then — away.’ Calvo flew first, close on his steps Laura, then Bessie, with sudden spurt. They were in the middle of the room before Mac saw, and started to his feet. But even as he rushed, he stumbled. Fitz, with thrown-back head, was shouting the red laughter of alcohol Bessie, in her swift passage, noted him — the flushed, jolly face; Mac, too, she saw; but as for Bonner, his face was hidden on the breast of Fitz.

Mac at once recovered his legs, having drunk little, and dashed to the door; but there, barring his way, stood Fitzgerald, staggering with outspread arms.

‘Ha! ha! ha!’ he laughed, with fainting breath; ‘what, art after the little Bess, thou Mac? Oh, gamesome princox! Tis not Laura— ’tis the little Bess thou wouldst be after for thy little dainty wife — God, thy little sweet, sweet wife! Nay, but thou shalt not — shall he, Bonner, boy? Shall he, now? Little, dainty, tricky Bess...’

Mac had his arms round Fitzgerald’s body, and after a brief tussle, they fell together. It was some minutes before Mac could wriggle himself free. He ran staggering out, but only to hear a sound of hoofs go galloping into faintness and silence.

When he returned to the room, Fitz and Bonner were inextricably cuddled into a heap on the floor, quite drunk.

CHAPTER XIV

AT KEW

AS FRESH AURORE of mighty Tithone spouse
Unshut the windows of her large hall...

GAWIN DOUGLAS.

WITH earliest dawn Bessie awoke, after three hours' sleep at the Blue Bottle, Kew. She hurried on her clothes, and, having put her lips to Laura's open mouth, descended into the yard at the inn's back, and, mounting on a bench, was able to scan far back the London Road. It was empty, and she breathed with thankfulness the fresh summer air of a balmy morning. There by the bench she knelt, crossed herself, kissed her thumb-nail, and prayed.

Her milk-white brow, lined with two chaste curves of dark hair, touched the wood-work. Beneath was a rather small triangle of face, but chastely lined. There was little eye-brow or eye-lash; her hair, as was mostly the way then with maidens, fell in a 'natte' or plait — not a long one — long as a hand. On her cheekbones were bright carmine spots; and her thin lips were scarlet.

Long she prayed, to many saints — little for herself, much for Laura, much for Mauro Calvo — and devoutly, with awe-struck, believing heart — not as men and maidens pray now.

As she rose, she saw far off, as if in sad inverted answer to her prayer, a cloud of rising dust. She clasped her hands, and, ‘Oh, Master Fitzgerald, sir!’ she whispered, ‘if you only knew what you are doing, sure you would not—’

She was about to run to rouse the sleepers, when she noticed a hole, long since made, five feet deep and broad, at one corner of the garden. Beside it was a dung-heap, bricks, old earth, and battered tin, and rubbish, sufficient to fill the hole; and beside these, spades and garden-tools. She had a sudden inspiration, and ran within.

First up to the room where Calvo slept. The alchymist snored, his bulging brow pallid in contrast with his black cap. Bessie put on his forehead a kiss. She would not wake him yet, cherishing with economy each precious moment of his repose: their animals fed saddled; there was still a little time.

She knew, for he had shown her, that he had the King’s-letters, which she had given him to keep, in a box in his bag. She opened the bag, searched, took the letters, and with them an inkhorn, pen, and parchment. This occupied five minutes. She hurried to Laura’s bedside.

Laura, deep in dreams, resisted the rousing hand with objecting elbow, and ‘Let me alone’ she droned drowsily, and flung herself into another pose of slumber.

It took Bess another five minutes to wake her. Then she ran to a window commanding the London Road.

The hasting cloud of dust was near now. She saw that time would fail her for her scheme. But even as she looked, there arose a hope. The horsemen stopped at another inn — the Crown — which stood alone in fields half a mile nearer Hounslow. They dismounted and hammered at the door. They were not Fitzgerald's party at all, but another of the searching parties.

Bessie hurried back to Laura, who sat nude, wantonly yawning in bed, showing her little teeth; and 'Write, Laura, write,' said Bessie.

The bed was on the floor, and near it a chest. Laura took pen in hand, for she could write; but as for Bessie, she did not know the alphabet.

Laura waited. Bessie, sitting on the bed's edge, pondered, seeking for expression. After a minute, her little scarlet mouth twitched with humour, and she said:

'The real and only Fitzgerald—'

Laura wrote with flourished letters:

'The real and only Fitzgerald—'

'Is sure a gentleman,' said Bessie.

Laura wrote it.

'Why, then, should he hunt down to death,' said Bessie, 'two poor maidens who bear him only good will and good remembrance?'

Laura wrote that 'Sign: "Bessie Ford."'“

It was signed.

'Now, on this other piece write: "Here lie the King's-letters taken from Master Fitzgerald's cloak."'“

It was written.

Bessie leapt up; she wrapped the King's-letters, together with her letter to Fitz, in a piece of blank parchment. Then, with winged feet, she hied to the garden, dropped the packet into the hole, and commenced with vigour to shovel in the earth and rubbish. Her frame was vigorous and vital, and the work swift, for the loose refuse ran freely, in lumps and thumps. Ever and anon she stamped upon the rising level in the hole to consolidate the mass; and on the surface, when all was finished, she impaled with a dry twig the words: 'Here lie the King's-letters.'

What in a few minutes she had thus buried would require, perhaps, hours to recover: and in this way she counted upon retarding her pursuers.

She ran in now, and woke Calvo, and soon they were ready to set out.

The wife of mine host, a kindly soul who had spoken with Bessie on her arrival, rose from bed to receive her reckoning; and to her at the last moment Bessie said: 'Prithee, Mistress Perkins, an a stranger named Master Fitzgerald come hither to-day, conduct him to the hole in the back garden. 'Tis a masterful great gentman, with large and humoursome face sans hair on it, and sky-blue eyes that twinkle. Sure, you could not miss him when once you saw him, for 'tis an Irish gallant like few.'

Mistress Perkins promised; and the party set off, bound for Colnbrook through Brentford.

CHAPTER XV

AT COLNBROOK

‘A GOOD MAN there was of religion
That was a poore parson of a town.’
CHAUCER.

SINCE Mauro Calvo knew that his westward flight was now tracked by his pursuers, it entered his calmly meditative brain that his best course would be to make them pass him on the road, and rush onward seeking him, while he, in his serene way, ambled after them at leisure on his mule. Therefore he made haste through the scented morning toward Colnbrook, where he had old acquaintance with a priest; and the girls followed at a canter.

In that day, when all travelling was by horse, everyone could ride. Laura’s dark face flushed to carmine; her hair loosened somewhat to a wanton slovenness; jollity was on her breath. And Bessie, seeing her so, a flash of galloping loveliness still near her, was inwardly content. Calvo said:

‘By all that’s rigolo I here’s a beautiful occupation for a man like me.’

They were descending slowly a stony path through over-arching beeches.

‘Oh, ’tis your exceeding wondrous goodness, Master Calvo!’ said Bessie.

‘A truce to my goodness, young woman. You have reason to talk of my goodness, methinks. Gadding over the country with two moppets on galloping tits behind me, and a lot of silly mad cattle on my track! What do you call that?’

‘Oh, Master Calvo, ’tis even exceeding abundantly gracious—’

‘Well, well. Don’t distress yourself — can’t you see you bother and worry me? Everything gone to rack and ruin — all my plans — all gone. I had in my mind the doing of — a thing! Aha! And now, where is it? — gone! And I was just preparing an electuary for that old hag Gammer Welch’s sore chest: now, I suppose, the old fool will die. And here am I gadding about this blessed morning with two young women — perfect strangers to me — and everything gone to hell. And all through that mumping chuff of a King — my God!’

Laura, behind, pulled a wrinkled nose and down-turned mouth at Calvo; and Bessie, shrinking painfully at every grumble, went with bent and guilty head.

They came to the top of Colnbrook village-street. It lay dozing in tranquil sunlight, three cows loitering down it. They proceeded to the bottom, past the church, searching for the presbytère.

‘Where the pestilence is the presbytère?’ grumbled Calvo.

They came back, searching. An old gaffer, clad in hempen gabardine, stepped from a door. To him Calvo spoke.

‘Is Father Anstrewther still the priest here?’

‘Ay,’ said the yokel.

‘Where the pestilence is the presbytère?’

‘Why, yonder, back o’ the church, behind the rows of yews.’

Thither they turned again, and found that the house lay quite concealed in a waving meadow-land behind three thickly-founded lines of yews. This was unfortunate for them, for, three hours after they had been received by the good Father, Macdonald, galloping toward Colnbrook, spied the identical gaffer whom Calvo had questioned ditching by the roadside. And said he:

‘Hast seen a pair of girls, with a man, pass riding, gaffer?’

‘Ay, the same as went to the presbytère, no doubt.’

‘How long since?’

‘Nigh on three hours, maybe.’

‘ ‘Sdeath! they must have gone further by this. Come, Fitz, ride — to the presbytère!’

They clattered up the blinking, white street, which drowsed in a languishment as of slow cud-chewing opium-eaters. Failing to find the house, they turned back, and questioned two women who, with elbows akimbo, expatiated by the gurgling pump. Far-sunken now, those two, down into the dim dark: but there on that hot mid-day in Colnbrook street, they did authentically discuss, minutely careful, with rough arms akimbo.

From the church-yard to the presbytère there wound a little path through the screen of yews. Along this went Fitz, Mac, and Bonner.

They were three hours behind the fugitives, for the reason that it had taken Fitz two hours to dig up the King’s-letters buried by Bessie at Kew. The letters Fitz had given into the keeping of Bonner for safety, since he himself anticipated more fighting, and possible death. But as for Bessie’s missive— ‘The real and only Fitzgerald is sure a gentleman’ — he had put it into his own pouch.

They had then taken to horse, and ridden hard for Colnbrook. And down the path through the yews they went to the presbytère.

“Tis sure they are gone onward by now,’ said Mac, ‘for why should they linger here to be captured?’

‘Sure enough,’ said Fitz.

‘Except the good Bess tarry for confession before Vespers,’ suggested Bonner.

‘Tush!’ answered Mac, ‘you lisp like an urchin. Folk tarry not to make confession when fears urge them forward.’

‘Which proves that you know naught of Bess: for she’s devout as a seraph, and bold as a dragon-fly.’

‘Being devout as a seraph, she hath naught to confess,’ said Fitz.

‘Hath she not on her conscience the stealing of thy letters, addle-pate?’

‘But being bold as a dragon-fly, she will cry “buzz!” to her conscience.’

‘Oh, they will sure not be here,’ said Mac: ‘yet no harm to question the good Father,’

They had arrived at a low odd-gabled manse, buried in greenery; they knocked.

The Father in person opened. He was a broad-faced old man, red and stout, with defiant, autocrat eyes.

‘What make you, friends?’ he asked aggressively.

‘We seek a pair of girls and a wizard-man, who were here three hours gone, Father,’

‘By what authority?’

‘By the King’s,’

‘Deliver me your warrant,’

‘We have no warrant,’

‘Then are ye mere strolling Corinthians. Get you gone,’

‘Nay, ’tis insolently said, Father. Abase, prithee, that high stomach. Are the maidens here — yea or no?’

‘And an they be? Here, Grip — at ’em, dog!’

The priest whistled. A huge ban-dog bounded bristling from nowhere, and was sprawling in the air, making with vicious spring for Bonner’s throat. But it dropped in two wheeling parts. Fitzgerald's sword had whisked through its neck.

'Father, are the maidens here — yea or nay? We take your sacred word,' said Mac.

'I will not give it,'

'Then we search the manse.'

The priest dapped loudly three times.

"Tis a signal to the fugitives, Fitz!" cried Mac. "They are here, sure!"

'In, then!' responded Fitz, with rising colour.

The two brushed past the priest, and went with prone outlook, ransacking every room and nook. Only one locked door checked them: it was a great Gothic portal of thick oak, barred and studded with iron, the entrance to the priest's library.

'They are behind this door,' said Mac.

"Tis so, Mac, but naught less than a culverin could bring it down,"

'Hi, there, hi!' cried Mac, pounding.

There was no answer.

'What now, Mac?' said Fitz. 'By the Rood, I have a deadly thirst. Let us e'en ravish the curate's buttery.'

'Nay, to the inn, Fitz. Escape us now they cannot, if once we get them from this hole. Let us away, and consult.'

They started for the Rose and Nettle, not fifty yards away; but the priest, jumping to a conclusion, hurried to the fugitives with the news that the searchers, failing to find them, had ridden off in further pursuit. Mauro Calvo supposed that his scheme had now succeeded; he resolved to tarry there till nightfall, and then proceed leisurely on his way behind his pursuers. Meantime, Macdonald, feeding at the Rose and Nettle, with the environs of the presbytere under his eye, said: 'Faith, Fitz, here's what I see not: wherefore squandered they three good hours waiting here?'

'God knows. The alchymist tarried to marry with little Bess on the road, mayhap.'

'They must have had some design, sure?'

'God knows.'

'I have explained to you that the good Bess tarried to confess.' said Bonner with demure smirk.

'To confess her envy of the kisses her sister hath sipped of thy cherry lips, boysie,' remarked Fitz.

'Nay, 'tis rather thy rough warrior-busses that the little Bess would be after: for she hath writ thee a letter of amorous, challenge that laughs while it weeps, for saith she: "The real and only Fitzgerald is sure a—"'

'A truce to that, boysie!'

'But by the eleven Virgins!' cried Mac suddenly, 'if the boy hath reason, after all?'

'How mean you, Mac?'

'If Bess hath not indeed tarried to confess, but if, being for whatever reason here, she do confess.'

'Well, what then?'

'Why, then we have her! and having her, we have her sister.'

'How have we her?'

'Gramercy, we seize her in the church.'

'Bah! Bess is too wary a wyepe for that. If she be indeed bent upon confession, she steals like a wind to the church, and there hides in some locked nook of the sacristy, till her turn come.'

'But as she kneels confessing, we grab her!'

'But the old priest whisks her into his box, and slams us out'

‘Then we lay siege to the box!’

‘She escapes by some little door or trap-door, and leaves us whistling,’

‘Then, by blood and nails, we pinion the priest beforehand!’

‘Say’st thou?’

‘Aye, by thunder! We lie in wait about the manse, and as the old Father steps out, we gag and bind him. Then I don his robes and hie to the confession-box, there to wait till the lass comes kneeling: then I have her.’

‘Aye, ’twill do — an she come,’

‘She will— ’tis odds she will. The boy, who knows her manners, says it. And ’tis her first occasion since she stole the letters,’

‘But ’tis I will don the curate’s robes,’

‘Thou?’

‘Aye, Mac.’

‘As thou wilt. But wherefore not I?’

‘Oh, I wot not. Swipes! ’twere like a morris-dance o’ May-day to hear Bess lisp confession!’

‘But, Fitz, thou wilt not fail the King?’

‘Fail? I?’

‘Once afore hast failed him with his letters, lad: a second time were a wee too much—’

‘Sure, ’tis not to me thou pratest, Mac? I fail? By the sacred wounds! I’ll pin the misproud little minx, I swear, as rudely as a beagle his hare o’ Christmas Eve!’ Fitz said it angrily, and Mac went: ‘H’m!’

All day they kept close in the inn till the dusk deepened, then went out on foot.

As the Father put a leg from his threshold, he was seized in vigorous arms. As his mouth opened to roar, it was dumb.

Without noise they laid him in a near room of the presbytère, after taking his hat, surtout, and beads.

Mac, with Bonner in tow, ran to lurk among the yews, if perchance Bessie should pass, that he might seize her.

Bessie, however, sat already in the church, easy of capture without the trick of the confessional: for she supposed the pursuing party gone far past Colnbrook by now, and an hour before the liers-in-wait had come to lurk among the trees round the manse had gone openly to the holy place, to string together and lay up for herself in heaven that day a long litany and treasure of devotions.

As for Fitz, he hied to the church in the black frock. As he passed, a sexton tending the graves doffed his hat. The evening dusk had deepened.

Through a side-door Fitz flitted into the sacristy. He flung on indiscriminately the priest's alb and chasuble and stole hanging there; thence he slipped by an open door into the confessional.

It was a small den, with one window and two doors. In two adjacent sides were two little gratings fitted with sliding shutters, one of them in one of the doors. Fitz made sure by trial that this door opened and swung freely, that he might pounce out with quick ease. In the den, by the gratings, were two high-backed, old, brown-oak chairs. He sat, drew back a shutter, and his small blue eyes twinkled.

A buxom village-wife came; and, kneeling on a hassock outside, said:

‘Prithee, Father, give me thy blessing, for I have sinned—’

Fitz muttered a deep monotone. Sitting with averted face, he said:

‘Say an act of contrition, daughter.’

Here and now the dusk had grown to a brown, religious gloom. She confessed to ‘scolding,’ related her part in a brawl, and a night of perry, and an opus carnis. With smitten breast she said her ‘Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa.’

Fitz, in absolution, muttered a longer monotone of indistinguishable nonsense-words, and imposed a chemin de croix. The woman, with an upward glance of question, went away.

Fitz closed that shutter and opened the other. There a woman knelt, confessed, and went away.

Then, with bowed head, came Bessie Ford, and knelt, with a ‘Prithee, Father, give me thy blessing, for I have sinned—’

There spread a pallor under the tan of Fitzgerald’s face.

The very last tints of the summer - evening sun shone through the stained needle-window, and lotioned her smooth hair in a vision of faint other-world hues.

Fitzgerald’s will was on the spring to seize her then and there, but his body sat still. Imitating the priest’s gruff voice, he bid her say her Act Then she confessed in a voice lowly as the moaning evening breeze.

Her crimes were deep-dyed before God, red as crimson: she admitted two — the sin of Theft, and the sin of Idolatry.

She had stolen some King’s-letters from the cloak of a fighting-man in order to save from him her sister, Laura Ford; and she adored Laura Ford sinfully, with idolatrous lechery, as the creature should not be adored, but only the Creator.

‘But in thus abstracting the letters thou didst treason to the King,’ Fitzgerald growled in the voice of the Father.

“’Twas for my sister.’

‘And thou broughtest anigh the Tyburn tippet the poor fighting - man’s neck from which thou stolest them.’

Her bent head bent very low; her voice dropped to the lowliest whisper:

“Twas for my sister.’
‘So, an ‘twere to do again, wouldst do it?’
‘Why, Father, I fear me — yea.’
‘Then art thou not truly contrite.’
‘Oh, I am crooked as sin, Father, and the root of evil is rank within me.’
‘Not truly contrite, I say. What! wouldst again brave the King’s wrath?’
‘Oh, the King’s wrath, Father, that your poor penitent could lightly abye, an that were all! The King’s wrath frights me not a toe.’
‘But the wrath of God—’
‘Aye mi! ’tis there, by my credit, that my sickness of soul is evidently seen, good Father, since for that girl’s sake I would even rush upon the damnation of Hell.’
‘What! and writhe in flames for ever under the pitiless pelt of Christ?’
‘Oh, ’tis my soul’s flaw! By my credit, ’tis my nature’s fault, good
Father!’
‘Why, ’tis a wondrous love. ’Tis a wild and deathly passion!’
‘She is my little sister — she is all I have — I die every moment for her!’
“Tis a rank idolatry!’
‘Father, ’tis a most wicked idolatry.’
“Tis a most noble idolatry!’
‘Say you, Father?’
’Tis a most divine idolatry!’
‘Then, Father, you absolve me? Oh, my heart! But the wicked theft,
Father?’
“Twas a glorious theft! Oh, ’twas a most brave and royal theft!’
‘From the poor gentman, Father, whose life I thus imperilled?’
‘From the wretched caitiff who would have robbed thee of thy lamb!
Curse him!— ’twas nobly done!’

“’Twas not, then, Father, a most deadly sin?’

‘Contradict me not. ’Twas most virtuously achieved— ’twas highly transacted! Oh, to think of it, it troubleth the eyes! But that poor fighting-man, tell me, hadst thou no thought for him and his peril?’

‘I had, yes: not at that moment, but afterwards — even with tears.’

‘What, tears, thou sayest?’

Her voice dropped to a lower whisper:

‘Why, Father, yes—’

‘Tears for him?’

Her lips moved, but without sound.

‘What is his name?’

‘He is called Garrett Oge Fitzgerald.’

‘Thou knowest him well, then?’

‘Well.’

‘And thou bearest him no secret malice in thy heart?’

‘Oh, I! none.’

‘What! And he would have ravished thee of thy idol!’

“’Tis a gentman of gallant and bounteous temperament, Father, tossed on impulses. If evil be within him, methinks it cannot be deep — oh, no, no. Or, it may be — I wot naught of him.’

‘Thou said’st that thou knowest him well.’

‘I think — I thought so. It may be — I wot not at all, Father. How should such as I wot of a gentman such as he? He is even now hunting after me as a goss-hawk hunts a linnet—’

‘Why, ’tis most foully done!’

“’Tis hard— ’tis very hard. But, by my credit, I say not ’tis foully done.’

‘Oh, ’tis a most miscreant crime!’

‘He but obeys the King’s behest, good Father. He is the King’s sworn servant—’

Down sledged Fitzgerald’s fist upon the chair-arm, and—’ A murrain on the dirty King!’ he cried, with red face, in his natural voice. ‘Oh, generous Bess! Oh, large and wholesome Bess!’

Bess then, for the first time, glanced upward. It was dark: the hues from the window were all dead gray: but his voice she knew, and felt.

In his passion he made a movement to rush to her: a movement infinitely sad and tragic in its final results. He had come to seize her, and she had won him: but his rush impressed her only with the fact that he had come to seize her.

A crazy instinct that his words of sympathy were only part of the whole ruse flitted instantly through her brain: and she was gone like a roe — he after her.

She dodged behind the sacrarium, leapt the altar-rail, and he lost her in the dark church. He went trotting after her, calling woefully: ‘Good Bess! Sweet Bess!’ Then out from the church he ran, his eyes swimming in tears, towards the yews; and to meet him ran Mac and Bonner.

Fitz put both hands on Mac’s shoulders, holding him away. He could not speak; a lump in his throat struggled with his spittle.

‘How now! the maiden, Fitz!’

‘Oh, ’tis the rarest spirit!’

‘Fitz, thou — !’

‘Hear me, Mac; hear a man—’

‘Hast sure not failed again, Fitz?’

‘Hear me. We cannot hunt her more, nor thou, nor I. She said there was no ill in me, Mac; that the ill in me was not deep; “oh, no, no,” said she.’

‘But, Fitz—’

“Tis a very angel, Mac. She’d move and melt Beelzebub. Oh, if thou couldst hear but one half her gentle, gentle whisperings that I have heard but now!’

Mac’s eyes glinted keen, like cold steel, between his lids in critical, close thought.

‘Well, and what said she?’

‘She said that for love of the little Sis, Mac, she’d brave, not only the wrath of ten thousand Kings, but the eternal wrath of God Himself!’

‘Well, ’twas boldly said.’

‘And she said that like goss-hawks hunting a poor little linnet — a poor little fluttering linnet, Mac, coz — so thou and I were hunting her.’

‘Said she that?’

‘The little thing, Mac! the little helpless soul, my friend. Oh, by God — no more! no more!’

‘I avouch, ’tis piteous.’

‘Aye, but hear the whole! Hear a man out! She said ’twas not foully done, Mac. “Nay,” said she, “by my credit, I say not ’tis foully done: for they but do the King’s behests, being his sworn men.”’

‘Said she that, verily?’

‘She said it, Mac. She sought pretexts and loving pleadings for rude, unmanly tykes like thee and me.’

Mac’s glinting eyes moved between their lids in close, keen reflection.

‘Well, ’twas finely said.’

‘Then draw thy sword, Macdonald!’

‘And wherefore?’

‘Bonner, boysie, draw thy sword!’

‘But wherefore?’ reiterated Mac.

‘To take oath with me, who am thy true friend and ingie, James Macdonald. Hunt her without me thou wilt not, sure; and hunt her more with me thou shalt not, by the Holy Rood of Christ! Swear, then, with me, that we escort them into safety now, and, now and always, with our bodies do succour, shield, and champion them against Cardinal, or Pope, or King, or Hell, with all their dastard myrmidons. Swear — wilt thou?’

‘Nay, but this is rash impulse that will pass. Faith, faith, I act not in that way, Fitz.’

Fitz put his arm close about his friend’s neck.

‘Come, Mac, come, coz — for me, if not for her. Drop that hard brow, and be still thy old friend’s friend. Else draw thy blade and stick me!’

Fitz persuaded, as he fought, like a whirlwind. He had a will as passionate as the will of Bessie Ford, whom he championed.

‘Fitz, Fitz,’ said Mac, ‘hast weighed all the awful consequences of this change? The King—’

‘Consequences! King! But nay, Mac: men of rich blood think not of Kings and consequences — never, lad, never! A poor little thing, in sore distress, most chaste, most sweet, braving all alone in her innocence the high Puissances of the land that hunt her, hath need of us. Consequences, quotha?’

Mac studied the ground with slanting frown, perplexed. Suddenly he threw up his head. His pressed lips were smiling.

“Tis heroically said, Fitz, lad! But remember: I, if I swear, abye my oath, not for a day or two, but for ever.’

‘For ever, aye! There ’twas Mac that spake. Draw, draw, my brave!’

In a moment three swords, with rushing sound, leapt into the air. Three mouths kissed the hilts.

‘I swear!’ cried Mac.

‘I swear!’ cried Bonner.

‘By God’s light, I swear!’ cried Fitz.

CHAPTER XVI

THE ESCAPE

‘FLY, FAIR LADIES! Oh, fly! fly!’

SHAKESPEARE.

THE swords dropped back into their scabbards.

‘Our first gear must be to hie to the manse,’ said Fitz, ‘and acquaint them that we fight now, not against, but for them.’

‘This night shall I see Laura!’ cried Bonner, with backward-shaken head and wriggling locks; ‘we shall have long rendezvous beneath the trees.’

‘And to-morrow night beneath the sheets, boysie: for, by the Rood, the good Father here shall wed ye before another sunset.’

‘Sheets or trees ’tis indifferent, sir: both being conductors of lightning in their way.’

‘Yet hold to sheet-lightning, boysie, as the less dangerous of the two sorts. Only, who then shall be my sweetheart, when Laura takes thee from me?’

‘I will give thee the little Bess,’ said Bonner with his smirk.

‘A truce to that, boy!’ growled Fitz.

And Mac went: ‘H’m!’

They ran up the three green-black wooden steps of the front gable, and into the manse.

‘What if they be gone?’ said Mac.

‘But nay, Bess cannot have yet returned from the church to bid them fly,’ said Fitz: ‘thou and Bonner must have spied her in the coming. They will be here.’

Bess, however, had returned. From the church, dreading an ambush among the yews, she had warily made a wide, breathless détour, speeding down the village street, and so round to the back of the manse. She had entered it with the word ‘fly’ panting to start from her tongue-tip.

In her passage, she saw the priest lying bound on the floor. A bitter ‘Fie! Oh, fie!’ directed against Fitzgerald, passed her lips. Wild as she was to be away, she stopped, and in an agony of flurry freed the kerchiefed mouth and bound limbs. A moment after, in the room where Calvo sat, the palpitating prone word burst loose, and ‘Fly!’ she cried, ‘oh, fly!’ Hence, when the three searchers now approached the great library-door, they saw it this time open. At the same moment the old priest, with quick step and menacing scowl, came up. He lifted his hand to utter anathemas.

‘Nay, ’tis useless, Father,’ said Fitz; ‘now we are nothing but your friends. Where lurk the maidens and the wizard-man?’

‘Gone, ye lilburns! gone, ye daws — !’

‘Bah! ’tis false—’

But it was true. The next moment, hearing a thud of hoofs, all rushed to a library-window to see.

From a little outhouse, where the mule and horses had been secreted, the girls and Calvo were just galloping off. Fitzgerald sent after them a passionate cry:

‘Hi! good Bess, halt! Hi, girl, hi!’

Two seconds, and the fugitives were hidden behind trees.

‘And we without a blessed nag!’ moaned Fitzgerald. ‘To our inn, Fitz, for the steeds!’ cried Mac. ‘They ride but sorry tits: in ten minutes we shall be up with them!’

Back to the Rose they ran, were delayed some minutes in trapping their horses and paying their score, then mounted, and, with loose rein, were away.

As they went off, the landlord, lounging by the inn-door, remarked to a neighbour:

‘So God me save! there be brisk riding about country to-day with one and another of them!’

‘What’s stirring?’

“Tis my question, too. Yon’s the third cavalcade to-day. This morning, foreday, comes a troop of three gallants, and ko one: “Landlord, hast thou in herbergage two maidens a-horse, with bare heads, and a man a-mule in skull-cap?”

“No,” ko I. “Then,” ko he to his mates, “are they fled onward to Slough,” and away they hie. Then, it being none in the afternoon, come those three who have even now ridden off; and it is twenty minutes ago, another five, with the self-same question anent the two maidens with bare head, and the man in skull-cap.’

‘What answered you to those?’

‘Why, that I wot naught of the matter. “Then,” ko one of the five, “are they fled onward to Slough.” And away in deathly haste they hie.’

‘Why, ’tis a very plague of scampering crosscountry cavalcades.’

“Tis so.’

‘But hold! Did not Dame Higginbottom’s grandchild aver that old Gaffer Meux had babbled somewhat of three folks asking the way to the manse—’

‘By St. Hubert!’ cried the landlord, ‘I’m a lost spirit if here comes not yet another troop o’ them — !’

In a minute a sweating cavalcade of six drew rein at the inn-door. They desired to know whether the landlord knew aught of a party of two maidens with bare head and a man in skull-cap. They were Alvarada’s party, with Sir John Perrot and four others.

The foreday party of three, of whom the landlord spoke, were Wolsey-gallants; the evening party of five were Anne’s emissary, Percy of Northumberland, with four serving-men.

At about eleven that night Du Ballay arrived at Colnbrook with a party of six knights.

Meantime, even as mine host of the Rose answered the fierce queries of Sir John Perrot, Fitz, Mac, and Bonner, with loose rein, were hot in loving pursuit upon the trail of the fugitives.

But now the twilight had deepened almost into night, and the girls were quite lost to sight.

Calvo, in the; urgent moment of his flight, had left the main Bath Road, and now was travelling hotly through bye-ways, across country, with a very vague idea of direction.

Here the Bucks country undulates in hillocks, rendering escape easier.

‘Ride, Mac, like furies!’ cried Fitz. ‘Miss them now we must not! Spur, spur, Bonner!’

‘An we miss them, captured they will be, certes, wizard or no wizard,’ answered Mac. ‘Royal Harry will sweep the country with five, with fifty thousand men, an need be, till he have them. Anyway, Fitz, we’ve entered on a biggish game of shovel-board!’ ‘Thou falterest not?’

‘I? No.’

‘On, then,’

‘Give rein, lad!’

They went in single file, pattering through a winding lane of soft, dried mud. In reality, they were in no danger of missing the fugitives, for they were galloping in the right direction, though on a different path, and their cattle were travelling greatly faster.

And suddenly clear sheen overspread the country from a risen moon, and as they came to a wide level of hedged meadow-land, out cries Macdonald:

‘There, Fitz, are they — near ahead — to the left!’

‘I see. But, blood and nails—’

‘Look!’ cried Bonner excitedly.

‘Oh, they are pursued!’ exclaimed Mac with conviction; ‘there’s fighting, Fitz!’

Still further to the left, galloping obliquely upon the fugitives, appeared a party of cavaliers, five in number, somewhat nearer to the fugitives than Fitz and Mac. They were Percy of Northumberland and his four.

There was nothing to do but cut them off, by taking three hedges, a five-barred gate, and the intervening fields. And at the first bend of the path, over a bramble-hedge with easy vault slid Fitz, and over after him, in supple succession, slid Mac and Bonner with easy vaults. And now, with deep-driven spur, they scampered across field, bounding the hedges in supple succession, Fitz foremost. And ‘Hi, there! stop, stop, or we fight!’ called Fitzgerald in clear bell-tones when he was near. But young Percy, not being of a mettle that stops, advanced: and in another moment there sounded the shock of their meeting.

Percy’s men were themselves galloping in mid-field, but, intent upon the fugitives, had held their course till nearly the last. They were, therefore, caught in demi-flank, and at once two riderless horses went trotting across the meadow.

Two fighting-men fastened upon Macdonald, and the steels of Fitz and Percy met. Bonner, too, with chilly heart, had drawn sword, and, at the first shock, given one blind hack at someone's armoured back without effect. Then, as if of its own accord, his horse had backed: and quiet sat Bonner with lifted sword and vigilant eyes and panting nostrils, as who should say: "Twere dangerous to approach me, yet prithee do it not."

At the same time, Mac did battle with a demi-lance on one flank, a bill on the other. Under these conditions his defence was as faulty as the light was dim. The lance pricked his horse's shoulder; in the rear-up he received a wound through his mail on the breastbone, and he tumbled backwards over his croupe.

That moment would have been Percy's last — for his battle-axe was wheeling away in air, and Fitz had his two-handed sword heaved almost behind his back to hew once and make an end — but there rang a shrill, affrighted cry of 'Clubs! clubs!', and the blow did not descend. The cry was Bonner's, upon whom Mac's victors were riding full. Like tempest flew Fitzgerald to his aid, and it was astonishing in what swift succession the two men tumbled dead. Of one he ripped the abdomen; the other he split through helm and brain. At once he turned back to Percy: but Percy saw, not only Fitz, but Mac on foot running upon him; and he was wounded in the forearm, and weaponless. He at once turned and fled.

Mac's trained horse, meantime, had run away but a short distance. The three, without delay, started in renewed chase after the girls. But in the short interval of the fight Calvo had descended behind a hill-slope, and there cunningly changed his course. Fitz, Mac, and Bonner scoured the country till far into the morning: but the dear fugitives were lost to them.

CHAPTER XVII

WANDERINGS

‘DEAR IS MY little native vale, The ring-dove builds and murmurs there;
Close to my cot she tells her tale, To every passing villager.

The squirrel leaps from tree to tree, And shells his nuts at liberty.’
ROGERS.

IN a week Calvo had traversed the spur of Berks which separates Bucks from Hampshire. To not one of his pursuers was either his direction or his exact position now known, though, ever and anon, as he journeyed, rumours of armed cavalcades, galloping hot, and reining for hurried inquiries, reached his ears at the taverns. One or more of the parties, it was clear, had preceded him; the others, he guessed, were near him, behind or around.

He reached Coxton in safety, a hamlet south of Odiham, umbrageously sequestered in a little deep-wooded Hampshire vale. They arrived at matins, and being miserably weary, Calvo threw himself upon a mattress in the dim loft — a piled chaos of odorous hay — to which guests were conducted. And Laura’s lovely head dropped near his knee; her pale-rose lips opened; she breathed in heavy sleep.

Bessie, however, did not drop in sleep. Three hours later, when Calvo and Laura awoke and hurriedly descended, she was not to be seen. They called; Calvo fretted; the animals, brought round to the inn-door, waited.

Calvo, with irritable brow, went down the side passage into the long inn-yard, cobble-paved, behind. There, by the pump, stooped hard-souled little Bess, intently washing and kneading with turned-up sleeves; a heap of washed woollens, hems, and linens was near her; and the landlord's wife stood inspecting the Augean work, arms akimbo.

'Come there, come!' cried Calvo peevishly. 'What make you there at all? You keep me waiting!'

'Oh...!' leapt from Bessie's mouth. She ran with a swift whisper to the woman, and then to Calvo; behind him she walked in silence to the horses.

Calvo asked the way to another village of the landlord, went a little in that direction, and then turned another way. This was a ruse continually adopted to baulk his pursuers.

'What made you with that washing?' he asked on the road.

Bessie averted her face. Her fifteen crowns — their all — was spent. She had implored of the landlord's wife the washing job to settle for Calvo's and Laura's hay-bed.

'Sure, Master Calvo—' she faltered.

Calvo was the most unpractical of men, with a head in the clouds. That the fifteen crowns with which Bessie paid their way might fail did not occur to him.

'Whatever could have been your motive for keeping me waiting in that way?' he said with corrective severity.

Bess could not answer. Laura gaily pointed out an aspiring lark.

'Oh, 'tis minion!' quoth she, grinning sweetly; "'Tis a frolic chansonnette!'

'Silence, you, with your face,' said Calvo.

But at Witton, four leagues thence, concealment as to the state of the exchequer was no longer possible. The supper and cider could not be paid for.

‘But, thou silly daw, why didst not tell me before?’ asked Calvo.

‘Sure, you have gear enow to occupy you, Master Calvo, by my credit, without curing of these things.’

‘So that was the secret of the washing at Coxton, when thou wert sore travel-worn, hey?’

‘Not that I was so travel-worn, Master Calvo; for, by my credit, I have a tight back-bone, too, though minion in stature,’

‘Well, well. Thou art a Bess. We shall see.’

That night they slept at Witton. The next morning Calvo slung his russet-leather bag to his back in evil humour, and went out afoot. Bessie, who was up, seeing him, followed wondering, and he, seeing her, turned and said:

‘This is rigolo! To think that a man like me should go gadding forth to trap halfpennies like some vile zany or touring punchinello!’

‘Oh! is that your purpose, Master — ?’

’Tis need that I feed thee, I suppose, girl? and that maudit sister of thine, who eats like the seven elephants of King Sut? What hast done with all the money thou hadst, hey?’

‘Sure, sir, ’tis a miracle — what with horses’ provender—’

‘And sea-swallow pasties for that sister, hey? and thou thyself thinning with meagre fastings, like the Mater Dolorosa! What atest thou yester-eve?’

‘A great portion of rye bread, sir, thick with rich Hampshire butter, and nigh a pint of ale to swill it,’

‘No viand, then?’

“’Twas a Friday, Master Calvo—”

‘Nay, then, I have no further interest in thee and thy affairs! Do as thou wilt, thou stiff and naughty spirit! Friday, quotha. ’Twas not too much Friday, methinks, to stuff thy sister with boiled picarell, and duck, and Rhenish, hey? And myself also — well, well—’

They had reached the street-top. Calvo took from the bag a little stick of brass, and a brass bowl of carved Hindoo work. With the stick the sage beat a ran-tan on the bowl. Something pathetic there was in that beating in mid-street, and something incongruous with those sage, calm owl-eyes, and with the bulging brow where dwelt Reason, and with the savant’s skull-cap, concealing all his hair.

By his side stood Bessie, rather pale. Her ‘natte’ of plaited hair — long as a hand — was tied with a little bow of black ribbon.

Faces began to look from tiny sweet casements, lovely as that old dead England. Calvo beat his ran-tan.

Presently there was movement in the street, a tendency toward him. As the moon the tides, as the piper his rats, so he drew them. For such is the interest of Man in Man.

In ten minutes there was an agitated crowd before him. Calvo handed the bowl to Bessie, and, eyeing them calmly, he said:

‘I wish you joy, friends, for the lucky fortune which has brought me into your midst this day. I am a physicianer, trained at the feet of the illustrious Magister Antonio Bartolomeo of Padua, who discovered the philosopher’s-stone. I am known at the Universities of Padua, Paris, Boulogne, Orléans, Montpellier, Salamanca, and Bourges. I am a distiller of simples of every sort and species. I am a witch-finder, a necromancer, and a cheiromancer. I possess the secret of the grand magisterium, and I sell talismans and cabalas, tessaras and amulets, that counteract the Evil Eye. I cure the King’s-evil and the dance of St. Vitus. In this magic bag which ye even now behold is that orviétan, or miraculous Venice-treacle, which is the antidote for all poisons; there is saltartare, argaile, cinoper, alkaly, and that arsenic, which, taken in small doses, protects from cold feet at night, but in large, has just the contrary effect. There also is turmeric, gum-mastic, marygold, sorrels, burnett, rue, hartshorn, spavin, and every wholesome medicament that completes the mediciner's elaboratory. Come, friends, open your purses; open, open. For a groat I cure the lumbago with the marvellous unguent of the Magister Sachs of Amsterdam; for a groat the sweating-sickness; for three halfpence I strike a cow with the plegia, by means of the famous abracadabra of the Persian magi, or else by common witch's-elm. Open, open: set briskly to it. Here are plasters, spasmadraps, waters, lotions, solutions, decoctions, ointments, poultices, and clysters. I tell fortunes, not solely by palmistry, but by the stars, being skilled to astrologize, or star-gaze; and I cure cast-in-the-eye by virtue of a magic sapphire-stone, discovered on Mount Ararat by the great Hasn-us-Sabah. Draw near: open, open. I see a good man yonder with rheumy nostrils: him will I medicine with an electuary of honey, olive-oil, and mint. Another hath the air of one who mourneth after a stray sheep: I am a discoverer of stolen goods by the Greek method, and a tracer of strayed animals by the Tartar method of striking the spittle. Another, as I see, hath the toothache, for the wrench of grief is in that wry jaw: him will I cure with the panacea of the Dominie Y'hudah Benisrael, else will I draw the evil fang with a waxed hemp tied in a knot which I learned in the Lazarro at Salamanca; for you, gammer, with the jaundiced face and dull eye, I have an elixir decocted from the Mexican herb — —'

'Ha! ha! ha! Tis all false!' cried a most weird, shrill voice, whose laugh ended in a wail.

Calvo looked up calmly.

“‘Believe not all you hear” is a good proverb, friends,’ said he, ‘yet “Disbelieve not all” were a better proverb still. There now sits a young man on a horse who would have none of me, and my nostrums, and my catholicons; yet that young man, believe me, is suffering agonies through all the nerves of his face; and, an he would but come to me, in two seconds would I, without recompense, send him laughing on ‘his journey,’

’Tis Flying Sidney?’ said one of the crowd.

’Tis crazy Sidney Boleyn of Ormond!’ went the rumour.

He had come galloping at a frantic pace through the village, and, seeing the crowd, had drawn rein to listen.

He was an extremely thin lad, with the blank pallor of wax, with eyes large, wild, black, and elfin, and a ribbed suggestion of outstanding sinews about his meagre face and jaw.

His movements had in them the swiftness of a spirit’s. The words of invitation were hardly out of Calvo’s mouth, when Boleyn had flung himself from his horse, and was standing before the sage.

‘Here am I, quacksalver! cure me!’ he said in his high, trilling cry.

‘You perceive, he calls me quacksalver,’ said Calvo to the crowd: ‘now we shall see.’

‘Shall what see? Zany! Saltimbanque! Charlatan!’

‘He calls me, you see—’

‘Arlequin! Polichinelle! Buffo! Pantalon!’

‘Calm your excitement. I am not altogether a pantalon — not altogether a charlatan.’

‘Why, thou art!’

‘No. Have I reason in saying that you have a torment, or nevralgia, in the face?’

‘Yea.’

‘And this many a year?’

‘Since I was born.’

‘Swallow that.’

Calvo, having dived into his bag, had taken out a box divided into squares. From two squares he took vials, and mixed a few drops of the liquids in a piggin.

Sidney Boleyn, with a wild hilarity of mockery and desperation, tossed the brown fluid down his throat.

There followed an interval so long as when a man swallows some novel wine and ponders the flavour in his gorge, gazing into nothingness. The crowd gaped silent. Calvo put back the vials and reclosed the box.

As he did so, Boleyn burst into passionate tears, and dropped, as if shot, to his knees. For the first time for twenty years he felt rest, he experienced sanity.

Calvo patted the bowed head. Bessie’s eyes filled with tears of worship. The half-crazy lad sobbed piteously. After two minutes he raised himself, walked to his horse without a word, and went down the street with bent head, holding the bridle.

‘Now, good friends, you see—’ said Calvo.

They had seen: and during an hour he did good trade, the coins raining into Bessie’s bowl. As they walked to return to the inn, Calvo said: ‘Well, now, you see, we are rich. No more hard washing, then, for little travel-worn lasses; and the sister with the face shall gorge herself with pasties,’ Ah, my master,’ quoth she, ‘great you are, and good—’

‘Well, well. But hullo! here is our man after us again—’

Sidney Boleyn was following deferentially, pervaded with his new surprise of painlessness, bowed with gratitude, full of adoration, behind them.

‘Well, does that go well?’ asked Calvo dryly.

‘Yes! yes!’

‘Don’t call me charlatan again, then. What is your name?’

‘Sidney Boleyn.’

‘What, not a son of Sir Thomas?’

‘Yes.’

‘And brother to the Lady Anne?’

‘A half-brother.’

‘H’m! And what make you here, so far from home?’

‘Oh, I am always far from home. I never leave the saddle — I am crazy — I fly — I fly always. I am a servitor in my father’s household: but they let me go, and I ride, ride. They know my pain.’

‘Well, poor lad! Keep courage. And when the pain comes again—’

‘It will come again?’

‘I fear me sa’

‘Ah! But I reckon not! I have felt pleasure! I shall remember this hour! Master, what is your name?’

‘I do not wish it known: but I will tell you, since you are my friend. I am called Mauro Calvo.’

‘Mauro Calvo — I have heard the name. May I come — ?’

‘Nay, nay. But return to your home, taking these liquids, which, mixed a few drops each with each, will relieve the pain, and it return. Good-bye.’

He gave the two vials, and the young man went reluctantly away, leading his horse.

CHAPTER XVIII

PALM SUNDAY AT MIDSUMMER

‘FAR FROM THE madding crowd’s ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
Along the cool sequestered vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.
GRAY.

FROM Witton, in a south-west direction, the nearest village is Skipley Rising; and here the fugitives spent a night.

The next day, on the road from Skipley Rising to Littlebush, passing between two chalk ridges, they saw above them a horseman, who, though he vanished, appeared to follow.

It was Sidney Boleyn, known through Hampshire as Flying Sidney.

Caught in a sort of fascination for the Magister who had given him painlessness, he was hanging in this way upon the course of Calvo, tracking him from point to point. The fugitives got to be aware of his furtive and Jack-o’-lantern attendance, though, having once been dismissed by Calvo, he did not sufficiently approach for speech. But by the time they reached Hadleigh-Stoy, some rumour, or new whim, must have enticed his flighty brain, for, for some days, he disappeared.

About here the country dips into a succession of vast vales, almost saucer-shaped, each an entity in itself, shut away from the world. Viewed from the encircling hills, each spreads out in dreamy panorama of uberant oak-land, toy pastures and orchards, bosky dingles, wheat-field and stream, knoll and lake — all delicately and daintily distinct, like images mirrored in an eye — an earth in little, good to smell, melting afar in azure haze — at which the sight swooûs with love: the difference between now and then being an enormous decrease now in the proportion of forest to the whole, the villages then being quite buried away in umbrages.

Still on ambled Calvo, from hamlet to hamlet, tending south-westward always, cheating day after day his pursuers by nothing but a marvel of luck, ever and anon, as he went, bringing forth his bag, ringing his ran-tan, and dryly prophesying lies which were partly true.

But at Mede Down, which lies nearly at the centre and bottom of Arling Vale, he received a warning.

‘Sure,’ said a little apple-cheeked inn-chamberlain to Bessie, ‘you be the very souls with which a party of three gentmen would be coming up.’

‘Mamie,’ said Bess, ‘oh mi! and when were they here?’

‘Yester-eve, near compline.’

‘And what asked they?’

‘Had we seen, ko they, aught of a pair of damsels ahorse with bare head, and a man a-mule with skull-cap.’

‘And how looked they, mamie?’

‘Two were martialists, sure; and one a stripling with flowing blonde locks, and burning-red lips, and eyes large, pleasing to the regard.’

‘A stripling with flowing blonde locks — ? I cannot divine—’

She thought of Mark Bonner, but could not imagine how he could be in the company of two fighting-men, following her.

‘What had he on for apparel?’ she asked.

‘A princox sarcenet doublet, a velvet cap, and threadbare hose.’

‘Sure — sure— ’twas Bonner! And he was with the martialists, say you? — in their company?’

‘Even so.’

‘And they — how looked they, mamie?’

‘One was small-knit in comparison with the other, who is mighty and deep-chested, and hath a walk like a lazy, laggard, swaggering giant-man; but the steps of the small one are quick and neat,’

‘My mother! — it is they — !’

‘You know them, methinks?’

‘Most like. What eyes had the great gallant!’

‘Small eyes — blue — very droll and twinkling, under à large bossy brow,’

‘Oh! ’twas he! And hair on the face — ?’

‘No hair on the face: and I should wot, for the malapert took the privy of kissing me,’

‘Of — ?’

‘Kissing me. And “Faith,” ko he, “a tasty little moppet, thou—”’

Bessie glanced quick with a half-terrified interest at her. In a moment it was over.

‘Sure, I pray thee divulge me none of thy lightnesses, girl,’ she said, turning away. ‘Is this the chamber. ’Twill serve. Prithee, get gone,’

‘Bessie, girl!’ cried Mauro Calvo from below. ‘Come! I start forth to the green,’

Calvo was going to harangue, and gather groats. As they set out, Bessie told him the inn-chamberlain’s tale.

‘Well, let the cattle come,’ answered Calvo, ‘all of them. But let ’em come quickly, an they love their skin’s salvation! for, an I be not far at fault, by this there is arrived in England a Sword that will make 'em skip a morris-dance to the tune of Placebo, Dilixi by St. Louis!'

Bessie did not understand, knowing naught of Calvo's summons to Francis of France. Later she understood.

He laid down his bag, and set to beat his ran-tan.

The village was in a singular state, which, as he had just arrived, he could not comprehend. Knots of twos and threes discussed in the open; yonder, by the little church-door near the green, sat two gammers with baskets containing box-twigs, and to everyone that came they handed a twig; box-twigs were in windows, in doors, in gabardines, in the hand. The church-bell was ringing in a tone of larum. Some stir was in the air. Three boys only gathered round Calvo.

Even these were in clean stiff buckrams; the poorest in decent Sunday trim of sober russet: yet it was not Sunday.

The bell ceased to ring; the last of the villagers trooped into the church. Calvo and Bess were left alone.

The high sun dappled the green with the vague wandering trellis-work of the chestnut-shadow, beneath which Calvo stood. All was sleepy, still. A sleepy breeze ran ruffling, with soft rush and vast rumours and raids of tittering whispers, through the leafage of the embowered little empty hamlet, as when faint airs stir the hair of some noon-day slumberer.

'Well, now, what make these silly cattle?' asked Calvo.

'By my credit,' said Bessie, 'meseems as though they celebrate Palm Sunday,'

'What! but this is not Sunday; and we are nearer Midsummer than Easter: for to-morrow, and I mistake not, is the fête of St. Philip and James.'

"Tis like, sir,' said Bess.

No sound in the hamlet; only, yonder above, through the ocean of leafage that giggled as if tickled, pelted with soft rush and rape the breezes, in tittering troops of whispers wide-rumouring: hush! shibboleth, shibboleth.

‘Let us to the church, and see what is toward,’ said Calvo.

They started, he shouldering his bag.

The building was nearly full. At the altar-rail stood a deep-girthed, heavy-faced Augustinian, with tiny eyes, blubber lips, and tonsured skull. He was explaining to the rude little flock that he had called them together that morning for their souls’ salvation. Owing to the remarkable length of the winter that year, he had appointed no Lent; and he was there now to tell them that, things being as they were in this most sleepy world, that was the day, though not a Sunday, on which they should hold the procession of Boughs, and the Sunday that followed he decreed should be Easter Sunday.

In fact, the good simple Brother, drowsing through that particular nook of sixteenth-century Time in which his life was cast, had wholly lost count of saint-days and seasons, nor was there anyone in Mede Down to remind him. His calendar had run crazy. The Year became to him a burden and an enigma; only the Day was sweet and soluble. Ignoring Time, he napped serene in a blank Eternity of threescore years and twenty. And like him was Mede Down. The little flock sat listening now with quiet faith, believing in what proceeded from his mouth, that it was good.

But the Brother’s awakening to a consciousness of Time on that particular morning was not without a cause. In his stream of monotonous days there had arisen an Event: he had received a letter with a date.

When he saw the date, he had rubbed his little fat eyes. And when he saw Calvo enter the church, he stretched his fat forefinger, crying out:

‘My children, my children, seize that man — !’

The letter with the date had been handed him that morning by a mounted messenger from one Mr. Justice Newton, of Alton.

It was now that Calvo first felt the length of Thomas Wolsey's arm, an arm longer than that of King or Emperor.

Wolsey, for his own political ends, was as fixedly resolved to possess Laura Ford as was Anne or Henry, more fixedly than was Katherine or Du Ballay. And he knew his way.

He had lately sent messengers all over England to every High Sheriff of a County and Constable of a Hundred, with instructions that these in turn should send to each Head-borough and Justice, and these again, to every Reeve of every Abbot, and through them to every priest of every parish, describing Calvo and the maidens, and directing their arrest.

There were now, therefore, several thousands of persons in England on the look-out to effect the seizure of the wizard and the girls.

And at once, as the oblong finger of the Mede Down Brother stretched upon him, Calvo divined the facts, and knew that now, at last, his feet were in the net.

In a moment all the church was in a flutter, but the calm, tumble-down eyes of the sage remained calm. Before any of the astonished yokels could move to touch him, he whispered Bessie, 'Follow me close,' and went with swift decision toward the altar-rail. The monotonous old lump of a Brother saw him come with alarm, raising both averting hands; but, or ever he could run, Calvo had his mouth at his ear.

The scientist, frowning, whispered in a tone of authoritative and severe reproof. He said:

'I am astonished at you, Brother Augustinian, for your manner of tending the little flock here. It is incredible to me that you should have the stupid audacity to introduce Palm Sunday into Midsummer in this wise. And no

Lent, quotha? And no Good Friday? And the souls of the poor sheep perishing for the hunger which they have of the ordinances of Christ's Church. Fie! fie! A fine tale, verily, to open to the Bishop! And to these poor sheep, if now I turn and declare how matters are! And that your motive for wishing my seizure is but fear of my honest tongue? Fie upon you for a sloven dotard, I say!" Keep them here, therefore, every one, during a ten minutes' space, till I be gone upon my way, or it were an ill case with you, I promise!'

The sheepish tongue of the Brother poked his cheek. Calvo gravely walked to a near side-door, leading Bessie by the hand. There was a movement, as of pursuit, among the people, but the Brother waved them back, speaking comfortable words.

In five minutes the fugitives were galloping hie from Mede Down.

Calvo was angry. Whither now to fly? England was divided into squares, like backgammon, each square a trap, to catch him.

'This should be Wolsey,' he said, 'that bladder of hog's-lard! It is Wolsey; it is like him, the pork. Why the devil don't you ride, you two? — for, look you, I have had enow of you by now, young women, methinks — both of you — you, Bessie, with your ways, and that silly daw, your sister, with her face. It is rigolo — it is rigolo — this scampering over the earth by a man like me with two hussies on tits, and all the empty-pated chuffs of Christendom on my track! I call it rigolo, by God! But wait — wait: perhaps I have yet a card to play. Well, well—'

Calvo knew by now that his pursuers were many, divided into parties, some, for some reason, inimical to others, perhaps each to all, and a plan for destroying them all had formed vaguely in his brain. This was the reason that he travelled south-westward always, in the direction of the city of Winchester, and of Southampton.

Suddenly, as he galloped from Mede Down, his plan congealed into definiteness: for suddenly there came to him definite news, and his case now was desperate.

A horseman, galloping with wild haste in the opposite direction, almost collided with him, before either could draw rein. It was Flying Sidney Boleyn.

His dead-white face almost blushed, and his elfin eyes dropped, at the sight of Calvo.

‘Well, now, you see, you want to ride me down, who have done you good,’ said Calvo.

‘Oh, your pardon, master!’ cried Sidney in his falsetto.

‘How does that go with the pain?’

‘Oh, ’tis clean gone to-day!’

‘But you grow tired, I see, in your gratitude, like the rest of you: naught have I seen of you for days.’

‘I have been galloping further down south.’

‘And whitheraway now so fast?’

‘To London! To London!’

‘And wherefore?’

‘To tell the King!’

‘Tell the King what?’

‘Of the strange Knight, and his exploits,’

‘Ah...?’

‘My father hath sent me with a dispatch.’

‘Soh! Which strange Knight?’

‘Oh, you have not heard? Yet he is near. Oh, I could not tell you— ’tis past belief!’

‘Nay, tell me.’

‘He is from across the sea: his ship, I know, lies in Southampton Water, for I have seen her. Such a ship! — she is crazily glorious! Her sails are of cloth of gold, damasked; she is painted all of gold and blue, and hath four masts and a bowsprit, all square-rigged, with a hundred and ten guns in port-holes on a battery-deck and on two gun-decks afore and aft. Sure, she must be near equal to our English Henri Grâce à Dieu, for she hath, I guess, eight hundred tons in burthen, and from her mainmast there flutters a streamer, most wondrous long and exorbitant, of sky-blue silk with a single fleur-de-lys.’

‘Fleur-de-lys, say you?’

‘Yes.’

‘Very good. Continue,’

‘And she hath, O, for her figure-head—’

‘Never mind the ship: tell me of the man,’

’Tis the strangest wight! Tis a fellow most tall and lank—’

’Tis Francis of France,’ muttered Calvo. ‘Good. Tis he.’

‘Tall and lank, and his mission, guess you, is to search out a beauteous maiden — for so it seems from the queries which he everywhere makes — a beauteous maiden in the vicinity of Winchester.’

‘Yes, ’twas to Winchester that I bid him come,’ muttered Calvo.

‘And since he was not long,’ proceeded Sidney, ‘in hearing that others, as it seems, are seeking for that very maiden, neither was he long in meeting them, some or all; and that joust, I, master, saw, and ’twas royster, O!’

‘You saw it?’

’Twas not far from here, near Penton, and yester evensong.’

‘How many were with the Knight?’

‘Seven only, and of the others seven. And they met. Oh, by the Rood, I’m all a-gee to think of it! He rides a battle as a ship a boisterous sea! With his own arm I saw him mow down four, as easy as a hunter takes a hedge. Oh, triumphant is his sword!’

‘Well, I suppose the chuff will do,’ muttered Calvo. ‘You know him, then, by sight?’

‘I know him like my father, though he wears a fluted Milan visor of glittering steel.’

‘Could you find him?’

‘Why, yes. His band carry a vast shimmering banner of sky-blue silk with one fleur-de-lys, and from a window of every inn at which he bides out floats the ensign.’

‘That will do, then.’

Calvo’s mule was standing near to Laura Ford’s horse. He turned to her; he put his hand beneath her chin, holding up her face. He said:

‘Turn a little more this way, that I may see you.’ Laura resented, but was compliant. Calvo, with goggle, contemplative eyes, coldly regarded the miracle of beauty. Then he let go the chin, and muttered:

‘Yes — that will make a fool of him. But he must see it: his enthusiasm must be awaked.’ To Sidney Boleyn he said:

‘So you are hurrying to London?’

‘Yes, master.’

‘But if I ask you to turn back a little way for me beforehand?’

‘Why, sure, most pronely will I do it!’

‘I thank you. Know you well the country hereabouts?’ ‘Every pebble.’

‘Then can you tell me of some river or stream with good steep, high banks to it?’

‘Why, the little Renney, a mile or two on the yon side of Chipping, hath that,’

‘Well, then—’

Calvo dropped from his mule, and took from his bag writing materials and a string. Holding the parchment against his saddle, he leaned sideways and wrote: ‘To Francis the First, King of France, from Mauro Calvo these presents.

‘If Francis the King will perambulate alone close by the water-edge of the stream Renney, a mile or two on the southern side of the village of Chipping, to-morrow even at the crépuscule, or it may be the morrow after at the crépuscule, this day being a Thursday, then Mauro Calvo will, by his science, so work and elaborate, that Francis the King shall have at least a sight of that most surpassing maiden of all, of whom Mauro Calvo long since prophesied to the King the dominion and jouissance.’

He bound the letter, and handed it to Sidney.

‘You will deliver this to the Knight in person,’ he said, ‘and you will not mention that I am hereabouts, or say from whose hands you received it.’

Sidney, as he took it, reverently kissed Calvo’s fingers. The next minute he was gone.

‘Come, come,’ said Calvo, mounting.

Bessie Ford woke from reverie with quite a start, and a little frown, vexed at herself.

‘By my credit,’ she muttered, ‘thoughts are childish things: else am I a most childish maiden....’

She had been allowing her mind to wander with a vague wonder on the kiss which that great warrior, Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, had given to the apple-cheeked little chamberlain at the inn at Mede Down.

CHAPTER XIX

THE RENDEZVOUS

‘... FAIRY DAMSELS met in forest wide
By Knights of Logres, or of Lyones,
Lancelot, or Pelleas, or Pellanore.’
MILTON.

‘Therefore sayd Arthur vnto syr Bed were, “Take thou Excalybur my good swerde...”’ — MALORY.

THE plan which congealed into definiteness in Mauro Calvo’s brain when he had definite news of the advent of Francis was this: He would first give Francis a mere glimpse of the face of Laura Ford, in order to arouse his ardour to the utmost; then he would hurry back some twenty or thirty miles from the neighbourhood which Francis then haunted, sleeping in woods, and seeking in every way to cheat the long, thousand-handed arm of Wolsey; then he would again advance upon the neighbourhood of Francis; but this time, as he passed hurriedly through each village, he would take care to leave behind him approximately accurate information as to his next destination: thus would he be sure to draw gradually together upon his trail all the various pursuing parties; and thus would he lead them all upon Francis, for destruction at the hand of Francis, or at the hand of each other, or both.

His mounted and martial enemies being thus disposed of, he hoped by disguises, sleeping in woods, and precautions, to elude the civil watch-dogs of Wolsey as far as the coast, where he might obtain a boat, and sail for French land.

That night on which he sent his rendezvous to Francis, the three slept in a wood of oaks, six miles south of Mede Down; and here Laura felt a pang of that vacuum which her nature abhorred.

Yonder the picketed horses cropped close; and anon, as they moved a pace, cropping close, they smote a hoof that tolled. Near by a brooklet murmured through the night.

Careful Bessie had in her bundle a woollen sheet, in which the sisters lay naked — the universal custom then, as still in France, Spain and Italy.

Calvo went some distance to lie upon a slope of warm verdure; and, as he stooped to lower himself, addressing the Deity, he muttered for evening prayer: ‘This is rigolo, my God!’

Bessie’s orisons were longer, and must have winged vastly higher. As she scuttled between the draps into close friendship with Laura, quoth the beauty:

‘But what a life is this I am leading here, our Saviour! — following that old hoball about, into woods and all. Phew! thank you, sirs — phew! not for me.’

Laura was cross, feeling the vacuum.

‘Why, Laura!’ said Bess.

‘I have a horrible hunger. ’Tis too much to expect of me, at the end of the tale.’

‘Oh, my dearest life, don’t say anything! — do, Laura, bear with me — till the morning—’

‘And why should I lead this life? phew! I have a pretty face, at the end of the tale — I am a plump and well-made girl—’

Bess rose on her elbow.

‘What art talking about, lass?’ she said with knit, puzzled brow.

‘Many and many a gallant, rich and high, the King’s self, were glad to have me—’

‘Silence,” hissed Bessie, with a serpent intensity that cowed the other. But Laura under her breath went:

‘Phew!’

There was a good long pause, during which Bessie, frowning, leant on an elbow over Laura, poring upon her in the darkness. Laura said, whiningly:

‘I have hunger....’

‘My mother! but I have naught to give thee—’

‘Well, let it pass. Thou’dst give it pretty quick an thou hadst it, I know, Bess — and I pity thee—’

Down fell Bessie sobbing upon her, gathering her passionately, sobbing, sobbing.

‘Oh, my dear soul — my darling pig’s-eye! Wait — bear with me — my little one — !’

So presently, being wearied, they fell lullabied into sleep, under the old hushing susurrations and shibboleths of the moving forest.

All the next day, till near even, Calvo and Laura remained in the wood; only Bessie, by twice asking her direction, made her way alone to a hamlet to get their nooning, and came back well provisioned, having forgotten nothing, and bought cheap.

Near curfew, Calvo informed Bess that he intended to take Laura with him a little distance, while Bess remained behind. Bessie's nostrils panted once in vague dismay, but to her what Calvo did was well. Only Laura dared to question the sage's purpose.

'But wherefore this?' she asked.

'Laura, sh-h-h, dear,' said Bess.

The two set out together, Calvo binding a kerchief round his head to hide the skull-cap.

Laura on the road complained lackadaisically.

'Oh, I am fatigued I' quoth she; 'I can't walk far.'

'Your fatigue, I assure you, is of no consequence,' said Calvo. 'Come, now, walk, walk.'

Chipping was only two miles way; they went through it undisturbed, and yet a mile beyond, tracking the brawling course of the Renney.

Nearly all the way there rose from both banks fairly steep, cliff-like slopes, ten to twenty feet high, leaving only, down below, a narrow foot-way of moss by the water-edge.

Calvo selected a point where the slope was highest, and was distant only by some twenty yards from a fairly thick green-wood. There standing, he spoke seriously to Laura.

'A Person,' said he, 'will be passing down yonder presently upon which I would practise a jape. You are to understand that the least flaw in the executing thereof will be followed by the gravest results, so be intelligent, sure and attentive — if so be you have such qualities in your pate. You will stand at the edge even here, still and steady, during two minutes' space from the moment when the Person rounds the bluff yonder and sees you. Then you will drop suddenly to the ground on your face; and, as you drop, you will pour out the contents of this vial. Then, bending low so that he see you not, you will run to that point of the wood there, where stands the blasted elm. And there shall I be, awaiting you. All is simple — there need be no error — you know the English tongue — have you understood me?’

‘I am not such a daw but that I understand,’ said Laura, ‘but wherefore all this?’

‘Silence you, and do it.’

He handed her a vial full of a red liquid — the liquid bromine — which, when poured into the air, sends up a profusion of brown vapours. The idea was to convince Francis that the vision of Laura had vanished into an ascending incense of brown vapour — leaving a smell behind.

Francis differed from Henry in this, that he was a real believer in the operations of witchcraft — in the witchcraft of Mauro Calvo above all, who, long since, had acquired a strong ascendancy over the French King’s credulities. And this Calvo knew.

Laura took her stand; Calvo retreated toward the wood. Unfortunately, half an hour elapsed, and no Person came. This made the miracle of beauty restless. She pouted; her right ankle, which was weak, continually jerked outwards. She said: ‘What a life I ’tis too much to expect of me, at the end of the tale.’

She forgot the vial in her hand.

Then he came — he saw her.

Stalking kingly he came, tall and lank, in armour, but without visor. He had a profusion of glossy black hair, and a hairless face, brown and dry as an autumn leaf, and lean as the east-wind; a face far from good, with an expression in it of the satyr, of the he-goat. Only, the eyes were royal, and flashed battle with black and gallant glow.

But what a bow bowed he! A wave of consummate humble grace, well worthy a prince of the Palace of Armida. Then, starting back, he shaded his eyes with horizontal palm, in the knightly pretence that her beauty dazzled him like a sun.

‘Pretence,’ we say: but only during the first moments, when he had not seen her well. In another few seconds he was genuinely dazzled, for her face was great, and akin with the sun and the moon.

He could hardly believe his eyes. He made a quick step nearer to watch, and wonder. The twilight had deepened into dun gray.

His next instinct was to rush, and seize, and ravish.

Laura Ford stood, rather pale, with opening nostrils, regarding this man, her spirit and posture on a sort of frightened tip-toe.

Francis was not a man to hesitate. He lived in a continual Now. She saw him rush toward her point of the cliff, and with a scream, was gone.

As she ran, she had a dim consciousness of the vial in her hand, and tossed it obliquely backward. It fell into a tuft of grass, and did not break.

Many men could not have scaled the cliff at all. Francis was over it in half a tick. Before Laura Ford was half-way to the near green-wood she was shrieking in his arms.

Francis lifted her as lightly as a plump down-pillow, and went running with her, as one trots hastily with a burning barrel, toward the point where he had dismounted.

At that point the run of cliff-wall dipped into a low curve, and in the grassy depression here browsed the picketed horse. Francis dropped Laura, sprang to his seat, and as she ran again, with a stoop he plucked and gathered her at a canter, and was off with loose rein, he hardly knew whither.

She, before him, beat with sweet provocation upon his tough face, wriggling, calling, with visage all inflamed, upon Bessie and upon Master Calvo.

Francis rushed through a space of greenwood, and came out into a tract of undulating grass-land. He slackened speed, and looked about, but saw no village. A house — an inn — this with all speed, was what he wanted. He was unfamiliar with the country. ‘Better keep straight on,’ he thought.

Off at full speed he set again, and in two minutes was galloping through a forest-path. His steed was a massive war-horse of Norman blood, more powerful than swift, the battery of whose hoof-beats was strong and ponderous. This, perhaps, was the reason that, as he plunged into an open flat glade, he called fire from heaven, bitterly annoyed: for yonder, from a nearly opposite avenue, came three riders, pelting prone upon him.

They were Fitzgerald, Macdonald and Bonner. These, at Mede Down, to which they had just returned, had learned that another pursuing party of six had not ten minutes before left Mede Down, taking the way to the forest; also, that the six had taken that way, for the reason that, as they had learned, the fugitives had taken that very way on the previous day. Hearing which, Fitz had cried: ‘Shall we after them, Mac?’ and staunch, unemotional Mac had replied: ‘What else, Fitz?’ and with loose rein the three had set out after the six; the six being Alvarada, Sir John Perrot, and four Queen’s-men.

And passing through the dim forest in pursuit, the three heard the ponderous battery of the Norman blood’s hoof-beats, were attracted, deflected their course, and came pelting upon Francis in the glade.

The impetus of the double advance was terrific. Francis had between his arms a still-struggling girl, whom, at the first glance, Fitzgerald recognised, and snatched his sword. Francis, seeing that he lacked space to rein, turn, and run, with dogged obstinacy persisted in his hold upon the girl, managing at the same time, by help of his elbows, to draw also. And at the awful impending crash of those on-rushing steels, Laura Ford sent through the wood an impassioned shriek of fright.

The shriek took the form of the one shrill word:

‘Bessie!’

And this cry Bessie, waiting for the return of Calvo and Laura not two hundred yards away, heard and knew. As a shepherd the bleating of his lamb, or as a young mother the cry of her babe, so she heard and knew it.

‘Oh, my mother — !’ gasped she.

Fluttering, deadly white, she flew to her palfrey, tightened in a moment the loosened girth, and was away.

But though she heard the cry, and knew it, she had no idea of direction. The voice had seemed to come from the heart of space, from the depths of nowhere.

But a minute before ever Bessie had mounted, Laura was already free, having tumbled on her length to the ground an instant before the meeting of the blades. Terror gave her power: she picked herself up, and went running wild, with bloodless, lovely face, through the wood.

Fitzgerald and Francis met, Greek with Greek.

King Francis had a sword, made specially for him by the world-famous artist of Toledo, Sylvester Agara, whose steeling was tempered to so fanciful a pitch of perfectness, that its solidity depended entirely upon the manner in which it was held. In any hand but that of Francis, it would have splintered at a first blow; in his, neither keen nor solid could resist that edge. Its steel-coated core was of soft iron; and it could be bent into a complete circle, which, at the instant of release, flitted back into perfect straightness. In sunlight it had the appearance of a rippling silver flame.

Two chops each, on steeds that stepped circling, head to head, they made; the four ineffectual, save that after the second of Fitz, a deep gap notched his blade. Informed by that instinct by which fighters feel their match, they drew deep breaths, strung, hundred-eyed, full of plots. Francis, by an intensely swift double-wheel of his blade in air, met the descending sword of Macdonald, who had attacked in flank, whereupon Mac's sword dropped like a pack of cards in sherds. Fitz at that moment hissed: 'Now!' but even as the hack came down, Francis bowed as easily as one stoops to avoid the tendrils of a bindweed, and the blow slipped upon his back-piece. Now, however, his back was completely at the mercy of Fitz: but before the next chop, the two were literally torn apart by a very tempest of force. Alvarada and his five, at rushing rate, had galloped up.

There was still sufficient gleam in the brown, and now rapidly thickening, twilight of the glade to distinguish forms: and at once it was seen that the entire new party of six concentered upon Francis, with design, the venom of their blades. He fought positively surrounded by them.

And now the sight was good to watch the warrior's nimble rage. His fate, indeed, under such conditions, was certain, for with every passing instant he had at least two blades to baulk; but in perhaps ten seconds he had beheaded a horseman, and driven another armless and hors de combat; and at a light and almost flippant movement of his busy sword, which sent Sir John Perrot's steel cap pirouetting high, out cried Fitzgerald, the fighter:

'Why, lightly done, Sir Knight — bravo. 'Tis an assassination this—'

And with that cry the contest was all but ended: for Fitz, shouting 'We fight a couple, Sir Knight!' spurred into the row, and after him Mac, who had snatched Bonner's sword.

It was precisely then that Flying Sidney Boleyn, posting hot to London with news of Francis for King Harry, drew sudden rein, and watched the fray from near. Fitzgerald cleft to the breast a martialist of Queen Katherine, and Francis sheared to the bone Sir John Perrot's bridle-arm, whereupon Sir John's horse bolted, and ran from the glade, Macdonald after him. The one remaining Queen's martialist, losing heart, took to flight, hacking as he went the skull of Bonner's nag, which dropped; and Alvarada, finding himself alone with the blades which he judged the two best in Europe, turned, too, and fled. Flying Sidney saw Fitzgerald and Francis disappear in chase behind him, and he knew Fitzgerald: for now, with his curiosity for facts and inn-news, he knew all the searchers after Laura Ford, their faces, and names. He started afresh on his pelting way, bound for London, big with news.

Meanwhile, Sir John Perrot, after a long ride, finding himself still hotly followed, and weak with loss of blood, drew a blunderbuss, and sent a random shot at Macdonald. The shot entered Mac's horse's brain, which dropped.

About the same time, Alvarada, who had fled a different way, and rode a swift Arab, dodged his pursuers down a path, and escaped. Fitz and Francis drew rein.

Francis turned upon Fitz with his large bow.

'La! I have to tender you thanks, comrade,' said he, in mincing, lisping English. 'To you I owe the saving of my life.'—'

'And the losing of a wife,' said Fitz, twinkling.

'Ah, so true, so true! But, as I have a hundred wives, at the least, and but nine lives—'

'On your conscience, you would say?'

'La! more upon my conscience, sir! but nine upon my saddle, I would say, which being less tough heareth less. But on the word of a — knight' — he half said 'king' — 'I tender you good thanks. You fight well.'

'Tush!' said Fitz, knowing not to whom, 'tis nothing.'

'But if I say 'tis something? And— 'tis my will that you accept this sword of me.'

'Why, nay—'

‘No nays, prithee, lest I call you neighing ass. For this priceless blade which you refuse hath but one brother in all the earth, and that, too, is mine. Take, sir!’

His tone was both bonhomme and commanding. Fitz, with blushing forehead, obeyed.

“Tis a most gracious gift,” said he.

‘La! as to that, say nothing. But learn it nicely in soft practice, I warn you, till you know its secret jars and tempers, before trying fight, or it will shiver in your hands. And now, my good will, and au revoir. To our next meeting, sir! Ha! ha!’

Francis at once galloped away; Fitz back to the glade.

To his surprise, Mac was not there, and Bonner had disappeared.

Bonner, being horseless, had run after a stray nag that, after the fight, had passed trotting through the glade. The nag, with stoppings to crop, and runs, had refused capture, and tempted him far. He was now, as Fitz waited, trying in vain to rediscover the glade.

Fitz lingered with hot impatience some half-hour, puzzled. He did not know that either Mac or Bonner had lost horse.

‘Perchance are they gone onward to Chipping together,’ said he, and, with that thought, started for Chipping.

Mac, when he reached the glade on foot, found no one. He concluded that Fitz and Bonner had gone back to Mede Down, and thither went on weary foot.

Bonner, in the midst of his hopeless search, flung himself, desperate, upon a bank, and slept a supperless night in the forest. The three were mutually lost one to another.

As for Laura Ford, running with blanched face from the battle, her flight had unknowingly led her to the little spot which they had made their home for a night and day. She recognised it, and stopped. But Bessie — she was not there. Bessie had gone out after that cry which she had heard, and known. Laura called timorously:

‘Bess! Bessie!’

Suddenly she heard cantering hoof-beats — approaching. They were the hoof-beats of a riderless horse fled from the battle. But fear took her. ‘Our Saviour...!’ quoth she.

She ran to where the animals fed; tightened the loosened girth of her nag, leapt up, and was away.

Some ten minutes afterwards, Mauro Calvo arrived from the rendezvous, holding his chin, concerned and guilty, saying:

‘But whatever can I find to tell the elder sister? That silly daw — !’

He approached with lingering foot. But when he came, Bessie was not there. He looked, and saw the two nags gone. He held his chin.

‘In that case,’ he mused, ‘Laura must have escaped from Francis, and now gone somewhither with Bessie, for here are the nags vanished. But whither away? And why? Or are they captured? Taken to Mede Down? Or Chipping?’

He walked to and fro, bent, holding his chin, quickly.

‘I pity her from my heart,’ said he ruefully.

Inquietude would not let him be still. He mounted the mule, making for Mede Down.

About a half hour afterwards Bessie came back, weary of search. There was no one there.

‘Oh, I can’t find her!’ she moaned. ‘Oh, sure, sure, Something is against me, sure...!’

And away, again, with her bundle, she rode.

CHAPTER XX

HENRY HEARS

‘DE QUELLE MANIÈRE Ulrich Gallet fut envoyé à Picrochole.’
RABELAIS.

HENRY was floating on the river when Flying Sidney reached the Placentia palace at Greenwich.

In London the ‘sweating-sickness’ was abroad — a malady of which Royal Harry had a most head-prone and indigestible horror. So at the report of each fresh outbreak, he would flurriedly pack for Windsor, for the palace at Richmond, for the palace at Greenwich.

It was noon, an hour after the royal dinner, for Royalty, then as now, ‘dined late’ at eleven a.m., ten being the more usual hour of the forkless feast Henry sat canopied in the stern of a high-prowed barge, rich-liveried in cramoisi velvets whose gold frounces trailed; and with him sat and talked the two Howards (Edward and Edmond), Surrey (my Lord Treasurer), Sir Thomas Lovel (Constable of the Tower), Knevet (Master of the Horse), and some gentlemen-archers and body-knights.

Sidney Boleyn got into a skiff at the palace landing-steps. The day was bright, and had in it the spacious charm of the summers that then were. The fringes of the barge, trailing, drew two wavering lines that widened to their languid death on the dappled and brindled surface, fading in the water just as the trail of that lazy summer-day, with its lazy breezes, and its spacious lazy charm, has faded now in the River of Time.—’

Flying Sidney came up with the slow royal Argo opposite West Ham. He hung on forward and sent word aft that he bore a despatch from Sir Thomas: and soon he was standing before the King.

Harry’s shapely left leg stretched stiff, his right elbow on knee, forefinger on brow, and thumb on cheek; and as he read the letter, lo, he gnawed a wry-pushed pout at a corner; he took in with his tongue-tip his moustache-end, to gnaw.

‘H’m!’ went he; and again: ‘H’m!’; and at last: ‘Ha,”

Let it be understood that Francis and Henry were life-long and bitter rivals in the two favourite pursuits of both — Love and War. In both, Francis feared the growing fame of Henry; and Henry detested and envied the established fame of Francis. In the matter of fighting, it was almost certain that Francis was the better man; though it was currently believed at the time that with the bow-and-arrow, and in barrier-combat with axes, Henry took the palm. But in the matter of Love, the question of superiority was more wholly in dispute: here they remained the patterns and paragons one of the other: if Henry was a dragon, Francis was an ogre; if Henry was a ghou, Francis was a vampire. They surpassed each other.

And the mere mention of the name of one in the presence of the other acted precisely in the manner of a prick, spurring to further exploit.

‘Ha!’ went Henry; and, turning upon Flying Sidney, he said:

‘Well, what’s all this affairing?’

‘What the letter declares you, sire,’ said Sidney.

‘Hast seen this knight, thou?’

‘And his ship!’

‘Ship? How looks this ship?’

Sidney described the glowing nautilus. And at once something like certainty dawned upon Henry: only kings possessed such ships. He jerked up his straight leg, and turning from side to side his nodding head, he cried:

‘Well!’

‘She’s a thing of glory, sire! Damasked sails of gold-cloth, and—’

‘The fustian hulk! But this knight’s self, varlet?’

‘He is most tall and lank, sire, and he wears a visor of fluted Milan steel —’

‘Ha!’

‘Milan steel, and carries a shimmering banner of blue silk with one fleur-de-lys, with a fleur-de-lys wrought on his horse-trappings—’

‘Oh, but this is strong, my gentlemen! this is a bit strong — !’

‘And he fights, sire—’

‘Ha! how fights he — ?’

‘He fights with grand ease, sire; he fights as a soaring lark showers her jolly carols; he fights as the wild-drake gallantly breasts a choppy tarn—’

‘Thou brazen cur! and with whom fights he — ?’

‘He fights with all the different cavalcades that are seeking the lovely maiden.’

‘Cavalcades? Maiden? Which maiden?’

‘A maiden called, as I hear, Laura Ford, who travels in our neighbourhood with her sister and the good wizard.’

‘Aha?... Aha?... ’tis so, eh? Aha? Well!’

‘The cavalcades—’

‘Which cavalcades?’

‘Oh, there are several after the girl Beside Fitzgerald, Macdonald, and Bonner, which now fight on the knight’s side, as I have seen with my own eyes, there are—’

‘Fitzgerald? Which Fitzgerald? But he is my man. He fights, say you, on the knight’s side — ?’

‘Why, yes, sire.’

‘Then the dark gizzard of that louse for it. ’Tis the second time — Ha! And ’tis this same maiden that the knight, too, is after?’

‘Why, yes.’

Henry leapt up with a stamp.

‘Oh, come, come, my gentlemen,’ cried he with red brow, ‘this is a bit strong — by the splendour of God, ’tis strong! Ha! What! in my own dominions? sniffing after my own subjects, the goat — in my own God’s land? What! he hath dared, then? in my own, own England, which is mine from Heaven right down to Hell? Aha! He shall see! My gentlemen! this is a bit strong, you know! Round with the boat’s prow there, you! You see, gentlemen, don’t you, how this Frenchman — this good friend and brother of France — ha! seeks a quarrel with me? Well, let him have a taste of English iron, then! To arms, I say! to arms! Dig it with the oars, there — to the palace with her! Well!’

Round went the barge, while Flying Sidney, anxious to be away once more, descended to his skiff. He paddled briskly back to the palace, mounted his spent horse, and made for the Bridewell Palace of Queen Katherine. He bore a letter from his father to his half-sister, Anne.

In that letter was a passing mention of the advent of the strange knight in the county.

Anne set Sidney before her, and fixed him with her keen blue eyes. She was the only person in the world of whom Flying Sidney stood in mortal fear.

‘You have seen this knight, Sidney?’ she said.

‘Yes, mistress.’

‘Describe him minutely.’

Sidney described him, and at once Anne muttered:

‘Oh, ’tis Francis.’

‘And the girl,’ she said aloud, ‘and her companions, and her other pursuers — have you seen them?’

‘Why, yes — all.’

‘Tell me of them.’

‘I — you mean no hurt to the wizard, Mistress Anne? — I would not — he is my good friend and saviour—’

‘Sh-h-h. Be good enough to answer my query.’

Sidney told and described, while Anne listened, her needle clicking in her embroidery. When she had heard every detail she went to a window, looking out upon the flowering manor-close, her hands behind her back.

‘So ’tis Francis!’ she muttered.

And she knew Francis well. If Francis sought Laura Ford, he would not fail to find, and possess; and if he possessed, then could not Henry; and until Henry possessed, she was certain that the Queenship of England would not be Anne Boleyn’s.

She left her station at the casement with a tottering gait, which was feigned. And with tottering gait she passed a corridor into a parlour where the Queen, with five ladies-in-waiting, wrought in six pieces a Flanders tapestry. Anne’s hand lay across her brow, and in her eyes was the glaring stare of fever.

‘Oh!’ said she. And again ‘Oh!’

‘Why, lady—’ said the Queen.

‘Madam, oh!’

‘Why, lady, thou art ill!’

‘Madam — I fear me — I have the sweating-sickness.’

‘Heaven’s mercy! sayest thou?’

‘Madam — I pray you — let me depart straightway into the country — to my father — oh!’

The Queen leapt to support her, as Anne tottered upon a sofa.

In fifteen minutes she had set out, accompanied by Flying Sidney and a servitor. As she passed from the palace-gate she tossed her pretty head, and giggled.

Two hours later Henry himself was en route. He was accompanied by a hundred and ten men, multifariously armed — brigandined archers, scarlet-doubleted yeomen with halberds, catafracts with partisans, arquebuse, pike, and caliver, swordsmen, mounted bill-men, axe-men; amongst them Knevet, handsome Charles Brandon, dissolute Thomas Howard, Lord Nevil, fighting-men all, with fames.

Down through the city trailed worm-like the procession of cavaliers, rolling a long rattle and pattering fracas of showering hoof-falls, Henry in disguise behind. He sat glittering upon a charger, whose bases and bards were embroidered with roses and pomegranates of gold; and before him a marshalman bore a white banner of silk with St. George in red.

And Wolsey, who had been forewarned of the King’s departure, looking from an oriel of his Bridewell Palace, saw the train move down the Strand, and heard the long pattering fracas of showering hoof-falls: and bridling his fat chin and his proud fat neck, he smiled his little superior smile.

CHAPTER XXI

THE TWO KINGS

‘... TILTING FURNITURE, emblazon’d shields,
Impresses quaint, caparisons and steeds,
Bases and tinsel trappings, gorgeous knights...’
MILTON.

‘One gusty day, now stormy, and now still.’
CRABBE.

HENRY, in his bombastic way, and passion for mummary and make-believe, went out precisely in the manner of a General who takes the field, with camp-accountrements, provision of forage, herald-king-at-arms, sentry-guards, and small siege-train; his own tent being a lofty pavilion of purple Lyons silk, gold-fringed and passmented: the same as once used by him at his meeting with Francis on the Field of the Cloth of Gold.

Travelling in a strict incognito, he became known on his line of march as the Golden Knight, from the fulsome glow in sunlight of his rich gilt armour and horse-trappings; while Francis, for a similar reason, had acquired among the Hampshire villages the sobriquet of the Black Knight.

When Henry reached Mede Down, Francis was still prosecuting his search round Chipping, only nine miles away.

About noon of that day two of Henry's out-riders galloped into camp: they brought news of the exact whereabouts of Francis.

Henry was tilting with Charles Brandon, their lances being tipped with the globular braces called 'rockets.' For the third time Brandon was going down under Henry's coup de cœur, amid cheers, when the scouts came in. And at once Henry, at the news, jumped with uncouth ease from his horse.

'Come, Charles,' he cried; 'see what I say to this swart-faced French goat!'

He entered his pavilion: he sat on a stool before a chest upon which he spread parchment, with quill and ink. He was a great writer and scholar, was Henry.

He held the pen, thinking. At all times his breath vented from his nostrils in a roguish wind, whose measured fan was faintly audible to one standing near — a proof of his stern strength and energy of personality. Brandon, leaning near, hands on knees, heard the breaths now come vehemently: for Henry was angry at this French invasion, and hot.

His letters he wrote nearly all in French. After a minute, pressing wide the points of the skating pen, he wrote flowingly:

'Celui que Pen appelle le Chevalier d'Ore vueil tantost scavoir ce qui aye esmeu le très parfaict Chevalier que l'en appelle Chevalier Noir à vaguer et naiger ès le bon pais d'Angleterre à ce temps-cy, quel prouffit, louenge, fame, honneur, ou renommé, quelle enqueste, ymaginacion, ou entreprins, quel gaing ou avantaige à achapter, quel meschief ou deffaulte, ou quelle Chaleur ou aultre chose, aye esguillonné et point le dessusdict très parfaict Chevalier Noir à vuyder de son pays pour venir vaguer ès le susdict bon pais d'Angleterre. Sans doubte répondra que son mestier illec a pour but de chercher et avoir en sa disposicion, administracion, et gouvernement une très belle, gente, doulce et débonnaire demoiselle que Pen appelle Laura Ford; en quel cas ne prendra de desplaisance ne tristesse que le dessusdict Chevalier d'Ore, à cause du roy d'Angleterre et France, et des Provinces de Gascoigne, Guienne, Normandy, Anjou, Galles, et Irlande, fasse l'entreprise d'estraindre incontinent la Chaleur du susdict très parfaict Chevalier Noir; en quel but passera ce soir avecques ses forces dans les champes entre les villages de Mede Down et Chipping une heure avant soleil reconscé. Vecy doncques que je requiers à Dieu à jointes mains, et que Dieu ne vueille pas qu'il advienne le contraire!' [He who is called 'The Golden Knight' desires at once to know what could have moved the very perfect Knight, who is called the Black Knight, to wander and sail into the good land of England at this time; what profit, praise, fame, honour, or renown; what quest, fantasy, or enterprise; what gain or advantage to acquire; what wrong or default, or what Heat, or other thing, could have pricked and spurred the above-said very perfect Black Knight to leave his land to come to wander in the said good land of England? Without doubt will he reply that his business here is to seek out and have in his power, sway, and government a very beautiful, high-born, sweet, and charming damsel, called Laura Ford: in which case he will not take it ill that the said Golden Knight — on behalf of the King of England and France, and of the Provinces of Gascoigne, Guienne, Normandy, Anjou, Wales, and Ireland — undertakes to quench quick the Heat of the said very perfect Black Knight; to which end he will pass this evening with his forces in the fields between the villages of Mede Down and Chipping one hour before sunset. And this I require of God with joined hands, and may God not bring the contrary to pass!]

Francis was made aware of the advent of this letter by a herald mouthing the shattering cry of a silver bugle in Chipping street. Another minute, and

King-at-arms, in a motley which was half his dress of office, and half new-fangled, handed the letter to Francis, who, with three of his knights, lolled under the thick greenage of the inn-porch in half-dress, playing the new game of cards, primero.

The King broke the seal, which was not the seal of Henry; but with one glance at the handwriting, he recognised his good friend and brother of England, and showed a set of extremely white small teeth in a smile. He promptly called for pen and ink, and wrote:

‘Celui que Ten appelle le Chevalier Noir n’a qu’aulcuns motz à respondre ne proposer aux raisons du très parfaict Chevalier d’Ore, qui est renomé en clergie et science par toute la terre, veue que la plume du Chevalier Noir, la mercy Dieu, soit mesmement son espée. Le Chevalier d’Ore n’a pas mal diviné ne raysonné que je cherche une gracieuse, douce, belle, bien adressée, et très gente et parfaicte demoiselle que Ten appelle Laura Ford, pour l’avoir dans ma disposicion, administracion, et gouvernement, ce que je fais jà sans decepcion ne mal engin, contre le Roi d’Angleterre et France, et des Provinces de Gascoigne, Guienne, Normandie, Anjou, Galles et Irlande. Et pour mieux faire estraindre incontinent ma Chaleur de la manière que, se la Fortune me donne tant d’heur, je vueil, je passeraie ce soir dans les champs entre les villages de Mede Down et Chipping, une heur avant soleil reconscé. Vecy doncque que je requiers à Dieu à jointes mains, et que Dieu ne vueille pas qu’il advienne le contraire!’ [He who is called the Black Knight has but few words to answer or propose to the arguments of the very perfect Golden Knight, who is renowned in learning and science in all the earth, seeing that the pen of the Black Knight is, thank God, even his sword. The Golden Knight has not ill-guessed or judged that I seek a gracious, sweet, lovely, well-nurtured, and very high-born and perfect damsel called Laura Ford, to have her in my power, sway, and government, which thing I do verily without deception or secrecy against the King of England and France, and of the provinces of Gascoigne, Guienne, Normandy, Anjou, Wales and Ireland. And in order the better to have my Heat quick quenched in the manner which, if Fortune so befriend me, I intend, I will pass this evening with my forces in the fields between the villages of Mede Down and Chipping one hour before sunset And this I require of God with joined hands, and may God not bring the contrary to pass!]

Francis stamped the missive with a cachet-de-chiffres, and having tied it with scarlet silk thread, deposited it in an ambergris-scented sachet of purple Genoa velvet, gloriously brodered with diamond and seed-pearl. He bowed, showing his teeth, as he handed it to the herald.

‘Might I ask,’ he lisped in mincing English, ‘how many fighting-men are with your seigneur?’

‘Something over a hundred, sir,’

He did not start; he bowed — though he felt a chill of heart, as on that day when, afterwards, he wrote:

‘All is lost, save honour,’

With him were only six men. But they were the very cream and acme of French chivalry.

And that evening, an hour before sunset in the Vale of Arling, two dust-clouds rolled across the vast lowland to meet — one trailing long in enveloping whorls of galloping smoke, one short and globular. Nearer, spying each other, they drew, Henry with his hundred, Francis with his audacious six; and the sunlit glint of brandished steel flitted in the dust like a fire-dance in smoke.

Nearer they drew, and at the last Henry’s host was thundering at a gallop down the incline of a long road, Francis thundering up it in gallant carelessness of his certain doom, when Henry drew breath and rein together.

‘Well, but — !’ said he.

Not five hundred yards separated now the two cavalcades.

‘Sire — ?’ said Charles Brandon, half halting.

‘Blue death, man! canst not see? Why, there are not twenty of them!’

‘Not ten, sire,’

‘Then why dost not cry halt, thou stupid dolt? Cry halt there, Nevil! Halt, there, I say! Morbleu! we are not Hounslow butchers—’

Halt, halt, went the impassioned word. And in another minute Francis, too, drew rein. One horseman only was in motion — Thomas Howard, galloping towards Francis with fluttered flag of truce.

Francis riding out to meet him, Howard proclaimed loud message: That the Golden Knight, having with him one hundred men, admitted himself vanquished, yielding arms to the higher prowess of the Black Knight who had with him but few; yet, if the Black Knight, would graciously spare his prisoners, then would the Golden elect an equal number of champions — six, as it seemed — to polish the Black Knight’s armour according to the old-time English fashion — sur le champ — then and there: and may God defend the right!

Francis lisped an answer crammed with courtly knighthood. There where he stood he awaited battle.

Henry had already selected his six. They stood grouped a-field toward the rear of the hundred, when a yeoman, left behind in Henry’s camp, galloped up hot with news. Before Howard could deliver Francis’s message, the yeoman delivered his.

‘Sire,’ said he, ‘a countryman, searching in your behoof after the maiden Ford, has just hied into camp. On the skirt of Halford Wood, two leagues on the yon side of Mede Down, he hath spied the maiden on a palfrey, she at the time being hotly pursued by three martialists on chargers.'

'Ha!' cried Henry, and at once the heat and flame of his interest blew from Francis to Laura Ford. Her first — and afterwards tourney, and joust, and chivalric play. The advent" of Francis into England — Henry's terror lest the Frenchman should beat him in the game of girl-seeking — had made his eagerness for possession a thousand-fold more instant and intense. 'Tell the Black-face I'll send him other rendezvous,' he tossed hurriedly behind him, as Howard cantered up with Francis's answer, 'and lead back to camp there. Ha! you six — come — ride it, ride it!'

They went at once galloping north-westward across-field, while Howard bore the message to Francis; Francis, on his part, received it with meaning smile, and instantly galloped off southward.

And with design: for he was aware that this sudden volte face of his good friend and brother at the moment of impending battle could be motivated only by some superlative interest; and what interest on the earth was superlative save the finding of the superlative loveliness, the new Helen? He made a wide detour round a wood to conceal his purpose of pursuit, and then turned, galloping in the self-same direction as Harry.

Now, however, Harry and his six were lost to sight; and Francis and his six rode vainly till far into the darkness, following vague way-side rumours and directions.

They were passing at a languid walk through a forest-path after midnight, seeking some hamlet for rest, when in a near glade they spied embers glowering red in thick blackness.

'What if those be they?' said Francis.

'Then we fall upon them and take them at disadvantage,' answered the Chevalier d'Arcy.

‘Hold my horse — halt,’ whispered Francis.

He slipped to his feet and went stealthily treading through thick trees and under-wood toward the glade.

They were Henry and his six, who had scoured in vain a large tract of country round Halford Wood for Laura and her pursuers, and in this other wood had lost all sense of direction, overtaken weary by midnight. On the broad, deep-breathing face of Henry Francis saw the dim fire-gleam glower.

He stepped nearer; now the embers shed a shine on his own lean, brown wedge-face. One of the picketed horses shrilled a strong chest-neigh. He stopped, and showed his little teeth, going: ‘Sh-h-h!’

Still further, with fearless rashness, he stepped, leaning prone forward on semi-tiptoe his lank strip of body. If a horse stamped, he stopped, with held-up forefinger, smiling.

Now he was in the very midst of the seven sleepers, in a situation of sevenfold and instant danger. But he was under an insupportable obligation to Henry for the knightly clemency of that day’s encounter: and the motto of his life was to surpass Henry at every point — in the matter of chivalry above all.

Henry’s sword-belt lay lax under him, near him his battle-axe and a horse-pistol. Francis with swift noiselessness drew the sword, and took the axe and pistol. Within three minutes he was making off, burthened with all the arms of all the seven.

And had they been the ‘Seven Sleepers’ of fable, they must have leapt into wakefulness at the sound which, a minute afterwards, broke upon their ears — a cry of ‘Charge, charge!’ and a sound of hoofs galloping upon them. Henry and his warriors sprang wildly to arms that were not there; and when the hoof-sounds galloped away into faintness and silence, they stared at the dim ghosts one of the other, all pale and bewildered men. After a time said Charles Brandon:

'Tis sure that swart-faced goat, sire—'

'Thou speakest of a King, Charles,' said Henry, with brooding undertook.

'Pardon, sire,' muttered Brandon.

Then suddenly flaming, Henry cried:

'The black French goat! If I stick him not for this — !'

His brow was red as brand. He was still raving at all gods and men at nine the next morning, an hour after his return to camp, when one of Francis's knights rode up to the purple pavilion with flag of truce, loaded with the mass of purloined arms.

He bore a letter from Francis, in a sachet of jet-and-pearl-work, costly as gold. The Black Knight, having found the accompanying arms in a glade of the forest, presented them to the very perfect Golden in token of the Black's profound homage. And if the Golden, with six, would meet the. Black, with six, on the left side of the chasm called Rendeep Fell that evening at sunset, then and there might trial by combat ensue. And this the Black Knight required of God with joined hands, praying that God might not bring the contrary to pass.

Henry sent answer confirming the rendezvous in a chryselephantine enamelled casket of Limoges, and spent the day, though rainy, with his six in the practice of arms.

It was not till his party were half-way to the rendezvous that it occurred to someone to ask:

'But which is "the left bank" of the chasm called Rendeep Fell?'

About the same time the same thought occurred to Francis; he had forgotten that a chasm is not a river, with sides 'left' and 'right.'

Clouds which had lowered all day were now pouring heavy rain, dashed by squalls. Premature twilight deepened; but both parties pushed on, in hope of meeting.

The chasm is an irregular cleft between Mede Down and Weedon in hilly country of chalky formation, winding two miles long, and, in places, four hundred yards wide. Open spaces round its edges, its solitude, and its character as a landmark, made it a good rendezvous for trial by combat. It runs east and west.

Francis arrived on its south edge, and, after five minutes, saw Henry's group vaguely indicated on the north.

Henry, at the very edge, shouted:

‘Wait there; we come!’

Francis, who heard a voice mingling with the dashed and huddled rain, but no words, vehemently called:

‘Good, good; we come!’

Henry, who heard a voice, but no words, set out, turning away somewhat eastward in a path between hills; and Francis, seeing him dimly take that course, galloped eastward also to a meeting at the chasm's end.

But Henry's path, after a curve, led him westward, and in fifteen minutes he was standing at the south edge where Francis had lately stood, peering at peering Francis on the north edge, where he had lately stood.

Francis shouted, Henry shouted, each hearing a voice in the streaming air, but no words. And now each could hardly distinguish forms across the chasm, for the darkness thickened fast.

Once more they changed places, in a bewilderment of mixed purposes, Henry to the north, Francis to the south. Henry swore; Francis, with thrown-back throat, laughed lightly.

At last, by a law of chance, they stood at the same moment on the same side of the chasm, at different points, each peering across to detect the other. Masses of mountain rock interposed between them; the last bleak twilight had left only darkness, and the parties now were lost to each other.

The same hour, on returning angry to camp, Henry heard news as to the whereabouts of a man whom he concluded to be Mauro Calvo. Where Mauro Calvo was, there, he supposed, was Laura Ford. And with little delay he broke camp and set out south, with his following.

At the same time he sent a messenger to Francis at Chipping, appointing that day week for a meeting on the shores of Ross Water, by Lipton.

CHAPTER XXII

MARK BONNER FAILS

‘QUAND ON N’A pas ce que Pon aime, on aime ce que l’on a.’

MARMONTEL.

AT this time the three fugitives, separated, were vainly seeking one another through the woods and ways and hamlets of Hampshire; so also Fitzgerald, Macdonald, and Mark Bonner, separated, sought one another.

Bessie, on the night of the separation, had in her possession three crowns, the earnings of Calvo’s street-meetings. The next morning she rode to three several hamlets, and at two inns sat through an hour with a hostess, and at a third inn with a host. The winning might of her simple and sincere character was extraordinary. At the end of the third hour she had three staunch friends.

At the first inn she left a crown, at the second a crown, at the third a crown; in each case receiving a promise that if a girl answering to Laura’s description, or a man answering to Calvo’s, should appear in the village, then they should not be utterly destitute: the crown should be there for them.

She knew that now there must be no more street-propheying for Calvo; Wolsey’s many-handed arm was stretched to seize him; and money he would have none.

But now she herself was penniless. She gave that not a thought. Laura was gone....

Her face was like the face of a man in the act of tumbling through endless space — a face of awful scare.

But not yet of despair — though she had heard that scream in the forest, and knew it. She left the crowns at the inns with the faint hope that her sister might yet be at liberty, in a position to use them.

Only on the fifth day did she reach the last depths of woe. She had come toward evening from a wood to beg a morsel of rye-bread, since many chestnuts and acorns left her craving still; and at an inn-door she heard two men discuss the great news.

Henry had come!... He was here! The very Dragon himself! In person he had followed Laura into Hampshire! As she heard it, her heart beat and hovered like the stick of a beaten drum.

The identity of the Golden Knight with King Harry was rather an open secret in Hampshire: his magnificent way, the nature of his quest, suggested it. One of the two men discussing asserted that the Golden Knight was none other than he; the second shook a doubtful head; but Bessie, quite sure, moaned:

‘Oh, ’tis he...!’

Now she divined the meaning of that cry in the wood! She did not hear from the yokels the when of the King’s coming, nor knew that at the hour of Laura’s scream he had not left London. She only jumped at the guess that the scream might be due to the coming; that Laura might, even then...

She begged no rye-bread that night. In the dark and deeps of the wood she lay on her face by her cropping palfrey through all the night, chill and still as a thing of senseless stone, dead to the hungry pangs that rived her. But when gray morning came, a thought had possessed her brain.

‘Oh, I will go to this man, and kneel, and kneel—’ she said.

And now hot tears relieved her piteous grief. An hour later, and she had a new thought — with her harmlessness of doves mingling a wisdom of serpents. If she could present herself to the King, suppliant indeed, yet having in her hand for trump card the King's-letters which she had stolen from Fitzgerald!

Bitterly now she regretted that she had returned them to Fitzgerald. But there remained a hope. From the inn-chamberlain at Mede Down she had heard that Mark Bonner was with Fitzgerald, seeking her. That Mark was genuinely in his heart hostile to her she could not believe, though she divined that he had some reason for pretending hostility, being in such a company. And Mark was shrewd and clever: for her, sure, if she could communicate with him, he would some-way get the letters from Fitz.

In fact, Mark had the letters actually in his slop-pouch, for to him Fitz had given them to keep.

How she might possibly communicate with Mark, after a time she thought: at inns she would win friendship with some chance scribe and leave letters for Mark, who, since he searched, surely travelled. Chance and tide which were against her would sure not be against her always, and on the earth was hope.

The King, she had heard, was near Mede Down, seven leagues now from her. At the instant of resolve and completed plan she started; and at the first village, after an hour's delay, left rendez-vous for Bonner, appointing for the meeting the great chestnut on the village-green of Mede Down, one hour after the third sunset from the day of writing.

Toward evening of the second day her palfrey fell lame near Lipton, having cast an off-shoe, and finally refused to budge. She led him limping to the village, and left him on future terms, conditioning forfeiture, at a farrier's, who would work no more that day. Down a short lane to the shore of Ross Water she went, resigned that her further weary way must now be a-foot.

But there, by the water's edge, stood a group of six village-women on the point of embarking in the nightly lug-sailed transport which bridged Lipton with Halford, near a mile away. The chance and hope of avoiding the long foot-sore detour made Bessie mendicant. She begged low at the ferry-man's ear, and he granted her a passage.

The last sunlight blotched the breadth of water with winking patches of bloody dragon-scales, coming through a depression of the hills which all round embowered the cosy lakelet. Evening breezes ran with chasing heels upon it, smiting the dragon-flakes into whipped wine, and all the lake into flying black blushes. From the west they came, and the boat, running with loose sail before them, made good way.

The place and the scene was full of the earth's ancient sidereal peace, and the vague pathos of man's most weird romantic residence on it. The women sat mostly silent on two thwarts astern, three with babes at the breast, waiting inactive that the boat should run, and the journey be done. Bessie's brow leant on her hand at the port side, and so piteously undone was she, that her head nodded there in semi-sleep.

Suddenly a most hoarse and wild outcry from the water startled her. The boat was then half-way across.

A tiny skiff, rowed in the opposite direction by a single oars-man, with a single oar, had passed near; and that oars-man, as the two floating things cleared each other, had for an instant seen her face. It was Garrett Oge Fitzgerald.

But the bigger boat was making such speed with her bulging lug, that by the time Bessie had started, rubbed her eyes, and looked around, she could arrive at no more definite knowledge than that a big man stood in a staggering skiff, stretching impassioned arms of appeal towards her. And she heard a shout, and even she thought that she vaguely heard her name.

‘Oh, Bess!’ he cried, ‘stop, for Christ’s sake! Oh, good Bess — dear soul — for — !’

But to the lugger it was a shout merely, and to Bessie merely a cause of fresh terror: terror doubled when she saw the oars-man sit again, turn his bow, and attempt, with wild right and left delvings, to follow the sailed boat. His effort, indeed, was foolishly futile: but, none the less, she ran to bury herself in a wood at the instant of her arrival at Halford.

The next afternoon she arrived at Lee, two leagues from Halford, famished. Here a school-dominie wrote a new letter for her to Mark Bonner, which she left at the Blue Bombard.

She was now only seven miles from Mede Down.

This was the day of her rendezvous. She set out, keeping to deserted ways.

Not two hours afterwards Mark Bonner sauntered into the Blue Bombard. When he opened the letter, his feet slid into a hint of dancing, and he fell to kissing the written words.

‘Oh, dear Bess — found at last! Well, my abounding star — ?’ he went.

A lady through an open parlour-door was watching him and his capers of joy. She had arrived at the inn a half-hour before him. She, too, with baleful purpose, was a seeker after Bessie Ford. It was the lady Anne Boleyn. And she very well knew Mark Bonner from the description of him given by Flying Sidney, in London.

Mark felt a finger touch his back, and, starting round, saw a low brow in an aureole over dancing blue eyes, and the brown beauty-spot on her short, firm-fleshed upper lip, and the tilted cap of white velvet, ringed with emeralds, stuck with a jaunty feather: a face bewitching as it was strong: and the out-push of her kerchiefed bust.

‘You are Mark Bonner, she said.

‘The initials,’ he answered, with smirk and bow, ‘standing for Maître-ès-Beaux-arts, my mistress,’

‘Ha! ha! ha!’ — her laugh was like a carillon of silvery things—’ you are witty, knave,’

‘And you — pretty — for the sake of the rhyme,’

‘Oh, ’tis so the wind sits, then? Sit you here,’

‘Woe’s me! I must be away.’

‘Ungallant swain! when a lady bids—’

‘Tis even for a lady’s behoof that I go,’

‘What, for Laura’s?’

Bonner started, and blushed.

‘Sure, you know me well—’

‘Did I not know your name, booby? All concerning you I know—’

‘Yet I know not you,’

‘I am called Anne Boleyn,’

‘What, the King’s—’

‘Friend,’

‘Why, madam—’

‘Oh, no madam; I am only a girl, Mark, and you a pretty boy, by my halidom! Where didst get those rolling and wreathing locks, princex? Come, sit and confess: ’tis to Laura that you go—’

‘No, to Bess.’

‘But Bess is the sis; to go to Bess meaneth to go to Laura. Is’t so?’

‘I suppose ’tis so. Yet ’tis to meet Bess that now I hie.’.

‘Then go — go to thy Laura, boy.’ She pushed him. ‘But I am — jealous, tnen.’

Now she pouted a baby’s mouth, and threw herself averted.

‘Nay, but — jealous?’ gibed Bonner, flattered from toe-tips to scalp.

Anne threw herself again to face him.

‘Is she really — so lovely?’

‘Who — Bess?’

‘You dare play the daw with me! No — Laura.’

‘She is even exceeding lovely.’

‘Then, wherefore tarry? Go in speed to her, booby.’

‘Faith, I’d liefer stay.’

‘Oh, no lies.’

‘I would.’

‘Because, forsooth, I am the prettier girl of the two, eh? Would’st dare say that, gallant?’

She fixed a keen, earnest under-leer on his embarrassed face.

‘Oh, I say not the prettier of the two!’ he answered, ‘but only as pretty. You are diverse in glory: you, the glad dawn — she, midnight, with all its stars—’

‘And of the two you prefer — ?’

‘Why, faith, the dawn.’

High carilloned Anne’s laughter. She leapt up, and, with a winged movement of the elbows, and a swaying suggestion of flight — though she was plump — danced to a window, looking out with hands behind her, thinking a moment. She turned again with dimples in her cheeks. On the face of Bonner was the flush of amorousness; he was now a mere plaything in her hand.

‘So you stay?’ said she, coming near.

‘Since I must.’

‘Silly boy!’ Her hand was on his shoulder. ‘What canst expect of me?’

‘One—’

‘Malapert! You forget who I am?’ She fillipped his ear.

‘No; forgive me. But I remember what you told me—’

‘What?’

‘That you are a girl —

‘Brought up in the French Court, eh, Mark?’

‘Perhaps.’

‘But Laura — thou lov’st her, varlet.’

‘You now only — I swear, by Venus—’

‘Thy tastes in ladies coincide strangely with Royalty’s, meseems, Mark.’

“Tis true the King does me the honour to pursue my discarded sweetheart.’

‘And thou his — in my person.’

‘I have outrivalled him with the first — if I could with the second!’

‘So thou hast hope? In what? In thy pretty cherry-lips and Jovian locks, rose-bud? Think’st thou I am so frail.’

‘Oh, in your dear clemency only have I hope! Look into mine eyes — !’

‘Oh, thine eyes. Well, they are large and swimming: but to resist them, friend, it is but necessary for a girl who would not perish in the regarding not to look too long that way, morbleu!’

‘That sweet French lisp you have! If you chatter so, I’ll crush you in a kiss!’

‘Try it, then! I’ll brawl right out! You love Laura!’

‘Not I!’

‘You do!’

‘I swear — !’

‘You do! Why else make you now to her sister?’

‘I? Oh, I am but taking her some King’s-letters, which I have here in my slop-pouch.’

‘King’s-letters? Writ to whom?’

‘To my Lord Wolsey.’

‘In truth — to my Lord Wolsey? So, boy? And how came they — ?’

’Tis a long story. You believe now — ?’

‘Wait — not yet. Where is it thou must meet with Bess to-night?’

‘I — should not say, perhaps.’

‘What, not to me? Here’s the worth of boys’ devotion, I swear to God! Am I not the friend of the girls, as thou mightest well divine from my knowledge of them? An thou wouldst have me believe half the japing thou spakest but now — then tell me.’

’Twas true! I am all on fire—’

‘Tell then.’

‘For a recompense?’

‘I give, Mark, to such as you: I do not sell.’

’Tis under the great chestnut-tree on Mede Down green that I meet her.’

‘When?’

‘One hour after sunset’

Anne had dimples in her plump, firm-fleshed cheeks.

‘Now?’ whispered Bonner, bending over her.

Anne leapt up, and with her bird-like flightiness of swaying motion went running round the room, he with encrimsoned visage after her. Once she flung a chair in his path, once a stool; then, pretending defeat, she sank upon the settee whence she had risen, and resigned herself with a sigh. He put crazy lips to hers; and as for her, one hand round his neck pressed him long to her: the other was in his slop-pouch. It was a bag with a flap, hanging from a leather at his waist.

At that moment Garrett Oge Fitzgerald, come so far from Ross Water in his search for Bessie, stood in the parlour's doorway.

Bonner was found! That fact, and with it a quick leap of joy, at once filled his consciousness; then, in an instant, a stab of jealousy: for Bonner, if not his, was Laura's, and Laura was Bessie's.

‘Why, boy...!’ said he, and in his tone was severe reproof.

Bonner glanced behind him: and, swifter than lightning-wink, new sanity at that instant filled him, and a consciousness of wrong.

‘Oh, God!’ he whispered quick to Anne, ‘say naught of what I have told thee as to Bess. He is mad in love with her!’

He jerked himself straight from his kiss. Anne, under the scowl of Fitzgerald, slipped from the room, and down to the inn-door. She at once took horse for Mede Down, the King's-letters being in her bosom.

At that time Bessie was hasting with beating heart toward the great chestnut-tree on Mede Down green.

As for Bonner, though guilty and trembling, he was yet about to tell Fitz of the rendez-vous, and to set out, when suddenly he discovered that the letters were gone. And now confusion and cowardly shame involved and abashed him. He escaped from his friend, and spent half the night in random, headlong, and bare-headed wanderings in the solitudes of that neighbourhood.

CHAPTER XXIII

EIGHTEEN PIECES OF CANNON

‘SHE WAS A gordian shape of dazzling hue,
Vermilion-spotted, golden, green, and blue;
Striped like a zebra, freckled like the pard,
Eyed like a peacock, and all crimson-barred.
KEATS.

WHEN Bessie arrived travel-worn, with languished head and aching soles, at the green of Mede Down to await Mark Bonner and the King’s-letters, Harry had already broken camp, and set out further; and no purple pavilion was there.

Nor did Mark come, being abashed by confusion and cowardly shame. But Anne Boleyn came instead.

At an inn-window she stationed herself, and thence presently saw a lonely, meek figure, carrying a small bundle, take stand under the chestnut. It was now night, but a full moon was working through sombre expeditions of wet cloud, and shed some shine.

Anne could make out no face, and curiosity spurred her. She gathered her murrey-velvet riding-dress, and went out.

She took no pains to conceal her interest in the poor toil-worn wayfarer that now sat with slung knee on a stone beneath the tree; but with neck that revolved backward in proportion to her advance, she passed and repassed several times, like a stepping peacock, near the humble waiter.

Bessie's eyes lifted, and she observed the face of her observer.

'My mother!' quoth she to herself, 'how this lady is for regarding me...'

Also an instinctive enmity, a surge of rancour, quickly repelled, swelled within her against this woman. Anne's face, dim-lit by the moon, was for an instant hateful to her as ratsbane and copperas and the finger of Doom. It was an intuitive sub-consciousness which she had of her worst, her fatal enemy.

Anne had fairly sure hope now of tracking Laura, having found Bessie, not suspecting that the sisters were separated. Bessie stayed there an hour motionless. Anne returned to her station at the inn-window to watch.

Suddenly, in another direction, there happened for Anne a lucky event: a party galloped into the village. They were her emissary, young Percy of Northumberland, arm in sling, with a fresh following of seven. She saw his face pass below, and at once sent down the chamberlain to summon him.

The eight weary horses being a world too many for the little inn's accommodation, the fighters loosed girths, and picketed them to crop the green round the great chestnut. Bessie, sitting with slung knee, like a stone on a stone, was in the midst of horses. Still she waited, and Mark Bonner did not come.

Meanwhile, brisk-eyed, bow-legged Percy broke, all in black armour, into Anne's parlour. His short curls of liquid blonde silk burst, as from ripe cocoon, beneath his steel morion. He caught her bodily in one arm, and boisterously bussed her lips.

'As though thou hadst earned that right, saucy boy!' said she. 'Where is the girl I sent thee to find?'

‘That girl!’ he cried, with snapped finger and thumb: ‘I have stuck five men, and, ‘sdeath! lost nine, in her co neying, and yet I have her not.’

‘Who, then, are these her defenders?’

“Sdeath! I know not: but this I trow, that many an armed man is abroad on the count of her.’

‘King’s-men and Queen’s-men all?’

“Sdeath! I know not. It strikes me they be not all nor King’s-men nor Queen’s-men.’

‘Knowest thou, Percy, if my Lord Wolsey hath haply had hand in all this matter?’

“Twere like enough. Methought that first night at the Eastcheap inn I met a Wolsey-man, and, ‘sdeath! I snipped his weasand.’

Anne started. To this moment she had no knowledge that Wolsey was in the hunt. If his hand was against hers — ! She ran with her bird-like, uplifted motion to the window, to make certain that Bessie sat still there on the stone. Back she soared with swaying lightness, to put her hands on his steel shoulders.

‘Hast encountered the King’s host, Percy?’

‘Even now I passed by it. He camps to-night not five miles hence, on this side Lee.’

‘Ah, but Francis would beat him in this search, an I Hast heard of Francis?’

‘Which Francis?’

‘The Black Knight.’

“Sdeath, yea! Is the Black Knight Francis?’

‘Booby-boy, yes; stupid, fighting, blue-eyed baby, yes. Think’st thou thou couldst fight Francis, and kill him for me?’

‘Francis?’ Sdeath! Am I not a Percy? Francis of France, quotha?’ Sdeath! I’d spit him like a moor-cock!’

‘Art sure, now? He is a true Colbrand in war, thou knowest, and in Love, too — I hear.’ She giggled a little.

‘Hath made love to thee, hath he?’

‘Perhaps! Perhaps!’

“Sdeath! I’d spit him—”

‘Nay, I love thee, booby; Francis thou must not fight, for my sake: he’d quench for ever that hot pate in half a trice, I warn thee. But there is another whom I would have thee kill for me, this hour—’

‘Hear her! Francis of France?’ Sdeath! I tell thee there is not arrow a one of them can stand one pigeon-dunging’s space before this axe, except—’

‘Well?’

‘One knave. Pah! I spit upon him. But, faith, he fights like ten thousand thunder-claps, Anne!’ Sdeath! he can fight. I love him like my brother.’

‘And who is this warrior?’

‘His name, they say, is Fitzgerald — an Irish louse.’ Sdeath! I’ll cleave him yet.’

‘Fitzgerald? Why, ’tis he I mean! You have him now — this hour. He is at the inn at Lee — alone. Percy — !’

Anne suddenly was deadly in earnest; her face reddened. Two hours since, she had left the inn at Lee under the scowling brow of Fitz; and Fitz, this great champion, was (Bonner had said it) in love with Bessie Ford. She feared and hated him.

‘He is there,’ said Anne, now. You have seven. He is alone — go!’

‘But — my left arm is in bandage—’

‘You have seven—’

‘But seven against one — oh, come! ‘Sdeath! fair play and roast ox, Anne—’

She drew herself severely back.

‘Do you cavil, then, at my behests, boy? Hands off, prithee! This Fitzgerald whom I bid thee kill, not one hour since, seized me roughly, and would have kissed my mouth—’

At this lie Percy’s hand fell clapping upon his smooth axe-handle, and his sharp teeth hissed a ‘Sdeath!’

‘Go, go,’ said Anne, pushing his shoulder; ‘no, not one buss, till thou return. And, Percy, leave me here two of thy servitors: I may need them.’

He went prone on new impulse, with busy, bowlegged roll, scattering behind a careless hand-wave, and out on the green called:

‘Hi, Bennett! Hi, Yates — all of you — here!’ approaching, as he called, the tree, where the men, their work of picketing just ended, stood. ‘Quick,’ said Percy, ‘swallow a cold repast: I give you fifteen minutes, watch in hand. Fitzgerald — you know, the fighter — is at Lee inn.’Sdeath! we finish him this self-same night. He is alone. Bennet, Thwaite, and Wright upon him first, and an he lard you three, then, ‘sdeath! three more! Come, line your bellies; ‘sdeath! and to horse—’

They trooped after him to the inn, to feed. And Bessie Ford, who had heard, sat, a stone on a stone, her heart seeming jammed in her dry throat.

He was doomed to die! He was at Lee inn, alone, and eight fighting-men, who hated him, knew! What though he was hunting after her life? In the thought of his death, somehow — she knew not at all wherefore — lay for her a horrid bitterness of world-loneliness. From side to side she slowly rocked, and with her rocking body rocked the woeful knee slung in her clasped fingers.

Only fifteen minutes, watch in hand, for the cold repast! And they were horsemen, she a-foot, sore travel-worn, ready to drop dead with her many griefs.

But she sprang up: she would at least try — though she perished — though he seized and slew her — to warn him. As she went running, in her gait was mixed a limping failure of the left leg.

Anne, from the window, saw, rushed down and out, and followed, sure now of Laura.

Lee lay six to seven miles westward by an undulating high-road, inclining mostly upward, bordered chiefly by bramble-hedge, but at one part traversing an extensive deer-forest — celebrated for a Henry I. anecdote — called Eleanor Wood.

Anne followed with extreme caution at a hundred yards, using the hedges and turns of road, well able to keep pace with the limping runner. But once, when Bessie was at the bottom of a depression, she chanced to look above and behind, and saw a skirt which vanished.

‘By my credit,’ thought she, ‘one might aver that I was followed by a woman...!’

She trotted on at the same pace till the next hill-brow concealed her from anyone behind it, and then, with all her speed, ran down. At the bottom the road abruptly entered the wood; and as she passed into the brooding gloom, she darted sideways into the thickness of the trees, intending no more to use the highroad. Two minutes afterwards, Anne realized that the crafty fugitive was lost to her.

But Bessie had not proceeded half a mile upon her detour when she found it impossible to advance. She had become involved in a jungle of forest-growths, which first confused her sense of direction, and finally barred her way.

‘Oh, my mother!’ she muttered, ‘I am only losing time with my foolishness. Pray, good, kind saints above, give me your hand to guide me....’

She lost five agonized minutes in fumblings, and then refound the curving highway. As she entered it, Anne, who, with a sense of defeat, had languidly continued her way, spied her near, and slipped behind an oak.

The next moment a scream rang through the wood — a scream of piercing joy. Bessie had Laura in her arms.

Laura, with Calvo, was passing along the road in the opposite direction. They two had been led together by Flying Sidney Boleyn, who, in general, knew the whereabouts of everyone in Hampshire; and now Sidney was with them, taking them to meeting with Bessie at Mede Down, where he had secret knowledge that Bessie was.

Sidney was leading his horse, and Laura hers, which was woefully lame. Calvo, in his wanderings, had lost his mule.

‘Come, master,’ said Sidney now; ‘I will escort you to a right fair domicile for the night not one halfmile hence, safe enow, though near, I avouch, to the King’s camp—’

Calvo was grinning; he patted Bess twice on the back as she ate and hugged at Laura; and he said:

‘Well, well.’

They followed Sidney’s lead into the forest. There was here no path; yet he knew his way. Last of all, Anne, flitting from her tree with held-up skirt, dodged warily from trunk to trunk, tracking them.

Sidney’s objective was a vast elm, old as the Scipios and the fall of Carthage, a roomy hollow within. It stood on a grass mound, solitary; and here, sitting, Bessie turned the face of Laura to the moving moon to watch it. She had forgotten Fitzgerald and his doom.

The lovely face was duskily thin now, divinely haggard, like Venus seasick, like Helen in crapes. The Beauty was as frail as beautiful, and did not take kindly to escapades and weariness; she sat languid and sad, and her small left eye drooped smaller, looking out Spanish melancholy.

Calvo, a little distance from the tree, was conversing low with Sidney.

From a village cider-house a quarter-mile away came vaguely a sound of revelry, flute and laugh and virginal, and the twinkle of tambourines: for the King was hereabouts, and money was brisk.

‘And these letters left at inns for me,’ Calvo was saying: ‘art sure they are on the part of my lord Wolsey?’

‘Oh, sure,’ answered Sidney. ‘In each case have they been left by a gallant called Havard, who searches in company with four. And Havard, I wot, is a gentleman-almoner of my lord Cardinal of York.’

‘What can the pork have to say to me?’ mused Calvo.

‘Some favourable offer, I would wager, from the manner of it.’

‘And as to the Black Knight now — finish thy story.’

‘There is but scant to add: pricked by the King’s ensample, he hath summoned to him eighty men from his ship in Southampton Water; and these, now on the march, bring four howitzers, three culverins, five falconets, two sakers, and four mortars, making eighteen pieces of enginry in all.’

‘Well, but the chuffs — with what object — ?’

Here a sharp outcry startled them: a quick ‘Oh!’ from Bessie Ford. She had remembered Fitz and his doom, and ran towards Calvo and Sidney, crying out:

‘Oh, Master Sidney! a poor man at Lee inn stands in sore peril at the hand of eight fighters, who even now hie thither—’

‘What name?’

‘Master Fitzgerald, I think, he is called—’

‘Why, the gallant fighter—’

He was interrupted by a galloping tramp that passed on the high-road.

‘Oh! ’tis piteous — holy Mother! those are -even they!’ went Bessie.

‘Don’t cry, I shall be there within time,’ called Sidney; and, almost as he spoke, he was away, tossing behind, with a shout, a tied parcel of rye-cake and meat.

Calvo, before he was fully off, ran a little, calling:

‘Be here with the morning: I have need of thee!’

Sidney’s animal knew him and the taste of his spur: in three minutes he had Percy’s party behind; five minutes before them he arrived at Lee. He informed Fitzgerald that fifty armed men had sworn to take his life that night; and hot Percy found the inn without a tenant.

Thus did Bessie save the fighter: but as though, in truth, Something was against her, her mercy wrought her woe: for there, behind a tree, lurked the Lady Anne, regarding her.

CHAPTER XXIV

KING AND MAID

‘THEN FORTH SHE rode, clad on with chastity.’ — TENNYSON.

‘How are thy servants blessed, O Lord!

How sure is their defence!

Eternal wisdom is their guide,

Their help Omnipotence.’

ADDISON.

THERE were thus four persons near together in the wood when Sidney rode away. Suddenly there were but two: for Anne, seeing the sisters disposing themselves to rest for the night, stole away to fetch for the seizure of Laura the two Percy-men left at Mede Down for her; and Calvo, too, with slow-planted step, went through the wood, making for the hamlet whence came the sounds of revelry. There, Sidney had told him, a letter awaited him. And, going, he murmured:

‘Whatever can the pork have to say to me...?’ As for Bessie, her head dropped in dead prolapse; though she was famished, her effort to eat failed in a sigh. They two heaped all their clothes in a mass and lay nude together, wrapped in Bessie's woollen sheet, in the farthest gloom of the hollow elm. Instantly they slept.

In fifteen minutes Calvo returned from the inn. He had with him Wolsey's letter.

If Mauro Calvo, the magister, it said, would visit the Abbey-ruin in the eastern regions of Eleanor Wood any fore-day that week at two o'clock, he would meet there an ambassador of the Cardinal; and he had the word of a churchman and a gentleman that no inconvenience should result to him from the granting of that interview.

Calvo re-read the letter thrice. He saw how easily, in case of bad faith, he might be seized at a rendezvous, or tracked after it. He went 'H'm!', armed himself with some strange-looking objects taken from his bag, and lay down to sleep, some yards from the elm, near to where Laura's lame horse cropped.

He slept placidly till one; then sat up and looked at his heavy Limoges watch of porcelain. The moon had now worked and won her way far westward through a cloudy heaven, whose sombre travel her glimpses whitened in patches of lunacy; some spears of beginning rain spat through the trees; and still there came from the cider-house the vague twinkling sounds of the incessant waking tambourine.

Calvo rose, and walked away eastwards. He had little difficulty in discovering the Abbey-ruins, for they were vast, though their distance from the elm was considerable. Precisely at two there was a rush in the bushes, and Havard, a servitor of Wolsey, draped in a cloak, stood before the sage.

'Mauro Calvo?' he said.

'The same, sir.'

'I come to you with an offer from my lord Cardinal. Sheer frankness betwixt us, methinks, were meet in this our conference: and frank I shall be.

Promise you no less?’

‘Let me hear,’ said Calvo.

‘My lord Wolsey, for his own ends, the which concern neither you nor me, desireth to have in his custody the person of your ward, Laura Ford, and this month near hath so desired. Now, consider my lord’s surprise that a wench like this should through so long weeks thwart his purpose; right or wrong, he attributed her escaping to the potent wit and working of the sage, Mauro Calvo. And since he knoweth that others seek the maiden — the King himself with his troop — two Kings — many warriors — and that there be need for urgent haste in this matter, therefore it is that he sendeth me to you.’

‘I see. He would have me betray this poor girl into his hand—’

‘Nay! not so. But he believes that, without you, she would by necessity be his within some hours only. He would merely have you leave the sisters to their own devices.’

‘And, in quittance, what offers he?’

‘Safety, quiet, staid habitation to prosecute your studies — all that you most desire.’

For some minutes Calvo said not a word. Surely the temptation was strong. He had in mind the doing of a profound thing — ! And for it he needed only safety, quiet, staid habitation.

He was silent, and during that silence Anne Boleyn, stooping behind a broken buttress, clapped her hands noiselessly.

‘Too late, my lord Cardinal!’ she muttered. ‘Trumps, trumps! the girl is mine!’

She had been riding from Mede Down with the two Percy-men to the seizure of Laura, when she saw Havard’s tied horse near the road. Having heard Flying Sidney tell Calvo of the Wolsey-letters awaiting him, she had divined, from the Cardinal's baretta stamped large on a boss of the horse's trappings, that hereabouts and now was rendez-vous between Calvo and a Wolsey-man. She had bid her men wait, had dismounted, and through the under-wood tracked the signs of Havard's advance to the ruins.

Now, however, noting the silence of Calvo, the tokens of his yielding, she realized that there was need for haste. She rose, and first crept, then ran, back to her horse. And now with plied whip she made, with the two servitors, for the elm.

When Calvo at last spoke, he said:

'I have the Cardinal's promise that no harm be done me, nor trial made to track me hence, whatever my answer. Is't so?'

'You have also my own solemn pledge,' said Havard.

'Then my answer to the Cardinal is this: That I deny not the greatness of his offer; but that I am a fool, and — I refuse.'

'You stick to the maidens?'

'Yes. Say that the great Mauro Calvo — great as King or Cardinal in his way — is doddering to his dotage. He refuses.'

'Tis final, then?'

'Aye.'

Havard bowed.

'There remains but this to add,' said he. 'If at any future time, the girl being not then in the Cardinal's custody, you be moved to accept my lord's offer, then you leave your acceptance in writing at the Thistle Inn, at Halford; and my lord Cardinal's known love for the learned, despite your naughty obstinacy, will still stand you in good stead.'

Calvo was pleased in his recesses.

'Well, now,' he said, when Havard was gone, 'Tis handsomely done. The pork's not altogether a chuff and thick beast, like those other chuffs. And here is poor forlorn Mauro Calvo tempting the great man's patience, all on the count of that Bess — well, well.'

He took the precaution, in returning, to make a protracted detour, fearing watching eyes. At one time he heard a far sound of several galloping hoofs. It was the sound of Anne and her two.

Within twenty yards of the elm, she whispered halt. Dismounting, she went forward alone to determine that all was well for the seizure.

At the moment when she should need her men, she arranged to run back a little, and utter a yodling summons.

She stole near the tree. It was drizzling steadily; but the opening looked westward, and the moon, now old in fore-day vigil, and westering far in lucid immarcessible silver, was as an aged saint who, after many a cloudy strife, at last in trance spies opening heaven, and a shining smites his face. Thus, every detail in the hollow tree was lit; and as Anne, with picked-up skirt and craning neck, on tip-toe, pried within, she saw — and started!

Laura was not there. Bessie only was there, with limbs tossed in deep-breathed slumber, hardly covered by the tumbled sheet. And, beside her, a small heap of clothes.

An intense sense of defeat — the bitter thought of Wolsey — filled Anne. Had Calvo already betrayed? That was hardly possible. Where, then, was Laura Ford? Now she must be Anne's, or never. If not now, then was she Wolsey's.

She turned to hunt, and instantly turned again to the tree. There was Bessie — Had she a dirk with her, she would then and there have struck it, in her rage, into the sleeper's bosom. As it was, with the double object of searching further without fear of Bessie's interference, and of doing a wanton turn to the poor, worn dreamer, she stalked prone on balancing tiptoe into the tree, swooped up the poor little garments on her arm, picked and gathered the sheet with dainty fingers, and was gone.

Through her deep sleep a stab of apprehension pierced Bessie Ford; she shook herself together with a shudder; she turned sharply round, with wild eyes, with groping hand: bitter emptiness — Laura was not there.

Her very first thought was King Harry: the Dragon's camp was near; she knew it; she knew whereabouts; she had heard from Flying Sidney.

The next impulse of her stunned consciousness was toward her clothes; her clothes were not there; she was naked; the sheet was gone. She was a prisoner.

She rushed to the opening. 'Master Calvo!' she called: Calvo was not there.

She was a prisoner — if the earth held bands to bind her! if the strong social ages, and their strong growth of world-idea and sentiment, was stronger than the fibre of her tough hero-soul!

Happily, she knew where Calvo had his bag among leaves. The bag contained a sharp-bladed knife. She ran, all flurried, to it, and took the knife — for King Harry's bosom, or for the bosom of Laura Ford! — she knew not which, nor cared.

A thought — which was almost a bitter suspicion — shaped itself in her brain: why had not Laura, on being seized, cried out?

There stood Laura's nag, cropping. With fluttering hand she girthed him, untied his halter. Having mounted, she moved south-westward.

The rain was not heavy, but steady, and soon trickled from the end of her little plaited 'natte' — long as a man's hand — down her bare back. Her clear, immaculate whiteness, as she moved among the trees under the glimpsing moon, gave her a bluish ghostliness.

Her motion was very slow. The nag was reluctant, and, being quite lame, limped deeply. With vehement powerlessness she beat it with the short halter-end. The nag quickened a moment his walk, and fell back into his stumping limp.

‘Oh go, horse!’ quoth she severely.

Among the trees she wound, always south-westward, to where, according to Sidney, the King’s camp lay.

Even the impulse to beard the Lion in his den was brave; thus to continue doggedly on her slow way was strong, truly: for Henry had acquired in her imagination the vast dimensions and the baneful leer of Satan himself: it was therefore into the jaws of death that she rode, and into the mouth of Hell.

On she rode, on a limping nag through the dark and dripping wood, clad in a string of rowan-tree berries — a knife in her left hand. Her direction, however, was, as might be expected, not precisely that in which the camp lay, since her information was vague. As she came to the end of the wood, she saw that the day was breaking, the sky eastward being already like a field of chrysolite ploughed into fresh, rough furrows of broken gold. And she saw no camp.

For some time she rode at random in open country, with wild haste, with little speed, powerlessly beating the horse’s neck with the halter-end, like a man who fights in nightmare, but his forceless blows fail and faint.

She could not weep, her face was dead white, and had a rigour as of death. She suffered despair, having no doubt that the King really now held Laura, Now she wet her lips with her tongue, and now she looked about with feeble and woeful eyes, saying:

‘By my credit, it is morning—’

Suddenly she heard a clear-calling bugle-sound chortle in the air. As it were mechanically, she turned in that direction, and found that the King's camp lay quite close, behind the shoulder of a hill.

She marked the lofty purple pavilion standing at the end of a street of tents, and blocking the street into a cul-de-sac. The camp stood on a gentle hill, strewn with flint-boulders and dotted with trees, the pavilion being higher than the other tents.

Bessie's horse continued its deeply-limping walk, descending the hill-shoulder, and in a couple of minutes was limping up the tent-street.

Now, at that bugle-call the whole little army was awake and up. And Henry, who was ever a stirrer before the lark, was lolling at his tent-door, talking to Charles Brandon.

On went the nag, limping through a double row of eyes that stared in a silence of blank amaze through a full minute. But at the end of that time there was sound: the lame pastern of the palfrey struck a boulder; down he dived upon both knees; Bessie, with a pathetic 'Oh!' clutched at his mane; and at that stumble and feeble, pathetic 'Oh!' of her feeble womanhood, down the two rows of tent-doors, from top to bottom, rose and rang a unanimous shout of laughter.

Bessie rode west; Harry looked east. The first fore-running brilliance of the sun was in his eyes. He shaded them with horizontal palm under peering brows, to see.

At twenty feet from him a yeoman caught Bessie's bridle to stop her. Harry called:

'Let be...! Let be...!'

He had not yet seen quite well, nor realized. She limped nearer. Suddenly, back went his merry head, and he cried:

'Ha! ha! ha! Why, mamie—'

Instantly she was down before him, shivering like the sheeted dead, knife in hand.

‘You are the King,’ she gasped; ‘give me my sister!’

‘Oh, come, mamie, this is a bit strong,’ said Henry, making a ribald pretence of hiding away his eyes from her: ‘by God, ’tis strong, Charles! Ha! ha! ha! ha!’

Charles Brandon was doubling with merriment, hands on knees.

‘Give her back to me!’ she exclaimed passionately.

‘An the Queen were here — ,” cried out Brandon, squeaking the last word in a climax of laughter.

‘Mamie, mamie!’ said Henry, with shaking abdomen, ‘I am a married man: there is the Queen to be considered, with her Spanish jealousy — oh, ’tis strong, Charles!’

‘Is she here? Oh, will you not give her to me?’

My mother! believe me, I’ll kill you—’

She raised the knife. And now the situation changed: Henry held up averting hands: Charles Brandon gripped the raised arm in deadly seriousness.

‘My sister—’

‘Hold, hold, she speaks of a sister—’ said Henry.

‘Which sister?’ queried Charles Brandon.

‘You know! You know! You have her in the tent there—’

Henry and Charles exchanged wondering glances.

‘No, mamie, we’ve got no sis,’ said Henry with gentle sincerity.

‘What sister speak’st thou of?’ queried Charles again.

‘The sister you’ve come out to hunt and chase; oh! give her to me—’

Now Henry glanced quick at her face, and recognised it. He had seen it in Mauro Calvo’s den, under London Bridge.

“Tis Laura’s sister,’ he whispered at Brandon’s ear; and aloud: ‘Why, my poor dear, we have her not,’

And at that word, ‘My poor dear,’ down fell Bessie at the King’s feet, tears pouring on her face.

‘God’s pity!’ said he, ‘it weeps—’

And with the words, he snatched from a stool his riding-cloak, and with face of painful compassion, cast it round her body, stooping to clasp it at her neck.

This new clemency was too much for poor Bess: her heart broke, and in a paroxysm of sobs she spoke bubbling words of lost meaning, while Henry, bending over her, muttered:

‘God’s pity! it weeps! it weeps! Tut, tut! ’tis an honest, brave soul!’

‘Don’t do it’ — at last the words came with some: audibleness from the midst of her choking gasps—’ you declare me that she is not here, and, by my credit, I am believing you. But don’t do it — don’t hunt after her narrow more — don’t you! It is hard on a poor sister’s heart — it is not right — her mother left her to me — I don’t think the angels in Heaven, and the good God — don’t you do it! Sure, there is Something which sees and judges even a King — and hears the sobs of the helpless — and the cry of their appeal — in the day — of their sore — calamity. Don’t you! Leave her be! Oh do! Do now! She has nought but one riches — despoil her not of that! — houses and lands cannot give her back her soul’s stand and quality — and it would Kill me dead, I know, oh my! Hear the prayer of your poor subject, do, great King....’

At that moment the strong will of Harry yielded to the winning power of this girl, and he was truly a King and Shepherd of his people. His one hand lay on her bowed and spasming head; his other dashed a moisture from his eyes. He had a bosom quick and generous, and as he muttered for the tenth time: ‘Oh, but God’s pity! ’tis an honest, good soul — !’, in his heart he renounced the pursuit of Laura Ford.

It was a mighty moment in the life of Henry — when the choice between Right and Wrong lay definitely before him — and the whole character of his Future, had he known it, depended upon his decision.

Really, one could almost imagine that at such a moment of crisis in a great man’s biography all the potentates of Heaven and Hell do silent battle for his soul in the air about him: something so horribly momentous seems to lie in a human creature’s power of moral choice.

There was a moment, we say, when the great river of that royal will was stemmed and turned by this Bessie. His hand on her bobbing head, his face stooped low to hers, he said:

‘Why, weep not, good Bess — stanch it, stanch it — am I not thy good Father and King, then — ?’

He stopped, hearing a sound: a faint, fluted sound from far away — a bugle-sound. At the same time Charles Brandon happened to utter this one word:

‘Francis—’

Down came Henry’s foot in a stamp of royal rage, and ‘Away with her!’ he cried with encrimsoned visage. ‘Ha! ’tis to me thou darest come, then, with thy whines and paltering pleadings? Charles Brandon! have the wench conveyed from my sight — quick, lad! Faith, she makes a fool of me....’

His words, begun in a roar, ended in a grumble of shame, and he beat a hurried retreat into the pavilion.

Charles followed him to say:

‘Perchance, the girl, if tracked hence, might yield us some trace of her sister—’

‘Oh, don’t be a dirty hound!’ grumbled Henry. ‘Let her begone, and have fair play. Toss her on a sound nag, and send her packing.’

He sat grumpy, leaning back, his head heavy on his hand, his bosom a rumbling cave of silent Sinai thunders, muttering awfully that he was Wrong.

If there be not God, whose is this dreadful, familiar Voice that we hear so close?

As for Bessie, in five minutes she was cantering down the tent-street, wrapped in the King’s riding-cloak.

The King had not Laura! Where, then, was Laura? Wherever she might be, Bessie was no longer in despair. It was Harry, Harry the Dragon, whose defiling breath she feared.

Laura at this time sat at the opening of the elm, wondering after Bessie.

She had awaked in the night refreshed, and heard a persistent twinkling sound of tambourines, far laugh, and virginal, and flute. Her hands had met in a single clap. Her light nature leapt always to the mere sound of dance and free jollity, from which now she was long divorced. She had stolen from Bessie’s embrace, peeped out, seen that Calvo was not there, whisked on her clothes, and gone to lurk and watch behind a hedge which backed the gay tavern-yard. When she returned, wet, Bessie was gone.

Through high day it was that Bessie galloped back to the elm, for fresh search in the forest; and seeing Laura there, and with her, Calvo, she uttered a cry, leapt, ran, trailing far the King’s cloak, and fell almost fainting upon her sister’s bosom.

CHAPTER XXV

WOLSEY'S RAGE

‘ALLOWING HIM A breath, a little scene,
To monarchise, be feared, and kill with looks.’
SHAKESPEARE.

IT had been Calvo’s cynical plan, as we said, to draw and concentrate upon him his pursuers — Francis, Harry, and all — to their mutual destruction, while he escaped to the coast. When on the point of putting it into execution, he was frustrated by his accidental separation from the girls. But the moment he found himself reunited with them, his mind recurred to it.

When Bessie arrived at the elm in the King’s cloak, Calvo was standing some distance from it, looking out for Sidney Boleyn, whom he had bid come to him with the morning. And very soon the pale-faced Rider appeared. He slipped to the ground and stood by Calvo, cap in hand.

‘I am going to confide a thing of great importance to you,’ said Calvo. ‘I trust you, you see.’

Sidney, with hands together, said:

‘My great and good master—’

‘How goes the pain?’

‘For three merry days not a twitch.’

‘Well, I deserve thy gratitude for that. I will tell thee. Thou knowest that there are a number of armed parties out after me and that poor girl’s sister. The sister with the face I could leave to her tholing without a single itch, but for the girl’s self I have, I confess, a sort of care. So now I am serious in my will to baulk these cattle, and my plan is to lead them all after my traces, and, at the last, have them gathered round a house or inn, where I can actually at a casement discover to them the silly face, to the intent that they shall rage with storm and brulziement within, working upon one another mutual havoc in narrow space, while I, with the girl and the sister, by a surely secret exit, do make good my escape. There should, I wager, be some such house or inn in Hampshire: and thy mete now it is to tell me it.’

Sidney pondered, searching the ground with shifting legs. He said:

‘There is the tavern at Baneleigh—’

‘Tell me of it.’

‘It lies six leagues hence, eight stone-throws only from Broughton Castle, and not two miles from my father’s seat. Oh, I know the landlord well; you could steal thither through field and wood, and for me, if you mention him my name, he would sure conceal you till your plan worked to ripeness—’

‘But the exit — ?’

‘The tavern makes part of the old Saxon Abbey of Baneleigh. It was the Abbot’s quarters, and from its cellars there leads an underground passage to the abbey-ruins, by which, as they tell, the Abbots were wont to surprise the jolly monks in refectory, though, more-like, ’twas but a sewer; and in this passage, oft and oft when a boy, I have spent dark days, rolling with pain.’

‘And the ruins are how far from the tavern?’

‘Say a hundred yards or less. The tavern stands by itself near the centre of a flat vale called Broughton Vale. It is made of gray-stone, with stoneshafted oriels of Purbeck. In front it looks west upon the flat land round Broughton Castle; at its side, to the northeast, are the ruins, covered in forest; and all betwixt ruins and castle, and at the castle back, is store of rich forest-land: so your flight would be well hid.'

'Any villages?'

'Only one within a mile of the tavern; but all about the low hills encircling the valley you have little hamlets.'

'What names?'

'Fletcherfield, Stroud, Cleve, East Hythe, Winton, Little Baneleigh, and Sudbury Rye.'

Calvo muttered after him the names on his fingers, storing them in his bulging hard brow.

'Very good,' said he; 'I dare say it will answer. Wilt accompany me, thou?'

'Alas! I cannot now.'

'How so?'

'I encountered my half-sister Anne, two hours since, at Lee inn. She requisitions me to bear her a letter in haste to London; 'twas even with difficulty I escaped her to come but now to you.'

'Thou canst not say her nay?'

Sidney drew in his breath with a siffle.

'Nay,' said he; 'her anger is most terrible—'

'And to whom is it that thou bearest her letter?'

'To my lord Cardinal,'

'Aha! Well, go thy way, go thy way,'

Calvo waved him languidly off, and Sidney — with an obeisance to him, and a wave toward where Laura, with galloping volubility and hand-gestures, recounted to Bess her week's adventures — mounted, and was gone.

To Lee inn he went, where Anne was preparing her letter to Wolsey.

The mere fact of her recent discovery that Wolsey, too, was hunting Laura Ford had given to Anne a scare, and upset her nerve. He could have no possible motive but her ruin. As Anne's game was to give Laura into the King's hands, so Wolsey's must be to keep her out of the King's hands, having her meanwhile in his own. And against all the searchers after the beauty Anne would have pitted her wits with an inward certainty of winning, but Wolsey was a different matter.

When she looked into the elm and saw Laura gone, her heart had sunk to her heel; when she searched all the wood and found no trace of her, she had despaired. For Wolsey, the great tempter, was at the ear of Calvo, and Calvo, she believed, would betray.

She despaired — almost. There was yet a hope — a card to play.

She had in her bosom the King's letter to Wolsey which she had picked from the slop-pouch of Mark Bonner. That letter contained the word 'divorce,' and also Anne's own name. Its publication, a hint of its contents to Charles of Spain, would precipitate upon the head of Wolsey a world of trouble with Charles, with the Pope; would dash his secret ambitions; would prepare for his taste a wormwood, and for his back a scourge.

With this knowledge she wrote her letter, casting off reserve, avowing open enmity, being all in a flurry and intensity of feminine scare. Only on the condition that Wolsey would withdraw at once and wholly from the chase of the girl Ford, would she, Anne, tormented, persecuted, and innocent maiden that she was, refrain from using to the utmost the powers which the possession of the King's letter gave. This, on five pages of close-written French, she said.

With the letter Sidney started about noon. Near Odiham he changed horse; at Chertsey he supped; near Staines he stopped late at a mareschal's for a shoe. Far into the night he rode at his habitual pace, crouching like a ghostly monkey on the stretched neck of his horse. At fore-day he reached London. Wolsey was at Hampton.

Off he went again. About nine he was bowing on the airy, flower-jewelled lawn before the great priest-man.

Here Wolsey, in cardinal red, took the air with short, quick-planted step, a little manual held open between thumb and finger; and behind him an old untidy gospeller shambled in black buckram, burdened with large books in pig-skin.

Wolsey, glancing down from the height of his thick stiff neck, saw the handwriting. He put out his hand, his superb coarse lips smiling their eternal smile of insolence. And as he read, he stepped, carrying his bulk in the very manner of a fat and haughty old dowager.

As he read, he smiled, and, having read, he smiled. He turned upon white-faced Sidney.

‘Art tired, poor lad?’ said he.

‘Yea, my lord.’

‘Then get thee through the archway there into the court, and bid a henchman let the carver feed thee full, and stable thy nag.’

He waited motionless till Sidney had disappeared, and twice his bright brown eyes moved from side to side in strenuous, agile, and potent thought.

Then he himself, almost at a run, went toward the palace. And now his brown visage was of the redder brown of passion.

He was a stupendous worker; he worked like the whirlwind. Here, in fact, was his main characteristic: that he worked like the whirlwind.

The travail of ten men through a week he would crowd with herculean rage into a single intense night's vigil.

Long before Sidney was half through his meal, he had set off with ten trusty men for Hampshire, he himself riding in a tylsent frock of simple Dominican black, a black mask over his brow and nose.

Like some frowning thunder-cloud he went, with spinning speed. And as he went, he said to himself: 'To-night, to-night, she must be in my hands....'

Few people lived who could have stirred him to action so furious. But for Anne Boleyn, who was, in truth, his evil destiny, his nature cherished a bitter hate. Her letter of threat had lit into raging flame his whole mine of supercilious arrogance. With spinning speed he went.

He had been kept well posted as to events in Hampshire — the movements of Francis, of Harry, of everyone, by his servants there. Already he knew of Havard's meeting with Calvo in the wood, and its results. He had been content to direct from Hampton the capture of the girl: but Anne's letter altered the matter. It gave him the first knowledge which he had that Anne, too, was a searcher. At once he pierced her motive. And he revered her wits, as she his: her presence on the spot necessitated his also. Expedience, therefore, urged his setting out; but chiefly whipped and flaming arrogance urged him.

The risk, however, of this his expedition was awful.

If Harry should get scent of it — ! and should get scent that his Cardinal's motive was to baulk and thwart him in his quest — ! Then would there be wrath and a stamping of the foot. Wolsey put on a black frock and mask.

He reached Mede Down at vespers, and there he had news of Mauro Calvo; he galloped on to Lee, and there he had news of Calvo; he went on to Halford, and there again he had news of Calvo.

His brow now was working profoundly: in this mere regularity of news his strong insight detected a mystery which as yet he did not solve.

At Mede Down, about noon of the previous day, three forest-keepers in Lincoln green, with buckhounds in leash, and jessed falcons on wrist, were passing through the village to the manor-house near, when a man in skull-cap rode up, and asked the way to Fletcherfield. He volunteered the information that to Fletcherfield with two maidens he was bound. The keepers realized that here was that Calvo for whom eyes were everywhere being kept open on behalf of my lord Wolsey. But before they could seize him, Calvo rode off. And this Wolsey heard at Mede Down.

Outside the village, in thick wood, Calvo had left Laura and Bessie — new-clad by the gift at a farmhouse of a home-spun gown of camlet-cloth — to await him, he being on the horse given to Bessie in the King's camp, and the girls afoot. From Mede Down they had proceeded to the neighbourhood of Lee, outside which, near curfew-toll, Calvo had left the maidens, and ridden into the village in undisguised skull-cap. There some local fête was in progress, for round a merry Maypole, fluttering with bandrols, three minstrels played recorders, sackbut, and kettle-drum. He trotted into the crowd, and asked his way to Sudbury Rye, volunteering the information that thither, with two maidens, he was bound; and while the yokels still meditated upon his face and skull-cap, had ridden off. And this Wolsey heard at Lee.

At Halford, the next matins, Calvo had trotted in and surprised a young inn-wife, who outside the inn-door leant, shouting morning salutations to gossips' windows, parading a brand-new stomacher of mohair powdered with minever. [Notice the rich dress of this woman. The author remembers now, on reading final proofs, that his motive for detailing it was to show the easy way of life of the common peasant people of that time, having in mind the fact that the appropriation of English land by a small number of ignoble Noblemen had not then advanced to anything like the degree of guilty theft with which we are familiar in these our impossible days of ‘phossy jaw,’

‘lead-workers’ convulsions,’ and, gentle reader, ‘potter’s rot.’ In fact, the difference between our Royal Harry and his meanest peasant subject in physique, dress, and manners was very slight, England then greatly resembling France and Spain then, or even France and Spain now. I have read that somewhere about 1460 a Sumptuary Act was passed prohibiting ploughmen and their wives from wearing silver girdles and costly head-dresses — as though, forsooth, Parliament now should start prohibiting our ‘potter’s-rot’ classes from wearing silks and point-lace! The misery of it is, that the curse against Wrong is two-edged, ruining both the despoiler and the despoiled, there being a species of rot in the world even more damned than ‘potter’s rot’ — if we call it dry-rot! Between ‘fatness of soul’ and the ‘fat of the land’ the choice of the present writer is unhesitating.]

To her Calvo spake, begged a piece of pasty, and volunteered the information that ’twas for two maidens, with whom he was even then making for Little Baneleigh. And while she meditated upon his face and skull-cap, he, seeming to take fright, had ridden off. And this Wolsey, that same night, heard at Halford.

That Calvo had designedly published these three destinations, Wolsey divined at once, also that all were false, given out to mislead pursuers, since all could not be true. It was only when he rode on to Lipton, on the western side of Ross Water, that a possible truth in all these differing destinations was revealed to him, and instantly he saw light. Here Calvo had left the rumour that his destination was Stroud. Wolsey perambulated the inn-parlour with agitated, quick-planted step, rustling a frou-frou of his black tylsent frock, masked, hands on chest. A man of fierce countenance was he that night.

‘And where is Stroud?’ he asked.

‘Tis a-top of Broughton Vale, your worship,’ answered the landlord.

‘Broughton Vale — where stands the castle of Sir James Broughton?’

‘The same.’

‘Stay: Fletcherfield — knowest where it lies?’

‘Fletcherfield, sir. ’Tis a village in Broughton Vale, too.’

‘And where is Little Baneleigh?’

‘Why, even a-top of Broughton Vale.’

‘And where is Sudbury Rye?’

‘Why, so God me save, even in that very Vale, at the top, your worship’s honour.’

Wolsey stopped his walk, scowling in thought.

‘Hath any person made search here to-day after this man?’

‘There was a lady, your worship, at the hour of sext, and a party of three about none, your honour’s worship. I gave them to know that his way lay toward Stroud, and for Stroud they went pelting.’

And at once Wolsey muttered:

‘Oh, then, I have the crafty knave.’

He hurried to the door; without a minute’s delay he was galloping with his ten from the village.

He remembered with intense self-complaisance that Sir James Broughton was under his thumb, his man, strongly bound to him. The castle, therefore, would afford a secure place of sojourn for him and his captives for that night at least, without the slightest chance that Henry should get wind of the capture, or of Wolsey’s presence in Hampshire. For of a capture Wolsey was now certain. Calvo, he saw, was voluntarily surrounding himself with his pursuers, since all the destinations he had given out were round Broughton Vale, and his motive could only be their mutual destruction. To effect that, he must bring them into contact, must himself be in their centre: must have, too, for himself some sure way of escape. Wolsey knew nothing of Baneleigh tavern, little of Broughton Vale, but he divined, long before he reached it, that somewhere about its centre must be a subterranean passage.

Not once did he draw rein till he was clanging the belfry bell at the outer drawbridge of Broughton Castle. There was need for spinning haste, he knew....

Had not a lady called at Lipton 'at the hour of sext'? — a lady, he guessed, with wit as quick as his!

As a matter of fact, Anne Boleyn had all that day been learning at the villages the identical facts which Wolsey learned, and her astute brain had reasoned in his very manner, to arrive at his very conclusions: only with swifter decision, for she had old, familiar knowledge of the subterranean passage between tavern and ruins.

Wolsey's first question at the castle was as to the existence of such a passage in the neighbourhood.

Even as he asked it, Calvo, with Bessie and Laura, were feasting on calvered salmon, and perch in foyle, in the tavern-buttery, where they had been sumptuously received by the landlord on Calvo's mention of his friend, Flying Sidney. It was well past midnight, just that hour when, yonder in the dismal monastery ruins, the ghost of many an ancient monk flitted from dorter to chapel at the alarum of the bell for primes.

Calvo, with full mouth, was impressing upon a hostler at his side the order in which he should forthwith ride to the various villages, pretending to come from the landlord, with the news that the girls were at the inn.

He knew that, led by his voluntary droppings of hints at villages, Francis, with eighty, now lay in tents upon Sudbury Rye; Henry camped at Little Baneleigh; Alvarada and Sir John Perrot occupied Stroud; Fitzgerald and Bonner, reunited now with Macdonald by the pursuit of a common trail, were at Fletcherfield; Northumbrian Percy, and also some Wolsey-men, were at Winton; Du Ballay and his knights at East Hythe. They lay an almost complete circle of arms and armour around Broughton Castle and Baneleigh tavern.

Calvo, with absolute cynical coolness, was on the point of sending out his messenger to bring them all upon the tavern, when carmine faded from Bessie Ford's cheekbones, and the sage's heart thumped once: for there was heard a furious, imperative battery at the inn-door.

Seven armed retainers from Ormond Hall stood there, hacking at the massive portal, among them their mistress. Anne was forcing the situation, bent upon driving Calvo through the subterranean passage before the moment of his plan was ripe. In the ruins, at the other end of the passage, waited three more of her father's men.

At once, at the sound of that battery, Calvo knew that in his lute was a rift, in the scheme a flaw: and his heart thumped once.

Before the inn-door fell in, the landlord put his head out of window, offering to open; whereupon Anne, leaving instructions with her seven to rush in and scour every nook, took to her brodequined heels, and went running up a holly-lane, splashing her surcoat of crimson velvet engrained, to watch the capture in the ruins.

Anne had risen from a feast at Ormond Hall, two miles off, to effect the capture. She had ready there a room to receive the long-searched fugitives.

But she had hardly run from the tavern-door, when a party of fifteen came up from Broughton Castle, among them Wolsey and his ten. He saw Anne's seven just pelting into the opened inn-door, and cried 'Halt,' divining at once that the lady who had called at Lipton 'at the hour of sext' was saving him trouble.

'Let her pick the apples, and I will eat them,' he thought, bridling with his smile. And he lifted his voice, adding: 'Be ready now to fall upon some caitiffs in the ruins, men. Forward with you.'

And forward through the holly-lane they went at a brisk march.

The lane ended in a wilderness of thorn-bush, trampled at one point into the indication of a path; then came a vista of bright-hued greensward between solemn, gnarled oak and wide-rooted beech; then a fragment of wall, part of the old Cellarer's Building; then three low flagged steps.

The party picked their echoing way up a nave of broken columns, roofless to the moon, and as they turned an angle where once was a corridor of cloister-dalles, and now only bushy growth mixed with stones, Anne, standing by a broken carrel-wall near the old refectory, saw them.

Her first impulse was to run to warn her three waiting men, her next to watch. She slipped behind the carrel, and as Wolsey passed, stepping quick, with an awful start, and a heart of ice, she knew him beneath his mask.

He had beaten her, he with his fifteen, she with her three.... In a craziness of rage she heaved up her clenched hands on high, grating them, and down again she swung them, and, catching a stone, heaved it up, screwing it to powder into the masonry, going, 'Oh, I must kill this man, or die! Oh, I must, I must—'

At the same time she heard three distinct sword-clashes; her three, surprised by the fifteen, had struck once, and run.

The flooring of the refectory had long disappeared, and it was on the cellar-level that Wolsey now entered between two still-standing walls. At one point some steps descended into a paved and pillared gallery, round the opening of which the men fell flat to wait, while Wolsey lurked behind a bramble-bush.

He had not waited a minute, when running feet sent up echoes from below. Calvo, hunted from behind by Anne's seven, was coming — was come. Bessie held Laura by the hand. Suddenly all were prisoners.

Calvo, for a minute, brooded calmly upon Wolsey's bulk through his tumble-down eyes, and muttered, 'The pork!' And Wolsey, for a minute, from the height of his bridled fat neck, looked smiling upon Calvo, and said, 'Now, Master Alchymist, you see....'

Bessie and Laura clung each to the other, held each by a man on either side, till the procession moved, and they were torn apart.

The way led through the forest which still lies between Broughton Castle and the ruins. As they went, Anne Boleyn was behind, tracking them. And no sooner was she sure that the castle was their destination, than sudden new hope leapt in her rancorous heart. The King was near...!

She turned at once and ran like a torn-boy for the tavern. Her seven were even then streaming out. She rushed past them, crying, 'Mine host!' and when he appeared in a corridor, her gasp was, 'Ink! ink! and a pen!'

At that moment she spied Flying Sidney, who had arrived from London, and come hither to see how Calvo fared.

'Sidney!' cried Anne, renouncing her purpose of writing, 'hither! The King's camp is at Little Baneleigh: go thither — flying, thou hearest? — and seek out Charles Brandon. Tell him I say that Laura Ford is now — this moment — in Broughton Castle, taken there by Wolsey. Stay not gaping, fool! Get gone — fly!'—'

Flying Sidney, who cherished a deep terror of Anne, was impelled to obey: and flying he went. But by now he well divined that Anne was, in some way, for some reason, hostile to Calvo, and he reasoned that, if the news communicated to Henry were communicated also to the other parties, whose whereabouts he knew from the landlord, then would the evil he was bound to do to the Master be counteracted.

He had, therefore, no sooner whispered to Charles Brandon the great news than he was off to Stroud, where lay Alvarada; and thence to Sudbury Rye, to the camp of Francis; and thence to Fletcherfield, where were Fitz, Mac, and Bonner; and to Winton, where was Percy; and to East Hythe, where was Du Ballay. And when his hard ride was accomplished, and his reeking horse swayed to drop, he saw a glimmering of morning in the East.

And when, an hour later, the full day broke, it saw the plain before Broughton Castle dotted white with leaguering tents, and champing steeds, and batteries of cannon, and groups of glittering armour — for all had come.

CHAPTER XXVI

BEFORE THE CASTLE

‘HARK! HARK! THE trumpet swells
A deep soul-thrilling strain!’
SIGOURNEY.

THE castle-front looked East, and well to its South lay the purple pavilion of Henry, surrounded with tents; while to the North, a mile perhaps away, close on an edge of forest, a still more resplendent erection of cloth-of-gold of baudekin, raised with flowers-de-luces of bullion-gold, marked the centre of Francis’ camp, a great ensign on its summit shaking from out its shimmering silken folds lazy whispers of War.

Henry and Francis had met — this time assuredly to try a bout together.

The castle was strong, of old Norman building, the front and sides being defended by two parallel curtains bastioned at intervals with those semi-circular bastions called ‘roundels,’ before each curtain being a fosse and drawbridge, and before the outermost drawbridge an outwork barbican with palisades. The donjon-keep was a square pile of smooth stone.

Two of the investing parties, Percy’s and the Wolsey-men, seeing the castle front watched by others, took station at the castle back, which likewise was defended by parallel bastioned curtains, thus to cut off the fugitives’ escape that way: for the Wolsey-men, through Sidney’s crafty silence, were without suspicion that their master was anywhere in Hampshire.

This was the disposition of things when, at seven in the morning, Sir James Broughton, a burly, bald-headed man of fifty years, broke into the chamber where Wolsey slept.

‘My good lord Cardinal,’ he blurted with opening arms, ‘the whole castle, north, south, east and west, is invested with tents and armed men!’

Wolsey’s start shook the massive low bedstead. There broke from his lips the terrified question:

‘Is the King among them?’

‘Among them, yea, my lord! Hark! A bevy of six heralds with pursuivants e’en now approach the outer drawbridge blaring fanfares on horns and bugles! Oh, my lord! — they come from the King with his demands!’

‘Well, let them come.’

Already Wolsey smiled, though with agitated underlip.

‘My lord — !’

‘The King is a naughty child, and sometimes needs the birch, Sir James.’

‘And there is that other one — Francis!’

‘You will not yield.’

‘What! not to the King?’

‘No.’

‘Why, my lord—’

‘Listen to me, prithee—’

‘But my neck, my neck, my good lord Cardinal!’

‘Round your neck is the arm of my protection, Sir James. The King will proffer his demands in the name of the Golden Knight, I think — yes, I think’ — he was frowning, reading as in a page the secrets of Henry’s character on the wall— ‘in the name of the Golden Knight. And you know not at all the Golden Knight, Sir James, nor whence he is. You will refuse, refuse. How many men with you?’

‘Some sixty in the castle.’

‘Enough. Myself will captain them. Leave me.’

Sir James hurried away, while Wolsey cautiously levered and lowered himself from the bed.

The horn-blasts were now blaring at the outer castle-gate. The drawbridge there was down, and as they came blowing, their horns hanging big silken bandrols, a rumble of chains announced the rising portcullis. The foremost of the heralds, carrying an ensign emblazoned with argent, a cross, and gules — the arms of St. George — passed the first escarpment — over the bridge — under the dark portcullis-arch; and there, to meet them, came the castle-seneschal, backed by half a dozen pikes and carabines.

‘Embassy, embassy, my masters,’ said he.

Herald - king - at - arms cocked forth one cordovan buskin, held up a parchment, and read pompously:

‘The puissant Knight, who hath acquired throughout all Christendom the style and cognisance of “the Golden,” demandeth forthwith the persons of the three fugitives who, pending and during the night, have taken refuge within this stronghold from the lawful quest of the said Golden Knight: and this under menace of instant storm with arrow, steel, and shot, from the part of the said Golden Knight.’

Not a word concerning Wolsey in this summons; for though Flying Sidney had delivered Anne’s message that Wolsey it was who had seized the fugitives, to Henry this was incredible, and, with wrinkled brow, he had said: ‘This, faith, cannot be....’

But great now was his surprise when his heralds returned with a flat refusal from the castle-seneschal. Sir James Broughton had no knowledge of the Golden Knight; and Sir James contemned the misproud pretension of the said Knight to the person of any person within the precincts of Broughton.

This was an answer dictated word for word by Wolsey; and Henry, hearing it, frowned a most piercing frown, astonished, wondering at the motive of Sir James Broughton, with a thought of Wolsey rising a moment in a back corner of his brain.

He stamped; and ‘Ha!’ cried he, ‘knows he not the Golden Knight, then? But the stupid addle-pate shall know in a banging lesson before — ! Knevet, Nevil, Charles — !’

He was interrupted by a blare, coming from northward yonder across the plain; six heralds of Francis in doublet and hose of gold-cloth, and blue velvet cloaks pounced with fleur-de-lys and Venice twists, were at the outer drawbridge.

Henry, hearing the sound, went down a street of tents, and stood looking, surrounded by his gentlemen. The heralds entered the gates. Above yonder on the battlements were signs of unusual stir; burdened men throwing their burdens into heaps near the bartisans, runnings to and fro, a group placing a springal in position, and dream-shouts from afar calling something in the morning sky.

Already it was difficult to observe the movements of the heralds at the drawbridge: for the plain was filling with creatures of all sorts, women with butter and poultry, lazy forage-carts, paniered donkeys, mules with water-butts, ‘sturdy beggars,’ loiterers, samples of all Hampshire, esquires, butchers, publicans, ‘and yonder in serried march a troop of ten ‘martialists,’ retainers of a neighbouring hall, who, having scented the battle from afar, came to offer their prowess to the seneschal, or to the leaguering camps — little it tided which.

So that now, as it were suddenly, the quiet plain was a-move, by miracle: as when one looks through a glass at what, to the bare eye, was dead matter, and, lo, it is all a-crawl, and swarms into movement Back through this crowd, not yet immense, but thickening every minute into immensity, came the heralds of Francis — and came without the fugitives.

Henry stood looking, gnawing his pout, measuring with a nervous contraction at the cheek-bones, as though he tasted acid, the events born here and now before him for his manipulation.

‘Well, you see, the black-faced’s heralds return with their tails between their legs,’ said he.

‘Francis, sure, will storm the castle, sire,’ said Charles Brandon—’ unless anon you order its surrender in your proper title as King.’

‘Thou talk’st like a — Ha! and have that Goat saying that I made unknightly use of my chance of kingship to out-do him in a strange land? ’Tis what he would say, the chattering Ape. Nay, we storm, we storm: here are no kings, Charles, but only knights,’

‘And when we have done all the hard work of storming, Francis slips in, and is off with the girl, sire.’

‘He! off with that girl? He? Oh so! Aha! I tell thee, Charles Brandon, within seven days from the day he touches her, I land seventy thousand fighting-men on the Norman coast to burn and harry all they meet!’

‘Amen, sire, I say. But, meseems, some arrangement must be come to—’

‘Hold — who the pestilence are those?’

‘Those seem like one of the searching parties, sire.’

Henry flew into a passion.

‘Who the pestilence, man, are these searching parties? Searching parties, quotha? Who are these lousy rats I hear of? With what motive, and by what right, search they where I search? By God’s light, this is something new to me, you know! Tis a bit strong! Searching parties, quotha? Who are they, where are they, what are they?’

Brandon shrugged his shoulders.

‘Faith, I know not, sire. There is one fellow I have heard of called Fitzgerald; and also I have heard it whispered that my lord Wolsey—’

‘My lord who?’

‘My lord Wolsey, sire,’

‘You babble, man, you babble like a daw! He wouldn’t dare — I tell you he wouldn’t dare — Ha! and this Fitzgerald, what of him?’

‘He is one of the searchers, sire,’

‘But he should be searching for me, the base tyke! If not for me, then for whom? Yet someone declared me that he had been seen to fight for Francis! What means it all?’

‘If that be he yonder, as is like from his stature, sire, then he must even be a searcher on his own proper count; for, faith, the effronted knave seems about to summon the castle.’

It was true that up the very gentle slope to the barbican and drawbridge Fitzgerald did, at that moment, saunter; by his side stepped natty Mac; and before him Bonner, having at his scarlet lips a horn, borrowed but now from one of the race of butcher-boys, who, at that time, went their rounds a-horse, with horns.

And, ‘Boy,’ quoth Fitz, as he went sauntering hugely with lazy and laggard swagger, ‘sure thou blowest a herald’s clarion like a flute. Give wind. ’Tis not Laura which thou serenadest, but a castle which thou summonest.’

Bonner, blowing with both cheeks, did not hear.

‘Well, if this be not a hardy thing we do — !’ said Mac, throwing up his head with a laugh.

‘I take it that we be two hardy fellows, Mac.’

‘No chance, Fitz; no chance,’

Fitz ground his teeth.

‘Chance there shall be!’

‘But how?’

‘Pah! I know not. But this I say: ‘ware the man that lays a finger on yon maiden while one last whiff of breath dwells in this carcase. Mac, lad, we have sworn an oath.’

‘Aye — I remember it well. But — I see no chance here,’ said Mac, who looked at facts and saw the future soberly; ‘they are many, we are two.’

‘Two and a herald, Mac — give wind, boysie! — and two who have sworn. And, maugre all, why not a chance? This King and the French champion here will sure storm; and, at the entrée, we rush in and take the prize — !’

Here Bonner, with thrown-back long-ringleted head, blew from his bladder-cheeks a final blast as they stepped over the springy drawbridge.

They entered. Bonner pronounced his demand for the fugitives; and the seneschal, having finished his laugh, said:

‘Nay, my masters, better drop the pleasant jape ye play, and come aid us defend the castle against the rest.’

‘You yield them not — ?’ said Fitz.

‘Why, nay.’

‘Then, sir, we take your castle by storm.’

Having said which, the three turned, and walked back to their station between the two royal camps.

This whimsical notion of demanding the girls, under threat of storm with four arms, had arisen in the mind of Fitz in a moment of levity and twinkling eyes; Mac had thrown up his head with a laugh; and Bonner had said: 'Make me your herald, and, as Jericho, so shall Broughton fall, to the blare of a horn,'

But no sooner was the whim in progress of quixotic execution, than the Condé Alvarada, who had taken station two stone-throws from Fitzgerald, found it highly knightly and pleasant to his fancy; so that Fitzgerald was hardly back, when another party of four — Alvarada, Sir John Perrott, and two Queen's-men — one blowing a horn, were on the way to the drawbridge.

And now the contagion of bombast spread. Du Ballay, with four knights, followed, demanding surrender in a fictitious name. The French Ambassador, indeed, had long since discovered the identity of the Black Knight, his master; but his master's purpose in the search being personal, and his political, and antagonistic, he had chosen to maintain his incognito and separateness.

Henry still stood looking at all this blowing and flourishing with a sort of angry wonder. It was high noon, when the Wolsey-men, having got wind of the prevailing passion for castle-summoning, came from the castle-back, blaring a fanfare, marching solemnly through a lane of gapers up to the drawbridge. In a fictitious name their leader demanded surrender.

And last of all, as these went back to station, came Percy and seven Northumbrians, he, with his busy bowlegged roll, bearing the great ensign of Alnwick through a lane of gapers, while from the tense cheeks of all the seven brayed a fervent bravura, whose flagrant, rough blare reached far to Baneleigh tavern.

But at that blast the walls of Broughton did not fall, and Percy came back without the fugitives. And now the lane of gapers disappeared in the swarm of waiting loiterers.

CHAPTER XXVII

HENRY AND FRANCIS

‘THEN THOSE TWO Kings anigh they drew
Withouten Berwick-town;
There were steeds that flew, and trumps that blew,
And pacings up and down.’
‘THE JOUST.’

BUT it was a day of embassies. In five minutes another lane had formed between the camps of Francis and Henry, and down it paced in passmented velvet buskins, and gorgeous cloaks fastened with aiglets of diamonds, six French heralds, escorted by six knights with band-roled lances, on chargers housed and purfled in gold and ermine. And on, blowing a blare, they passed slowly to the purple pavilion, on their banner a cognizance of fleur-de-lys.

They bore a proposition from Francis: since the castle was strong, for what cause should not the Black Knight and the Golden amicably unite forces in its attack, up to the moment of its impending fall — in case it fell — thereupon to cease concert, and thenceforth act each for himself in the seizing of the final prize?

Henry packed back the heralds, promising reply; and in half an hour his own six, with pursuivants, accompanied by yeomen with gilt pole-axes, paced blaring through the lane of gapers to the blazing pavilion of Francis.

Henry agreed, but added a condition. Up to the moment of impending fall, concert — each general captaining his own forces: but then, single combat between the two knights to decide right to the possession of the fugitives; then again, disinterested concert in the taking of the stronghold.

Francis sent back the heralds, promising reply; and in half an hour his six appeared, blaring, pacing toward the camp of Henry.

He agreed. But called the attention of the Golden Knight to the fact that the Black and the Golden Knights were not the only knights, having the same objects, then on the field; and though the forces of those others were not magnificent, yet knightly courtesy was not wholly a dead thing in Christendom — a slap that stung the cheek of Henry to crimson. He proposed in addition: Concert between all the assembled knights up to the moment of impending fall, then single combat between the two leaders who first had arrived that morning on the field; then combat between the victor and the leader who third had arrived on the field, and so on, till each leader had fought; and the final victor should have right to the possession of the fugitives; then again, concert of all in the taking of the stronghold.

To and fro went the gaudy, solemn processions across the plain, blaring always, filling the long day with unnecessary noises. The hot afternoon sun sloped far westward. The great ensign of Francis drooped without a stir. Yonder over the stately battlements of the square donjon drooped, too, the red Broughton standard, blazoned with the house's hatchment, martletts and a patonee, without a stir. A smoke from the midst of Henry's camp galloped straight up, unrolling itself on high into a perfect Prince of Wales' plume, without a stir. The plain, thronged now, festered in sultry swelter. The noise of the morning had died into a low, universal buzzing murmur. A bleating of sheep, and a lowing of oxen, was plainly heard, during each lull of the flourished trumpets, in the two camps. Ten thousand mouths gaped stupidly at the passing and blaring heralds.

For Henry had refused to recognise the other searchers; and Francis had insisted, the Frenchman's motif being partly his native amiability, and partly a pretension to a finer degree of knightly nicety than Henry's — Henry's motif a haughty disdain to enter into competition with his own subjects, dogs for whom he intended, when he came to know and seize them, only the Tyburn halter. And so there arose and wrangled an angry deadlock.

It was only toward sunset that Henry, at the earnest prayer of all his gentlemen, gave way: for Francis at that hour sent the threat to make the proposed terms with all the parties, excluding only the party of the Golden Knight, an arrangement which would have combined against Henry at the in-rush a phalanx of skilled force, fatal to his purpose. He dashed down a pen, and stamped, and yielded: for he was in frantic earnest now to have Laura Ford within his tent.

Then came more fanfares and heraldings, as the twilight deepened. Three of Francis' heralds, in solemn deputation with three of Henry's, went seeking the parties of knights. The Wolsey-gallants they found noisily drunk round the vast cave of one of the hatch-mented fireplaces of old Baneleigh tavern; and in the long-dead Abbot's solar, lolling in the embrasure of a stained window, Fitzgerald and Bonner drunk, and Mac sipping mead. But not too drunk to apprehend and assent; for 'Bravo,' cried Fitzgerald, 'for the Black Knight, who is as gallant a gentleman as ever stuck a kern! and long may he live, if not on earth, in heaven; for here, boysie, have I the sword he gave me, and an I chance to meet him, as is like, I'll draw it, boysie, I will —'

Fitz drew the flashing excalibur, and held it aloft.

By this time Du Ballay, Percy, and Alvarada had each received and agreed to the offers of the kings; and there remained only the question of leadership of the united forces. Back and forth through the now deserted plain went still the heralds, lighting the darkness with cressets and pole-torches. The Black Knight proposed the leadership to the Golden; the Golden proposed the leadership to the Black. Neither would yield, and there arose and wrangled a new deadlock of courtesy.

Three of the smaller parties now lay in tents provided them by Francis, all well beyond artillery-range from the battlements, except Percy, whose sentinels watched the castle-back under the shelter of forest-trees. And to all, once again, paced the loud and torch-lit herald-band on the question of Leadership. The Wolsey-men and Fitz at the tavern slept sound, but Macdonald gave his voice for Francis; and so did all, except young Percy, who claimed Henry for general. And so Francis yielded with his smile and bow, and was leader of the siege.

Now the castle-clock tolled midnight, and in the abbey-ruins many a raw-eyed ghost rose at that sound for matins; over the plain the far yelping and whining of some forlorn wolf was heard, and around the battlements the sentries walked like soldiers of wood.

At this hour my lord Cardinal, sitting at a table, and bending his red-veined bastion of a brow over a plan of the castle and its defences, said to a liveryman:

‘Bring me hither that Calvo.’

Calvo and the girls had been placed in three roomy apartments intercommunicating at the castle-back behind a locked portal.

He came in ten minutes walking slow, with a push-forward of alternate shoulders, hands behind.

Wolsey, now quick-stepping about the hall, presently stopped and faced the sage; from the high-tower of his bridled neck he smiled, with pressure of his upper lip, his superior little smile of insolence.

‘Now, Mr. Alchymist, you see—’ said he.

‘See what, my lord of York?’

‘You are my prisoner.’

‘I see, yes, I see. I thought you had more sense.’

‘How mean you?’

‘Is it not rigolo for a man like me to be in such a position with respect to a man like you? Have you not yet travelled so far in thought as to know that I am a better man than your Excellency, since I see more, know more?’

‘You are wrong, sir. The value of an Eye consisteth not at all in what, by much study, it hath seen, but solely in what it is capable of seeing: in other words, not knowledge, but Wisdom, is the testimony of worth, and the core of greatness. Thus, you have more knowledge of chymics than I, but I more wisdom of life than you — and so have made you my prisoner, sir. Come, now!’

‘With ten armed men ’tis not methinks a wisdom so vastly profound to make one man a prisoner!’

‘But, by wisdom, should you have calculated that I have these ten armed men ever at command, and skill to guide them; and so should you have embraced my offer of terms when I made it you.’

‘I did not choose to abandon the girls, that is all.’

‘Are they parents of yours?’

‘No, no, perfect strangers: but helpless without me.’

‘So? Then was pride in your single skill, and a naughty contumacy, the causes of your resistance to my will.’

‘Yes, that was it, that was it, you may be sure.’

‘Was not my offer large and liberal?’

‘Wondrous large and liberal: even for the making thereof I thank and praise you.’

‘Then why refused you?’

‘I chose, that’s all — I chose.’

‘‘Twas pride—’

‘Ah! that was it.’

‘Or was it not rather a good benevolence toward the maidens, meriting praise and honour — ?’

‘What is it you want me for, sir? I prithee, preach not to me: ‘twere rigolo, verily; my heart is hard.’ Wolsey stepped twice through the room; returning to Calvo he held out his hand, intending that the sage should kiss it: but Calvo languidly shook it, with forced politeness.

‘I consider you honest,’ said Wolsey, ‘and my eyes are good. After this siege you may call me patron.’ Calvo bowed low.

‘You wot that there is a siege, by the way? Archimedes at the siege of Syracuse invented burning glasses, and destroyed the enemies’ ships for the townsfolk. May we expect something similar from you?’ Here was the real design of this interview, and Wolsey knew how to wrap his flatteries in honey. At the comparison with Archimedes, Calvo was inwardly soothed and pleased, and he said:

‘If I think of anything, I will tell you: and for the kind proffer of your puissant protection I really give you hearty thanks,’

He bowed, and was led away, and locked behind the portal.

And with that idea of ‘thinking of something’ he paced a long time through the three chambers of his prison; ascended by a short ladder-stair to the battlements, and there paced; descended, and paced. The three rooms were exceedingly spacious and lofty, and had once been rich, being tapestried with light sendal; but now, at one point, the flooring was decayed, and repairs were in progress, for in a corner leant four or five very long planks, with a great basket of osiers containing tools and sawdust. And suddenly Calvo, looking at the silken hangings and the long planks, stopped short and slapped his brow. And after awhile he muttered:

‘Hot air is lighter than cold — much lighter even. And why should not that fact be applied to practice? Why not? Seeking hog-wash for the pork, I may have found mainemy-royal for myself.’

CHAPTER XXVIII

THE SIEGE

‘THE LOUDEST BLAST

That ever filled Renown’s obstreperous trump.’

KIRKE WHITE

THAT night, for several leagues round Broughton, every inn was crammed, and every village awake with revelry. From far and wide, from many a hall and manor, from many a chase and forest-side, castle and abbey, had come jaunting both lord and lady, keeper and esquire, seneschal and liveryman, tramp and yokel and friar, justice and reeve and martialist. The Bishop of Winchester, gallant prelate of the Order of the Garter, slept at Sudbury Rye; the High Sheriff of the County at Baneleigh tavern.

For their life was easy and jocund, not hopelessly ugly and heavy; and the lust of the eye was fresh.

Even when morning broke, roads were still streaked with trains of horses jogging all toward Broughton Vale: for the fame of this joust of arms had travelled, stirring the tough and merry heart of England.

But when the sun was high the castle-plain was empty, for it was a place of danger now. Only, far back toward the tavern, was visible a region of human heads stretched out wide into innumerable vagueness.

On the plain was a rattle of the old kettle-drums named nakers, pattering to arms; and bugles were calling in the air; and the battlements of the donjon were lined with men. And now down the escarpment from the outer drawbridge came a trotting cohort to the sally-port of the barbican, among them three of the seven castle-priests, and a fourth priest, not of the castle, who carried his black-robed bulk with quick-planted step, and directed in person the defence.

An early meal was over now in the two camps; and as three batteries of eighteen pieces swept out from the French camp, and galloped with blundering row after ponderous Norman horses south-westward over the field, a battery and a half of nine pieces swept out from the camp of Henry, and galloped north-westward to meet the three. And as they met a shower of arblast-arrows from a bastion of the curtains whizzed in the air, and fell far short. So commenced the day.

And immediately from both royal camps burst two gallant arrays of horsemen, showing pennoned lances and drawn swords, cantering in unanimous phalanx, Francis and his troop raven from their floating casque-plumes to their steel-shoes, and Henry's band winking gaudy as a patch of sunset on a wobbling water. And as the artillery advanced at a walk, these two troops fell in behind it, the troop of Francis containing all the small parties engaged in the quest of Laura Ford, except those watching the castle-back.

Suddenly the barbican barked: a great stone ball from a thirty-three pounder demi-cannon plunged into the earth, and spurted gravel upon the besieging limbers thirty yards away. The artillery horses reared and plunged, and Francis behind his beaver laughed, for he liked that sound.

Down the straight-ruled front of the bristling phalanx he pricked briskly, riding with easy adeptness the choppy sea of his curvetting and caracoling charger, noting the disposition of Henry's men, where were the axes, where the pikes and carbines, and how many, and in what formation; and Henry, collared with the collar of the Garter, and all a blaze of golden points, eyed him sullenly behind his visor, gnawing his pout. And as Francis began to speak, well he knew that shrill and jocund voice.

‘I propose,’ Francis said in syllabled English, ‘that we attack first the outwork, beginning with cannon, and at the just moment making dash with scaling-ladders, petards, and grenadoes. My aim, you surmise, is not so much the barbican itself, as the expelling of its defenders: an event which will induce the warders of the first drawbridge to lower the bridge for passage of their friends, while we are yet busied on the outwork. Now, a lowered drawbridge is the soldier’s chance, as saith the proverb. Yon archers, you halberds, yon carbines, and the left half of my front-line men, will therefore dismount, now, at the lifting of my sword; and their chargers will be led backward to picket by the rest, to yonder hillock beyond the reach of shot. There will the non-fighters stand, dismounted, to the moment when my clarion from the barbican shall announce the defenders in retreat; and then will they spring to horse, gallop like black-riders, and grip by surprise one — or ha! — both of the bridges at the edge of the sword. Artillery — halt! — Knights and warriors — I lift my sword!’

Bustling movement followed his cry: men leaping from horses, snatching at implements, half the host cantering backward with led horses, among them Henry, keenly piqued at a post of inaction. At the same time a puff of gray left an embrasure of the barbican, and another thirty-three pounder from a mortar’s mouth arrived, almost as soon as the report, with smash and fracas upon a scaling-ladder borne on a gun-carriage, crushing a gunner, and thence pitching far down the slope.

The answer was swift: the line of the assailants’ artillery, now within the eight hundred yards’ range of its twenty-four pounder sakers, and seventeen-pounder culverins, opened, at the signal, unanimous fire; and at once it was as though there had popped above-ground the broad visage of some ogre, breathing fumes, with twenty-seven bleared eyeballs of baleful flame.

The shock was almost like a single hoarse hoot — the ogre's exclamation; and in half a minute the barbican appeared nothing but a drifting cloud of powdered stone. From the cloud, however, came voices, and spouts of fire: and balls of stone played in the air, beyond the skill of juggler's hand. Along the line of assailing cannon black-faced gunners wrought fiercely in a flutter of action, cleaning, spying into muzzles, ramming hard for life; and first done first shoot; so that now the fire was in the quavers and semi-quavers of that thundering organ-board, two notes with quick bang-bang, or three, then pause and minim, then competitive mixed howl and barking chord of many a throat, then quick semi-quaver bang-bang, in twos and threes. And suddenly yonder, half way down the keyboard of gleaming cylinders, there darts into the air a swarm of splintered metal, and flying wood, mixed with smoke and limbs of men; for a falconet, with huge hubbub and detonation, has burst as it shot, as falconets were apt to do. And of the many juggler's-balls in the air, some fall well, cracking carriages, horses and men, or ploughing pebbles that shoot like pistol-shots; two swooping even among the infantry twenty yards to rear, crushing in their midst two chasms of emptiness where full hearts had beat; only Francis, riding between artillery and infantry, and anon ducking with half-playful upward glance, they cannot and must not touch: for the jealous observation of Henry is upon him.

It lasted three full hours, till the sun was hot in the forenoon; and eleven of the twenty-seven pieces of ordnance were burst, and hors-de-combat; twenty gunners mangled; the rest parched and nerveless; and the barbican, where Wolsey was the marksman, stood whole.

Francis put hand to side, and blew the bugle-call of retreat. The two troops rode back, bearing seven wounded, each to its camp; the stagnant smoke, which grew like ghost-cotton from all the wide plain, thinned slowly; and the sun stole from noon to hot afternoon amid a waiting silence profound as the waiting silence of the grave.

It was broken by sudden trumpet-call from Francis' camp. This was near two.

Again swept out the two artilleries with blundering row, and the black host, and the golden, to take stand as before, in the same disposition.

And with hope: for the face of the round barbican was now deep-eaten, and battered rough; and at the very first new round, the assailants shouted cheers, for from the top there disengaged itself a cake of battlements and fell in powder; in twenty minutes an irregular breach appeared; and Francis, tossing his bridle to a servitor, went prone, calling, inviting, with forward-pointing sword.

Then came the hot 'dash,' rolled all in smoke, riddled with shot, and galled with arrows, as when one urges blinking, bitter way against storm-dashed hail. Fast now fell the fighters, as they pressed nearer and nearer within range of quarrel-headed shaft, and shot of every size and form, rained not only from the barbican itself, but from the nearest of the first - curtain bastions. Backward through the on-pelting host of the assailants streamed and bickered many a flare of red — pine-torches snatched from the gun-carriages to fire the petard-fusees; and ten scaling ladders, overlying the bent and pushing phalanx, sailed steadily toward their goal; the guns, meanwhile, of both battery and barbican still flashing in demi-semi-quaver bang-bangs, or brawling chords of competitive uproars; while Francis, ever in advance, called and invited, with one prone-bent knee, and wildly-pointing sword.

But though the dash was hot, and costly, and rash, the result was swift. A scalding bouillon of liquid lead thrown freely from window-slit and battlement, and ladders flung backward with all their freight, could not save. Petards and grenadoes, thrown through breach and over battlement, were cracking in an ear-splitting distraction of darting fury, doing red-hot execution everywhere, popping back, some of them, with shout of spouting fire upon their throwers. The erection was divided into two stories, the breach made by the cannon being in the upper; but too high for the defenders on the upper floor to repel the inrush from ladders placed outside that point; and at the intrusion of the shoulders of Francis, a general cry of: 'Sauve qui peut F' went up to the men on the roof. Down they rushed pell-mell, their leader among them, his face black as his robe; and after a short sword-scrimmage with three of the assailants, they contrived, all but four slain, to scuttle through the trap to the lower stage, and slam down and secure above their heads the iron slab called 'peerplate.'

The assailants were now swarming, all of them, over the barbican, it being part of the ruse of Francis to leave the ground quite empty: for in the lower stage the defenders might have held out some time, if danger barred their retreat, since the sally-port was of thick iron-work. Accordingly, the assailants were set to beat upon the peerplate, as if concentrating their purpose upon it, while Francis crouched behind a battlement above. After some minutes, the sally-port opened; then followed an out-rush of the defenders; and as they rushed, the drawbridge moved downward; and as it moved, Francis put bugle to lips.

Now was the chance of Henry. The cavalry, waiting half a mile away, spurred forward. And all the castle, from donjon to curtain, in an alarm of surprise, flew to its self-defence.

The horsemen rode therefore into a pelt of missiles which thickened continually as it advanced; but before the barbican-men were half-way across the bridge, the knights were dashing on foot upon it, their abandoned horses ranging for the time over a plain already sown with carcasses of men and beasts. Here the assailants were not far from the two nearest first-curtain bastions, which poured in upon them a blistering fire; but now the won barbican turned its still-acting guns against its own mother; and the assailants' artillery, too, galloped near, and talked; and all the air was a hubbub of complex war, filled with crackle, and whizz, and boom.

And still on pressed the cavaliers, fresh men against faint, Henry foremost, and after him Brandon, Nevil, and Knevet. Once, at the last moment before the portal, some of the flying barbican-men turned sharp with cocked blunderbusses and horse-pistols, one covering with his muzzle the royal bosom. And they fired. But the weapon aimed at Henry was knocked up by a swift hand — the hand of Wolsey, who hissed only 'Stupid daw!', and rushed on.

The next moment the outer drawbridge was won; the warders slain; the chains axed; and since the inner remained aloft, the fugitives, after a short, unequal, and ever - retreating hand-to-hand struggle against the operating axe of Henry and the knights, flung themselves down the escarpment of the inner moat, to become in the black water the target of occasional wanton missiles from the victors.

The captors of the barbican had now descended to join in the storm. Three of the outer bastions were taken at the sword's edge, and occupied: and to defend the castle there were now left hardly forty men. After the stationing of guards, the clarion of Francis blew. The castle seemed all but won. The sun was low to its setting.

On a planchette within one of the boldly-projecting machicolations near the donjon-battlements sat Bessie Ford, wide-eyed, tightly holding the hand of Laura. Laura, since she had the liberty to ascend a small stair and gain the top, could not be kept from seeing, and constantly clapped a single hand-clap. Bessie had followed to protect, though, in fact, the donjon was as yet safe from shot. She had her chin in her hand, gazing numb through all the long day's loud action and to-do. And the thought in her heart was this:

‘Well, my mother! Can all this affairing be on the count of my sister Laura? Oh, my boding heart! — my heavy, boding, boding heart!’

But, as for Calvo, he was below in their three rooms, working hard, forgetting the siege, Bessie Ford, himself, and all things: fall only of interest in a Thought of Nature, a New Thing which he would do with his brain.

Ever as he worked, he said to himself:

‘Hot air is lighter than cold....’

He had cut from the long planks, leaning there, two circles of wood; and in the circumference of these he had cut regular square notches all round, and into the projecting cogs bored holes to admit a wire; then he had set to work to saw with the workmen's saw long laths of planking, and these he had cut up into limber strips an inch wide, a quarter inch thick, very long and pliant, and warily cut, till he had eight of them. At each end of each he bored a hole through the width to admit a wire, for he had left the strips thicker at their ends; and with a stout wire taken from his bag he secured these at both ends within the notches of the two circular pieces which he had cogged and bored; he then took down the light, but strong, sendal-silk hangings from four walls, cut them into strips, plaited them rudely, and thus got a rope some thousand yards in length; he then bored two holes in the two circular pieces, and passed the rope, largely knotted at one end, so that it could not slip, through them. By placing this immensely long double umbrella firmly in position, and manoeuvring by drawing the rope, he could now open it into a huge orange shape.

The rooms were in a lumber of disorder due to repairs going forward, and he felt no apprehension that the shock-headed servitor who bore their meals would take active observation of his operations. Even an attempt at escape must seem, he knew, beyond all things absurd, the situation of his prison being what it was.

Toward midnight of the first day's siege he had advanced thus far in his intense and silent labours.

CHAPTER XXIX

ARMS AND A MAN

““LO! YONDER THE thane of Crumbauchty!”

The tother woman said again:

Of Moray yonder I see the thane.”

The third then said: “I see the King.”“

ANDREW OF WYNTON.

THE great vague crowd that had watched from a distance the first day’s siege reassembled at a distance with the next foreday.

The sun rose, and the people waited for the loud sounds of arms: but no sounds came. Only, on the plain, in a natural flat cricket-pitch, bordered by rising ground on both sides, and beyond range of castle shot, they saw men driving stakes. By twos and threes, by tens and hundreds, with gathering boldness, they drifted nearer: the men, they perceived, were inclosing the length of the pitch in palisades, leaving open doorways at the narrow ends: they were creating the lists for a tournament of arms. And at once a glad thrill excited the multitude.

But now there broke a blare of horns like the blares of that first day of heralds: and again there came pacing solemn a richly tricked-out embassy, in an emblazoned splendour of gold and taffeta and tissue-cloth, cordelière and egrette and cordon, quite different from the emblazoned splendour of that first day — differing as one star from another in glory. From the Black Knight they came, and they made for the camp of the Golden.

It was necessary to arrange the minuter conditions of the coming joust, what constituted defeat, the arms, the hours, the marshals of the ceremony, the umpire. Back and fore paced the heralds blaring; a clouded sun climbed from nine to ten, from ten to eleven, and still they paced and blared.

Now a vague misty drizzle, which persisted through the day, began to haunt the air. But the people budged not from round the thronged lists, some provided with pic-nic cheer, most forgetting their stomachs. Hour by hour they stared at the repassing embassies.

At last, before noon, a sign of business was seen: ten mounted trumpeters, red-clad, in mantelets of Venice-gold, rode slowly into the lists and took stand at a corner of the oblong; while from the other camp ten in cloth-of-tissue cloaks raised with pearls of silver damask, took stand diagonally opposite. The heraldpacing ceased: terms had been arranged, and the minor parties formally apprised.

Then came a body of men-at-arms, riding back the multitude from the lists with cries of ‘Field! Field!’, and immediately followed a number of servitors, bearing tents. One they pitched near the north, narrow end of the lists, outside the palisade, for Francis; one at the south, for Henry; three also on the east long side, and four on the west, on the rising ground, for the other fighters: all being as richly wrought and gaudily barbaric as the tents of ancient Asiatics.

Now expectation stood on tiptoe, for the trumpeters blared unanimously as the two marshals of the day entered at opposite ends; and even as the castle clock tolled noon, the crowd fell back both north and south before two galloping parties, one Henry’s, the other Francis’s; and as these dismounted at their tent doors, there were other gallopers: and soon the seven tents had occupants.

Then occurred an interval, during which the two marshals, one Charles Brandon, the other the Chevalier d'Arcy, met and conferred. To the crowd the moments were hours; and Bessie Ford, peering through a machicolation of the donjon, saw well through a pair of very sound and seeing eyes, but knew not what.

At last Charles Brandon, stepping back, called out:

‘The Knight of Norfolk, and The Seeker!’

Down the lists in opposite directions went he and his fellow at a trot, each crying prone three times: ‘The Knight of Norfolk, and The Seeker!’

And while the trumpets stormed the ear, two horsemen slowly entered the lists, one at the northern, one at the southern, gate.

The first-arrived before the castle was to fight the second-arrived; the victor the third; and so on: this being the order of the day. The first-arrived were the Wolsey-men; and their leader, Havard, having stripped from his horse every cognizance of the Cardinal, had adopted the style of ‘the Knight of Norfolk.’ The second-arrived was Alvarada, and he, under the style of ‘the Seeker,’ advanced now to meet Havard.

He was cased in simple Spanish plate-coat, complete from greaves to neck-piece, a morion on his head. But he wore no visor, and his classic-featured face was visible to Henry, who, at his tent door, sat, palm on knee, sullenly watching. As for Francis, he stood tattling among his chevaliers, casually glancing anon at what went forward.

The lists, five hundred yards long, gave room for impetus: the two riders spurred; the chargers, with frisked tail, spurted to combat; galloping fast, faster, they drew near — met — hacked quick, stretching far sideways, two whistling hacks — and passed.

To spin with swift wheel, and re-engage. Not a breath of sound now from all that intense and tiptoeing multitude of onlookers, while chop, chop, went the clashing steels. But the contest was short: from the first botte it was seen that, in this fight, ‘the Seeker’ was dominant, and the aggressor; and at a raising of the sword-arm of his antagonist to strike over-helm, Alvarada deftly inserted his blade into a joining of the cuirass, and pierced the heart: so that Havard toppled dead.

The riderless charger scampered through the lists, dragging him a little by a stirrup, and went spreading a random noise of confused alarm among the furrowed multitude. The trumpets stormed the ear; Alvarada pricked once round the lists, then back to his tent; servitors came and laid the dead on a litter; they covered him with a cerecloth; they bore him thence for ever. While Henry, sitting, tilted his head behind a goblet of gingered ypcras; and Francis was lisping to a chevalier: ‘The English girl is to the French as a peach is to an oyster...

Now again the marshals conferred during an incomprehensibly long interval; till Charles Brandon, stepping back, cried: ‘The Seeker and The Knight-Courtman!’ And down the lists went the two Marshals trotting, crying that thrice.

‘The Knight-Courtman’ was the style assumed by Du Ballay; and into the lists from opposite ends came Alvarada and the portly, militant Churchman, the latter cap-à-pie in heavy plated mail, very minutely arabesqued in silver, his horse also heavy with steel. And the two riders spurred: the chargers, with frisked tail, spurted to combat; galloping fast, faster, they drew near — met — hacked quick, stretching far sideways, two whistling hacks — and passed.

But with swift check, and wheel, they re-engaged. There were seconds crowded with intense mixed chops, — then pause and readjustment of the two stepping horses — then seconds crowded with mixed chops, in thick squalls and spasms of virulence. At last Du Ballay's heavy blade split the corselet of Alvarada at the collarbone, drawing a stain of red; whereupon the Spaniard reared on his haunches, and as he came down, the horses were side by side, head to haunch and haunch to head. The quicker hand and wit was now the victor: each had the other's nape; and both, almost simultaneously, chopped. But at the instant of the fall of Du Ballay's hew, he experienced a violent cuff on the chest, inflicted by Alvarada's left fist, which had abandoned its bridle: his stroke faltered: at the same time the Spaniard cut twice, quick and deep; and Du Ballay dived over his saddle-bow, blood spurting from his visor-bars, to stretch his bulk on the ground.

Alvarada pricked once round the lists, while the trumpets blared, then rode back to tent.

Fitzgerald, sitting at his door on the wet sward, chin cocked on hand, remarked:

‘That is sure the carle with which I fought at the Bell Inn, Mac.’

‘It is,’ said Mac. ‘A sound fighter that, a sound fighter.’

‘He learned war in his ten minutes with Fitz,’ suggested Bonner.

‘Boysie,’ said Fitz, and laid his hand on Bonner's.

The prostrate knight was removed. The trumpets blared, the marshals conferred. The sun, no brighter than a haloed moon, stood half-way in his setting quadrant. And ever the vague drizzle haunted the air, like the ghost of rain, damping tree, and sward, and mail, and the patient, gazing multitude, and all it found.

Charles Brandon at last exclaimed:

‘The Seeker and George Percy!’

And this having been thrice cried, Alvarada for the third time entered the lists, confronted now with the martial youth of Percy of Northumberland, who was the fourth arrived. Percy was borne on a huge and rather raw-boned animal of Wold-breed, in shabby trappings. Heavily armoured, his fresh Roman face was yet bare, and under his morion popped, as from ripe cocoon, the bunch of flaxen silk.

Looking short on his big mare, his right palm lay back on her haunch as he went coolly forward at a walk. Anne Boleyn, watching near in the thick crowd, felt a tightening of the heart, for she had loved him. Bessie Ford, too, from her watch-tower, knew him. And Henry, seeing the face, as it passed close, vented from bosom and nostril a low ‘H’m!’ of meditative surprise.

They pricked — they galloped near. Here was a contest between sword and battle-axe. Percy’s bridle-arm, wounded by Fitzgerald, was still sick, but could do its work; on the other hand, Alvarada had in his chest a slash which, but for the tension of that hour, might have laid him on his back.

But he galloped forward with undiminished gallantry, his black eyes bright with the inspiration of a cup of Xeres just drained.

They met; and at once with clattering brusquerie and spurts of sparks the engagement commenced, the white and whetted steel of Percy’s slenderly-curved axe-blade operating fiercely, notching the sword of Alvarada, and cleaving his armour, every time. The defect, however, of the axe in armoured combat is its inability to pierce, its effects being for the most part flesh wounds — a defect which gave rise to the invention of the halberd; and at a moment when the cuirass of the Spaniard ran three streams of red, a sudden deft prick in the ribs caused Percy to close his spurs in an involuntary spasm: his mare leapt forward; as his sick left arm tore at her mouth, there was an ooze of blood from the elbow-joint; at that moment, as he turned to hew, the head of the Spaniard’s horse forged forward to his saddle-bow, and Alvarada twice plunged his sword into the other’s hip; once more Percy's spurs touched his flanks; his axe cleft only air; grinning, with a face of pallid death, he gagged his horse, and turned again to hew; but his eyes closed; his saddle rolled with blood; Anne Boleyn uttered a little cry; the martial boy lay bloodily bloodless on the ground.

Alvarada pricked once round the lists, as the trumpets stormed the ear, then returned to tent. Meanwhile, Henry stood up at the tent door where he had sat, and shook himself. He was the fifth-arrived.

There followed a longer interval than usual. Francis sent from his tent a fresh coat of mail to the Spaniard, with the Black Knight's admiring congratulations. The marshals conferred. The trumpeters set to blaring at a wrong moment, and were hushed with frantic gesticulations by the marshals. At Henry's tent Nevil and Knevet and ten others were nervously and flurriedly busy. There stood the King's horse, a gleaming black, not big, just able to wield Henry's weight, with arched neck, meaningly nibbling the bit, with nods.

When at last Harry was seen to be mounted and waiting, the marshals bustled. Charles Brandon ran, calling some final thing to one body of the trumpeters in a loud whisper; the Chevalier d'Arcy ran after him; Charles turned; they flurriedly whispered something unguessable; Charles turned again and shouted his momentous whisper: and all was ready.

'The Seeker and the Golden Knight!' they shouted thrice, and the trumpets blared.

For the fourth time Alvarada entered by the northern end, Henry by the southern, he being a mere blaze, his horse in latticed trappings of pearled and damasked cloth-of-gold, with buckles and pendants of fine fretted bullion, his sword-hilt red with rubies, the blade a Toledo, damascened with gold.

And under the King was the Man-Boy, with two thick hands, an ardent brain, and good blue eyes.

They pricked, they galloped briskly near, they met. Francis yonder pretended still to tattle and chatter, but his eyes were fixed upon that meeting, and soon the pretence itself halted on his lips. Hold! has the Spaniard lost the trick of victory? Step by step the sorrel is backing, and step by step the black with tossing neck is encroaching, while Henry, with encroaching dominancy, is raining a vehement rain on the stranger's crest. But with damage only to steel, and to one slashed ear: for Alvarada, dumfounded by that onslaught, is yet not resourceless; he spurs in a demi-volte, parrying, even as he does it, a descending chop, and is at Henry's flank, disengaged from that rough weather.

The horses sidle, prancing; there is a full minute's manoeuvring into fresh relationship; now the Spaniard's lids are keenly lowered over eyes hawk-like in their close intensity: the two right arms lift, ready, waiting, while the chargers step a little. Chop, chop, twice, comes Henry's sudden blade upon Alvarada's left arm, but upon metal; and chop, once, comes Alvarada's upon Henry's, but upon bone!

Henry is all one tingling pain; with face red under his visor, he drives spurs to ribs, and goes racing, as if in flight, northward, the Spaniard after him, but languidly in comparison. Suddenly, with sharp wheel, Henry is galloping the other way — at really furious speed; and with him, laid in rest, comes a demi-lance of good steel and ashen shaft, unslung from his saddle. The double speed is monstrous and deadly now: they meet, they crash. Alvarada's sure eye does not fail: he actually does strike up the firm-held lance, but too soon, or too weakly; it redescends to its exact atteinte, meeting his gorget in the little depression at the centre in front; the steel bends, and bends, till tip-toe expectation waits the pop and shivery clash — but it does not break. Backward lean man and horse — backward still more, under that urgent, coaxing impulse: now is the decision of the balance, now the moment, the overthrow: over, with abandoned shock, thumps the whole dead mass to earth. Alvarada's nape strikes a stone, and he lies there without movement.

Henry passed once, rising in his stirrups, round the lists, a trotting splendour.

'Now,' said Francis to a knight, showing his little teeth, 'will you see my Heat "quick quenched"—'

For the Black Knight was the sixth arrived before the castle: and his turn was come.

As for Henry, alighted at his tent-door, he drank wine, the breath venting in strong audible fan from his stern nostrils.

Upon his burly form the eyes of Bessie Ford in her watch-tower were fastened with mesmerised stare, fascinated as a bird's upon a snake. She would have known him under all disguise, or felt the horror of his presence in the thickest midnight. Also she had a consciousness that all this bouting at arms was somehow for the possession of Laura. And he, so far, was victor: her hands were clammy, and the space beneath her eyes jaundiced and haggard.

Clammy, too, were the hands of Anne Boleyn, as she saw the lank, close-armoured form of Francis saunter into his tent: for she knew his arm, and had fear for her Queenship and ambitions; and clammy were the hands of Wolsey, looking from the donjon, for he had a secret love for this Harry, his King-Servant, and knew him to stand in fearful peril now.

Yonder, at the side of the lists, lying at lazy length with propped chin on the drizzled sward, Fitzgerald resettled to comfort his great athletic limbs, remarking:

‘I bet on the Black, Mac.’

‘A sound fighter is the Golden,’ said Mac with judicial nod, ‘a sound fighter.’

‘Goes too earnest to his work,’ criticised Fitz, ‘nor light enow. A fighting-man is not a woodman felling oaks, now. I knew an Irish kern who pricked off twelve Pale-men together, whistling the whilst. A furious levity — that’s it. A great fighter must be a man of humour, born so. Faith, I bet on the Black.’

‘Oh, Fitz, Fitz,’ cried Bonner, ‘if thou wilt quench them all for me, Black, Golden, and all, under that smothering sword of thine, two kisses shall I give thee on each hacked cheek! for then shall Bessie be thine, and Laura mine!’

Fitz pressed the hand of his boy.

The interval was long. The sun began to in-gather the blurred hues of his setting. Even the trumpeters at one time deserted the empty lists. And always the enwrapping drizzle acted, like a law of nature.

Then there was movement and revival. The clarions, for some reason, blew. Suddenly all felt that the moment, the crisis, was here. Brandon and D’Arcy laid mysterious heads together. And presently, amid a great vague tumult of the multitude, like a noise of far waters, Francis and Henry were sighted mounted at their tent doors.

The marshals went trotting, bawling thrice to the four winds:

‘The Golden Knight and the Black Knight!’

And at once, even from the gates, the two horses burst at full speed, plunging like buffaloes at the grinding spur; and with them flashed two lances in rest.

In that minute Henry’s face was a savage crimson, and the teeth of Francis grinned.

Here was a meeting of rivals — the final decision — all life crowded into one bursting and tip-top moment. And Fitzgerald, gazing, threw behind him a ‘Look! there flies Style on horseback, an you like it!’, for Francis bounds lightly as a flower jaunting on the billows of some rushing flood: and Mac whispers ‘Sh-h-h!’, just as the two steeds meet with horrid check, slipping on their wrinkled and struggling haunches, and the two steels, with chilly shrill clash, splinter on the two helms. But the sherds have hardly reached the ground when two swords have leapt: they cross and lounge and chop, the Black Knight sitting straight-backed on his saddle, the Golden standing on his stirrups, reaching prone. The management of both horses is perfect: they step and move as by instinct, in nice steady relationship: there is no pause: the blades continue their desperate parley, their ticklish intercourse, a minute, two, three. Francis, in a movement too accentuated of his horse — a movement half-voluntary on his part — receives at the bottom of the neck-piece a chop which penetrates, and draws blood. At that moment his eyes glow like two bright black moons behind his bars: for now, at last, he sees his way. As the sword of Henry descends quick to the same spot again, and rests on solid, Francis, with his excalibur, hews it fiercely. It falls in jangling sherds; and as Henry curses Heaven, Francis feints an over-helm chop; Henry bridles sharply upon his haunches; Francis plunges his blade deep into the chamfron of the charger — deep, deep into its brain. Henry is already ready with battle-axe as the animal lowers dead from its rear, and dives crashing. Out goes the heavy King’s right arm, like some reaching swimmer’s, as he pitches prone, tossing far the battle-axe. But he is agile: with swift scramble he is on his legs again — his hand seeks his dagger, seizes it, lifts it a little, and flings it to the ground in writhing pain and rage. The arm which had saved his fall is dislocated, and he stands hors de combat.

He was only a grown and bearded boy, ill-disciplined, ill-bred, obstreperous, half-savage: and he took his beating badly.

As he stamped in shockingly bad form from the field, his visage all impassioned, his nose wrinkled, he hissed with bitter, biting venom:

‘Cursed black-faced Goat! Ugly French Beast! In my own God’s land! But I’ll have her — I’ll have her — I’ll have her — so help me — !’

Now, as never half before, he was determined upon Laura Ford, As for Francis, he cantered lightly once round the lists, and returned to his tent laughing.

Macdonald had leapt up. He was at Fite’s charger, stooping, tugging at the bardwise trappings, trying the steadiness of the saddle-bow, smoothing a pastern, muttering counsels into the horse’s nostrils. Fite’s former animal had fallen sick during his period of separation from his friends; and this new horse was a present of the day of siege from free-handed Francis, who had given it with axe, lance, and harness complete.

Fitz with his friends was the seventh, and last, arrived: for they, without horses, had come to the castle on foot.

It was no longer day, but beginning twilight, when he rose from his length on the grass, and shook himself like the mighty gallant that he was. He looked keenly from under his large brows at the castle-front, and remembered that behind it was little Bessie Ford. And she, gazing intently through the grey air, saw his stature, and with fainting heart muttered:

‘Isn’t he a big one....?’

Francis was anxious to finish the tourney before further darkness, so as to proceed to preparations for the taking of the stronghold. He quickly reappeared, mounted, before his tent, sipping from a cup handed him by a chevalier.

Now the delay was short. The trumpets blared; and as the marshals called, Fitz, with one foot on the stirrup, drew Bonner's head to his side, with fondling smile; and Bonner, nestling it there, said:

‘Fight roughly, Fitz, an you love me!’

To the four winds went the prone cry:

‘The Black Knight and Garrett Oge Fitzgerald!’

And into the lists cantered the champions, Francis from the north, Fitz from the south, he passing close to Harry sitting there, who went ‘H'm!’, and looked with intense secret interest of desperate hope at the coming combat.

The speeds intensify: Francis has given well, like a royal good fellow, and Fitz's horse flies blithely to the spur: Fitz's sword is the gift of Francis, his spear, his axe: and all are very good. He is full of elation as he gallops, like one taking exercise in the element to which he was born: his simple, jolly heart does not think of defeat; he is largely confident; and so, too, is Francis largely confident, for both are Masters, easily omnipotent, buoyant on the roughest tip-top surface — as the Master always is! Fitz, in the nick of time, perceives that Francis as he comes, borne on his bounding flood of flesh, comes with lance in rest: he has just space to dash his sword into scabbard, snatch his lance, and lay it firmly to the atteinte. They meet: the two steels shrilly shiver. They draw: and with quick exquisite interaction ply those blades of supremest craftsmanship, whose fellows are not in the world; quick, like the quick winking of sheet-lightning, they ply: and the least fraction of an inch's fault on either side will bring on instant ruin.

They cannot conquer one the other: here Mars has met Ares — each his match. Francis is perhaps a shade the more agile, the iron of Fitz's wrist perhaps a shade the more inexorable. By the twinkling of a second's space Francis sights an advantage: he chops largely at the collar-bone, and must enter, if he meets it: for Fitz wears absolutely no armour save a steel morion, and a scanty ring-mail habergeon, sleeved to the elbow, bulged by his buxom breasts. But, as the precious blade of Francis descends, it is met with sharp impact by the equally precious blade of Fitz; and click go the two great falchions, split like glass, mutually destructive, and dropping in common ruin.

Now is the regime of the axe — but it lasts not one half minute. The horses step into such an obtuse-angled head-to-head relation, that the destruction of both, given two such fighters, is quite certain. Francis hews at the chamfron; Fitz, a half-second later, farther back between the ears; both steeds dive from their rear with instant suddenness. Of the two men, Francis can hardly be said to fall: by some miracle of agility he is disengaged from his horse almost as it drops; Fitz tumbles ponderously, and rolls once.

Reason enough now has he to bless his lightness of armour; for in a flash the edge of Francis is impending upon him: but that edge meets with the top-ring of his axe-hole, and the next moment he is towering upon Francis, aggressive, urgent, wielding his weapon like Jove; there is a minute during which he raises such outcries from the clattered metal of the French King, that the lists ring with the clangour of it: the front of his own mail-shirt is stained, but Francis' cuirass runs with blood. And 'Gallant Fitz!' hisses Macdonald, shivering on tip-toe yonder, 'hew, fool! hew!' Fitz hews, nor fails. Francis staggers to his back: Fitz, over him, has a dagger at his bars.

'Oh, I yield, I yield,' laughs Francis — leaps up lightly, with light sobbing laugh — falls again — leaps again, trying, with sobbing laugh, to shake Fitz's hand — and faints in the arms of Fitz.

On the battlements yonder Bessie Ford has jumped upright, with bright face, with clapping hands.

‘Oh, by my credit! the greatest of warriors, the chief of gallants, he — !’ cries she.

But the next moment she collapses, sobbing, remembering that he too, even he, is against her.

And Harry, also, at his tent door was upright, with clapped hands. Francis had been vanquished! And Christendom should know it! And Laura Ford was Fitzgerald’s! — and Fitzgerald, and the gallows at Tyburn-hill, were his!

CHAPTER XXX

HOT AIR

‘IL AMUSA LE peuple de la ville en faisant sortir toutes les nuits du fonds d’un puits un corps lumineux semblable à la Lune, qui portait sa lumière jusqu’à la distance de plusieurs milles.’ — D’HERBELOT.

OF all this Mauro Calvo saw nothing: he was busy that day and far into the night, like a man who, having found hid treasure, forgets the world in digging.

His operations now were so evident, that, but for the wild pre-occupation which filled the castle, even the stolid servitor who bore him food must have been pricked to curiosity.

For Calvo had now taken down all the dusty sendal hangings in two of the rooms, and had cut them with a knife from his bag into eight equal-sized canoe-shaped pieces; also, lying along the floor of the large rooms, for anyone to see, was his arrangement of eight laths, strung at both ends by wires between the sixteen cogs of two circles of wood. But of this the servitor took no notice, perhaps associating it in his mind with the repairs. He had no thought of the prisoner’s escape: it was, indeed, perfectly easy for Calvo to lower himself by a rope, if he had one; for outside a door which looked upon the castle-back was a stone platform with a coping, in which was a stout staple; but had he climbed down there, he would have descended into the back castle-courtyard, within the bastioned curtains, where his capture would have been coolly effected. There was not therefore in the mind of anyone the least thought of his escape.

His next work was to cut in the inner surface of one of the circles of wood, near the circumference, a deep round groove, into which the bottom of a water-cup in the room could be firmly fixed; and into this same circle he made, also, near the circumference, a hole to admit the hand. Into the cup he put some coal found half-burnt in a fireplace, with some pieces of shellac from his bag, freely wetting the whole with inflammable naphtha; and he fixed the cup in the groove.

About this time Bessie and Laura came down from the summit: for the tournament was over. Calvo took not the least notice of them. They had for him now absolutely no interest, save as the parts of an experiment.

He next proceeded to cover his framework of eight laths with the eight pieces of canoe-shaped sendal-silk. Glue or gum he had not, but with a small gar, or awl, he bored holes along the length of the lathes, and, with a string of sendal, fastened two edges of the canoe-shapes along each lath, the string running over and under alternately. He was half through this slow work, when he heard, far off, the renewed boom of cannon, and started.

It was now late night. He left his work, ran to the door opening upon the platform, and looked out. It was drizzling, and dark, and bleak. A rough wind had arisen, which moaned round the crenaux and bartisans of the donjon. With inward satisfaction he saw that it blew from the north-east.

Back he ran to his great, doubtful, momentous task; his heart misgiving him; his brain spurring him. The thought that hot air was lighter than cold had become a numb mania with him: he had eaten no food that day: he muttered with his lips.

Swiftly, tremulously, worked now his cunning fingers. Strange, eager, dying sounds reached his ears from beyond the locked portal. Momentary uproars of distracted petards burst and crackled; there were shouts, and echoes, running feet, and violin-sounds like wails, and still the rare vague boom of cannon. The rushlight which he had stuck near flickered upon a face pallid, and even awful, the lips being pressed tight, sweat beading the bulging corpse-brow, and the calm of the misshapen eyes changed all to wildness.

The edges of the eight canoe-shapes were now taped to the eight laths and to the two circles, and all was fairly air-tight. Where there seemed a crevice, he melted some shellac in the rush-light, and smeared the parts thinly.

As he did this, he heard three strokes of the castle clock through the noise of the two raging storms. It was midnight.

He rushed to the basket lying in a corner, and upset upon the floor the mass of shavings, tools, and oblongs of sawed wood which it contained. He began to tie in its stout rim eight pieces of sendal rope, which he had prepared for that purpose. They were all equal in length, about seven feet.

Suddenly he sniffed, lifted his head, and looked round: the room was pervaded with thin smoke. He ran out to the platform: all the air was luridly red, and far to the west there went out from the building, solemnly informing the night, a stream of sparkling fume. The castle, it was clear, was in flames.

He ran back to his task, crying to Laura and Bessie:

‘Prepare yourselves, you two — !’

They, sitting on the floor in fear, knew not in the least what he meant; but they rose.

He attached all the eight strings to the basket in a fury of haste; then shouldered his slender silken work. The length was great, the weight little. He manoeuvred the turning end through the door, out upon the platform.

Held upright, its top reached well beyond the battlements. A new fear of the streaming sparks beset him, and his movements became intensely flurried.

Leaning the long spar of silk against the battlements, he pressed with his left fist against the lower circle of wood, pulling at the same time, with the right hand, the rope which, knotted largely at the top, passed through the two circles. The straight spar began to bulge into needle-shape; he pulled — it bulged into melon-shape; still he pulled, straining, with reddening face — it bulged into orange-shape; and now a plug of wood plaited into the rope inside met the lower circle; quickly he inserted another plug into an opening left in the plaiting under the circle: and now the orange-shape was fixed. He tied the great globular bag to the staple in the coping. Its rockings and bumps were moderate, the castle's bulk shielding it from the east-wind.

Even there he could hear that the castle was full of shouts. The assailants had, in fact, now pelted into the burning building, the inner drawbridge and fosse having been carried, slaying all they met, Francis and Fitzgerald foremost, and Henry, too, prone in the van. Calvo quickly and firmly secured the eight basket-ropes to the peg beneath the lower circle, and called:

‘Come, come, you....!’

Bessie and Laura stood at the door wondering at this strange, great, light, round monster which rocked and bumped. They could no more divine its purpose than the things that are done on Saturn.

The basket lay on the platform with lax ropes; and Mauro Calvo said:

‘Get in there....’

Laura Ford drew back with parting nostrils, in extreme fear of this new thing. Bessie, lion-hearted, at once said:

‘Come, Laura...,’ and led her by the hand.

The basket was large and deep-rimmed. They sat: Calvo ran with trembling legs, and returned with his bag; ran again, and returned with the shaded rushlight. He pushed it through the hand-hole in the lower circle, and turned the flame to the naphtha-cup. The spirit popped into flame. Calvo undid the rope from the staple, and scuttled into the basket.

He waited. Gradually the lax ropes stirred, straightened, tightened. He waited still in a horror of expectation.

The conflagration of the donjon was now in full swelter, and from many a casement roared a flame, while on high the spangled black gonfalon of Ravine floated through a vault lurid as the dawning of day in Tophet. All in the loud air were tones and sounds, as when men in sleep shout weakly in the centre of the thundering of cataracts.

The ropes tightened — but the basket did not move. Calvo waited, and it did not move, and lift. As when the treasure-digger finds the casket there, but empty, and the world all rags and hunger still, so was the sage's face.

Yet the ropes between basket and silken bag were taut — the bag wanted to ascend, if it could — the hot air within it being lighter than the cold around it: this, of itself, was a triumph for the thinker. After a minute, seeing it, he had a joy in his despair. He threw out his bag, and at once the basket thrilled and creaked; in his mad urgency to watch the fruit of his brain, he got up, stepped over the rim — and was tossed sprawling upon the platform, tripped by the edge of the now ascending basket. Never did fall fill a man with glee so rapturous. He was on his feet in a moment, snatched at the running rope, wrapped it once round the staple, and so held it as it paid furiously out, gazing the while upward with adoring eyes.

From the air there reached him an awful shriek — the shriek of Laura Ford, as she felt the strong aspiring leap of the unknown thing that bore her.

Bessie exclaimed: 'My mother!', and the next moment, white herself, was hushing her sister's loud terrors.

But the bag had hardly reached an elevation of forty feet from the platform when its ascension ceased, it paused, and yielding to the weight it carried, began to sink, rushing all the time at the rate of fifty miles an hour down the north-eastern wind under a canopy of smoke and sparks from the castle.

Those of the assailants who guarded the castle-back saw with straining necks, and the wildest wonder, that floating visitant, that novel moon, lit and yellow, sailing in solemn mystery above their heads. As the shepherds who, tending their flocks by night, were aware of sudden brightness in the air, and sweet preamble of heavenly harps, so these wondered. The last thing that occurred to them was that here was a thing of human making.

It passed over a stretch of forest and bumped with some heaviness on a rising ground some seven hundred yards from the castle. As the girls attempted to get out, they were flung to the ground, and up, with instant buoyancy, it shot again, running away fast with the rope. Calvo, however, by giving the rope another turn round the staple, was able to check its flight; and now, with straining effort, equal almost to the effort of lifting together the two girls, he commenced to draw it in. Once and again he had perforce to pause, holding it by help of the turns on the staple. But after some ten minutes, he at last threw his bag into the basket, himself after it, cut the rope, and shot high.

His course was more adventurous than that of the girls. His weight being less, he was borne upon a far more extended descending curve; also, the wind which entered the silken bag by the hand-hole, at every gust blew the flame into horrid proximity either with the outer covering, or with the cord that connected the two circular pieces at their centres. Thus it happened that, at a moment when the flame had begun to expire, and the contrivance was descending some mile and a half from the castle, Calvo noticed in the covering a hole rimmed with spreading red. He glanced with horror below: the earth was forty feet away. In another twenty seconds he was crashing through a shubbery: he clutched instinctively at his bag; and the next instant, the air-horse, relieved of the weight, leapt high. He saw the wasting silk shrivel and consume before a writhing edge of flame, till with steep drop it fell among trees ten yards away.

At that time, the castle was being ransacked for Calvo and the girls; and though the exact place of their confinement was unknown to the assailants, it quickly became certain that they were not in the building.

Henry himself entered the very rooms whence the wizard had lately vanished, and he was hurrying back along a corridor rolled in smoke, when before him he saw a sight at which he started: Wolsey coming toward him.

An expression of fury flitted over the King's face: here was confirmation of the incredible rumour that Wolsey was in the castle, had brought the girls thither, was opposing the purposes of the King, had resisted his demand for surrender.

‘How now, my lord Cardinal? You here! You!’ said Harry.

Wolsey was large in cardinal red and hat; and with him were most of his ten men. He had been hiding in a locked room, finding all escape cut off, till he was certain that Harry had passed beyond it inward. Now he came stooping forward, an expression of frank gladness on his face.

‘Your Majesty is safe!’ he cried.

‘You here, my lord? You,’

‘I am this moment arrived from London, Sire. I had tidings that my King was in peril—’

‘From London, say you? This moment, eh? My lord, your arriving is wondrous well timed!’

Henry was regarding him with a most stern brooding underlook of suspicion.

‘You make me the more happy, Sire.’

‘But ’tis said that you were in the castle all the time!’

‘Which castle, Sire?’

‘God in Heaven, man, there are not five million castles! This castle.’

‘But — Sire—’

‘You falter, my lord Cardinal! You halt, you falter. ’Tis an ill sign, by Heaven’s light, when a man falters—’

‘But — Sire — hear me—’

‘You but me, man — you but me overmuch — !’

‘I am at your Majesty’s feet. Sire, if some enemy hath abused your ear with this weird tale, ’twere but due to me to declare me who.’

‘Who, Brandon, was it said that my lord Wolsey was in the castle?’ asked Henry.

‘One Sidney Boleyn, Sire,’ said Brandon.

‘A brother of the Lady Anne?’ queried Wolsey.

‘Yes, my lord.’

‘But, Sire,’ said Wolsey, ‘she is my enemy! — avowed—’

‘Well, that she is no doubt, I admit.’

‘My enemy, Sire!’ said Wolsey, with opening arms, working upon Henry’s generous candour in the presence of facts.

‘Well, I hope I wrong you not, my lord Cardinal — yet ’tis strange, you know— ’tis strange—’

At this point Knevet ran up, crying:

‘No sign of the fugitives, Sire!’

And on the instant the agile brain of Wolsey divined that the sagacious mind of Calvo had somehow saved his skin, and if so, then Wolsey's as well. At once he said:

‘I believe that the ears of your Majesty have been greatly abused by the conceited fiction of an impudent girl. And the proof that the part of it which concerned me was false, is seen by the fact that the other part was false, too.’

‘What other part, my lord?’

‘Sire, there were here no fugitives.’

‘What! dared she that?’

Wolsey was sweetly tickled.

‘Sire,’ said he, ‘the whole was concocted. There were here no fugitives, credit me. I have even now encountered Sir James Broughton, who hath given me that assurance. This Mistress Boleyn, Sire—’

‘She shall smart for it, then! My lord Cardinal, forgive me—’

The hands of King and Priest met in a grip of renewed friendship, Wolsey smiling from the height of his proud neck his little superior smile.

CHAPTER XXXI

IN THE WOOD

‘THE VIRTUOUS SOUL pursues a nobler aim,
And life regards but as a fleeting dream.’

GAY.

CALVO, from the castle, had observed the whereabouts of the girls’ fall from the air-car: and within few minutes after his own fall was rejoined to them.

Now their plight was worse than ever: their enemies in hosts beset them round; they were without horse, or food, or coin. They sought out the deepest recess of the forest, peeringly advancing, and there slept.

This vast dark wood, which was called Broughton Wood, was peopled with rabbits and hares: and the next day Calvo contrived a trap, set it near, and waited long, with back turned upon his hope; but the rabbits of the period, wise in that their dim, far-sunken generation, divined the whole mind of the sage, and squatted in their jungled sylvan glooms, content to leave the baitless trap alone.

Laura complained, saying that it was too much to expect of her, at the end of the tale. Calvo’s nose had the wrinkles of fretfulness. About three in the afternoon, good Bessie rose, saying that she would go and beg, they to await her there.

Off, then, she went, winding on a way that she knew not through the sunless shade. The storm of the night had died now to a breeze. All the forest crackled and sang and squeaked with unseen life. Above, the great ocean of foliage was very good Gileadite, and could say the sh in ‘shibboleth.’

And, as she went, sadly meditating upon the bright green-sward, her dress somewhat torn, and her little plait reaching no lower than her low-cut bodice-neck, suddenly, two hands from behind pressed over her eyes, drawing back her head, and two lips shot a fugitive kiss at her ear, and laughed a little.

She was released at once; and, looking, saw a lank strip of body high above her, and a lean brown face. Mournfully she smiled, and, without the least appearance of being startled, said:

‘By my credit, sir, you startle me....’

She knew him at once for the Black Knight, having seen him visored in the lists, and Laura, whom he had seized, had described him. Also, she had heard village-rumours that the Black Knight was none other than the King of France.

But as for him, he had no notion that here was the sister of that Beauty which he coveted. He kissed her ear for the simple reason that she was a girl in the romantic gloom of a wood.

‘And why here, and whither-away, mamsel?’ quoth he.

‘I am faring through the forest, sir, to seek some nourishment for me and mine.’

‘Little English body...’ he said, contemplating her, smiling, pleased with her little way, and English demureness.

‘And whither-away you, my lord?’ said she.

‘I? Why, I seek here — but come, thou art not angry, I think, that I busshed thy cheek?’

‘Why, no, sir! By my credit, ‘twere more than that would anger me, seeing ’twas merry and fairly done. But you seek someone, my lord?’

‘La, yes. Hath it not come to thine ears that a goodly number of cavaliers search a gentle special demoisel through this country-side? I, know, am even one of them: and, catching this morning a wind of rumour that she lies concealed within this wood, I with some comrades wander here a-search. La! and now am I in double dilemma, for neither demoisel nor comrades find I. Moreover, I have three sore gashes in my chest, and am faint, mon Dieu! An, now, I had that little lap whereon to lay my head, pending but a ten minutes’ space—’

‘Why, sure, sir, an you will it so—’ said Bessie, turning upon him the full regard of her candid eyes. They met a leer not quite fair and good: yet she did not blush, nor turn away.

‘Here, then...,’ he said.

She sat on a swell of sward in brown obscurity under an oak; and lying at his length, with head raised on her lap, he looked up into the breeze-tickled leafage.

Once two babes, exposed in a forest, were found by a she-wolf. There were ten million chances against one chance that she would tear and eat them: but that one chance, which verily exists in the elfin Heart of Nature, worked and won. She suckled them.

Even such was Bessie’s risk in resting here with Francis of France; and she had an instinctive consciousness of it: but her heart was strong, and her eyes candid.

‘Thou hast rencountered none of my friends, I take it?’ said he after a minute.

‘Not I, sir.’

‘Of the maiden which I seek hast heard tell in thy village?’

‘I have heard tell of her, my lord.’

‘How knowest thou I am milord?’

‘Sure, your good and gracious way with a poor maiden bewrayeth you high and gent’ sir.’

He kissed her hand.

‘Thinkest thou I would harm thee?’

‘You, my lord? Not you!’

‘Faith, then, I would not.’

‘Why, I wot it, sir.’

‘But as to this maiden — canst give me no guidance? For I could wager she is somewhere in this wood.’

‘An I could give you guidance, my lord, think you I would?’

‘La! and wherefore not?’

He jerked up in surprise his hairy head, all about which the breezes toyed.

‘Because, sir, ’tis sure you seek her not for her good.’

‘There you err fondly: precisely for her good I seek her; ’twere my will to lavish round her beauty all the jouissance of life, by Crisscross!’

‘For how long, my lord?’

‘Why, so long as her life, mamsel.’

‘But life is not long, my lord. Sure, you can give her no jouissance in the grave.’

‘Who talks of graves, mamsel?’

Again, as he asked, Francis jerked up, glancing at her, wondering at so broad outlook in village maid.

‘Sure, sir,’ she said, ‘’Tis nought oddish if I talk of graves, for, by my credit, graves are all about us, and near enow; and a life, were it King’s or village-maid’s, is just like last Summer, which lasted not long, and is evanished now, and buried deep away, no man any more thinking thereon at all for ever.’

‘Mortbleue! ’tis true, girl. La — true. Yet while that Summer dured, ’twere well, methinks that it shone blithe and merry, since it so soon passed.’

‘So hold I, too, my lord. And fain am I, I avouch, of flute and tabouret, and dancing under-moon on the green, and the warming of strong ale, and specially of grand Hampshire cider, sir, and sweet lover’s-whisperings above all, my lord, had I — aye me — but a lover, sir! For though I talk of graves, ill were it to me to die, who am full of life, by my credit, too much, perchance. But, sir—’

‘Well, I hearken, I am hearkening. Say it through, say it right through.’

‘Sir, the things of jouissance you would be giving to that poor wench resemble not really the good, brave shining of a Summer, but rather, meseems, flashes of lightning in a lowering sky. Faith, something assures me that I say true. I see well that she would gain a drop, and lose the sea.’

‘What lose, then?’

‘Why, sir, sure there is something in simple innocence that more warms the bones than an ale-house fire at Christmas Eve, and a jig into which the clear heart anon breaks merrier far, by my credit, than galliard, or brawl, or coranto; and a secret Wine, sir — ah! nay, I cannot say all I would—’

The heart of Francis burned strangely within him as she so communed with him. Looking up into the moving tree, he lisped dreamily:

‘Say it on — say it on—’

‘Why, sir, sure,’ said she, ‘there is that in the world which speaks, and we hear it, though not with the ear: and like an angel-lover it sings and soothes, or like a storm it brawls. Oh, faith, to act well appeareth a great alchemy, and fine ducket-gold in the pouch, my lord! — for ’tis then with the soul as though it went jaunting on a grand upward march in good company with the sun and the moon and all the train of the stars — oh, my lord, look out! look out!’

Her words ended in a cry: and out, with swift, protective impulse, rushed her hand over the brow of the French King. The hand was pierced by a small bullet, which penetrated, and drew blood from him also. She had seen a puff of smoke start from a thicket ten yards away, glimpsed a bullet, and acted with the instancy of thought.

Francis in a moment was on his feet, and, with drawn sword, was gone like the wind in pursuit.

CHAPTER XXXII

AT ORMOND HALL

‘DISTINGUISH ALL THE floods that are Mixed in that watery theatre....’
HERRICK.

THE shot had been fired by a retainer of Ormond Hall, of whom three, with Anne, were in the forest searching for Laura Ford. Anne, looking through bush, saw Bessie, and, to her astonishment, the head of Francis on Bessie’s lap. She was seized with fright, concluding now that Bessie had compounded with the French King — that Laura was in his hands. The thing or man, were he a King, that came between her and her ambition she doomed without hesitation, and ‘Shoot me quick that man!’ she whispered to a liveryman.

Francis, at the pistol-crack, went dashing in search; but pursuit in such a wood was hopeless. He found no one. After a random hunt of ten minutes, he stopped.

He put his hand to his forehead, and took it away red from a flesh-wound. He remembered now that she had laid her hand there, and saved him; must have been herself pierced.

His heart had burned strangely within him, moved and touched by some sweetness of pity in her tones, some dear light in her eyes, or some profundity of hoary world-wisdom in her words. He ran now swiftly, pantingly, to find her. But he was uncertain of his way. Not till after a half-hour did he come to a tree which he believed to be the tree he had lain by: there were many oaks in the forest. Bessie, however, was not there.

Had he been bespoken by some affable and wise Angel in homely disguise, resting here in the shade mid-way on her high wayfaring betwixt world and world? Some such fancy passed in his mind. He was full of a sense of loss.

The tree to which he returned was indeed the same: but Bessie had now gone forward on her errand of food-seeking. She had sprung up, agitated, immediately after Francis, and had stood some minutes, waiting what should betide. Nothing happened: and when Francis did not come, she went onward.

Anne Boleyn, even in hasting out of Francis' path, had kept her eye on Bessie, who was the key to Laura; and as Bessie moved through the wood, followed, guessing now that since she went forward without Francis, then Francis had not yet Laura.

Bessie happened, without special motive, to take her way north-westward, hoping to come upon cottage, or hamlet, or castle. And half a mile north-westward lay Ormond Hall.

The thought leapt in Anne's mind:

'If now she should go to the Hall, and I hold her safe there under lock and key!'

There was no danger that Bessie should discover her tracker: the anguish of her hand occupied her; anon she held it aloft, shaking it cherishingly as it panged. She had rent a strip of under-garment, and bound the wound.

A thickness in the forest made her change direction, and in the new course she continued.

But Anne was now besieged by the idea of having her at the Hall. It seemed clear that Bessie was not now making for the spot where Laura hid, being now too near the wood's edge; she was therefore going from that spot. To reach Laura, it would be only necessary to search somewhere in the opposite direction. But Anne's first tactical task was the securing of Bessie, if that was possible without scaring her. For this pure sister of her intended victim Anne had acquired an extraordinary detestation, evil as sin; merely to do her hurt was pleasant to Anne. When Bessie changed direction, Anne threw over her face a folded veil of gold gauze, quickly caught up the lowly pilgrim, and passed her a little.

It was in a narrow green-sward between tree-trunks, deep-gloomed and cool. The afternoon was well advanced toward twilight. But here it seemed almost night.'

Anne's dress was very different now from her dress beneath the chestnut at Mede Down: her skirt being of rich cloth-of-tissue, with a surcoat of crimson silk, and plumed cap of white cloth-of-gold. Bessie, as the lady passed, drew back respectfully, and waited. At five paces' distance Anne turned, saying:

'Hast lost thy way, girl?'

Now, for the first time in her life, Bessie heard that voice. It was a deep and rich contralto.

'Why, no, mistress, not that wholly. But—'

'What seekest?'

'Why, a hamlet, mistress, or a hall, imports not which.'

'Thou goest hardly right, then, meseems. Art a stranger? What is thy need?'

'Truth to tell, I go to beg a morsel of food—'

‘Why, poor lost soul, follow me straight, I bid thee! Not five minutes hence is Redmond Castle, where thou shalt be richly regaled, I promise!’.

Anne, a consummate actress, walked on at once, without waiting, and Bessie followed with laggard steps. If her good angel in some remoteness of her consciousness whispered her halt, she hardly heard: for the angels whisper low, thinking our ears celestial like their own, and they are mortal ears — not made by us, for that matter.

Ormond Hall was a grey square mass of low building, with a multitude of windows, half of them on fire now with sunset. It stood lonely in the middle of wide lawn-land, which was quite surrounded by a circular edge of forest.

Not till Anne emerged from the wood did Bessie see her well. And at once something — a fear, a memory, an instinct — troubled her. But it was very indefinite: and yonder was the house; and hunger pressed: she followed, continually quickening her laggard steps.

Yet a hundred yards, and Anne was at the house-front, which looked east. She beckoned. Bess came to the long frontage-steps, and halted.

‘Come, come,’ said Anne busily.

‘Shall I not make round to the back, mistress?’ asked Bess, wondering.

‘No — this way! Come,’

‘My mother...’ muttered Bess.

She followed. Anne passed through the antlered and hatchmented antechamber, through a salon, up a wide ‘stair-case,’ along a corridor, into a room. At the door Bessie halted, with panting nostrils.

‘Come, come—’ said Anne.

It was a long room on the first floor, containing three windows in the front of the house and two in an adjacent side. Its furnishing was heavy and august — storied tapestry, ebon chairs, a table for shovel-board, a Spanish foot-cloth of needlework bound in buckram, a massive beaufet of shining wood, a massive escritoire of oak, Venice mirrors in silver filigree, and at one end an elevated gallery with fat-bellied balustrades. It had two doors, one permanently locked; and a mass of court-letters on the escritoire, and of embroidery on a settee, showed that it was a room of Anne's.

Bessie entered. Anne returned to the door, shut it, locked it. Then she leant her back there, tossed up her thick veil, and with mocking sideward underlook, turned her face upon Bessie.

Now Bessie recognised her, and uttered a cry. And in that cry was not fear alone, but enmity and rage also.

‘Why, lady,’ said she, with white face and opening nostrils, ‘what is your will of me?’

‘Oh, Innocence I’ mocked Anne, ‘chaste village naivete embodied, I swear! Canst not guess?’

‘Why, lady, not I!’

‘Yet thou knowest me, I see well. I followed thee once — thou fled'st from me. — Now — is it not so? — I have thee.’

‘Have me? You? By what right have you me, ‘lady?’

‘So, thou hast a pert tongue to question, I see, and art not all village-naïveté and chastity, after all! The head of Francis the First, King of France, on the lap of an innocent, sweet village-lass in a forest is sign of far progress in the paths of chastity, for that matter. Oh, by the Rood, thou naughty, naughty Bess!’

Bessie's white face flushed into peony crimson.

‘Prithce — let me hence—’ she faltered, all crushed with shame— ‘oh! your thoughts — your tongue—’

‘Was it not, then, very naughty, Bess? Poor Francis is so frail — thou hast no notion! and hath, 'tis said, a weakness for both of two sisters—’

‘Oh, lady, lady, may I not fare hence?’

‘Why, nay, Bess. The door, you see, is locked.’

The key, however, remained in it.

‘Now may God me keep from doing you hurt with my hands, lady!’ exclaimed Bessie Ford, holding back her stiffly-clenched fists.

‘I hope He even will, girl: for this, you must know, is not Redmond Castle, as I told you, but Ormond Hall, my father’s house. And, an you stir against me, my servants rend you limb from limb; nor, look you, am I myself wholly a wren-chick, I swear to you!’

‘I hear you, lady; yea, by my credit, you have all the strength on your side. But therefore ’tis that you should the less wrong me, who, faith, am a poor creature, sore beset, God wot, come hither to beg of your ladyship a morsel of rye-bread. Wherefore keep, and crush, and madden me? What part hath a lady such as you in my forlorn and woeful estate? Prithee, let me hence! Prithee, prithee! — Who, lady, are you?’ — .

Anne was open, bluff frankness itself when no motive urged diplomacy.

‘Oh, I am the Lady Anne Boleyn,’ she said; ‘now canst guess what I need with thee?’

‘Why, lady, by my credit, nay!’

‘Art dullard, then! King Henry of England, thou seest, was hot to make me his queen this day month ago. Thou must sure have heard. But, being the great mumping fool that he is, he hath flung me clean over, to the intent that he might run agape after thy silly sister, good Bess—’

‘My sister! What have you with my sister, lady? Oh, good mother!’

‘Your sister I seek, that I may have her in my hands, that I may give her into the hands of Henry, that Henry may give into my hands the Kingdom of England, that so on, and so on, in the manner of the House which Jack built, chaste Bess.’

‘Why, woman, you are black with sin!’

‘And would you know precisely why I hold you now, chaste Bess? Wait — I will even show you!’

Anne soared to the escritoire, which was near the locked door, and scribbled a few words, while Bessie stood with heaving chest, her eyes roaming round the chamber like a new-caged creature’s. They fell at last upon the open escritoire. There on the drawn leaf she saw, with a start, a folded paper which she had every reason to know well, and instantly recognised. It was the Kings-letter to Wolsey, taken by her from Fitzgerald’s cloak.

‘There!’ said Anne, leaping up. ‘This, Bess, is a billet to a young nobleman called Percy of Northumberland, who lies rather sick with wounds at Fenley, one three-quarter mile hence. And the billet has it: “Go with seven or eight armed men, sans delay, in an eastern and southern direction from Ormond Hall through Broughton Wood, passing close by the cress-pool on its northern side. The Girl is sure there. I have her sister. Do thou endeavour to go in thy proper person, maugre thy wounds. Francis lurks thereabouts. — ANNE.”’

Now it happened that this note pretty accurately described the real whereabouts of Laura Ford; and as Bessie heard it, hope left her, and her knees were weak.

They remained a minute motionless, confronted, vice with purity, Bessie’s eyes wildly haggard, Anne smiling venomously: till Anne moved to a bell-rope hanging near the elevated gallery, to summon a messenger; and that movement broke the spell of Bessie’s terror.

Crying: ‘You shan’t,’, with a swift snatch she had the note crumpled in her own hand.

The venomous smile passed now from Anne's face, and flaming rage was there. Stepping upon Bessie with the menace of a Billingsgate-wife, she cried:

‘That billet, wench! — lest I strangle you — quick — !’

‘Oh, I fear not the stranglings of such a woman as you,’ answered Bessie, even as down upon her cheek came the brisk palm of Anne with scarlet smart; and in a moment they were engaged in a panting struggle for the letter. Of the two women Anne was the more largely built, but Bessie Ford was very vigorous and knit, having the vital good sap of England in her birth and making.

She had no intention to yield the paper, and Anne, tugging with bitten under-lip, and gradually-failing force, found a wrist and fist stern as a locked portal. With tottering stumbles, with wild swayings, in an intense silence of effort, save for their fervid breaths which vehemently filled the room, they fought. At the last Bessie, though tortured by her wound, with a strong push of both fists freed herself, and sent Anne staggering to a backward crouch; and at once she slipped the letter into her bosom.

‘Now you die, you little marmot!’ gasped Anne with threatening head-shake, as she rushed anew to the bell.

But here again Bessie was beforehand. With pelting speed she darted to the spot, and, even as Anne's hand rose, leapt, caught the rope, and hung all her weight upon it. It was made of twisted wool, and came away from the metal a-top, dropping in a snake.

And now Bessie ran to the locked door; but before she could turn the key, Anne's hand was upon it. Bessie, with swift craft, in an unexpected jerk, drew the key, and from where she stood tossed it through a window, which splintered, out upon the lawn.

Now, if she was a prisoner, so was Anne. They stood there equal, woman to woman, Anne without help from without.

Bessie's weight had, indeed, rung the bell in a hard clang, followed by two weak tinklings as the rope broke; and this Anne knowing, waited half a minute at the door, expecting coming footsteps. But the single bell-clang had aroused no one. And Anne, crouching agonised, at length commenced to cry out: 'Hi, Bertha! Wallis! Hi!'

But at once Bessie, springing upon her, put both palms to her mouth, and so urged and flung her backward. From her crouch Anne leapt up shivering with passion; and in this passion, now, was a qualm of physical cowardice.

'Look you — girl — if you dare lay — hands on me — !' she panted.

'Hold — your voice, then!' responded Bessie's pant, 'do but lift — it and — I tear your skin — I beat — you blue!'

'Then would you need — your man, Fitzgerald — here to aid you — base gutter-hen — !' gasped Anne, her strong sense all breaking up now into mere childish spite and femininities.

Bessie, in a lower tone of surprise, and transferred interest, said:— 'Master Fitzgerald? sure, I wot naught of whom you mean. Will your wicked tongue be fastening now upon him also?'

'Him I the rottenest profligate that man in all England — !'

Here was feminine arrow shot at random, which hit and pierced.

'Oh, most like 'tis a foul lie, like all you say!' cried Bess with impatient bitterness, harsh as terebinth.

'Corrupted is your tongue, and only evil from its root! And how if I, since you so madden me, since you dare so slander the innocent, do make straight hence to where the King lies encamped, and straight declare him of you; reveal him this your letter lying in my bosom here; point to whom 'tis writ — most like, your paramour; and tell of wherefore you would trap my poor little sister — of all your unwomanly pitilessness — your foul, unhandsome thinkings — your virtueless and ungentle works — and all your shame! Oh, fie, fie, lewd lady! Nay, and 'tis what I even shall do — yea, verily, by my credit, exposed you shall be — !'

At this hideous threat out blazed Anne's eyes like a virago's, and showing her grined teeth, she advanced with shuddering opening arms upon Bessie: but stopped, fearing her; and sought with feminine instinct how to stab and slay her with the venomed weapon of the tongue.

'So you would expose me?' cried she with forced hysterical laughter. 'Ha! ha! Anne Boleyn exposed by Bessie Ford! — a theme for the play-house at Southwark, I swear to God, I swear to God! O cameradoes! Then, sure must I call Mark Bonner to witness against you!'

The last words were, in a high degree, hysterical, without special meaning, except in so far as they introduced the name of Bonner with the hope of wounding.

'And what of Mark Bonner now, an it please you?' said Bessie.

'He! O, the accepted lover of the sister! By God, that boy kisses a woman like a trout biting a bait!'

'Who, Mark Bonner? Sure, 'tis some mistake you make, then...'

'A woman mistakes not the man which kisses her, daw! He has kissed and tongued me, that boy — !'

'Mark Bonner?' said Bessie, white as paper: for if Bonner was false to Laura, what hope remained?

'Faith, never was I so hotly tackled!' cried Anne.

'Nay, but what a wanton must you be?' went Bessie, faintingly, turning away her shamed face.

'Tis so said. Yet never have I borne in my lap the head of Francis — in a wood!'

‘But have you indeed led that poor youth astray? Oh, have you verily?’

“Twas he led me astray! As you have led poor Francis! — whose taste, by the Rood, degenerates of late, thou bosomless skelet!’

‘Oh, then, if this you have done, I could almost curse you! Filthy are you in the regard of honest eyes! I could almost say: may your life fail upon you — ending in as sharp a stroke as now you have — !

Nay, I curse you not, for that were ignorantly done, by my credit! But I do most foully hate, and spit upon you. I do loathe you with my soul as a thing unclean and spotted as snakes! Dangerous and deadly are you; yet, by my credit, I fear you not, for stronger is that better is: and yet may you know it, though now your understanding be a world too dark to scent a truth so bright. And as for the letter that lies there, no right have you to it, I trow, and with me now shall it rest—’

She had cunningly backed as she spoke towards the escritoire, and with a sudden movement seized the King’s letter to Wolsey.

Anne, forgetting every fear, rushed to seize it — for here was her last weapon against the Cardinal. But she was too late: the letter was in Bessie’s bosom, and Anne received a stern thrust-back at the neck, the better here being indeed the stronger.

If the quick temperament of Anne had flamed before, now it raved. There where she stood, she threw back her throat, and she piled shriek on shriek, yelling ‘Help! help! help!’, and as she yelled, foam sprinkled from her mouth, and speckled her nether lip, and her dishevelled face was all like tumbled sunset.

Now she was heard: from some remote region of the great house Sir Thomas came running, as did a dozen retainers.

And still she called and yelled; and as she yelled Bessie Ford, transported too, beat and beat upon her upturned face and mouth, gasping:

‘Hush — hush — or I beat — you blue!’ And even in that moment of hysterical collapse and distraction, Anne remembered the dart, the venom which kills, the poison of asps which was under her tongue. And she shrieked, and sobbed, and jerked, while Bessie beat:

‘You might divine — whence I got — the letter—’

‘Little it tides whence — hold — your voice! Hush — or I beat — you blue—’

‘’Twas from him! He is wild — in love — with me—’

‘You said — it before. I heed not — hush, I say — !’

‘Not him — not Bonner — Fitzgerald—’

‘Who?’

‘Fitzgerald—’

‘Oh, you liar! — take that! — take it! — if he loved a filth like you — I’d stab — I’d stab — him to — the heart!’

‘He loves — me mad!’

‘You lie — take it ——— !’

‘’Twas he — that gave — the letter — he gave me when: — he knew — you were — expecting it—’

‘He,’ Oh, now you hurt — have mercy—’

She swerved back crouching, with covered face, deep stabbed, conquered, sobbing — for the lie was so plausible to her. But now the door was rudely shaken without — there were calls, voices, urging shoulders.

Instantly Bessie recovered herself, and flew to a window to leap — a bold leap of twenty-five feet. Anne, swiftly roused to a sense of the practical, was after her. As Bessie put her shoulders out of window, Anne’s hands were upon them, dragging her back. Now with cat-o’-mountain fury they struggled, with spitting rancour, with rent clothes, their womanhood all naked to its foundations, ugly as harridans. And as in this turbulency of action they fought, heaving like the angry sea, Anne glimpsed on the lawn two retainers, run round here to see what they could see. At that moment Bessie was all but freed from her; Anne let her wholly go, drove her head out of window, and shrieked:

‘Go to Fenley — a wounded man there — tell him — !’

But Bessie, with visage all inflamed, was by her side again, looking out, too, shouting a passionate monotone, drowning Anne’s words, anon beating Anne’s face. The two men could not hear. Meanwhile, the other party of retainers behind were battering the door with truncheons and quarter-staffs; but of this neither of the women, in the crazy ecstasy of that moment, was actively conscious.

At last, Anne, with a cunning feint, ran from the window to the middle, and thence, with quick spurt, to another window. Before Bessie reached her, she had cried half her message; and the rest she shrieked through Bessie’s shouting, bending perilously prone, with the concentrated rage of the pearl-diver who sees the prize near, and his wind is wholly done, yet will he reach, or burst; her throat being now hoarse, and her lips blubber and shiny with blood and serum.

The men at last nodded.

‘Have you heard?’ howled Anne.

They nodded yes.

‘Then go!’

Off they went running.

The fury of Bessie Ford now transcended all bounds. The messengers were on their fatal way, and as a mother when the she-wolf is in steep career upon her babe, so was she. Again she leapt to a window, and again Anne was at her. The fierce, loud battery of the door continued, soon now to cease.

But now Bessie Ford had the vigour of quite two, or three, ordinary women. Long, Anne saw, she could not be held. Terribly the fight gasped, and gnashed, and hissed, and swayed. Another window went clattering upon the grass. Three horsemen without were cantering leisurely toward the house across the lawn; and both must have seen them; but seen them like things in another world, unrelated and remote. Nothing in the earth was of interest, save the moment, the gall and lash of their intense Present. Anne fought to her last conscious gasp: but she sighed, gave up, and lapsed upon the ground a disfigured and sluttish heap. At the same time Bessie stood on one of the front window-sills, hesitated, and leapt.

Her feet touched ground as buoyantly as a bouncing ball — her fall broken by two strong arms in which she was caught. They were the arms of Garrett Oge Fitzgerald.

He, with his two friends, being in an unknown neighbourhood, had been seeking an inn to eat at, when they spied the Hall. They had advanced with the certainty of feeding there, such being the hospitable freedom of the age. Fitz, in front of the two, saw a woman hesitating on the window-sill, spurred, leapt, and caught her with such yielding force, that her feet touched ground with quite buoyant lightness.

Then for a moment he saw her face — she his.

She, still venomous, her countenance marred and red, his name still ringing in her ears in the voice of Anne, flung him from her with the impassioned force of a jealous woman, hissing:

‘Beast! — let me go! — filthy, heartless, cruel herd — !’

One might have knocked down Fitzgerald with a feather: so tigerish, unexpected, was her attack. She had run quite ten yards before he started in chase; and twenty more before he perceived that he was hardly gaining upon her, her legs and wind being excellent.

‘Oh, good God,’ he called, ‘hold, Bess! Why, ’tis I — hold, I prithee — sure, ’tis I!’

Anguished at the thought of again, this time, losing her, pale with the terror of it — for the forest was not sixty yards thence — he hesitated between persisting on foot, and returning for his animal: hesitated, and was lost. He ran back, crying to Mac and Bonner: ‘After! After!’ But they, behind, had realized not at all what was toward. By the time Fitzgerald regained his steed, and mounted, Bessie was but thirty yards from the wood. The three started together in stretched chase, Mac and Bonner being horsed from the plenty left riderless by the castle-siege. But almost as they started, Fitz perceived that the hunt was hopeless now; also, that another figure, in addition to Bessie Ford’s, was before him, whence sprung he knew not, a man flying after her, so close upon her that Fitz had fear to fire.

From this runner, certainly, Bessie could not escape; for he ran with the fleet feet of a slot-hound. As the girl disappeared into the wood, he turned a moment, and sent a random bullet at the riders; crying out a moment afterwards in high falsetto:

‘Stay, mamie, prithee! fly not from me — I am Sidney Boleyn!’

Hearing the commotion in Anne’s withdrawing-room, he had suspected mischief to the fugitives, and run to spy the front windows. He had arrived at the hall-door at the moment when Bessie leapt, and as Fitz started in chase on foot, he had started, too, behind. Fitz, running back in somewhat changed direction for his animal, had not seen him, till mounted.

Sidney, since the fugitives’ escape from the castle, had been busy. He had purchased a small house, standing solitary outside the village of Maddox, and he had put within it a stock of provisions: then he had waited, alert for the first hint of the fugitives’ hiding-place.

Now he put his hand on Bessie's shoulder. She led him to the thicket where lurked Calvo and Laura. The shades of evening were now gathering; and the three went cautiously through the wood, following the good leading of Sidney.

CHAPTER XXXIII

FRANCIS AND BESSIE

‘NOR KNOW WE anything so fair
As is the smile upon Thy face.’
WORDSWORTH.

MEANWHILE the two messengers of Anne were hasting to Fenley. It was a fair-sized village, with a street which contained two inns.

In one of these Percy had lain with a grievous hip-wound; but at noon that day, when signs of delirium supervened, he was taken by his men in one of those horse-litters called ‘charres’ to the town of Alresford, where was a mediciner.

An hour afterwards Alvarada, Sir John Perrot, and their two, arrived at this inn, Alvarada’s handsome face being of the colour of weak coffee-and-milk, and his hurts serious. He went at once to sleep on the inn-parlour bench.

About half-past five Francis returned to the other of the two inns, which he had left that noon to go a-search in the forest. He had met none of his chevaliers, who, having set out with him, had scattered in the wood; nor were they yet returned. His camp lay back of the village in a field; his ensign, from a window, drowsed over the winding and muddy street, domain of speculative ducks. On entering, he washed the blood from his brow, and, being faint, threw his long lean body on a short settee, to dream a vague dream of that fugitive Angel who, on her high passage, had spoken to him of life and death, of good and evil, eternal words.

The two messengers were sent to 'a wounded man at Fenley': so Anne, in her haste, had described Percy. At the porch of Alvarada's inn they found an old woman: sitting there was she in gammers coif, and as the sun without rest nor haste went down, so without rest nor haste she sewed.

And 'Gammer,' said one of the men, 'is it that a wounded man lies in this inn?'

'Why, yea,' said she, nor ceased to sew, 'here lies a wounded man. Aye, and at the Wheatsheaf yonder also lies a wounded man.'

In her proneness to speech lay perplexity. And said one of the men:

'Which will it be, coz?'

And the other replied:

'Faith, that I wot not.'

But the first, being by nature profound, said:

'Fail we cannot, an we give to both the message.'

And this, as soon as uttered, seemed an axiom, though, like axioms, it was very wrong. And so one ran down to the Wheatsheaf, while one entered the Lymington Pot.

Francis was quickly aroused, and a horse alone; but it was not till some fifteen minutes afterwards that Alvarada, more grievously hurt, set out with his three.

They could not doubt the description: it was explicit: south-eastern from Ormond Hall through Broughton Wood, passing north of the great cress-pool, which was a feature of the wood: and both concealed their surprise at receiving it, divining a lucky mistake.

Now Fenley lies south-west of Ormond Hall: and to reach Ormond Hall from Fenley (if one does not go through the forest), one travels by a road which leads directly north for half a mile, and then turns sharply eastward. The north-and-south road goes on beyond the turning in a footpath to Maddox village, where Sidney had the empty house for Calvo: and so it was that as Francis galloped north, he saw four persons before him on the road, not far from the turning, their backs toward him.

Sidney was now leading the fugitives to Maddox; even as the messengers of Anne were delivering their message, the four had hurried through fields past Fenley.

Hearing the hoofs, they looked in terror behind: and at once Francis knew Laura's face; moreover, slung on Sidney's shoulder was the bag of Calvo — one of the clues to the fugitives. And 'Hi, friends! halt there!' shouted Francis.

Escape now was not for Laura: except on the one condition, that the four scattered running, and Francis should pursue the wrong girl: an improbable contingency, since the gloaming air was yet clear transparent purple. Other hope, however, was none, for all around was open field. So Sidney wildly whispered:

"'Tis the Black Knight! An we run divers ways—"

On came the impending hoofs. Calvo looked round once, and, flying recognition by Francis, said: 'Well, do it — !', running to the right from the road, while Laura spurted straight northward, Bessie and Sidney obliquely to the left, but haltingly she, with head continually turned to watch the rider.

In a minute it was clear that Francis was not deceived, he keeping his onward course after Laura, not turning across-field after Bessie. He was thirty yards from his prize — he was twenty-five — he was twenty. Bessie Ford stopped her halting and backward-hankering flight; she turned; she ran with desperate speed — back toward the road.

She reached it at a moment when the horse was not six yards from her. It was a mere country-path, not broad, intermittently bordered by bramble-hedge. There in the middle she stood, with spread arms, facing the galloping charger.

Francis, astounded by this wildness of audacity, saw that she must inevitably be trampled, and passionately shouted: 'Vide! Vide!' in self-unconscious French.

At the same time he pulled at the bridle; but the impetus could not now be checked. An instant before he was upon her, he recognised her — the girl of the forest, who had infected him with fancies of weird sweetness: it was she — the resting Angel — this time barring his impious way, not with flaming sword, but more irresistibly with her bare bosom and simple high devotedness. With all the force of his straining tendons, with his whole grinning energy of effort, he tore, he tugged, he reined. The heavy animal reared — immediately above the head of Bessie. But as it rose, she rose with it, wielded aloft with horrid shock by the snatch of the head-harness, to whose wrenching impetus she clung by one frail left arm; and down with it again she swung to her back, white and wincing, but alive.

Francis' eyes were given up to her, fastened fast upon her. There was no chance that he should sight the flashing steel that was winging straight, as a swallow darts with folded wing, for his left side. It was a dagger hurled with good aim by Flying Sidney; and now Francis wore for armour only a simple shirt of ring-mail. And again the pierced palm of Bessie was rent. She leapt a little with lifted arm, and touched the weapon as it flew, the four sharpened edges slitting the thin bandage and skin. The dagger, deflected, lightly struck the flank of the horse, which started, with twitching ribs.

'Again?' said Francis, bending low, gazing playfully, with solemn smile, 'what, again!'

She, too, smiled, very sweetly through her pallor.

“Tis the second time, my lord,’ quoth she, and held up two fingers, with a head-shake.

‘But you are very brave! La! are you not very, very brave?’

‘Am I, sir?’

‘This galloping charger — by the prowess of a Coeur-de-lion! And the dagger! — prithee, prithee, let me see your hand! Crisscross— ’tis a-bleed!’

He leapt down in a flurry, and was on a knee before her, bending upon the wounded hand.

‘How may I ever thank, and enow extol, this little hand? La! little hand — little, little martyr-hand — !’

He fondled it; he kissed it.

‘Nay, ’tis not so much as that, my lord,’ quoth she. ‘By my credit, I’ve been athwart worse than that!’

From a portmantle at his saddle-bow he whipped a square of broidered silk, and tied it mincingly round the hand, going:

‘Little princess-hand! — wilt come with me to the land of France? Why, prithee! Then shalt thou demurely instruct me every day how highly to live “in the company” — what was it?— “of the sun, and the moon, and all the train of the stars.” La! that were strange, new beginning of life for poor rotten Francis, by our holy Mother!’

‘But the girl is running away all the time, my lord,’ said Bessie, with bold self-confidence, and confidence in him.

‘Which girl?’ he asked quickly.

‘Laura Ford, my lord.’

Up he leapt.

‘La, by Crisscross, I had forgotten her! Mamie, and thy motive for arresting me thus boldly in this my pursuit?’

‘She is my sister, my good lord.’

He smote hands, and drew back a step, gazing at her for a full minute, struck dumb. When he spoke he said:

‘Now, may every blessed saint forgive me!’

Bessie smiled.

‘Sure, my lord,’ said she, ‘you take it too loudly—’

‘’Tis thou that art the sister?’

‘Why, by my credit, yea, my lord! She will declare it you herself, an you will it,’

‘Good angel! gentle girl! I pledge thee, on the honour of a knight, that I knew not what I did,’

Bessie with uplifted voice called ‘Laura!’, beckoning. Her good insight into men had perceived that open confidence in Francis touched the best in him, and warmed his chivalry; but Calvo, from the field, heard her call with angry surprise.

Laura, wondering, hesitating, came; while Francis, his back turned upon Bessie, stood with lifted arm, and bowed head. He was silently swearing that no man, he being alive, should take from this girl her sister, not himself, not Henry, no man. And as he swore, and turned, Laura, panting, with coquettish underlook, was before him.

Again he started: for she was beautiful. He shaded his eyes with horizontal palm, pretending dazzlement, bowing largely, while Bessie smiled.

But his mood was, for the moment, turned and changed. It was Bessie now, and not Laura, by whom he was won and enraptured.

Undoubtedly in the world there is a something more beautiful than Beauty itself — more ravishing far than a perfect nose — and touched more with Aurora and the weird tints of Grace than the rose of the loveliest lip.

Call it Wisdom — or call it fair Virtue — Francis cared not: but, for the time at least, the worldly King did certainly catch a bewitching glimpse of it in the clear spirit of Bessie Ford.

And he lisped, bowing:

‘My adoration, mamsels. Paris, the Greek, gave his apple to Venus; his modern namesake, the city, proffers in the person of me, its King, asylum to Minerva. Will you accept my protection? Will you sail with me? — wilt thou?’

‘Why, my good lord — this were too gracious of you!’ cried Bessie.

‘Oh, gracious of you, an you accord it. Would’st trust the sister to a darkling, God-forgotten rogue like Francis of France? I am a King, wot you? Yet, if so thou honourest me, prouder were I than of sceptre and diadem. And here in your England is naught of safety or escape for you, be sure, be sure! Henry... la! Wilt sail with me? Say!’

‘Sure, my good lord,’ answered Bessie, who searched deeply into his glowing eyes, and thought she saw honour there, ‘there is naught that Master Calvo, and myself also, could more desire—’

‘Calvo?’ said Francis, ’is he with thee—’

But before he received answer, he was surprised by a sound of galloping hoofs. Alvarada, Sir John Perrot, and two Queen’s-men, were coming pelting, Francis, from afar, recognised Alvarada.

‘By Crisscross!’ he cried, ‘here come some of your seekers, with which I must anon cross sword: one, two, la, — four! And since one against four hath end uncertain, faith, ’twere best you take straight to running, mamsels! But stay, where meet we?’

‘Oh, sir, I know not! Prithee have a care! Are you not faint with wounds — ?’ cried Bess.

‘La! not too faint to pick a cuirass or two, Minerva, I warrant thee! Where meet we, say? Whither now away?’

‘We go now to Maddox. See, they pelt near, my lord — !’

‘I see, I see: I keep one constant eye upon them. Maddox? Ah yes, I know. What place, or house?’

‘‘Tis a house, sir; but I wot not the name.’

‘Wot not the name. Well, I will tell you where — yes, I see they come, I see — Maddox. Now, in two days my ship were ready to sail, my camp to pack; this, then, being Thursday, I meet you Saturday eve at compline — at compline. Fear not — I see — through the corner of mine eye. Let them come on. North of Maddox is a wood with a cascade; near the cascade a road; from the road there goes an old stone wall; on still, a pool lies; and beyond the pool, a shed. In that shed, o’ Saturday eve, at compline, I meet you for a prompt start coast-ward. ’Tis agreed?’

‘Why, yea, my lord! yea! Look out!’

‘Now, away!’

The girls, hand-in-hand, went running northward, Sidney and Calvo, who had kept their distance, running to join them.

Francis remained yet some seconds standing: then sprang to horse, and with drawn sword galloped to meet the four.

And as they met, Bessie Ford was looking backward, trotting lingeringly the while, to see him do battle for her.

In reality the fight was but one to three, for Sir John, wounded by Macdonald, had his sword-arm slung, his only weapon being a pistol. As Francis dashed near, Sir John sighted steadily along the two silver sights: there was the jar of cocking, the trigger clicked: the percussion - cap, as was its way, did not explode. Again cocked Sir John, and as he pulled again, the sword of Francis, with a chop of disdain, swept upon his hand, and, in a backward slash, upon his horse's head.

Then, during a minute's space, plied the King's blade with that easy, triumphant nimbleness and graceful Achillean rage which characterised him. Alvarada, indeed, could hardly fight, being sorely sick: but he inflicted upon Francis' back a slash through the mail, at a moment when Francis was eagerly engaged with the two Queen's-men. In a wink, however, one of these dropped, run through the heart; and a moment afterwards Alvarada was vomiting blood on the grass, carved to the lung. The remaining Queen's-man, left alone, turned in flight, but Francis, overtaking him, stabbed his horse in the groin, and, contemptuously leaving the man, went at a grave walk in the gathering dark toward Fenley, so faint, that anon his brow fell to rest on his horse's mane.

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE DEVIL AT MADDOX

‘THE RILLS OF pleasure never run sincere;
Earth hath no unpolluted spring.’
WATTS.

‘In the territory of Istakhar there is a kind of apple, half of which is sweet, and half sour.’ — EBN HAUKAL.

ALVARADA was now grievously wounded, but not fatally.

It seems certain that in martial ages, when wounds were a commonplace of life, the body received them with less gravity and despair. This trick of Nature scientists call ‘adaptation to environment.’

Sir John Perrot, whose horse was slain, and himself quite hors de combat, contrived, with the help of the remaining Queen’s-man, to recapture Alvarada’s, and place his comrade on its back.

‘Whither now, Count?’ said he.

‘On to Maddox,’ said the Spaniard.

He had definitely seen the fugitives take that way.

Maddox is one of the loveliest embowered villages at the foot of a wooded mountain-face. Before it, runs east and west a rapid and angry stream, called the Winney, with irregular broken banks of mossy rock and large pebble, where wives wash clothes aloof, in cosy sequestration. Nothing could be sweeter than the vast mournful plume-waving of the rich mountain-face, where peeps an ancient windmill, a wooden black old water-mill, a hanging long cascade, perched manse, and, at the top, some grey castle-turrets. It resembles a corner of Granada.

It was a cottage thus embowered on the mountainside that Sidney Boleyn had procured, and stocked, for the fugitives. And thither, by a roundabout path, he conducted them in safety, and left them, on the understanding that there in perfect isolation they should abide, never to venture from the cottage-door.

That night, as they ate, Bessie and Calvo discussed the offer of Francis.

‘Dost trust that chuff?’ asked Calvo, with cynically raised eyebrow.

‘By my credit, Master Calvo, I do,’ said Bess.

‘Ah, I know him better than thou, thou seest. Fair enow, doubtless, he means to-day — but next month, next year? Yet, perhaps thou hast reason — perhaps thou hast. There is good hi some of these cattle—’

He drank largely of good malvoisey.

‘Why sure, Master Calvo, is not this proffer of the King like sudden light in a dark place? By my credit, ’tis to me like the plain working of the hand of God. ’Tis hope so strange. ’Tis salvation, sir!’

‘Well, well,’ said Calvo, ‘have it thy own way,’ and he drank again.

Calvo was not enthusiastic, on his own account, as to Francis’ offer, though, for Bessie, he perceived inwardly that it was a very great thing, and the one way. As a matter of fact, his motives and thoughts were now corrupted by the offers of Wolsey, and tinged with selfishness. For one thing, he wished to maintain in the mind of Francis the notion that Mauro Calvo had verily announced Laura to the King by virtue of his star-gazing: to be seen in the company of Laura were hopelessly to dispel that superstition — and Calvo, vain, was touched with charlatanism. Moreover, if he could possibly live in England under Wolsey, he preferred England. France he had tried, protected by Francis, and yet had run from the strong Church. The civil arm of Wolsey was many times stronger than the 'French King's. He preferred England — he wanted Peace to do a thing.

But, on the whole, he fell in with the offer of Francis, which was immediate and tangible, and drinking Sidney's malvoisey, he patted Bess on the head.

Here and now he tasted happiness: he was in a house, unmolested. Taking hardly the time to finish his meal, he hurried to a little bowered pantry-portico at the back, and spread the contents of his bag on a table. He began to plan, to do.

The next morning he rose almost with Bessie, and set to work, as busy as she, who went to and fro preparing their nooning. Laura, lying abed, well-fed now and content, saw beaming sunlight, and heard a mavis at her latticed casement. And 'Oh, 'tis minion!' she grinned, and went to look. The rollick laugh and aspect of the wooded world pleased her well. The hour was blithe with revel, birds screaming with glee, the tickled trees, the wedding-morning smell and freshness, and all the gala ostentation of Summer. She threw on her clothes, looked long with considering undertook into a small mirror, and crept on tip-toe down the stairs.

Her whims were imperious, and, having a whim, she was a mere mule in prone obstinacy. Nothing could bar her. Now, luckily, Bess was busy. Laura, knowing that it was forbidden, went out.

Her steps led her through the multitudinous forest towards the sound of the cascade; and here she saw that, by stepping on some rocks in a swirling pool, she could enter a cave immediately behind the falling flood. And this she did.

Sitting on a rock in the cave was a man, who rose and said: ‘Pardon ‘; adding immediately to himself: ‘This should be she.’

It was Alvarada. Once before he had glimpsed her at the Bell Inn, in Eastcheap, but only for a second’s space. He was not absolutely sure that here was the girl he sought; but he had a kind of surety. In England it was improbable that two things so passionately fair could breathe, and heave the breast.

‘I will — leave you—’ said he, bowing.

Laura, who had a natural eye for perfect bowing, was charmed.

‘Why, nay,’ said she, ‘it is rather I, sir, who am at fault...’

Here was invitation, and an opening of the arms of welcome, for Alvarada.

‘Yet, if you go, then shall I be desolated,’ said he, and bowed.

‘Why, then, sir, I will stay, since you so speak,’ quoth she, with coy dalliance.

Alvarada, who could hardly stand, and had crawled without to heal his wounds with morning mountain oxygen, sat again in thick moss, while she, too, leant upon a verdant slope, wrought into rich mosaic with violet and hyacinth. Before them the cascade, robed like a bride in frothy frippery, rushed chaunting down, shouting that same sound of the moving trees, the mysterious ‘sh’ of Nature’s shibboleth. The continual dust-spray, haunting here, watered into a greenery fresh as the limpid emerald of a cat’s eye both trembling maiden-hair and plushy moss, acanthus, and many a bowering odorous shrub, and bright-eyed flower. And when the Spaniard heaved a sigh of half-real, half-pretended swoon, Laura, who was happy here, said:

‘Sir! — you are sick.’

“Tis nothing, lady,’ said he; ‘I — I was attacked two nights since by brigands, and wounded. ‘Twill pass — an you will but lend me your hand.’

His carved nose was the picture of hers; his eyes were a mournful dead black; his coffee-colour made him handsomer. When she gave him her hand, the thought struck him that he might have Laura Ford, if this were indeed she, without the employment of force: and since he had little force at command, against force he decided.

His tongue was polished and glib; he told her frankly that he was a Spaniard, and a man of high estate; he told of Spain and Europe; he recounted adventures, the dress of ladies, the things of Courts. After half an hour, she allowed him to kiss her.

‘Oh, I must go now,’ she said, agitated.

‘To-morrow morning at this same hour?’

‘Our Saviour, I cannot! I have a sister!’

Now Alvarada was certain.

‘But you dwell where?’

‘Down yonder in a house apart.’

‘That yonder whose thatch appears?’ She nodded.

‘I shall come and see you there this very night!’

‘Our Saviour! you would not! Nay, you could not! You forget my sister!’

‘Fear nothing: she will sleep. I will come — can I help it? Oh, I will come! You, awake, will hear me mouth a recorder, and show your face, lady; your divine countenance, dearest girl!’

At this threat of passion she was filled with both horror and pleasure. Holding herself from him, she kissed him bent, and ran. She entered the cottage noiselessly.

At eleven that night she heard the soft complaining flute. At the cottage-back in a bowery wilderness, bridal with flowering vetch and fairy jasmine, he stood. Trembling lest Bessie or Calvo should hear, she worked herself from the bed, tossed round her her outer garment, wrapped her head picturesquely, and looked out.

No moon shone, but she could divine his stretched clasped hands of adoration, and his serenader-pose. 'Will you come?' said he.

'Sh-h-h!'

'Oh, come!'

He called it with unnecessary loudness. And now she was at his mercy — he could make 'the sister' hear.

Putting up a confidential hand, bidding wait, she turned inward, arranged her dress, and crept down to him. She opened the little lattice-door, robed in honeysuckle and white briony, of the pantry-portico appropriated by Calvo: and into this room she admitted him.

They were a long while there, Alvarada holding her hand, murmuring continually, speaking this time seriously, she listening with divine bowed head, and hair-draped face. He made her large offers, chateaux, menials, and last of all, marriage, though he was married. He asked her if she would run with him.

She made the same extraordinary reply which once she had made to Fitzgerald:

'Only by force could I be won, sir.'

This merely meant that she willed, but was afraid. And Alvarada understood, and rose to go.

In doing so, he put his left hand to the table to lever himself, being very weak. And that hand sank into a buttery mass which Calvo had there, a mass which shone feebly in the dark.

Having gone out, he noticed afresh the unclean sensation, and put the hand to his face to smell it; and the hand accidentally touched the face.

His little inn was on the other side of Maddox: it was necessary, in order to reach it, to pass through the village, long since fast asleep.

But it happened that the village-priest, accompanied by the sexton, was precisely then wending homeward, bearing the elements of the holy supper from a dying bed, just visited; and these saw Alvarada's face — his face and his left hand alone.

That face and hand shone with an unearthly faint luminosity in the dark night; also, the phosphoric butter with which he had touched his nostrils affected his breath, too, which came from him in two divergent hazes of white and wannish fire.

The priest, aghast, struck a cross, muttering a 'Vade retro Sathanas.' The sexton struck a cross. And there was a huge sensation and to-do in Maddox that very night. For even as Alvarada slipped unperceived into his inn and to bed, the church-bell was calling and clanging loud alarum. Maddox started terrified from dreams, and pelted to the church. The priest, with fainting breath, announced that the Devil had been authentically seen in the village that night. He sprinkled his entire flock with holy water.

And with amazing rage and rapidity that news spread, from village to village, through Hampshire, like a fire. Satan had been authentically seen at Maddox.

The very next day Henry heard it, for the news, like the air, was everywhere. Anne Boleyn heard it, Fitzgerald, Du Ballay's party, Percy's party — all heard it. And all these instantly concluded that with such a phenomenon the alchymist must in some way be connected; that Calvo, undoubtedly, must be in or near Maddox; and upon Maddox without delay they all proceeded to move.

CHAPTER XXXV

THE ABANDONMENT

‘FRIEND AFTER FRIEND departs.’...
MONTGOMERY.

IT was on Friday night that Laura Ford said to the Spaniard, Alvarada:

‘Only by force can I be won, sir.’

It was on Saturday eve, at nine — the then hour of compline — that the fugitives were to meet Francis in the hut, to fare under his wing to French land.

The Saturday was spent by Alvarada’s Queen’s-man in riding five leagues to procure a pillion; and by sunset this was affixed to the haunches of the Spaniard’s fine horse.

At this time, all the parties of search, except Percy’s, were about Maddox; some tents of Henry lay in a depression between hillocks on the other side of the stream — the south side — Wolsey being now with the King. Anne Boleyn was moving patiently all among the boscase of the mountain-face, spying evilly as Satan when he peered round Eden. Du Ballay’s party, shunning attack from other stronger ones, were in the prior’s-solar and guesten-hall of a Carmelite friary, on the yon side of the mountain, but near; on the yon side of the mountain, too, at a hamlet, were Fitzgerald, Macdonald, and Bonner. And all, in their various ways, were full of search, thrilling at trails and rumours which were false.

It was not a night propitious for quests and clues. Almost as the sun set, it was dark; a wind arose, and blustered; and rain dashed down in spasms, like bursts of tears, and almost ceased, and dashed again. The stream, which had all the day been angrily swollen, rolled now higher, and went rushing free in noisy soliloquy, like a delirious Cassandra with brawling torch, its loamy billows almost splashing the two plank-bridges which spanned it near Maddox.

About eight Alvarada had his wet horse in a thicket at the fugitives' cottage-back. He blew a long soft flute-note, which only a listening ear would detect. Laura flew to her lattice. Bessie was giving her finishing cares to their evening meal.

"Tis useless — O, I must not come, sir!" whispered Laura.

Alvarada had no time to waste in words.

'Dearest girl,' said he, 'haste you, I beg! All is ready; the horse waits yonder a-hind the bush. Prithee, prithee, haste! Else must I enter the house —'

The moral courage to have her intrigue revealed Laura absolutely did not possess. She considered the argument of force final. Stooping low, she whispered loud:

'Then must you wait yet a while...

She had spent the day in writing clandestine short notes to Bessie; as:

'DEAR SISTER: I am gone off with a Spanish nobleman, which is very rich, with five castles, and menials. He will marry me. I will be sending thee a collar of balasses like the King wore. — Thy dearest sister, LAURA FORD.'

And this, after a while, she tore, and wrote:

'MY DEAR SISTER BESS: I hope thou wilt not be angry with me, for I have gone off with a mighty, great Spanish nobleman, with seven castles, and menials. He will marry me. Thou knowest I love thee, Bessie, but it was too much to expect of me, at the end of the tale. If ever thou seest Mark Bonner, tell him I love him until death. I will be sending thee some collars of balasses like the King wore, and some armlets pounced with diamonds and sapphires. — Thy loving sister, LAURA FORD.’

This she had torn, and written another, and another.

Turning now from the lattice, she heard the voice of Bessie call her below. She held the rushlight, and saw her white face in the mirror, and ran down.

They three sat, Calvo, as he ate in shirt-sleeves of Holland linen, leaning an elbow on the table-edge, brooding.

‘Well, is all ready for this rencounter in the wood?’ said he.

‘Yes, sir,’ answered Bess.

‘Aha! And how feelest thou, girl, at this prospect of embarking for strange land which thou knowest not?’

‘By my credit, sir, I feel bold and spree, for sure the good hand of God has led me, and will lead—’

‘See what you have brought upon the sister, you with the face,’ said Calvo, with a fillip at Laura’s hand.

That face of Laura was very sallow. She half-rose, and sat again; and, after a minute, rose again, and said weakly, with a throat-cough of agitation:

‘I will return...’

Bessie looked after her, as she went toward the latticed pantry-portico, supposing that she went for a bodily office.

Within the minute she was on the pillion of Alvarada, having dropped her final note to Bessie upon Calvo’s table.

After a walk, the horse broke into galloping, making for the spot where, higher up the mountain-side, Sir John Perrot and the Queen’s-man waited the Spaniard.

Five minutes, eight, passed; Bessie awaited Laura, glancing oft at the door. Laura came not, but instead, a man dashed in, wrapped in a drenched riding-cloak, which hooded his wan, thin face. It was Flying Sidney.

‘My good master,’ he broke out, ‘great and momentarily is your peril! Wot you that your pursuers are crowded round you? Also, Mistress Anne — woe’s me that I could not come afore—’

‘Know they where I am?’ asked Calvo.

‘Not the house; they divine, nevertheless, that you are at Maddox, since the priest and sexton saw yesternight the devil—’

‘But I am not the devil, lad.’

‘Nay, but a man they saw with face showing shine in the dark, and breathing haze like Milky-way—’

‘Why, that must have been phosphorus.’

‘And something so they all have guessed, saying: who hereabouts but the alchymist could be so daubed with chymic essences? Have you not been abroad from the cottage, good master?’

‘I? — not I. But stay — but stay — Some derangement I did observe this morning in a pot of amalgam—’

‘Then hath one entered the house!’

‘Nay, lad, none.’

‘So I hold, sir! Prithee haste you now to gain the shed where you have rendezvous, or all were yet lost! Not a house on the mountain-side but will be spied. My half-sister, Anne—’

‘Bessie, come!’ said Calvo with promptitude, ‘we set out this moment. Call the sis, call the sis. Why, lass, what have you?’

Bessie stood with deathly face in the doorway, holding in one hand a lamp, and in the other a letter.

Spurred by growing unrest she had peeped into the adjacent pantry, and seen the paper on the table.

Read she could not, but she knew the look of Laura's writing, and her boding heart divined some horror.

Without word she handed the letter to Calvo, standing bolt, with stern white face, as he slowly read aloud.

When he finished, she tossed herself sideward to a stool, dropped her head, with its little up-sticking plait, upon her arms over the table, and wept there, her mouth stretched back like indiarubber in the poignant strain and tension of her piteousness.

Calvo was walking to and fro in a great passion. For poor Bess in that hour he had no mercy. The burden of the iniquity he put equally upon her poor little shoulders, involving both sisters in a common anathema; and said he, washing his hands of them:

‘Well, I have done now — I have done. Enow have I had of you both, and, God wot, more than enow. This is the very last of all. Now, certes, ’tis finished, by God! You seem to forget, both of you, that you are perfect strangers to me — that all I have done and suffered for you was done in pure doddering and dotage kindness of heart. And yet you dare do this! Well, my God! Sidney! shoulder that bag! Aha!... so this is the meaning of the devil in Maddox! — that marmot, your sister, hath e’en lured a man hither, and he hath dared meddle with my physics! And you see the result? Your persecutors surround you afresh, this time, most like, without reprieve — I hope so. Art proud of thy Laura, now, eh? Art proud of the slubberdegullion? I told you how ’twould be — but hear you would not. Thou wouldst cling to thy Laura, eh? Thou wouldst cling, and cling, and cling to the silly daw with infatuated bigotry, with blind-struck, wilful obstinacy: and now thou seest what she was — a silly slut, a putrid hop-heels, a run-away wanton — nay, shake not thus thy head! faith, I could smite thee on the cheek, girl! Defend her, were it but by one motion of the head, and I promise thee I souse thee smartly on the cheek! Oh, 'tis a bit too much! Well, may you fare well. As for me, I am off—'

This rage of Calvo, though he did not know it, was complex. His mind and motives, we have said, were corrupted by the offers of Wolsey. He preferred England to France. But in order to abandon Bessie Ford, he needed the sweep and impetus of a passion. Laura gave him the excuse for heat, and his own lash whipped it to whiteness. The heart knows not the full secret of its own impurity.

When he threatened to smite her on the cheek, it was in loud answer to Something in his bosom which, with tongue in cheek, was slyly whispering: 'Thou deservest, Calvo, that she should smite thee on the cheek!'

Sidney had Calvo's bag. The whole interest of this lad in the fugitives was concentrated in Calvo alone: for Bessie and Laura he had no special care. Yet he looked with a lingering pity on the bowed head, as he preceded the Magister up a sanded step, through a passage, to the front door.

Bessie Ford lifted her head, and was alone. The Desolation of her life scared her. She leapt up, and ran.

An over-branched foot-path led her to the road. This, with undulations, went rather steeply up the bushy mountain-side from Maddox. She ran desperately downward, a sound of 'Oh-h-h...' coming from her. After a few minutes she heard steps before — Sidney's horse, and Calvo's voice. The night was quite black, and washed with gusts of rain.

Wolsey's instructions were explicit: If the Sage should decide to adopt the offered patronage, he should leave his acceptance in writing at the Thistle Inn, Halford. The journey to Halford Calvo resolved to begin that very night, openly, not now fearing capture, or its effects.

Near Maddox-village he heard a voice close behind:

‘Master Calvo!’

He turned angrily.

‘Well, now, what is it?’

‘Don’t you leave me, sir — !’

‘Now, away with you and your tears, my girl! Faith, ’tis finished now.’

‘Oh, don’t you, sir — !’

‘Why, you talk like a child! Is it not your own fault? Certes, ’tis not mine.’

‘Master Calvo, for Christ’s sake — !’

‘Stop it, stop it. You are trying to work upon my feelings, and you wot as well as I that you cannot. Your own fault, your own fault.’

‘I admit it, sir! But don’t you leave poor Bessie Ford!’

‘You see, you weep, you weep. I told you not to weep. Bide I, or go I, what have you to hope? The fool of a sister is gone past recall.’

‘Yet don’t you be leaving me, Master Calvo, don’t you.... When we set from London, I told you, sir, I told you, that naught feared I, I said, were you with me. And so it has been. Sure, many a trouble, many a scathe, have I passed through since, and well escaped, for you were by me, sir, my good right arm you were, good kind father that you have been to me and mine — oh my, oh my. And even yet, an you stay with me, even in this last black darkness, who knoweth but that the good hand of God—’

‘Bide I, or go I, ’twill be the same to you, the same to you, I promise you.’

‘Why nay, sir! I tell you nay! My sure talisman and good fortune are you for ever, whilst you bide. But go you from me, then all, all, all, all were lost! Oh! I swear it by the Cross of Christ, Master Calvo! Something tells me — something here in my panging bosom, sir — a lumpy pang like the last pang of death, my master — oh God, sir, God, God, God....’

She choked utterly with sobbing. Her eyes were a fountain of tears. In that her hour, which brooded black upon her as Gethsemane, she saw the vision of her life all palled in crape, and fore-felt its final tragedy with presage of bane dark as a rayless universe.

There was silence: only her sobs were heard mixed with the rain.

‘Come with me, an you like,’ said Calvo.

‘Why, sir — now?’

‘An you like.’

‘But, sir, must I not go meet the foreign King in the wood?’

‘To what end? Laura is gone. You desire not to go to France alone: nor do I.’

‘But I must sure go tell him—’

‘Tell him, no! Let him go to the devil.’

‘Faith, what would he think of me, which made most faithful rendezvous — ?’

‘Very good, you choose him, you see, rather than me. Your own fault all thorow. Farewell, farewell.’

‘Master Calvo, you abandon me!’

Her cry wailed high and far on the night-wind.

And the answering words rose to his lips:

‘Why, I’d liefer abandon life and all it holds, you little fool?’

But, instead, he only said:

‘You may go to the devil!’

Such a brutal pleasure lies in self-torture, common, apparently, to many men. Thus, a kind man may anon be murderously cruel, because his cruelty he feels to be a cruelty to himself also. He revels venomously in his own pangs: so dark and subtle is the heart.

With Calvo it was so. He said ‘the devil ‘when he meant ‘my darling.’

He moved on; she followed him: and again she cried:

‘Master Calvo, you abandon me,’

‘Well, you can come, an you like,’ he said.

And as he said it, she stood fixed. She would not go. Her excuse, which she thought real, was her rendezvous with Francis: but her motive was subtly complex: in reality, she cherished a secret obstinacy of reluctance to leave the spot whence Laura had gone, without first knowing whither she had gone; a secret hope that she might not be far, a secret desperation of fidelity, a vowed and passionate waywardness of loyalty, which only the snatch of wild horses, or the opening of the earth, could have overcome.

Onward went Calvo, she following with stops and runs. He reached one of the two bridges. Here she finally stopped, and would no further go.

There was a sound of galloping hoofs. The sage was half-way across the bridge. Close beneath his feet the swollen Winney rushed free with Bacchant feet, a brawling soliloquy.

In the south distance, whence sounded the hoofs, were seen lanthorn lights, which slowly moved.

‘The King, sir, must have news,’ said Sidney —

‘hither, meseems, come some of his riders.’

At that moment from the other side, Calvo heard in the air the high, calling voice of Bessie, piteously calling.

‘Good-bye, Master Calvo, sir!’

‘Fiendly cattle — fiendly, cruel cattle!’ muttered Calvo, with shaken fist at the approaching horsemen, venting all his secret self-bitterness upon them, ‘to hunt a poor, forlorn, and we-ridden lass like a wounded leveret!

Be ye man or be ye devil? If devil, how now if I send you pelting to your place, ye herds! Sidney, here — quick — my bag! And get you with your horse off the bridge till I come.'

Calvo's bag had in it a slender saw, abstracted from Broughton Castle. He took it, stooped, and began to saw the bridge.

It was simply a plank not three feet wide, with a rude rail, supported by a single pile at the centre.

He sawed furiously, till the riders were close. Then he sprang, and ran, and hid within a near grove of elders.

They came well lighted with horn-lanterns, trotting; and Bessie, even as she halted on the verge of running, saw and realised what happened.

All saved themselves by a halt upon their haunches, except the first two. These, entering confidently upon the bridge at a quick walk, plunged with the sawed plank into the stream.

The others went along the bank, watching with held-up lanterns the death-struggle of horse and rider. And as they went so down the stream, they sighted the second bridge, which Calvo did not know, or had forgotten; and, with precautions, they passed over.

Meanwhile, somewhat more than half of the sawn bridge was left intact on its supporting pile.

CHAPTER XXXVI

ANNE AND BONNER

‘WHEN FIRED BY fever’s phantom chase,
We fling aside the curtain’s fold,
It shows a face — a pitying face—’
BETHUNE.

ALVARADA, with two comrades, galloped up the mountain-road, Laura sitting on a pillion behind him. At this time Fitzgerald, Macdonald and Bonner were also en route, having heard from a yokel the empty rumour that the devil, breathing Milky-way, had been again seen to stand, not one hour since, at a door above Maddox: whereupon they had rushed to horse, and were away to the Maddox-side; and, some minutes later, to Du Ballay’s party at the friary the same news was carried: and these, too, pelted to horse.

And anon, as Fitz and his friends galloped up to the hill-brow, they heard ghosts of hoof-beats behind, and were aware that a cavalcade of knights were after them, and knew whom, and why. They stretched their steeds to topmost speed, giving rein, and whip, and spur.

Bonner bore an agitated lanthorn, so did Mac; also Alvarada’s Queen’s-man bore a torch to light his way, which winked and flinched from the rain.

There was but one road: the going and coming parties could not miss encounter. Before Fitzgerald saw her, he heard the scream of Laura; then he saw her, and drew rein and sword together.

Mac flung his lanthorn to Bonner, and drew; and the affray was almost momentary. Alvarada, weak as he was, had the effrontery to hack once at Fitz, at the same time lifting his horse with spur and rein to a sideward leap over a bordering hedge-row. But the animal, chopped at the moment of effort, and without impetus, merely dived into bramble, pitching all its freight overhead; and while Fitzgerald leapt to snatch the girl from the mêlée of hoofs, Sir John, incapable of combat, overrode, as he fled, his prostrate comrade, who cried out in torture; and the Queen's-man, after two passes with Macdonald, received a wound, and disappeared with Sir John down the hill.

From the down-rush of these two a solitary wayfarer who was toiling up the hill drew aside a moment. It was Bessie, bereft now of Calvo, and of all.

Above, the Queen's-man's torch, flinching, where it had dropped, from the rain, flickered upon a lovely face contorted with pain. The left hip of Laura was sprained. Fitzgerald held her up under the arm-pits; she could hardly stand.

‘Where is thy sister Bess?’ he asked.

‘Lower down,’ she gasped, ‘there is a side-path—’

‘By Heaven, Fitz!’ cried Mac, ‘there is need for haste here, lad! There are those above which pelt down upon us I’

Fitz sprang to horse, and plucked up Laura before him. They started at risky pace down the steep wet road.

Bonner held up a lanthorn, and said: ‘Why, Laura — and smiled.

And she, too, smiled a smile of pain.

Yet a minute, and he lifted the lanthorn again to her face, and said again: ‘Laura —

And as he so held the light, there shrilled from the road this passionate cry of bliss and terror:

‘Laura,’

Bessie saw her in Fitzgerald’s arms.

And there, with a valour reaching now the divine, she stood with outstretched arms in the path of the spattering prone stampede of hoofs.

Aided by her cry, they discerned her in time, and drew rein.

“Tis Bessie!” whispered Laura to Fitzgerald.

He knew it.

‘Here, good Bess,’ cried he with quick breath, ‘take her, take her, she is lamed — and get you quickly from this path, I bid you, for others come, and we return anon to fight — !’

Her soul reeled within her. Bewilderment was the world. But this one light-beam shone steady in that wheeling mist: it was he who had brought her Laura! he, the warrior of warriors, was — somehow — for some reason — on her side! he was not against her any more!

At the moment she was crazily distraught, caught in the sweep of tempest emotions. As he lowered Laura to her arms, she, with thrown-back head, was showing a drawn and witless grin. And hardly conscious of any meaning in her act, she put hand to bosom, pulled out a letter, and held it up, flaunting it like a trophy, with twisting wrist.

It was the King’s letter to Wolsey, snatched by her from Anne’s escritoire. The dim meaning in her consciousness, as she so flaunted it, was this: ‘It was not you, really, who gave it to her! It could not have been! My surmising heart divines you, and dances!’

To Fitz this held-up paper had no significance, nor did he even recognise it; only Bonner, standing near with the lanthorn, recognised it with a start.

Small space was there for speech! Fitz and Mac threw their horses round. Distinctly now from above came the sounds of hoofs.

They were off, Fitz, in the urgency of the moment, forgetting to make rendezvous with her.

She called after him.

‘Master Fitzgerald!’

He did not stop, but advanced only at a walk, she trotting bedraggled after him, leaving Laura to stand as she could.

‘You are on my side!’ she cried.

Fitz, twisted backward, with a palm on his animal’s haunch, screwed his face into listening effort, with showing top-teeth.

‘What say you? Quick!’ he called impatiently.

‘You are on my side!’

‘Why, sure—’

‘Whither go you?’

‘To fight.’

‘Where meet we?’

‘I wot not — hereabouts say.’

‘Higher stands a wall to the right hand, still on, a pool, and then a hut: there shall I be awaiting you, Master Fitzgerald!’

‘Good — good. Away, Mac — !’

Away went the three riders, unaware against what odds.

Alvarada, lying with slow, regular groans by the roadside, heard them gallop past, and still up.

Then, five minutes later, he heard other steps and loud sighs, the wincing sighs of Laura in her effort to limp. A groan came from him.

‘My mother! ‘someone is here in pain,’ said Bessie.

‘Oh, my hanch, my hanch!’ sighed wincing Laura.

‘Water, water!’ groaned Alvarada.

The lashed rain-pour could not quench that mortal thirst. Bessie made a step that way, and groped — for the Queen's-man's light had flinched ever smaller into final darkness — and touched a face.

‘Ah, I am very poorly,’ said the Spaniard.

‘Can you not stand, my master?’ asked Bessie.

‘That can I not, alas!’ said he.

“Tis, sure, Bess — the Spanish nobleman — who would have — taken me — by force,’ moaned wincing Laura.

‘Ah, ’tis you,’ said Alvarada; ‘and with your sister. So ’tis well. Have you no water, no water?’

Bessie's palm rested across his brow.

‘Naught, sir,’ said she, ‘can I do for you now, since my sister is lamed. But her will I place in safety, and return anon.’

Helping the limper with a hand round her body, the other beneath her arm, Bessie continued some ten yards up-hill, peering close on the right for the massive green-grown wall — supposed to be Roman — which ran at right angles from the road. She touched it finally, and went by a quite dry, foliage-covered foot-path along it, skirted next a deeply-sombrous pool, and, at its furthest end, found a one-roomed hut of thatch and wattle, standing with tumble-down slant on a knoll, but rain-proof in the shelter of a den of greenery.

Francis had not come, though it could not now be far from the hour of compline. Bessie deposited Laura upon dry leaves, kissed her, and closed the door upon her. But the door, hinged with hide, hung askew, and, as soon as released, swung sullenly back.

Off she set running, her feet shod with Mercy, to refind Alvarada. About the same moment Anne Boleyn, hasting up the mountain-road, stumbled over the Spaniard's legs, pshawed an 'Oh, silly!', and continued her eager upward way.

That Laura Ford was in the neighbourhood of Maddox Anne was absolutely certain; that many men were seeking her all that afternoon she knew; she herself, with maniac energy, had searched inn-cellar and forest, cottage and dingle and hut. That one or other of the searching parties would now find was, she knew, highly probable; that the finder might be attacked was also probable. When, therefore, she heard two pistol-shots, and saw lights and flashes far up the road, she ran toward the mêlée, her eyes eager as gimlets with inquisitive lust.

This noise of mêlée which she heard arose at the meeting of Fitz with the Du Ballay party, five in number, Du Ballay himself, wounded at the Broughton-joust, being absent in the farmery of the Carmelite friary.

Mark Bonner, seeing his friends thus out-numbered, being in high-wrought state at the fresh sight of Laura, rushed with desperate heart and drawn sword into the fight, the very first incident of which was his headlong tumble into a grassy depression by the way-side, he well wounded in the loins.

But the two warriors of Bessie Ford proved hard nuts to these her enemies. Mac, with set lips, fought with the resistance of bluffs in a sea-storm, and the high aggressive valour of the arm of Fitzgerald nothing that night could withstand. He was near his hope: he fought with a laugh.

One of the French knights he cleft, through ring-mail, from shoulder to heart; one he stabbed through the mouth; a third, wounded by Mac, himself wounded by a bullet, turned and fled up the road with his two comrades. But in the dim lanthorn-shine, it was not seen that this third man was wounded: and the flight of three before two was suspicious: Fitz feared further trouble from them — though, in fact, their flight was merely due to lack of motive for strenuous combat, in the absence of their commander. But Fitz and Mac gave chase.

As they galloped away up the mountain, Anne reached the spot. Lying there, doubling over with torture, she saw Bonner in the light of two overturned lanthorns.

She peered upon him, and he saw her face, pretty yet foul, a lady's yet a hag's. Her hair sprawled in muddy streaks to her hips; in her cheek were no killing dimples, but ugly exhaustion; her eyes glared; her voice was cracked and hoarse.

Seeing him, she had a throe of joy.

‘Why, Mark—’ said she.

‘Faith, I am dying,’ he said, and writhed.

‘Dying, no. Wounds slay not, Mark, save those from ladies’ eyes—’

‘Faith, I am sore wounded. Oh, the sword went right in — oh.’

‘Did it? Did it?’

She whispered it, kissing him evilly, stooping over him.

‘Oh, you are the Lady Anne. How came you here? Faith, you are very good. You have no idea — faith, I am sore wounded—’

‘Whine not, whine not, boy. See, I kiss you. Tell me, where is Laura?’

‘Oh, ’tis bitter — the bitter, bare, cold steel—’

‘Why, you whine like a girl! Like you my kisses, Mark? Love you them, sweetard? Do tell me now — darling — where is Laura?’

‘Why, you are very good. But Laura! Nay, I would not tell you for all the world. Gar — it aches — it aches—’

‘Doth it? Why, poor ousel. Shall I not kiss the place and make it well in a pigeon-dunging’s space? So you wot, then, where Laura is? Then wherefore refuse to tell?’

‘Because — why, ’tis too unthinkable! — the outrage of the cold steel upon the soft, warm flesh, lady—’

‘A truce to the soft, warm flesh! Tell me! — wherefore refuse? Am I not Laura’s good friend and helper?’

‘Oh that can I not now credit! Did not you abstract from my slop-pouch the King’s-letter I bore to Bess? Ah, sure, a wound is a fearful thing — a wound, above all, above all, in the loin—’

‘Abstract! the King’s letter! I? Yea, but did I not abstract it in order to give to Bess? Sure, you had no horse, and I one. By Christ’s Cross, Mark, I gave it her! sure, Mark, I swear I gave it her, I did, I did, I swear to God! Prithee, tell me, boy — tell me!’

‘Faith, it pangs, lady — it pangs too close and biting! Oh, say you so. ’Twas you gave the letter to Bess?’

Continually writhing, he remembered now that but lately he had seen the letter flaunted by Bessie’s twisting wrist.

‘Oh, you wot, then, that she hath it?’ answered Anne, incessantly kissing him: ‘and whence, think you, dear, could she have it, but that I gave it?’

‘Oh, then are you verily her good friend and helper. Faith, kiss me still — so — it dulls the pain. Wot you? — it went right in, right in. You pity poor Mark Bonner, don’t you? Kiss me still — that soothes so nicely — I like it. Her good friend and helper, I swear — oh!’

‘Poor fellow! Let me rock thee in mine arms — so. Likes it that? Now tell me — where is she?’

‘I wot not precisely — oh! I heard Bess tell Fitzgerald — there is a wall — then a pool — then a hut: and in the hut are they — oh!’

Anne knew wall, and pool, and hut! In the hut had searched thrice that day! As the words passed Bonner’s lip, with brutal callousness she flung his head from her lap, and was gone into the darkness.

She took not the trouble to descend the road to find the wall, but plunged at once into the forest, making obliquely, south-eastward, for the hut. In such a darkness, however, with her imperfect knowledge of the wood, such a course was over-bold. The line she took was not precisely right. She passed the hut and went beyond.

With hideous self-intolerance of impatience, she ran fumbling about, spitting a thousand blasphemies. Soon she lost all sense of direction, and the north became to her both the west and the east. Well divining that the moments were precious, she reviled earth and Heaven.

At last, after some minutes, her hand, groping blindly, and led by the fate which doomed her life to hateful tragedy, touched woven dry wattle. And now as a cast-away who, a sail in sight, cries 'Saved!', so was she.

She groped round to the door-way, and felt the opening. She stood listening — no sound. She peeped within, and could discern nothing.

Her heart sank horribly; she believed that she had failed. But when, before turning away, she intruded a cautious hand, and felt a buskin, then she was as the cast-away who sees the stalking regiment of approaching oars. She waited yet a moment, and detected now a breathing. Weakly-built Laura, exhausted and shocked, was asleep.

Now Anne ran; but only a few steps, then stopped. She had lost sense of direction. She looked for the pool, and did not see it. Nor did she remember whether the door, just left, looked toward the pool or away from it. She ran on at hazard, not knowing whither, though, in fact, the direction she chose was practically right.

At this time Bessie Ford was bending over the Spaniard at the other extremity of the pool. The weary load of Alvarada she had drawn and borne and manoeuvred on her little shoulders all the way hither, toward the shelter of the hut, from the road. But now all the Spaniard's self-help failed, and she failed, too. He lay on the grass, she over him, her hand in his. His breathing was very rapid and feeble.

With quick fan his breath said:

‘Girl, I am dying—’

There was silence. She pressed his hand.

‘Art verily the sister of Laura Ford?’ said he.

‘Yes, master,’

‘Wot you that I am one of her chasers? That ’tis I which this day bore her off from you?’

‘By my credit, sir, ’twere ill talking of that now. Sure, repentance is as wise and fair as spotlessness, though ’tis later wise; and since you so talk, my master, think you I give you not all my heart in this your hour?’

‘Dost thou?’

‘Why, sure, I do.’

‘And I all my heart to thee — all, all! Could I but live two days, my arm, my life—’

‘Prithee, speak not, sir, but compose your soul. Oh, sure, ’tis a mighty, fair, and wondrous thing to die!’

‘Give me thy lips that I may kiss them, Bessie — so. Sweet, and wise, and merciful art thou, girl, and very fair to me revealed in this my dying hour — very fair — very fair. Now turn up my steel shirt at the bottom.’

She turned it up.

‘Now intrude thy hand beneath my silken girdle.’ She did so.

‘What find’st thou?’

‘A key, sir.’

‘A key — ah, my moment is come — is come, fair Bess. A key. I seem to see a whole universe of slowly-sailing moons volving in an emerald twilight. The key — ah, yes. It opens a coffre-fort, which lies for me in the keeping of mine host of the Bell Inn, in Eastcheap. Thou seest, I fail — I fail. The coffre-fort contains 27,000 golden rose-nobles — they are thine. The wyvern at my collar is pledge agreed for their delivery. Take it quick, lest thou despoil, despoil — a dead man—’

With his own feeble hand he tore the pledge from his collar, and gave it her. A minute afterwards she felt and knew that he was dead.

Her reverent hand rested on his brow. He was dead. And death was — what? A minute she sat wondering. Was it verily a multitude of pallid moons volving slow in an emerald twilight? Her fancy saw the innumerable wan orbs, and the most weird and glowering green glamour. Much lately she had fallen into thinking of that very thing — of death — she, a girl in her nonage, full of tough health. And now with her thought of death was all mixed up the thought of her new riches: she had the key, the silver cognisance. She was rich, by my credit. Twenty-seven thousand gold rose-nobles she had — a sum not measureable, King’s-wealth, quite infinite. She would go sometimes and visit them in their mighty great mansion in France, the married couple, Master and Mistress Mark Bonner! No longer she believed Anne’s tale of Bonner’s kisses: Anne, who had lied as to Fitz, might have lied as to Bonner also, to madden her. There, sitting, she had a brief happiness, and a tear of gratitude fell from her upon Count Alvarada’s brow — a tear, sure, which must have weighed well for the Spaniard at the bar of Heaven. But the sudden thought of Calvo — her sure talisman, gone now — spurred her. She leapt up.

To hurry to the hut. And as she moved three steps, someone going the opposite way brushed by her: a woman — Anne.

CHAPTER XXXVII

THE ORDEAL

‘I HEAR HIM in the mighty roar
That rusheth through the forests hoar,
When winds are raging loud.’

ANONYMOUS.

ANNE, feeling that someone was near, stopped; she was hopelessly bewildered as to direction; and she said:

‘Oh — are you of the Maddox folk? I have lost my way!’

Even as she spoke, Bessie, without fail, knew her in the roots of her consciousness — knew her bitterly. And this fact branded the girl’s soul like the scorch of a hot iron: that Anne came from the direction of the hut wherein Laura lay; also that Laura was lame, and could neither run nor walk.

It was in a voice strange, unlike her own, yet not simulated, that Bessie answered:

‘Whither would you go, lady?’

Anne, famished and over-driven, her wild spirit spinning now on a tip-toe of crazy ecstasy, was no longer capable of cautious, retarding thought. Her conduct was precisely the conduct of a lunatic, sane on one point: and in answer to Bessie’s ‘whither,’ she replied:

‘To the King’s camp across the river.’

There was a silence, horrible enough there in the dark and dripping wood: a murderous stillness: and in a voice hoarse, and evil as sin, Bessie Ford said:

‘I will lead you, lady, an you follow my steps.’

Instead of turning west to the mountain-road, where Anne would at once have recognised her whereabouts, Bessie turned south, so to gain the river through the wood. In a voice hardly audible, guilty as crime, she repeated:

‘Follow my steps....’

She it was not who remembered that Calvo had sawn through the Maddox bridge! but something in her brain which thought it for her, and said: Do it, do it, I bid.

Onward she went through the utter dark, not admitting to herself that the bridge was sawn, not thinking at all, nor conscious at all, except of this one thing: that Hell led her, as she led Anne, lifted her feet, and planted them for her — always in the same direction — and that this was sweet, though awful.

Anne was going to the King, and Anne was coming from Laura: the inference was clear that Anne was going to bring the King to Laura. But Bessie did not infer anything, nor consciously reason. Only, her spirit was taught — with even instantaneous certainty — by the dark doom-voices that admonish souls, that if now she did not do to Anne the thing which she was bid, then would Anne, without fail, heap upon her head a horror of woe.

Onward she went, quite numb, through the utter dark, her face pinched and ghastly, her teeth anon chattering a little. But so small a thing as her robe caught in a bramble sufficed to prick her mind. She stopped to disengage it; and as she again went onward, muttered:

‘Now, may the good God keep my hands from evil....’

But the prayer was without force, or faith. It was self-hypocrisy added to murder, and blasphemy to crime.

She hated Anne: even with viperous venom, and the rancour of cobras thrice distilled she hated her — as only females hate. But now, not even hate was it that led her, for she was without sensation: it was the strong thing that moved her feet, and set her going like a wound clock.

As a man receives a stroke of paralysis, or shock of apoplexy, so he receives a stroke, or shock, of crime-mood. The moral nature collapses: a squall leaps out, smites the little sail, and with just the easy suddenness of a wink over goes the skiff. To every infamy, as Goethe says, each man is liable. Happy the well-built craft that rights herself — with a shudder from keel to pennant.—’

The night was dark, the forest thick-wooded, and here was no path. Hence the clock-work figure that led Anne to her death met obstructions, at each of which mere mechanism, incapable of advancing, found thought essential. And so the habit of thought grew: till, near the end, Bessie’s spirit, with angry impatience, was ejaculating:

‘Oh, save me, save me, from this!’

But she prayed as one struggling in nightmare, bound hand and foot; and persistently she advanced, without haste nor rest, and Anne followed her sounds.

Now the Winney, its bands forgot, running free between its banks (as an athlete spurts light with elbows close), began to surround them with its growing shout. To Bessie it noised like some weird river in the pale Kingdom of Death, its wash filling the world, mingling with the beat of her blood, welling and swirling within her ears.

Always her grinning teeth-edges met in chatterings like bird-peckings: but now she was actually reasoning to herself in a species of lucid lunacy.

‘This woman,’ she thought, ‘whom, sure, I have never wronged, how hath she hunted and beset me! I hate her, for first hath she hated me. I will choke her life in the water, and hear the glad bubbling cry of her agony, for first willed she to choke my every good hope in shame and horror. I will not stop — no, I will walk straight on to the bridge, the ghastly bridge. I can hear the water shout, and I know precisely how she will feel at the instant when her foot steps on air, and the world turns all into unsolid rushing floods to her. Sure, I am not a bad-hearted girl, meaning fair and well to everyone, and how hath she hunted and beset me! How hath she hunted and beset me!

I hate her with rage and bile, and the bitterness of aloes and verdigris, for first she hated me. God will sure not judge me harsh, for now, if I lead her not to the ghastly bridge, and choke her life in the unsolid rushing flood, whose shout grows and fills the whole pale Kingdom of Death in mine ears, then will she still hunt and beset me, and now, this night, will work me final woe. For what one knows, one knows: and this I know. Well and fair have I meant, God wot, and if I love my little girl, is that my fault? By my credit, who could help to love her? She should have let me be, that woman, she should not have kindled the flaming malice of Hell in my bosom, who, sure, am a well-meaning girl in my way; nor should she have hunted and beset me, nor hated me first. I will not stop — no, I will walk straight on to the ghastly, ghastly bridge. ’Tis God — perhaps — who hath wrought it so to a chance most wondrous rare, and given her into my hand, just when she would work me final woe, that I might choke her life in the unsolid rushing flood, and be for ever rid of her, rid, rid of her, that woman. My mother! how the shout of the great pale waters grows, and fills one’s poor ears! I hardly can hear the sound of her feet behind me. Sure, we are near now — we are not far off. Oh, save me, save me from this....!’

At this last heart-cry — a real emotion now — she tossed her face upward with irritable and impious impatience. The smitten boat, well-built, was straining, in vain, to right itself. It was a question of Time.

She did not stop, but moved steadily in the tow of a Power. And the Power said: ‘Do it! Laura is lame,’ and thy chance is wondrous rare, one in a thousand thousand millions: thou wilt not touch her even with the finger: she asks the way, thou guidest her right: the bridge is there: thou knowest not that it is sawn — how could’st thou know?’

It was a question of Time: but they drew very near the bridge. The forest ended, and they were slushing through a muddy field. Here Anne said:

‘On, on, — faster, good woman!’

Bessie quickened not her steps: but on stolidly, without pause nor haste, went she. They passed through a lane of six dark and slumbering houses of scattered Maddox: and now they were on the river-strand.

And here, at once and suddenly, Bessie Ford’s prayer was answered, her temptation solved: and she was saved from murder. Anne panted hurriedly:

‘I give you thanks — now I know my way — —’

For yonder across the water gleamed lights of Henry’s camp.

Anne bent forward into running, knowing the position of the bridge relative to the lights. But she stopped, remembered the good woman’s guidance, returned, groped, and scrambled a crown into Bessie’s hand: and Bessie took it, and said nothing.

She was saved from murder, she saw! Anne ran toward the bridge in voluntary suicide. Bessie, sure, had not led her thither: the bridge was quite ten yards along the strand from where she stood.

But she ran after Anne, not knowing why, her teeth now chattering a steady tattoo.

Anne reached the bridge, and entered upon it with hurried, prone gait. Bessie Ford at the end, one foot on the plank, stood and peered, her soul focussed in her eyes.

‘Go not on!’ she tried to cry, but the words choked in her throat.

Her responsibility was gone: the voice which had said ‘Do it!’ no longer spoke, since nothing remained to do. But now the test of her integrity was a millionfold heightened, it being no longer a question of virtual Murder, but of active Mercy: not of negatively refraining from wrong, but of doing positive good. And so complex in its generous operations is a noble mind, that she who had found the easier negative hard, rose naturally and gallantly, like a swamped life-boat, to the height of the positive harder.

She was in time, as the virtuous are. She irritably cleared her raucous throat, and pitching her voice to a triumphant cry of passionate valour, she halloed:

‘Why, woman, go not on! the bridge is broken...

CHAPTER XXXVIII

THE CAPTURE

‘AH, I MAUN crush amang the stour
Thy slender stem:
To save thee now is past my power,
Thou bonnie gem.’
BURNS.

THE Voice which whispers with lover’s languishment, ‘Well done, good and faithful servant’ is full of honeyed promise and consolation; yet, certainly, it may be heard amid the intensest earthly misery.

Bessie, having uttered her cry, and run north from the bridge, heard the good Voice; but none the less, her frame trembled in a continuous jerky ague of boding anguish, as she made her way up the mountain-road: an ague which hardly left her to the hour of her death.

The situation of her affairs, viewed rationally, gave no prima facie reason for this extreme mental agony: for she knew instinctively that it must be past the hour of Compline, and her defender, Francis, should even now be at the hut awaiting her; Fitzgerald, too, according to promise, should be there — her warrior! With these four arms alone, the most potent in Europe, she should be strong. But she did not view her situation thus rationally. Her heart, knowing its own secret, boded, boded waywardly; and the strong hand of a continuous ague shook her frame, and chattered her teeth.

And, in fact, when she reached the hut, neither Francis nor Fitzgerald was yet there; only Laura breathed heavily in sleep on the dry leaves; and Bessie, sitting, took knees in arms, and shook there with bowed head and sideward-leering eyes, listening in terror, waiting in craven collapse.

Anne, meanwhile, having heard the warning cry, had turned, and found her guide vanished. She was puzzled: this disappearance, and something in the tone and manner of the cry, made her think of Bessie Ford. But she dismissed that notion easily. ‘Sure, she would not be the daw to warn me!’ she muttered.

She knew that there was another bridge lower down the stream, and toward this with flying heels she ran, found it, made her way cautiously over it, and so over hillock and plain to Harry’s tents.

She approached them at slower pace, and stealthily. There were five, one of considerable size, four smaller, under trees. From all, at the flaps, gleamed ruddy streaks. The largest, which was Henry’s, she avoided, and stepping on tip-toe to the nearest of the four, lifted an edge of flap, and peeped. Some men lolled on the ground among harness, saddles, and arms, playing backgammon, and eating a mess of cowheel-and-bacon. She went on to the next, lifted a flap, and saw what she wanted: Charles Brandon nosily dicing on a chest-top with Knevet, a brass-work cruse-lamp between them, a flagon of Lachrimæ in Charles’ grasp. She put in her head, and whispered:

‘Charles....’

‘Who goes?’ said he.

‘Anne — Anne Boleyn.’

‘Anne! you?’ cried Charles, half drunk, in the loud voice of surprise.

Now, from the apex there fell a curtain, dividing the tent into two equal parts; and on the other side of the curtain reclined my Lord Cardinal, writing; and he heard Charles Brandon, in the loud voice of surprise, say: ‘Anne! you?’

He was not therefore slow in slipping through the flap-door of his side, and creeping half-way round the tent. He heard the momentous, breathless news: the description of the whereabouts of the hut in the wood; Anne’s whole gasping passion of tidings. And even as Charles Brandon cried, ‘Knevet, we have the girl!’ and darted towards Henry’s tent, Wolsey was carrying his bulk at an earnest trot toward another tent near, where lay seven of his own men.

He intruded his head, and hissed: ‘Burrows!’, and when a man ran to him, he whispered with intense haste and emphasis:

‘To horse all of you, secretly and instantly! At a noiseless walk go hence ten yards, then gallop like devils! Up the mountain-road, a wall to your right, a pool, then a hut. In the hut the two girls. Whip them off to Baneleigh Tavern! Two of you there remain in guard, the rest return in secret. Burrows, Burrows, be swift and silent, I charge thee! No light take: and remember the demolished bridge. Nothing forget — all do. Be gone—’

Wolsey, having dropped his whisper, trotted his bulk clandestinely back to his own tent, reclined, took pen in calm fingers, and wrote as before.

And, in fact, quite ten minutes before Henry — whose very extremity of heavy flurry retarded him — the servants of Wolsey were galloping toward Maddox.

Bessie Ford, meanwhile, sat by the side of sleeping Laura on dry leaves, knees in arms, ague-shaken, with bowed head and sideward-leering eyes, listening in terror, waiting in craven collapse.

Waiting for Francis, waiting for Fitzgerald, waiting for doom! And Francis and Fitzgerald came not: but doom came.

Both Francis and Fitz, however, were coming at tearing gallop, Francis accompanied by six of his knights. He was, in reality, the soul of punctuality, the French King. But the narrow foot-way which leads from Fenley to Maddox had been lost by the cavalcade in the darkness; they had gone askew, and found it necessary to return on their steps, losing twenty minutes.

As for Fitz and Mac, they had pursued the three Du Ballay-men quite up to the mountain-brow, and beyond it, without overtaking, though every moment pressing them harder. Now, however, the agonized heart of Fitz, thinking of Bonner lying wounded by the roadside, would let him no further advance. They turned and degradingly at break-neck pace the mountain-side, till they came upon the wounded scholar: and here was more delay.

Finally, after some minutes, the wound was bandaged with a belt; and Bonner, uttering querulous complaints, was before Fitz on his charger. And now, bound at last for Bessie and the hut, they set off 'down the hill. They had not, however, proceeded ten yards, when the thronging spatter of near up-galloping hoofs startled them; and since the unknown party was without lights, when in a moment or two it met the three comrades, it seemed to burst out of the dark upon them.

The wary prohibition as to lights was, in fact, the weak point of Wolsey's enterprise. The wall, except to one who knew its locale, was not an obvious landmark: and the Wolsey-men, expecting something obvious, had galloped up well past it.

The two parties met. Fitz, as he drew, dropped Bonner with what gentleness he could, and Mac, flinging aside the lanthorn which he carried, tackled Wolsey's Burrows. Fitz, whose aim was to hack his way through the six now left to his one arm, and so fly to the hut, entered the fray with grand and terrible impetuosity, his sword thrashing like flails. But the Wolsey-men, who had at once known him by the lanthorn-shine, offered a dogged resistance: and four he had cut down before he found his path open, and himself free. And now, abandoning Mac for Bessie, he spurred downward at rushing pace. But his head dropped like a nodding sleeper's, his eyes closed, and he moaned in dream. After some yards, he toppled forward, then heavily sideward, crashing into bramble. He was deeply chopped in the back over the left lung.

At the same time, the Wolsey-men, pressed to do their errand, went on their upward way, leaving stubborn unconquerable Mac alive on his two legs, with several wounds. At the same time, also, Henry, with five, turned, lower down, from the high-road to the right, going along the wall.

Bessie Ford, sitting with continuous moan and shiver, heard the approaching hoofs: and knew with as clear an assurance as though she saw them, that here were the sounds of neither Francis nor Fitz.

She did not rise, nor move. She sat, and rocked her body and knees, with continuous moan and shiver.

Then light was in her eyes. Henry entered first, and with that chill horror which she had of him, she felt his presence, and flinched gnashingly, as when through a man's flesh a razor slowly moves.

It was some minutes before her eyes would lift a little: and then she saw that Henry was supporting Laura round the waist with the right arm, while with the left fore-finger he held up her chin. And a man near lifted a lanthorn to reveal the lovely face.

Laura Ford's eyes were bashfully cast down, and her lips were — smiling.

At that moment, a man with wild, blood-washed face, and drawn sword, dashed through the King's gentlemen at the hut-door: a sturdy, tough spirit, he, who had sworn to defend Bessie Ford, and did not forget. It was James Macdonald.

The words which he cried, with a jerk of the head, were:

‘Have them you shall not, while I live, Sir King — !’

But Henry spoke in time.

‘Cut me down this mad dog,’ said he.

And at the doorway itself the swords clashed. Stubbornly, in his stolid, firm-lipped, rock-browed way, though quite weak now, Macdonald defended himself against five blades during two full minutes’ space. Then, washed from head to foot in blood, he gave in, and drooped, and fell dead.

And seeing him fall — so gorily, and so tragically, and so loyally — Bessie Ford lost her woe in swoon.

CHAPTER XXXIX

BESSIE'S GREATNESS

‘ON HER NOW

A curtain, blacker than the night, is dropped

For ever!’...

ROGERS.

THE girls were captured by Henry at twenty minutes past compline on a Saturday night.

They were at once taken to the King’s tents, a separate guarded one being assigned them. And it was not till five minutes afterwards that Francis, with three, arrived at the hut — three of his six having been precipitated at the broken bridge into the Winney. He found the hut empty, save for dead Macdonald lying there.

At five on the Sabbath morning, a party of ten, led by Charles Brandon, set out from Henry’s tents, bound for London, the two girls, well mounted — though Bessie was in a condition of agued debility — being in their midst. And at London, at two in the dark Monday morning, they arrived safely. Meanwhile, Henry, with Wolsey and some twenty, had rejoined the larger portion of his camp lying at Fletcherfield, and with his whole following set out for London, which he reached about noon on Tuesday, the serene array of horses rolling through the streets a long rattle and pattering fracas of showering hoof-falls, the expedition over, the war won, and the boys strangely here again.

As for Fitzgerald and Bonner, their wounds, though grave, were, none of them, what doctors call ‘dangerous’; and in a week’s time, Fitz and Bonner were occupying a little garret between the Old Wool-market and Almoner’s Yard, Westminster, where lay Caxton’s press. And these two, sleeping three or four hours in the twenty-four, were searching London for the sisters.

Francis, too, was assured by the departure of the English royal camp that Henry had the prize. And spurred by many spurs — by love and veneration for the resting Angel who had bespoken him in the wood, by gratitude to her, by intense jealousy of Henry, by the spirit of enterprise — he had sent back his camp to ship in Southampton-water, and accompanied only by the Chevalier d’Arcy, prosecuted in a strict disguise from a solitary house near St. Botolph, beyond the city-wall at Bishop’s Gate, a strenuous search for the sisters.

Wolsey, too, never despaired. Even though Laura was within the adamant grasp of Henry, he still searched — and with infinite secrecy, complex skill. But he found them not.

Anne Boleyn, returned to London, knew of these efforts, and smiled. She said to herself: ‘Now that Henry hath her, no power in earth or heaven will rob him of her, till he wants her no more.’

All this time Bessie and Laura were in a Bank-side house, the personal property of Lord Thomas Howard.

‘Bankside’ at this date was a swelling hill-land, scrubby and blasted, at the back of Southwark High-street, extending, we imagine, from the south end of London Bridge, where stood St. Mary Overie, quite as far as Lambeth Palace. At its east end, overlooking the river, were Rochester House and Winchester House; and a little back and west of these, a collection of slum-houses of the old timber-frame sort, called ‘The Stews.’ Still west of The Stews, at about six stone-throws, stood, on a plateau of risen ground, a very ancient house, low and black, the summit only of whose roof, and a turret-top, was visible behind a square enclosure of battlemented wall. It was called Rain (Reine?) House, was in the mortmain of the Dukes of Norfolk, and now Lord Thomas'. And behind the gloomy secrecy of these walls lay the sisters.

For a week nothing happened. But at the end of that time, Fitzgerald, Wolsey, and Francis had, each on his own account, decided that here was probably the hiding-place they sought.

Wolsey knew with perfect assurance that Henry had not yet seen Laura since her arrival in London: for his hundred eyes were upon the King. It was not therefore too late for enterprise.

Francis and Fitz both divined that Henry, for many reasons of shame, of secrecy, of slow courtship, would not act hastily; and hoped that it was not too late for enterprise.

On the eighth midnight, Fitzgerald was over the battlemented wall. He made his way through a wilderness of unkempt vegetation to the old wood-building. He broke a shutter, leapt through a low lattice, struck light to a rush. He proceeded to search through the vacant, brown, and dust-exhaling halls. He had come certain of death, expecting an opposition of overwhelming force. But he was met only by a little woman in undress, bearing a lamp — a buxom, dimpled woman of middle-age in pinked porringer, who perked, and seemed greatly surprised; and behind her peered an elderly man, who frowned fatherly reproof. They seemed the comptrollers of the old deserted mansion.

Fitz said: 'Yield me the two maidens ye hold, lest I run you thorow instanter.'

They seemed very alarmed. No maidens, sure, held they there, they swore, and offered to lead him through the house, what though he merited the Marshalsea for infraction. And this they did: and Fitz went away sure that his suspicions had misled him.

Two hours afterwards Francis and d'Arcy effected forced entrance, met the same experience, and went away sure that their suspicions had misled them. And the next midnight a body of Wolsey-men, masked, entered the close through a wide-opened portal, searched the house, and went away sure that their suspicions had misled them.

The girls were in a turret connected with the house by a wooden causeway. Each of the searchers, having entered this turret, had found themselves in a large square apartment, with floor and vaulted ceiling of stone. The turret was not high, and the infallible impression conveyed was that all above this ceiling was only solid masonry. A secret slab, however, removed from the flooring, would have revealed a narrow stairway, which, after descending, mounted in the thickness of the wall to an iron portal, and to two low rooms, above.

These two rooms were separated by a rude wall, containing a Gothic oaken door, iron-studded, very thick and ponderous. In this door was a great key, projecting outward toward the little iron portal by which entrance was effected from the stairs. At every curfew the buxom dimpled woman in pinked porringer, having watched their evening repast, led Bessie Ford to bed in the inner room, and locked the door of communication, Laura sleeping in the outer, or stair-room. After the third day, however, Laura noticed that the key was never withdrawn; she hated loneliness in the dark; and thenceforward, as soon as the woman retired, the sisters were reunited, and slept together in Bessie's bed, till they judged morning come.

There was no window, and no sunlight. Candles burned in iron sconces all the day. Bessie Ford was deadly sick, and, in general, sat wrapped in her arms, cowering in an ague.

Laura, on the other hand, thrived in this dark confinement and stuffy air. Here and now she fared sumptuously, and with steady appetite: here was venison pasty and ypocras jelly, here halibut engrailed, godwit, and heron, and peacock. She fattened like a duck, and her loveliness swelled royal and authoritative. But Bessie, a poor mean-clad figure, incongruous with the rich-velveted chair where she sat and cowered sideways, only moaned and shivered, and hardly ate.

On the ninth day they were led down and out into the jungled close, and here they breathed deep of the free air; the buxom, dimpled woman in pinked porringer followed, making herself hideously pleasant, with many a perk and knee-curtsey, and praise of the beauty of Laura: — It was a broad and glorious summer-day, though into the rank close the light came like light asleep, like shade a-trance in far and magic lands, where lady-birds sail the Arabian air, and boozy coccinellæ, cruising, trawl a musing boom. At the portal, through gratings in a wicket, they could see the glistening river, flitted with small-sailed craft, like muscae in the sunlight; or anon a nobleman's barge glided, low and long, like a gondola, with high in-curved prore, toward the King's Stairs. There landed the cloaked nobleman, passed beneath the Clock Tower of Old Palace Yard, by Westminster Hall, by St. Stephen's Chapel, and so to the Palace, to disappear full of purposes which seemed momentous, and were not.

Yonder, eastward, rose visible the high needle of St. Paul's; visible, too, the mouth of the little rapid Fleet, and the Queen's Bridewell Palace, and the frater-roof of the Grey Friars; the turrets also of Savoy Palace, fluttering flags, and Somerset Place, and St. Mary's Hospital, and Durham House, and the Whitehall of Wolsey. To a little opening in the land near came an open punt with horses, here being Stangate Horse-Ferry. The pinnacles of the Westminster Palace waved six flags in gala polychrome of yellow and blue and crimson, fluttering small in the vast Walhalla-hall of the vacant and jubilee heaven.

There are days when the conspiracy of the unseen Powers to vulgarise man's life in his own eyes fails: and the world is perceived to be, in truth, an elfin world, musing through region after region of romance; an earth set in a far nook of the universe, where haunt gnome and kobold, faun and peeping sylph; lit by a rabid day-star; and swooning at the angelus-bell in the lazuli grot of Fairy Night through a lamp-lit bazaar of stars.

Such was this first day of the sisters' airing; but as they so stood, looking upon the bright world, something black and ominous molested them.

Laura stepped back with the cry:

'Our Saviour..... 'Tis sure token of Death....!'

Three crows, with rough and stertorous caw, had rushed low by the portal, flapping so palpably close their raven augury of ill, as almost to strike the arch.

The buxom woman, also, saw it, and took them each by an arm. After an hour's breath, they were conducted back to the turret.

Now they were regularly led out every noon. Laura grew nothing less than gay, and would grin beautifully at a caught butterfly, with an 'O, 'tis minion...!' Bessie waited, watchful, surprised at this grace, never ceasing her chronic shivering.

Why did not Henry come? It was because, like men at a great crisis, he was being pulled two ways. He remembered the divine face of Laura Ford, and would come; and he remembered the divine voice, and words, of Bessie Ford, and would not.

He was intelligent — in comparison with other Kings; and he was conscientious. His crime loomed almost so monstrously large in his eyes as, in fact, it was. Day after day he passed in lonely, ever-repeated agony, forgetting tax, forced loan, and Council Chamber. Bessie Ford had called him 'Father,' and her tone was in his ears. She had said: 'Don't you do it — don't you,' And one day, deeply disguised, he had taken boat at the Palace Stairs to go, and quite near Stangate Horse-Ferry on the Surrey side, had ordered the bow round again.

'By Heaven, 'tis an honest poor soul...', he had whispered from the depths of his struggle.

If he was not, in truth, the 'Father' of a poor little storm-tossed subject of his Kingship like Bessie Ford, what was the good of him?

But never once, had he known his own heart, did he really, in the deeper depths of his Purpose, give way. For, lo, 'he was a prince of most royal courage; and sooner than miss any part of his will, he would endanger one half of his Kingdom.' So said Wolsey of him.

About the twelfth day, the buxom, dimpled woman in pinked porringer said to Laura, the three sitting on a bench in the deep shade of an ivy-tod:

'Will you come with me, dearie? I would show you a thing'

This woman and her wheedling ways Bessie Ford had grown now to abhor. She started.

'Shall I not come with my sister, Mistress Haliday?' said she.

The woman, dimpling, said:

'Why, no harm meant, my faith, to your sweet, sweet sister, girl. Lord's light, how pretty she is looking to-day, too! Her lips are as soft as butter, I swear, and her eyes shine like a bullock's! No, troth, I'd liefer she came alone—'

'Yet will I go with her.'

Bessie stood up.

But as she stood, the elderly man of the house appeared by miracle through the bushes, put a rough hand on her shoulder, and sternly said:

‘Such demeaning of yourself, girl, is not meet, and can further you nothing! Here you tarry!’

She fell helpless to the seat, face in hands, while the woman, taking Laura by the arm, said:

‘Come, you darling.’

The intenser woe of the situation here lay not in the fact that the sisters were in the grip of a Force which could do with them what it would: but in the fact that Laura did not resist the Force. After a reluctant shake of the left shoulder, she went with the pinked porringer, curious to see what that thing was which would be shown her.

She was led toward the mansion, and was away from Bessie twenty minutes.

The two were then led back to the turret, and left alone.

There was a silence. They sat side by side in cushioned chairs in Laura’s room. Bessie waited for Laura to recount. Laura said nothing.

‘Well, Laura—’ said Bess.

‘Darling Bessie,’ said Laura.

‘What led she thee to see, Laura?’

‘Phew! ’twas some gallant who would be for courting me — phew!’

’Twas King Henry the Eighth, and this Laura knew, but said nothing as to that.

‘A gallant, Laura Ford? And what said he to thee, Laura?’

‘Naught but a heap of blag and stupid folly! Our Saviour — I paid no heed to what he said!’

Bessie’s reading eyes were upon her face.

‘And what did he, Laura?’

‘Oh, naught did he. What could he, Bess? Thou knowest gallants’ foolish play — he only touched my cheek with his finger-tips.’

‘Did he, Laura? And, Laura, thou lettest him do that?’

‘I? Phew! not I! I knocked his hand right away—’

Bessie, in her woe, felt a solace, and inward charm. She went to kneel by her sister, and adore.

Again the next day Laura was taken away for twenty minutes, while Bessie, guarded in the ivy-tod, waited. But that day the answers of Laura, on their reunion, were not so satisfactory. There was confusion in her looks.

And thenceforth every day, for three days, the sisters were separated, each day for twenty minutes. And on the third day Laura returned with a face encrimsoned as morning.

What now was eating into the heart of Bessie Ford was the canker of a mad jealousy. Laura’s answers had become vague, irritable, sometimes self-contradictory, obviously false. With the horror of Bessie’s great Fear now mingled a rage, and a yellow gall, and a world-hate which seemed to parch her soul within her. There were moments when she distrusted her sister with jaundiced spleen, and distrusting, detested her. But, ten minutes afterwards, she would be sobbing out her heart upon Laura’s bosom, imploring, even for Christ’s sake, her love and loyalty.

In this state of crazy, flaming jealousy was she on the fourth day that Laura, with hardly any pretended vexation, was led by the pinked porringer to the mansion. Bessie sat on a bench in the shade; and the elderly man, by her side, had his restraining hand on her.

She could no longer bear it: of the identity of the gallant who daily saw her sister she had acquired a suspicion which was like a red-hot dagger in her flesh: her necessity now to see, at whatever cost, was absolute. This day, she suddenly wrenched her arm from the man, and took to her fleet heels — towards the house.

The man, in great scare, was after her: but she distanced him easily.

Approaching the one-storied mansion at its side, she saw before her in a little gable a Gothic door, consisting of two parts, upper and lower. The upper swung open; and leaping over the lower, she latched the upper within, shutting out her pursuer: and she darted forward.

In two minutes, running, she had traversed a complexity of sombre and cob-webbed halls and passages; antic triangular rooms, little stairs of three steps, dark-arranged tiring-rooms, rotting bed-chambers: an intricacy of deserted and ghost-haunted oddity of ancient building; till, having run along a corridor of some length, she was about to turn into another, when, at the corner, she saw, and stopped, and gasped, cold as death.

This second corridor was dim, but a lattice at a far end diffused some twilight: and she could see.

Laura and a man stood in the middle there. His two hands rested on her shoulders; he was speaking earnestly to her, underlooking a little: for her head hung quite down, her face shaded with draping hair.

A black mask which the man wore had been lifted, and now stuck above the horizontal from his forehead. Bessie, with a deathly failure at the knees, saw well that it was Henry.

Oh, without fail, it was he....!

There were the shapely legs, tight-clad, one projected; the sculptured protrusion of the knees; the thick body in girdled black-velvet jerkin. She noticed the look of complicity here: the earnestly confidential face of the self-sure and masterful lover.

Low, low, hung Laura Ford's head, draped in hair; and her face now was pale.

Bessie saw the bent head nod slowly once: it seemed a nod of consent. Then the earnestly confidential lover spoke a minute, and she saw the bent head nod slowly once again: and it seemed a nod of consent....

But now a sudden hand was over Bessie's mouth, clapped from behind, and she was hurriedly dragged round the corner by the buxom woman in pinked porringer.

That day the sisters, when rejoined in the turret, did not speak, and shunned each other's eyes. About midafternoon the woman brought up a basket containing a repast: and Bessie, with jealous rage, observed that now Laura ate with no effusive approval of the good things, and little appetite. Laura was subdued, and mused.

Between angelus and compline came another repast. Laura ate not at all; but when the woman handed her a goblet of Tokay, she nodded royal consent, took cheek from hand, and drank largely.

Both beds that day had been relaid with clean stiff covertures, sheets of cambric, and down-coverlets of basted white silk. The woman, now, as she looked finally round before departure, inspected like a backing drill-sergeant the bed of Laura from the judicial distance of her held-back head; then tugged finishingly at here a corner, there a cambric-edge. And this poor Bessie Ford saw with still under-look.

The woman said 'Come' to Bessie. Bessie kissed Laura on the brow. The woman led her into the inner room, put out her lights, shut the door, and turned the key. That night, for the first time, she did not put out Laura's lights, and kissed Laura with fussy benediction on the cheek, and backed away with curtseys, Laura palely smiling with one shoulder-shrug.

Now each sister was alone, Laura with two lights, Bessie in dead darkness. It was Laura's nightly custom, after some minutes, to rejoin her sister. But this night Bessie waited, and Laura did not come.

Laura was in her bed, sitting up; Bessie crouching at the door, silent, waiting.

Poor abandoned heart, in that hour she tasted all the inhumanity of man, and the bitter cold of the world. Laura did not come to her. It was just as though there was no God in Heaven, and no care anywhere for a poor honest soul wanting help. If a good man or woman is not stronger than a stupid King, or a locked door, how can there be a God? She wept there, shuddering, shuddering, tasting all Gethsemane, kneeling on her knees, her arms thrown up against the strong oak, and her bent head sweating great drops.

But a certain greatness of mind which was hers, that invincibility of high spirits, saved her from utter collapse. She rose after an hour, and began to pound at the door.

Laura heard, and started with a terrified whisper of ‘Our Saviour!’: but she did not open, having the excuse that the sounds were faint.

Soon, however, came other sounds, loud bangs, produced by a stool which Bess, with fierce brow, was hurling against the door. With every bang Laura’s heart thumped, and her body started, as though struck by the operating stool. This mean-clad woman who was her sister the beauty had in genuine awe, and feared with a deep-seated fear.

After a while, no longer able to withstand that strong summons, Laura cast up her eye-whites, stealthily hurried from the bed, and turned the key. Very lovely was she that night in her nudity, pale, her hair well turned and built.

She met the eyes of a judge there.

‘Wherefore earnest thou not to my bed to-night, girl?’ said Bess.

‘Sure, Bess,’ said she timorously, ‘I fell asleep—’

‘Asleep, girl? Asleep? And wherefore opened’st not when I knocked?’

‘Our Saviour! thou knocked’st so soft—’

‘So soft, so soft,’ moaned poor Bess, covering her face, weeping with stretched-back lips.

But she pulled herself together; and she looked steadily at Laura, who looked on the ground.

‘To-night,’ said Bessie, ‘I will sleep in thy bed, thou in mine,’

‘Why, nay, Bessie, nay!’ protested Laura. ‘Be reasonable, do— ’tis too much, you know, at the end of the tale—’

Royal was Laura’s beauty that night: but here not she, but her sister, was the real Queen and Sovereign. Bessie Ford stretched her forefinger.

‘Do it, girl,’ said she, ‘do it, do it. You see that stool? There where you stand I brain you therewith, an you do not now my will!’

A push at the shoulder sent Laura into the dark room. Bessie closed the door, and turned the key.

After a time she put out the two lights. She went to bed.

Like a boat’s sail ruffling in the wind’s eye, so, lying there, she shuddered.

Later, she heard that the key of the small stair-portal moved with stealthy creakings in the lock. Then she felt that someone was with her in the nether blackness of the room. And after a second or two, a hand was on her shoulder.

‘Laura... pig’s-eye....’

Bessie Ford gasped this word:

‘Sire....’

That most chill horror which she had of him shook her now with strong fundamental shudder.

But as a lamb led to the slaughter, so was she: not one sigh of pain, or groan of mortal shame, escaped her lips. Only, her upturned, martyr eyes appealed to God....

CHAPTER XL

TWENTY-SEVEN THOUSAND NOBLES

‘THEN FORTH THE chest he brought:
They pressed the secret spring:
With pearls ’twas fraught and broidries wrought,
And many a gleaming thing.’
OLD BALLAD.

SOMETHING like what she had hoped really came to pass. She had the inward certainty, like a consciousness, that this sacrifice of her girlhood would lead to her sister’s liberation and ultimate salvation. And so it was.

The next morning at ten the woman in pinked porringer entered the room, and saw Bessie Ford lie in deep, oblivious sleep, there where she thought to see Laura; she took note of the look of the sleeper’s face: and she clapped a hand upon her mouth.

Here before her, she well perceived, lay a tragedy.

And the tragedy was due to her laxity of discipline. The key, on that night, at least, should have been removed from the separating door.

Her dimples vanished, her face paled. That this event must become known if the girls remained was certain, and, with terrible consequences, it would be ascribed to her. After many doubts and trepidations, she decided that their immediate escape would be the lesser of her two evils.

Accordingly, when at noon the prisoners were led down for air in the close, they found themselves alone in the neighbourhood of the portal, and presently perceived that this was open. Bessie caught Laura by the hand, and, with what of power remained to her, ran from that evil place.

South-eastward they ran across barren fields, past The Stews, and so into Southwark High Street, and up it, till, at a sombre archway, Bessie pointed, saying:

‘Wait thou there,’

The manner of the elder sister was now calmly grand, irresistibly authoritative. This day, to the bottom of her soul, Laura feared and shrank from her, almost as from some risen spirit, or superior essence.

The arch was some steps only from the carved frontage and barge-board roofs and gables of Chaucer’s Tabard Inn; and under the hoary pendants and quaint finials disappeared Bessie in haste.

She would speak with mine host in private: and for ten minutes she spoke, part of that time on her knees. After which, she ran for Laura, and the two followed the good man to a gable-garret overlooking the street. He had promised her silence and shelter; and she locked the door upon herself, and sat waiting.

Except those three words: ‘Wait thou there,’ she had not spoken that day to Laura; and now, too, they sat silent, dim-lit beneath the low roof, Laura Ford slinking mouse-quiet, dreading to make a sound or move a finger.

Bessie waited for darkness. Her one hope now was to get Alvarada’s twenty-seven thousand rose-nobles from the Bell Inn, find Mark Bonner — and die.

Very good now seemed to her the grave, and sweet the oblivious clods of the valley. But so far, she had conceived no method of self-destruction, nor had even formally thought of that. Only, she felt that sure there was some natural working in the Loom of the World which would not deny her death also, and, somehow, must bring it to pass.

After curfew she went out, locking the door upon Laura, without saying anything. She passed by the inn's back over deserted Bankside, took ferry-boat at the water's edge, and landing at some stairs near Old Scotland Yard, passed through Holbein's Gate, and by the tower of Charing Cross into the Strand-fields. A lonely and lowly figure went she, her plait reaching no lower than her rowan-tree necklace and low-clad neck, seeming not great, nor important, though she was both. And now, crossing the Fleet-bridge, through the Ludgate she passed, and at the Bell Inn went down the side-passage, and entered the court-yard at the back.

Mine host himself, her great-uncle, opened to her knock at a buttery-door, and his eyes were round.

'Bessie Ford!' went he, "Tis thou. And many a searching of heart has been mine these weeks for thy poor mother's child, my troth! Wherefore leavedst thou me, girl, without congee or farewell word?"

'By my credit, Master Somers, that were long in the telling, sir,' said she. 'Prithee, let me sit me here a moment.'

'Art sick, then, girl?'

'Not so quick and hearty as I have been, sir.'

'Goes all not well with thee, Bessie Ford?'

'Not all, Master Somers — not all, sir.'

She had lowered herself carefully to a stool, while he, with parted legs and round blue eyes, stood regarding her. After a minute she took from her bosom Alvarada's key and silver wyvern, and presented him the wyvern.

'The Spaniard's pledge!' cried he.

'The coffre-fort is mine, Master Somers, an so be you will deliver it me.' Somewhat askance he eyed her.

'Bessie, thou hast come honestly by this, my girl? Honest a man was thy father as ever breathed, and as to thy mother—'

She rose impatiently.

‘Honestly enow, Master Somers. The gentman who gave it me is dead, and gave it with fair and good intent in dying hour. Prithee, deliver me the box.’

The light was dim, and mine host observed not the ghastly apprehensive pallor of her face. He hesitated, taking a turn or two through the room, and there was need for haste: for one no less than the Queen of England was at that moment hasting in a close whirl-cote eastward to seize this very coffre-fort of Alvarada. However, there was no gainsaying the Spaniard’s pledge. Mine host finally led the way upward, and in Alvarada’s once bed-chamber on the first floor, dived into a chest, and produced an iron box, green-painted, of massive weight. Bessie put in the key, and in a moment saw gold pieces lie thick as flaking wafers.

‘Heaven’s mercy, here’s riches!’ said old Somers; ‘girl, girl—’

He trembled; but now Bessie was calmer, and less pale.

‘Master Somers,’ said she, ‘you are parent of mine by the mother’s side, and sure, to boot, my good friend. In this matter, I wot, you will even help me. All this wealth you here behold is verily mine: but bear it about with me I cannot. What, then, must I do, sir?’

‘Why, Bessie, here thou mightest leave it, girl, to use as thou hast need, an so thou will’st it.’

‘Nay, Master Somers, for myself this pile of gold were useless, by my credit: for my case is this, that I have an ailing, sir, and an aching, which, sure, in brief space must take me from the world, somehow, some ways. But you wot that I have a sister, Laura? She is here in London now, and her I hope to marry before I die, if, sir, I can but find the bridegroom for her. And for them, since I would not have them live in London after I am gone, I would lay up the money in some ceremony-place, whence they could draw it with surety—'

'Why, then, a banker of Lombard Street would do thy affair, girl.'

'Of Lombard Street — a banker. Why, yea, sir, there you just hit my meaning; and since I would not be in the streets by day, would you, Master Somers, place the money in the banker's hand in my stead, giving afterwards into my hand his acknowledgment?'

'Why, that will I. When see I thee again, then?'

'In two days — three — an come I can. Sure, my way is hard and beset. There are those that seek me, I wot well. An I cannot come—'

'Where bidest thou?'

'Oh, 'tis secret, Master Somers, 'tis secret, sir! An I tell you—'

'By bread and salt, with me 'twere secret as the grave.'

'We bide at the Tabard, sir, in Southwark. If I return not in nine days, you bring to me the acknowledgment, asking after me in the name of Stanley—'

'Fair and good, that will I. But, Bessie Ford what is this talk of ailing, and aching, and dying, girl? A young sprig like thee, now—'

He stopped with a start, the lamp's flicker falling at the moment upon her face: he saw an ineffable face, as it were of lightning, weird with the pale grandeur of suffering past, like the risen Lord's.

She took from the box ten of the coins, and not till she was about to close it, noticed that, built in a corner of it, was a smaller box, closed by a lid half-hidden by the coins. She raised the lid, and saw some papers. Judging them private papers of Alvarada's, which the Lombard Street banker need not see, she put them in her bosom, locked the coffre-fort, and gave to her uncle the key.

On each cold cheek with strangely tender reverence he kissed her then, as she went away.

Eastward still she fared in moonlight, hugging every shadow, till she saw the White Tower, and, on the Place of Execution, the cubical erection, and beyond Great Tower Hill, the Postern Gate. A few paces northward led her past Allhallows Church, Barking, to the Crutched Friars.

She passed down an alley to the bell-cot of the southeastern gate-house; and she rang. The friary-bell was even then tolling its forlorn monotonous call to compline.

Bessie leant with weary abandonment upon the portal, till the door-keeper brother came peering.

She said that she would have speech with the good Brother Bruno, and was admitted.

Through the burial-ground path she went to the narrow friary-parlour between chapter-house and calefactory, where on a stone bench she sat, till Bruno, summoned from the garth, came heaving his puncheon mass past the south transept, along the east cloister, by slype and chapter, to the parlour. With a hand on her head, he said:

‘Now, what hast thou?’

‘I am sister to the girl which once you were for marrying in Master Calvo’s elaboratory, sir,’ said she.

‘Ah, I mind, yes. That lovely child, yes—’

‘Could you tell me, sir, where Master Calvo is now?’

‘Not I, no. He suddenly left the Bridge — by’r Lady, not I, no.’

Her heart sank bitterly. Brother Bruno made always a stertorous kind of asthmatic throat-groan at the end of each sentence, which, as he said: ‘Not I, no,’ his throat dwelling grievously on the ‘no,’ hurt her in her deathly strait like a cruelty of indifference.

‘Oh, could you not tell me, sir?’ cried Bessie Ford. ‘Not I, no.’

Her hope was that both Calvo and Bonner had returned to London: in which case, Calvo would know the whereabouts of Bonner, his disciple and messenger. Her one plan of finding Bonner lay in her finding of Calvo.

‘I thought you would know, sir,’ said she, ‘being such a friend of Master Calvo.’

‘Not I, no, not I. Hast thou done?’

He turned, thinking little of her, and much of supper and convent routines.

‘I had also to pray you, sir,’ she said, following him, ‘that you do the needful offices to the speedy marriage of my sister, Laura Ford, with Mark Bonner — say, the morrow, or the morrow after — I offering a donation of fifteen rose-nobles for the prior’s camera, and fifteen more for a mass.’

Brother Bruno started at this munificence.

‘Why, thou?’ said he. ‘Fifteen plus fifteen is nineteen, twenty, twenty-five — thirty! Yes. Whence — ?’

‘I have it, sir: little it tides whence.’

‘And, the names?’

‘Laura Ford—’

‘Ford; yes.’

‘And Mark Bonner,’

‘Bonner, yes,’

‘All will be preste and ready, sir, when I come?’

‘All, yes.’

The bell ceased its plaintive and forlorn calling, and Bruno hurried away. Bessie Ford set out to retrace her steps to Southwark.

At this very time Queen Katherine in person was alighting in great flurry at the Bell Inn. Only one hour since had she heard at Bridewell of the death of Alvarada from Sir John Perrot, just arrived with many a bandaged wound; and, hearing, she had wept.

But with a start of scared suddenness had her tears been arrested, she exclaiming:

‘But — found you not on his body a key and wyvern?’

‘No such thing,’ had said Sir John.

And the Queen had almost fainted.

She well knew, for Alvarada had told her, that in his coffre-fort were collected documentary evidences of Henry’s frailties, of his cruelties toward his Queen; documents which Alvarada had promised to deliver to Katherine, lest they should meet the eye of her nephew, the Emperor Charles. Also, in that collection were letters of Katherine herself to Charles, written in hours of spite and passion: which, now that she had hope of winning back Henry from Anne, she would not, for ten kingdoms, have reach their destination: which, once seen either by Charles or Henry, must, without fail, result in conflagration, perhaps in the consummating of that thing whose name had already been whispered and written — Divorce.

But as she threw round her head a thick veil, and with Sir John and five attendants made haste eastward, the papers were already in the bosom of Bessie Ford.

The expedition was on the very point of setting out, when Anne Boleyn hurried down to the palace-hall, and whispered to Flying Sidney, who, having accompanied her return to Court, sat there among retainers:

‘You see the Queen’s whirlcote in the yard there. Follow it, Sidney! and fail not to give me in my bedchamber to-night whither it goes.’

Sidney, following on his fleet feet, saw it stop at the Bell Inn.

Here old Somers, trembling, surrounded by these sudden visitors whom he perceived to be great as they were sudden, led them to Alvarada’s room.

He dared not refuse to produce both coffre-fort and key.

The Queen fumbled the fluttering key, and could not insert it. Sir John having opened, she pounced upon the coffre-fort, upset the gold, and groped distractedly; then lifting the lid of the now empty little box in the corner, she uttered a cry of failure, and fainted.

The fist of big, ferocious Sir John went out, threatening Somers, whose knees were weak as he flurried for water to dash the Queen's face, muttering: 'Not a coin, not a coin has been touched....' But even as he returned, the pallid lady opened her eyes, sighing out:

'Sir John Perrot, no hope, no hope?'

'Why, that,' answered Sir John: 'too desperately takes Your Majesty the outfall. Let us question our good-man here, and, look thee, Master Host, answer as thou lovest thy skin's entirety: who was't, as thou sayest, opened this box but now?'

'Even my niece, Bessie Ford.'

'How! the Beauty's good sister?' asked the Queen, looking up with new interest, like a sad sun through pausing rain.

'Aye, she is a good lass, and hath a sister,' answered Somers.

'And she it was which duly presented the wyvern-pledge?'

'Even she, lady.'

'Said she that she had it from the Count himself?'

'In his dying hour, lady.'

'Why, the good Alvarada! how it was I see well now. Won by her virtuous demeaning, the kind heart would have left to her the gold here, while the dying head forgot the papers. But, Sir John, if the maidens are indeed in the privy custody of my lord King, how comes Bessie Ford here but now?'

'She hath even escaped, then,' said Sir John.

‘But she will be recaptured, sure, Sir John, by the King! And she hath these papers upon her person — God give me strength—’

‘Marry, is the girl then a King’s-prisoner?’ asked Somers aghast. ‘Sure, now I see light — for hence grew her strange talk of dying—’

‘Of what, sir?’ said the Queen.

‘Of dying within few days, lady. For, quoth she, “An ailing have I, and an aching”—’

‘Oh, here is worse on worse!’ exclaimed Katherine with clasped hands of terror— ‘for this of dying, Sir John, but betokens that, the King having performed his evil, evil will upon her sister, the poor good child hath it now in mind to make away with herself! And, an she escape the King’s recapture, then will the writings be found upon her dead body, making my woe sure either way — ill-happed Queen and woman that I am this night!’

‘And thou wottest not at all, mine host, the girl’s lurking-place?’ asked Sir John.

‘Not I, my lord,’ replied Somers, with scratched head.

‘But, at least, thou canst declare which way she passed hence, varlet!’

Now, after his effort of reticence, Somers, oppressed, spoke truth.

‘I saw her go Leadenhall and Aldgate way, my lord.’

‘How long since?’

‘One half-hour—’

‘Sir John — after with speed?’ cried the Queen, whereupon Sir John, with three attendants, rushed down to gallop eastward, the Queen, with a lady-of-honour and one cavalier, returning to the palace.

Bessie Ford, on her homeward way, had nearly reached the great quadrangle of Leadenhall, when she was aware of the approaching hoofs of Sir John. Being in a state of morbid suspiciousness, conceiving the world against and after her, she stopped scared, glanced about, and saw an open doorway, into which she pitched. It was the house of a solid haberdasher of the Jewry, over whose doorway burned a lamp. She was, therefore, seen to run, and Sir John sent after her an excited roar of his gross voice.

The riders, before they could halt, passed the doorway, and three, dismounted, were running back to enter it, when Bessie, having found no hiding-place, spurted out, like a hare started from covert, almost into their hands. Doubling, however, southward into a near bystreet, she summoned all her failing powers, and ran well, while behind her she heard both shouts and pelting feet. Happily, this part of London was thickly housed in a complexity of short, steep, or winding streets, which now were desert, save for the occasional lanthorn of the night-watchman and his tolling tread. Her instinct led her, darting from street to street, in a direction rather east of south, where the building was denser. But in spite of her dodging agility, they tracked her during five minutes, till, near Billingsgate, she spied the deep-embrasured arch of a yard, where, bathed in moonlight, stood timber-stacks. Her pursuers now were desperately near, though hidden, and, bolting, she hid in a nook, black between two timber-stacks, her body rowing shudderingly in quick-repeated dying efforts to breathe.

Here she lost the pursuing sounds; waited some minutes; and ran again, judging the yard too obvious a hiding-place.

She came out, running, upon the river at Billingsgate, slipped with a cry foot-long down three slimy ladder-steps, and on a strip of moon-lit strand hid in blackness under a pile-propped cellar, open to the wash of high tides.

But everywhere in the world seemed to her moon-lit and obvious: and hearing echoes that ran, she, too, ran again, westward now; until emerging from a street upon Botolph's Wharf, she hasted far out to the end, down the five steps, and balancing along a tide-washed horizontal beam, sat there in darkness among old green-bearded piles.

A strangely long time she sat there, her bursten buskins hanging in the water. All among the aged timbers sluggishly flopped the moving river, and in a language of sobs spake with dumb and sloppy tongue. Here were odours, dreams, suggestions. Some boats and barges lay by the wharfs side in the land-opening there, and were at rest: for Day was done, and great Night, wherein no man can work, was in and over all. At rest, at rest. Only, afar, like a passing bell, tolled the watchman's tread.

Bessie Ford put her hand in the water, and raised some, and let it trickle through her fingers. Here, here, here, was Rest....

But with a start of horror she roused herself; stole stealthily up and away; ran till she reached St. Magnus; then, at a less guilty pace, crossed London Bridge, and so by the Bridge House, St. Mary Overie, Suffolk House, reached the Tabard after midnight.

CHAPTER XLI

THE CIRCLES SPREAD

‘EAGER AMBITION’S FIERY chase I see;
I see the circling hunt of noisy men,
Pursuing and pursued, each other’s prey.’
YOUNG.

DURING those very days Anne Boleyn knew that the fate of her ambitions and Queen-ship was being worked out: and she lived on a tip-toe of activity.

Even while the Queen was sighing ineffectually at the Bell Inn, she was ardently intriguing with Charles Brandon, whom she had summoned from Westminster to rendezvous in a little room opening upon the close of the Bridewell Palace.

‘Charles,’ said she, ‘you no longer please me; and you should, for I am going to be your Queen.’

Brandon, a languid gallant, with dreamy blue eyes, which yet could be shrewd and hard, stretched his legs, and throwing a weary sideward look, said:

‘You are already my Queen, dear Anne.’

‘Nay, but I mean really, Charles: a Queen at which you will bow, you wot? and not yawn.’

‘Royal little woman—’ he said, drawing his palm down her cheek, for long since had she given him these her easy favours.

‘Only fools are modest, Charles. Am I so o’er-confident? Doth not my little star twinkle bright and minion? Laura Ford is in Henry’s hands, young sir!’

‘What of that?’

‘Never yet was male man who could see, I swear! — except that pork they call Thomas Wolsey. Laura Ford in Henry’s hands meaneth sure and certain return of Henry’s heat for me day after the morrow, without fault!’

‘You make me deadly jealous of my King, dear Anne.’ Faith, I’m serious, you do. But art so sure?’

‘Sure? Is not my sister the King’s paramour, ninny? From her alone, if from naught else, I’d know Henry of England. Possession with him meaneth instant surfeit; his whim unfinished, a latent flame. Dost not yet wot that, ninny Charles?’

‘I suppose you have reason. Abstract thinking bothers, Anne. Women are made to think for men, and men to think of women. But, being so sure, what more would’st have?’

‘You wot! you feign the imbecile! There is always the eternal Wolsey against me.’

‘I hate Wolsey: talk not of him.’

‘But because I hate him, therefore I talk, talk, talk, of him, till I do pierce and slay him with my tongue-tip!’

‘Then, o’ God’s name, talk of him, I care not: though I have known thy tongue-tip pierce, and yet not slay, sweet Anne—’

“Twill slay thee, and yet not pierce, an thou palterest when I bespeak thee at the pitch and acme of seriousness, Charles Brandon. Listen — there remains Wolsey,’ Before thy poor friend can touch greatness, Wolsey must lose credit, hope, estate. And ’tis not so hard, I swear to God, Charles Brandon! He hath his weak spot — his Spain. And because he would be the friend of Spain and Pope, and have the friendship of Spain and Pope — therefore hate I both Spain and Pope, and would court their enmity.’

‘Enmity of Spain meaneth union of Spain and France against England, Anne.’

‘I wot it, and I care not!’

‘A sorry patriot thou, Anne, Anne.’

‘But an egregious Boleynist, Charles! Are you not with me, Charles Brandon?’

‘I am always with thee, Anne. But I have a sort of scurvy liking for England.’

‘England is all right! Countries take care of themselves. But you perceive, don’t you, that there must be a row, Charles, a row between Henry and Spain, before he can be led to the nice and definite point of divorce. And this row I have it in my hand to make — an you would but help me! The King’s letter to Wolsey, in which is that very word “Divorce,” lies in the bosom of Bessie Ford; and you wot where she is, and this week gone have I prayed and prayed you therefor, and yet I have it not! Charles, where are the sisters?’

‘No; that I tell thee not, Anne.’

‘Charles, tell me!’

‘No.’

‘I’ll give thee—’

‘No, Anne, no. ’Tis the King’s secret, pretty.’

‘But, ninny, am I not on the King’s side in this matter? What a thing is a male man! What harm? Tell me!’

‘Oh, no — no. I could not.’

‘Then keep thy stupid secret, and I will make thee suffer. But tell me this: — Has the King yet gone — has he done—’

‘Yester mid-night.’

‘And has he revisited to-day?’

‘No.’

‘What, so soon distasted? Ha! ha! But, Charles, now is thy chance to visit the hiding-place, and have the letter from the wench. Promise, promise. Tonight? Oh, promise! I will do for thee what thou darest not hope, when — look, Charles, deep into mine eyes. Dost promise, then? For the sake of thy love for me, of thy hate for Wolsey — say yes!’

‘Well, I promise,’ said Charles, and shook himself, and rose, having as yet no knowledge of the sisters’ escape.

An hour later Anne had from Flying Sidney the news of the Queen’s visit to the Bell Inn: and stealing from the sleeping palace, she made her way eastward, accompanied only by Sidney, who roused the Bell landlord about midnight.

In a secret interview Anne plied old Somers with gold, and got from him the whole story of the documents taken by Bessie, of the Queen’s fainting agitations, and, most momentous of all, of Bessie Ford’s talk of death. Only the old man kept in his bosom that word: the Tabard Inn.

Often had Anne, with hissing malice, invoked the death of Bessie Ford: now, with all the intensity of her soul, she desired the prolongation of her life.

Like the Queen, she divined that this talk of death portended suicide: and suicide meant the loss, or the falling into wrong hands, of both the King’s letter, and the Alvarada documents.

Quickly on her return to the palace she sent Sidney packing with a letter to Du Ballay’s palace, standing near in fields between Rolls Place and Fetter Lane, composed then of but six houses.

The French Ambassador's objects differed only from Anne's in that they were two-fold: firstly, the alienation of Spain from England; and secondly, the union of Spain and France against England. But in this they were at one: the alienation of Spain. And hence the political friendship and collaboration of these two.

The next morning, Du Ballay, still stiff with wounds, awaited Anne between two ivied side-turrets of St. Bartholomew the Great, where Anne that morning piously attended missa matutinalis; and presently she came running, her large-kerchiefed bosom a-heave, her back poised far forward on her haunch, plumb as a Nubian water-carrier's, and her veil lifted to the nose-tip to show her carnal smile, above being some scratches of Bessie Ford's hand.

She spoke with gossipy volubility:

'My lord Bishop — others are with me — in the church — we make hasty conference — one half-minute! Tell me, my lord, yea or nay — is Francis in London?'

'Must I say?' smiled Du Ballay.

'But yea! Are we not — ?'

'He is, then.'

'I thought so. Then, my lord, you will whisper him anon that in the bosom of Bessie Ford lies a letter of strong unfriendliness against Spain and the Queen, writ by Henry's hand; also some documents of Alvarada, at whose loss the Queen swoons, I swear, like a yawsey hen; tell him, my lord Bishop, that Bessie Ford has escaped from Henry; that she momentarily plans her own death — momentarily, my lord! that, if he loves his hopes, if he detests Henry, then he must find this girl before either her death, or her recapture by Henry, or her capture by the Queen, who also, this very day, be sure, be sure, will be hunting through London after her. My lord Bishop, be prompt and urgent, I implore! You yourself will seek the girl, and I, and Francis, above all — I have done—’

She awaited no answer, but ran, with lifted skirt, her torn-boy run, back to the façade, and into the church, which in some minutes she persuaded her companions-of-ceremony to leave.

As she passed through the Bridewell fore-court, Flying Sidney whispered her:

‘Charles Brandon awaits you in the vestibule of your withdrawing-room....’

She ran up without inquietude, expecting only that Charles had come with the stale news of Bessie Ford’s escape. But he had other tidings.

On hearing at Rain House from the pinked porringer the surprising tale of the girls’ escape, his hard-headed shrewdness had divined a purpose, and a secret: and with his sword at the woman’s breast, he had won from her fears a confession of Bessie Ford’s sacrifice of her girlhood for her sister.

‘Anne,’ said he brusquely, on Anne’s entrance, ‘the girls have escaped.’

‘You are nine months late, Charles,’ she replied, unpinning her cap, ‘like Lady Westcott marrying on the day of her first-born’s birth. I knew.’

‘But this you know not, Anne — Bessie Ford has cheated the King, and Laura is gone intact.’

She frowned, paled, and heaved the bosom, saying:

‘What say you?’

He explained, and as he explained all colour vanished from her skin; she swayed as if to fall, and she sighed the self-contradictory words:

‘That all-cunning strumpet....! This, then, explains the threatened suicide...!’

The next moment she was on her knees before Charles Brandon, smoothing his hands, down and down. ‘Charles I knows the King as yet?’

‘No.’

‘Then, Charles, you will not be telling him! Pity me, boy! All, all, all, were to recommence again, an you do! He will love this Laura more crazy than ever, an he hears. For me, Charles, do it not, my son! Look you, that girl has in her bosom letters of the Queen to the Emperor, as well as Henry’s to Wolsey, which I have but now told Francis of: Francis will be seeking, and more likely finding, the girls, than Henry, and an Henry have not Laura—’

She was interrupted by Brandon, whose face had flushed.

‘What!’ cried he, ‘is Francis in London?’

‘He is,’ said Anne, and immediately regretted having said, for Brandon stamped.

’Tis insolence!’ he cried; ‘this is not his country, the black goat! Wherefore goes he not back to his own country to play his japes there? The rank impudence of it! Henry will storm into a fine passion when he hears of this—’

She smoothed his hands, down and down.

‘But, Charles, you will not tell him this — for me I’

‘Tell him I will,’

‘Oh, addle-pated male! But of Bessie Ford’s act — you will not tell him, Charles? Oh, you dream not what I will do for you! Promise, dear, dear Charles!’

‘As to Bess? Well, I wot not. God! ’tis a grand girl that — a grand, noble, all-sufficient creature. Think of it, Anne! what a superb thing!’

‘Superb fiddlesticks! Will you promise me — ?’

‘Wot you, Anne? you’d swear that ’tis Bess, and not Laura, with which the King is in love, an you heard him these last days. For myself, I swear I have the thought to seek the girl out and marry her — I were capable of it!’

‘Capable of devil’s lunacy, Charles Brandon. Listen to me — listen. Will you promise — ?’

‘I’ll consider it.’

‘Promise.’

‘No.’

He had a will of steel, the loose gallant, and would not promise, though he was himself reluctant to tell Henry of Bessie’s act. Anne, indeed, trusting in her power over him, and judging from his manner, believed that he would not tell. But the same day, in telling of Francis’ presence in London, he told all: of Bessie’s sacrifice; even of the documents which she carried; of her probable suicide.

The effect upon Henry was astonishingly different to Charles Brandon’s expectation. For when the King heard what the girl had done and suffered, and how she had taken up her cross, and how she had given herself in meek resignation, not counting her life dear to her, then he fell, and, with his arms cast over a table, he was rived by sobs and the loud bursting gasps of a strong man throed with bitter pity.

And she would die, he heard: she was near to die. It seemed to him then that if she died, then he, for grief, must die also.

He was thus better than Anne’s divination of him. Not of Laura, at that moment, did he think with lust, but of Bessie with sobs. The same hour he had twenty men searching London for her.

An hour afterwards Wolsey knew all from Knevet, whom Brandon had told, Knevet being secretly in the counsels of Wolsey. And by evening Angelus, Wolsey, tremblingly eager to have these papers in his possession, had some score of men searching London for Bessie Ford.

The quest of Laura had ceased; the quest of Bessie begun.

Anne, meanwhile, had written to Du Ballay a spurring letter, explaining the motive of Bessie Ford for her supposed purpose of self-destruction, and the urgency of the case: and Du Ballay galloped through Bishop's Gate with the news to Francis.

The French King, hearing what had been done to his little friend of the wood, spake nothing. He was profoundly moved, and dashed a tear from his eyes. Presently rising, he lifted his arm, and muttered, with deep frown:

‘Now, may the great God who ruleth in heaven, and mixeth Himself with the rolling of the world, give to my arm strength to avenge this most ugly, inhuman, and filthy crime!’

By compline, including men sent out by the Queen, Anne, and Du Ballay, there were some seventy persons engaged in the search for Bessie; many, from Chelsea to the Tower, keeping watch in line by the riverside to guard against the expected suicide.

CHAPTER XLII

FRANCIS AND CALVO

‘THE HOUSEHOLD OF continuance.’ — HOWARD.

FRANCIS had no knowledge that the skull-capped man’ whom, as the companion of the sisters, he had sought in Hampshire was the sage, Mauro Calvo, whom he knew; but had thought that Calvo was in London, and genuinely by means of his ‘science’ had announced to him Laura Ford.

And soon, on learning the news of poor Bessie Ford, of her act, her awful sacrifice, her impending death, his mind, urged to invent, thought of Calvo.

An hour, with arms folded on chest, he paced the room. And, ‘Poor Minerva,’ he muttered mournfully, ‘how have the fates and the powers conspired upon thee, and storms wrecked thy little bark! La, what an offering up of herself was here! — worse to her, as, I divine, than many deaths. Yet “Ill were it to me to die,” said she in the wood that day. And — what was it? — something about “jaunting on a grand upward march with the sun, and the moon, and all the train of the stars,” said she. Poor Minerva! My heart bleeds intimately for this rent lamb: for, by Criss-cross, a bloody sacrifice, a foul incestuous pollution, was there! And with what a sweetness of simplicity trusted she Francis of France, too, rotten Francis, bad old Francis. And what now for her can Francis do? Even as I loiter here, she may taste the last bitterness of death.

And “Ill, by my credit,” said she, “were it to me—”

Faith, what a day was that! To my fantasy it appeareth the one holy day of my life: there beneath the tree I lay, my head on Minerva's lap: and 'tis wholly like a dream of blessedness, the gentle breezes, the waving tree, my musing doze, and the fugitive girl whose words for ever will infect my memory. Calvo! yes — I will discover the seer's place, and invoke his science to her discovery....'

To discover Calvo's former abode was not difficult: for London knew it. But on learning it, Francis learned also that the sage had left it.

And now his mind was left blank and deviceless.

But his necessity for action was absolute. That night late he was on the Bridge; and passing by the spot described as Calvo's den, he entered the dark house-passage and jerked down the black stairs, though without hope.

But behind the portal upon which he butted, he heard sounds; and when he knocked, the door opened. To his surprise, he saw before him the skull-cap, the bulging brow, the goggle eyes, which he knew.

In fact, Calvo had decided that the place from which he was known to have been driven was precisely the most unguessable place of tranquility and hiding. Not that he was any longer in pressing fear of disturbance: for on a finger he bore an intaglio" of a biretta, a ring of his new protector, Wolsey.

The sage started as Francis, with a laugh, raised his mask — showed the dry, brown face — and entered.

'You knew not that I was in this city, I perceive, Signior Calvo,' said Francis.

Calvo coughed.

'I — divined it, Sire,' said he: 'but your visit, I avouch, startled me. Pray, seat yourself on this little stool.'

'Pest! your work-shop stinks like a badger's burrow, Signior.'

“Tis the odour of Knowledge, Sire. In the mouth ’tis bitter, but in the belly sweet.’

‘Well said. Now, I come to test and consult your science. Your letter with regard to the lovely, gent and amiable damsel, Laura Ford, I had, and came, as you must wot, to England in her pursuit. La, in this I failed. The King of England hath caught them — her and a sister, Bessie. But they yesterday escaped him: and this Bessie, in special, I now seek. I seek her ardently: I would resign, Signior Calvo, five years’ revenue of my kingdom to discover her. I seek her for her own sake; and I seek her for the sake of certain most momentous State-papers which she bears about. But chiefly I seek her for her own sake. Can you, Calvo, reveal me where she is — yea, or nay?’

Calvo, wholly charlatan at the spur and surprise of that moment, possessed by vanity, answered:

‘Why, yea — I hope it.’

‘Well said, very well said — and when?’

‘I must first consult, and work, and elaborate.’

‘Consult — work — and elaborate. I see. Then — I wait. My abode is the Grey House, outside Bishop’s Gate, at Saint Botolph. There will I await your news. La, do this, and your guerdon shall be what you will. Only — be speedy, be speedy: she meditates suicide.’

‘Who?’

‘The girl — Bessie.’

‘Suicide?’

‘La, I fear, I fear.’

‘But you said, Sire, that she had escaped this King. Sure, you said that, Sire!’

‘I did, yes. But, by Criss-cross, a most foul outrage has been accomplished upon her—’

‘Upon Bessie?’

‘Yes.’

‘By Henry?’

‘Yes.’

Calvo’s wan forehead burst into sweat. He could hardly hide his agitation.

‘God—’ he muttered.

‘Had you no hint or intimation of her fate from your science?’ asked Francis.

‘Science? I? Oh, I see your meaning — none, none — that is to say, a vague indication I may have fore-had anent a near parent of the girl with the face—’

‘Well, I say you bonsoir,’ said the King, rising in haste, ‘and speedy success to your vigils, Signior Calvo.’

He fumbled his way up the steps, stooping prone his lank body, and did not reach his bed till four o’clock lauds were singing in the London convents, and the silent workings of earliest dawn were in the east.

CHAPTER XLIII

ANNE'S HINT

‘EA SERPENTIUM POPULATUR ova, gratissimamque ex his escam nidis suis refert’ — SOLINUS.

LEFT alone, Mauro Calvo, standing with his foot on a stool, elbow on knee, propped his brow, and so for a long time mused, while something which boiled shouted and fussed over, unregarded.

He had abandoned her: and she had been caught. Bitterly had he abandoned her: and she had suffered wrong.

‘Master Calvo, sir, you abandon me?’ That cry he heard again, close, as it were, in his ears.

Still, Francis’ story was singular — almost incredible: he hardly believed it.

‘Well, well,’ sighed he with a start, rousing himself. He rushed now to the shouting brew. But even as he rescued it, he lost interest. That night he could not work.

He threw round him a voluminous cloak with capote, hiding his face, and went out.

‘Whither,’ he thought, ‘should she go, having escaped, and having no money, save to the Bell Inn?’

So to the Bell Inn he went, and in an interview with old Somers, played the wizard, pretending to more knowledge of the facts than he had, and so won from mine host an account of Bessie's visit. But Somers, remembering Bessie's injunction, kept that secret — the Tabard Inn.

Thence Calvo went westward to Almoner's Yard, where he knew that Bonner, who had visited the London Bridge den on his arrival, had a garret with Fitzgerald. And having called down Bonner, he said:

‘Bessie Ford has escaped from the King—’

‘Oh, happy vein!’ cried Mark.

‘Hold thy enthusiasms, and listen,’ said the sage; ‘she hath been to the Bell Inn to her uncle there: and him have I bespoken. Where she now is he swears that he knows not; but know he doth, for I am not blind. The hope of finding her therefore must lie in a strict watch upon the Bell: for either mine host will pass to her, or she to him, he having in his custody a pile of money, left her, says he, by a Spanish count. So you, Mark, and this Fitzgerald, by turn, will watch from some coign the Bell exits and entrances every moment of every hour of the twenty-four—’

‘My troth, Fitz will even dance for joy!’ cried Bonner.

‘Ah... let us hope it. Go now, one or other of you two, to the Bell. Come to see me every day. And remember my counsel,’

The sage paced home to a troubled pillow, and Bonner that night watched the Bell.

But the watch, maintained steadily for eight days, resulted in nothing.

Meanwhile old Somers lived in a flutter of apprehension. Bessie did not come for the banker's acknowledgment, though her money had been duly deposited at Lombard Street.

Bessie all this time remained cowering in her locked garret at the Tabard. The chase through the East-Thames region by Sir John Perrot on her very first going-out had scared her from a second attempt. Daily when the landlord, faithful to his pledge of secrecy, tapped at her door, she had from him tales of many men who, below, sought news of two sisters. The whole world seemed to hunt and beset her.

As the days passed, hope in the business that remained to her to do left her. Where to find Bonner she knew not at all, since of Calvo's whereabouts she knew nothing. Through the days a sickly inertia of fear possessed her, and she sat silent, hugging herself like one shivering in Arctic cold; and Laura, mouse-quiet always, regarded her stealthily, as one might regard with interest the movements of a ghost. Only toward midnight Bessie would go out a little, creeping thievishly down the stairs, to the back-court, and so, lifting a gate-latch, out upon Bankside. A stone's-throw from the inn, at the bottom of a depression, lay a sedge-pond, stagnant and green, inhabited by frogs, and watched by three blasted willows. Here, for a long time, at the very water's-edge, would she crouch, and pore, and gloat.

This hydrophilia had rapidly grown with her into a mania since that night when, under Botolph's Wharf, she had soaked her buskins in the Thames. A sinister fascination for water-sides, for the sight, the neighbourhood of water, informed and led her by the nose. Laura, who furtively watched her every movement, observed that from these expeditions she returned exhausted, with a more emaciated pallor, her buskins soaked, her clothes bedraggled. And the notion of horror took rise and grew in Laura's brain that one night, having gone, she might never-more return.

Here was not a modern, but a sixteenth-century, mind. A modern girl, all rationalized, having performed such an act as hers, with motive so pure and high, would feel clearly that the act itself was of no importance, involved no real stain, and was, in fact, itself ennobled by the motive. But in such a century as the sixteenth, glamour was the world. The act, the dogma — apart from reason — whatever the circumstances — was the point. In her heart Bessie must have heard stifled whispers of the approving Voice; but across her brow the staid mind felt branded, in characters of shameful and shocking red, that word: Polluted. And the river became her lover.

Poor hunted girl, she did not even suspect the weak point in her hope of resting yet some days at the Tabard: for now she was incapable of connected thought. On the ninth day old Somers was to come to her, as she had bid him, with the banker's acknowledgment, and old Somers was being watched, not alone by Fitzgerald and Bonner, but by five or six other men as well, each of her searchers reasoning that if she had gone once to the Bell, she might again go.

Toward evening Angelus of the ninth day, old Somers set out, and made straight across the Bridge for the Tabard, stolidly unconscious of the watchers who, at various distances, loitered before and behind him. Two had risen from the Bell bar-parlour on his departure; two had run down from windows opposite the inn; Bonner had followed from the shade of a manger-arch near. All saw him enter the Tabard.

When they, too, entered, Somers was not there, nor the landlord. The inference was not obscure: Somers had been led by the landlord to his niece.

And now, the spies, one after the other, with all their legs, ran their various ways — to Henry, to Francis, to Wolsey, to Du Ballay, to Anne, to Katherine, to Fitzgerald.

Bonner was the first of them to rush from the inn, his quicker wit being the first to realise; also he noted the unusual number of men who entered the Tabard in that minute. And as he ran toward the Bridge along Southwark High Street, he spied a one-stirruped butcher-boy's nag stand with empty saddle, and gaze into a casement. He was not slow to spring to its back, drive heels to ribs, and be away.

In fact, he reached the Wool-market and Fitzgerald some minutes before the nearest of the seekers had heard the news. Their spies reached Anne, Katherine, and Du Ballay's palace about the same time; but Du Ballay was at court at Westminster, and Anne and Katherine, radiant at the discovery, each believing herself alone in the secret, lost something like an hour without action, Anne at that very time having to keep rendezvous with Brandon.

Henry, Wolsey, and Francis were practically equidistant from the Tabard: but Wolsey was at vespers at St. Margaret's; and the race lay between Francis, Henry, and Fitzgerald.

Fitz had just awaked from brief sleep, when Bonner rushed in with the panted news; and he had hardly heard, when he was pelting down the stairs, with doublet hung askew, as one who, prone to fight, half jerks off his coat. At the bottom, he saw the butcher-boy's nag, and flung a leg over it: but his swinging toes touched the ground, and he felt the little nag throe indistinctly under him in a kick-out. He slid off, and ran a-foot river-ward.

Now, just beyond the Gate House of Old Palace Yard, there stood in an angle of the wall a street-pulpit of lovely marble, sculptured corbel and crocket, flute and fruit, a cornucopia of chiselling; and from it, at this hour, a jocular Austin friar was preaching a succession of jests to a little giggling and answering crowd. And said he:

‘But to leave laughing, good folk, and to come to what is rather matter for tears — for tears follow upon laughter, as a wroth husband upon a busied wife, or as scurvy Monday morning upon jolly Sunday night—’

‘Bah!’ cried Charles Brandon from the crowd, ‘since thy laughter maketh us weep, good friar, sure thy tears will but make us laugh—’

‘Now, here have you a Corinthian,’ exclaimed the friar, ‘which, an I mistake not, is that very scion of the Brandons which—’

‘Come, no more,’ said Charles to two young gentlemen of the King’s bed-chamber who, with him, had stopped to hear the friar’s jibes: ‘I have a rendezvous.’

‘Near?’

‘But here.’ He put his mouth to the ear of one, whispering: ‘Anne!’

But as he spoke, he started, and with quick breath hissed close and pantingly:

‘There — there — is the knave, Fitzgerald! Quick — follow — ! we must have him — Henry would be hanging him — !’

Fitz was running at the moment through the Gate into Palace Yard to reach the King’s Stairs, and the ferry there: and the three were after him.

They were close upon him, at the other side of the yard, before Brandon cried: ‘Halt, fellow!’ and Fitz had hardly time to stop, twist to guard, and draw, when he was confronted by the three active blades.

There are, however, mental conditions when the spirit rises easily above material obstruction, as if proving that it, and not matter, is master here: so that Fitzgerald regretted this attack only because of the delay, since no blades could long check him in this his quest. And cried he: ‘Why, sirs, look out for your pates, then...!’ and began to ply and operate.

The Yard was deserted, and the shuffling feet and mixing swords sounded in dumb echoes. Thrice Fitzgerald shifted his ground, retreating always. At the third time, he had the three rapiers in the exact position which his fencing had designed for each: one lifted to hew to the left, one thrusting before him, one cutting at the right. The first weapon he sent wheeling five yards with the hand that held it, the second he parried, the third he struck downward, receiving a deep horizontal slash in the thigh — all in one triumphant movement of his blade. An instant more, and he had the second of Brandon's friends spitted through the throat, and springing backward, cried to Brandon:

'You yield?' Brandon, famed as a swordsman, did not yield. With rash enterprise he came on: the two edges, edge on edge, jostled and jarred lingeringly, with slide and pause, till Brandon's wrist gave with a jerk to the urgent compulsion of Fitzgerald's blade, and the gallant sighed, staggered with lifted sword-arm, and fell heavily upon the pavers, well ripped in the breast.

As Fitzgerald turned, he saw a lady, peering nearer with dainty step. At the same time she knew him and recognised Brandon, his faintly-smiling agony: and she uttered a little cry.

It was Anne come to rendezvous.

She ran to stoop over Brandon, but even in the act, her face flushed with malicious rage against this all-conquering warrior of Bessie Ford; and she turned to him as he moved, and touching his shoulder, said:

'Master Fitzgerald, will you, then, kill all one's friends with this your sword? And always for the cause of the same fantasy? Is it that you still seek Bessie Ford, then? Spare yourself and desist, an you take my hint. She is at this moment the King's mistress — Bessie, remember, not Laura.'

His ears heard the words, but hardly with realization. He frowned a moment upon her; his lips muttered something. Then he ran: he had no time....

But at the King's Stairs he saw the boat half-way across, going. He had to wait ten minutes.

A strange sickness took him. During the row across, he leant over the tilting boat, and vomited: it may have been his wound, which left a stain on the boat's thwart; or the words of the slanderer....

On the other side, he set off running toward the Tabard across Bankside; but he was a world too late.

CHAPTER XLIV

AT THE TABARD

‘BUT WAE THE thane which bears the bane
O’ waeful maiden wronged,’
OLD BALLAD.

THE first, in fact, to arrive at the Tabard, was Henry, who, at the whispered news, had flung from a sitting of Council composed of the Lord Chancellor, Suffolk, Surrey, Gardiner, and Fisher; and meeting Thomas Howard waiting in the Lobby of the Chamber, had, with him alone, taken boat at the Palace Stairs, and, both deeply disguised, landed at Stangate Horse-Ferry on the other side.

They entered the inn-yard at the back, and Howard having run in and summoned the landlord, he came out, and stood on the flags before Henry. The twilight was now darkening; and the yard, not large, was made obscure by the low eaves of mangers and outhouses. Old Somers had, some time since, gone home to the Bell.

‘I require thee straightway to deliver me the two girls thou hast here in hiding,’ said Henry.

There was some tone in that voice which abashed mine host. But he was staunch, and said:

‘Girls, my master?’

‘Silly addle-pate, come, come,’ said Henry, and lifted his mask a moment.

Now mine host trembled, and led the way through a passage and upward. He tapped the agreed tap at a tiny, wry-hanging door.

Bessie opened. Henry and Howard entered.

Here it was so dark that, for a time, they saw nothing. But soon Henry perceived that Bessie Ford was standing drawn up to her height as far as possible from him, her back against the one perpendicular wall, holding Laura by the arm. Looking at them, he lifted his mask.

Bessie had an instant of the intensor pallor of death; but it passed. Her neck was erect and proud.

‘So, mamie, thou rannest away from me?’ said Henry.

There was no answer. Laura Ford’s head hung, and her heart beat thickly. She thought that he spoke to her, but it was to Bessie that he spoke.

The difference between a good and a beautiful woman is even this: that the beauty of the good symbolises eternity, being constant through the day and night; but the beauty of the beautiful symbolises time, depending upon the sun, and ceasing at midnight.

Here so simple a thing as the dimness of the garret abolished poor Laura, but Bessie it left intact and potent.

The King, with sideward, cajoling head, said:

‘I fear me, alas, that I am fallen into the bad graces of mamie. Stands it not so?’

No answer.

‘Tell me now.’

No answer.

‘Well, thou wilt not be gracious, then. Thou seest I come pilgrim and penitent.’ Faith, sweetheart, I grieve for thee, and have grieved; and taking all into account, I praise thee, Bess, I extol thee more than words. Come, now, I have said, and we are friends again. Speak to me — stands it not so?’

No answer.

‘Why, then am I in thy bad graces, in troth. Is it that thou hast yet fear for the sis? Nay, but have it no more. Even as Christ offered an all-sufficient offering in our stead, so, believe me, hast thou for this the sis. Henceforth is she safe from me, and from all: I myself will be her protector.’

Now Bess was moved to speech.

‘You?’ said she.

‘Why, even I.’

‘Now, may every saint forefend!’

‘Ah, thou seest, thou keepest bile, thou keepest bile?’

‘Sir, since here you come with soft words, I pray you tell me wherefore. My sister, you say, you would no more pursue. Then what have you with me?’

‘Now would I be thy Father, mamie, in every good office—’

‘Father and ravisher in one were evil mixing!’ she said spitefully. — N

‘Ha! thy tongue can bite, then, girl. Yet once only have I wronged thee, and hath not Christ enjoined forgiveness till seventy-times and seven?’

Here Thomas Howard tittered, and Henry, turning, said: ‘Silence, Howard!’ even as Bessie Ford exclaimed:

‘Oh, talk not of Christ with your tongue, sir...!’

‘Aha! now thou showest open naughtiness. Yet, I swear, I pardon thee, seeing that the roots of all noble valour are in thee, girl. And, maugre thyself, I will be to thee what I have said, thy good friend. Thy sister, I vow thee, I wed to one of my own gentlemen. And thyself I place high, among the great of this land, where is thy due and proper place—’

Bessie Ford interrupted him with a wail, covering her face:

‘Oh, cannot you let me die in peace — oh, prithee, let me be! let me be!’

‘As to that — no!’ answered Henry. ‘Thou comest now with me.’

She left her place by the wall and fell upon her knees before him with supplicating hands.

‘Pity me — if only for the sake of what I have been to you — !’

He took her hands, and kissed them, and raised her by force.

‘Come, come, Bessie,’ he said.

There was no resisting. The four left the room, she with rigid face, but without tears. Above the first landing was a window; and the light streaming in suddenly re-created Laura. Henry, overwhelmed afresh by her face, started, with the murmur:

‘Christ! ’tis a luscious bit...’

His repentance had been more emotional than profound, and nearness with Bessie Ford dulled his sense of her pathos. Christs, seen near, with broken boots, lose glamour.

They had half descended the back-stairs, when they heard an altercation below between a man and mine host, who sought to bar his way; the stranger’s voice was raised shrilly, and the instant that Henry heard it, he paled.

The next moment his face rushed into crimson rage, and his sword leapt ‘Back — back to thy chamber, and there await!’ he whispered to Bessie; and to Howard: ‘The French goat below! God’s light! in my own capital city — we stick him now!’

Down rushed the two men, so prone that Francis and d’Arcy, standing in the passage near the backdoor, had but time to pitch recoiling into the yard, d’Arcy being wounded in the shoulder before he could draw.

But in another moment, the four sprang to guard, Henry engaging Francis, Howard d’Arcy.

Three of the combatants fought with prone impetuosity — heavy, earnest Henry having his bottom-lip between his teeth; only Francis, easily calm, showed a broad smile below his mask, parrying attack, rather than attacking. And with constant chink, chink, for the space of two minutes, without incident, interacted the four blades, Howard and d’Arcy almost stationary, Francis’ gawky legs skedaddling over half the yard in spasmodic rushes and manœuvres. And presently, his edge is fitted to the edge of Henry in slippery, sliding, jostling wedlock; a moment he grinces hard with red-faced effort, and instantly smiles again — for now he would do a feat. Every incident, not of his own duel only, but of the other also, is marked by him, as though his ears were eyes. And suddenly Henry’s urged sword slips sideways, and in a moment his mask is spinning high, while the blade of Francis, without break of sweep and impetus, comes down upon the nape of Howard, whom he has observed near: and Howard drops. And now, seeing with his ears that d’Arcy is turning to his aid, Francis calls: ‘Laisse! laisse,’, for alone he would ‘quench quick’ that heat before him, and abash that bleeding face. Nor is it now difficult, Henry being quite demoralized by the snatch-away of his mask and the fall of Howard. With wilder and wilder earnest come his bottes and hews, till Francis’, with a perpendicular chop, bangs his sword to the ground, and at once strikes him between the breast and left shoulder. Henry, in his heavily bad form, drops gasping:

‘God! the beast has killed me....!’

Not a moment tarried Francis now; in, past the landlord, who stood gaping paralysed at this fray, he rushed, in eager earnest to secure this time his little friend. In two minutes he had every nook searched: but the girls were gone.

Seizing her chance, Bessie, holding Laura, had run down by the front way into the dangerous High-street; and wildly she ran north-eastward toward London Bridge, wildly, blindly, knowing not wherefore.

Passing by the Bridge House, she heard galloping hoofs behind, and doubled her panting pace, almost dragging Laura, who was much less fleet. Whither to fly, she knew not; she thought of Botolph's Wharf; but the hoofs, which, in reality, had no relation to her, hunted near. Suddenly, she caught sight of a doorway with which she was familiar, doubled, and darted in. It was the doorway above Calvo's den.

She ran along the passage, and scuttled down the steps, where in the complete darkness she might find temporary hiding. And here, sitting, they panted, and presently Laura began to cry and sob.

The thought that Calvo might be behind the dark door there never at all occurred to them. But at Laura's sobbing the door was pushed back; they saw light; a peering form was before them.

Bessie leapt toward him with a sob, and Calvo, pleased as Punch, his arm around her, patting her head, said:

‘Well, well.’

Thus, by the Powers that led her, was she led to him.

CHAPTER XLV

CRUTCHED FRIARS

‘WHOSE YIELDED PRIDE and proud submission,
Still dreading death, when she had markèd long,
Her heart gan melt in great compassion,
And drizzling tears did shed for pure affection.’
SPENSER.

WHEN Calvo told her that he knew where Mark Bonner was, her heart felt ease. All that remained to her to do seemed easy now.

Calvo appointed them his chamber in the garret, and manoeuvred a narrow settee down the dark stairs for his own bed.

By the time these works were finished, Laura complained of weariness, and was led to sleep. And for a long time, in the den, Bessie and Calvo conversed.

‘Well, we have sought thee far and wide, all and some, girl,’ said he.

‘Me, sir?’

‘Thee in especial,’

‘And who, sir?’

‘Francis for one, which is in London, has sought thee; and because thou hast with thee certain papers, others among the great have sought thee; also myself, Bonner, Fitzgerald—’

‘Master Fitzgerald, sir?’

‘Why, sure—’

‘What would he with me, Master Calvo?’

She asked it with opening eyes of fear.

‘Why, hath he not sought us all through our Hampshire wanderings, since the day that thou confessedst to him in Colnbrook Church? and we, silly cattle, knew not that he was for us—’

‘But wherefore was he for us, Master Calvo?’

‘Why, an thou askedst me, girl, I’d say he was mad in love with thee.’

‘With me, sir?’

‘Why, yes.’

‘Oh, not with me, sir!’

‘Even with thee, Bess, Why, the carl’s face is grown hollow and haggard —’

The effect upon her of these words was a panting terror. She rose, gasping:

‘I must go hence, anon....!’

‘Why, what hast thou now?’ asked Calvo, astonished. ‘Oh, God, sir — you wot not, you wot not — this man may find me here?’

‘Well, and what an he doth?’

For answer she coffered her face, melting for sheer self-pity into tears, wailing inaudibly thinly:

‘Oh God, sure Something must be against me, sure....’

He loved her! — she heard the strange, glad tidings with her ears! — and across her brow, branded visibly, was the Stigma of her taint.

She was obstinate: no pleadings, no threats of Calvo, no fears for Laura, could hold her. When it was dark, she went out, leaving Laura behind, having appointed a place where she would meet Bonner the next compline.

When she had gone, Calvo stood a long time silent, meditating.

‘Can it be,’ said he, ‘that that King hath verily done her hurt...?’

He could not understand, nor credit it: the ‘wrong’ hinted at by Francis was, he had decided, improbable. ‘Not Bessie, sure,’ he said, ‘but Laura, was what Henry was after....’

As for her, she sat shivering an hour that night under Botolph’s Wharf, and later found an obscure lodging at a watchman’s, whom she followed to his house by the water east of Billingsgate, resolved that no one — not Laura, nor Bonner, nor Calvo — should know her hiding-place. Worse than she had ever dreaded Henry she dreaded now Fitzgerald.

In the lane leading steeply to Botolph’s Wharf she met Bonner the next compline. He came jauntily, having but lately drunk of Laura’s lips, and hair, and eyes at Calvo’s, all the world showing rose in his eyes.

Bessie Ford considered long his face before she spoke, remembering Anne Boleyn’s accusation of him. But of this she said not a word. His large, swimming eyes had a look of grave sincerity: sure, if he was weak in his nonage, he was yet honest.

She appointed the next evening after vespers for the marriage. And she said:

‘The morrow morning after terce, prithee go thyself to Brother Bruno, and acquaint him, appointing one half hour before compline as the time, and enjoining his secrecy. It is my will, Mark, since King Francis hath so shown himself my good, kind friend, that thou, and thy wife, and the great wealth that thou hast, do fare with him to the land of France, an so he be still of the same kindly mind to me and mine. And know, Mark Bonner, that I palm not off upon thee a wife tainted and touched, and unworthy thy mating, but one equal to any queen, boy, pure as snow! And cherish her, boy, cherish, cherish her, for Jesu’s sake — all thy life — I prithee, Mark—’

She turned her face from him, her mouth working.

‘But,’ cried Mark, ‘Fitz will himself come to France, an so thou will it, and therefore thou also, good Bess!’

‘What art talking about, Mark?’ she asked, with that scared look, as of one prone to fly and hide. ‘Art, then, distraught?’

‘How! wed’st thou not with Fitz at the same altar with me and Laura?’

‘Oh, thou talkest but destructive folly...’ she said faintly.

‘Why, Bess, sure I thought Master Calvo had told thee all. Know, then, that Fitzgerald loves thee, and with no common passion, but even with idolatrous and heroic flame; he wastes for thee; faith, he perishes for thee. Oh, Bess, and anon he swears that thou lovest him, too, thinking of that night on the mountain-side at Maddox, and thy calling after him; and anon he swears that thou hatest him, thinking of thy leap from Ormond Hall, and thy beating upon his face. Sure, an thou sawest and heardest him, thou couldst not help but pity the great-hearted childish giant that he is; and sawest thou his big frame sob, sure thou must even die of love—’

‘What, sobs he for me?’

‘Aye, and very care and sighing doth nip his faded cheek, good Bess.’

‘My mother! the pity on it — !’

‘Dost pity him, Bess?’

‘Aye — aye.’

‘His eyes are wan and worn with vigils for thee, good Bess—’

‘The pity, the pity on it!’

‘Then will I tell him that thou, too, lovest—’

‘Why, no! no! Do but dare, and I hate thee for ever, Mark Bonner! Listen! And bear what I now tell thee to this man...

Then she recounted her shame, not hiding her virtuous aim, but dwelling upon the act, the dogma, the ineffaceable shame. Never, she said, would she have this man address to her word or message more.

But Bonner kept the tale of shame in his own bosom, and that night told Fitz only that Bessie kicked against marriage, and must be won by force and strategy, though she loved.

‘But will she not even once see me?’ asked Fitz. ‘Not once,’ said Bonner; ‘and not Laura, not Calvo even, knows her hiding-place.’

‘Why, pity me, then, boysie, for a wrecked soul! Oh, the dear hope that I had, how like a bladder is it burst!’

‘But, nay, Fitz, the case is not wholly so, I pledge thee. Bessie loves thee, my brave—’

‘Oh, then, wherefore — ?’

‘She is even in a weird and crooked temper which, anon, will pass. Wot you, Laura has told me that she had fears but lately that Bess would be making away with herself — in the river—’

Fitzgerald paused in his uneven swaying tread about the room, frowning into the soul of Bonner. ‘How!’ cried he, ‘make away with herself?’

Somehow, his mind connected these words with those wild and crazy ones of Anne’s, sown like a rank weed there: ‘Bessie Ford is the King’s mistress....’

‘I but say it, Fitz, to reveal thee the wayward unevenness of her present temper,’ said Bonner soothingly. ‘Faith, lad, Bessie loves thee well.’

‘Sayest thou?’

‘She loves thee well.’

‘Art sure and certain?’

‘Faith, Fitz, I do swear it.’

‘Oh, then, God bless thee, boy, for thy ravishing mouth! And how looks and speaks she? Hath she yet the little plait upon her bare neck, and the active half-turn of the little body when she speaks?’

‘Oh, ’tis ever the same neat, good Bess.’

Fitz lowered his voice.

‘But art sure they both escaped unscathed that King...?’

‘Oh, sure and certain, Fitz,’ said Bonner, swinging a sheepish leg, averting always unpleasant things.

‘An it be not so...!’ went Fitzgerald, jerkily poking the air and imaginary King’s-bowels with venomous sword-point, a savage thoo! hissing from his teeth.

“Tis so, verily, Fitz,’ said Bonner. ‘Faith, all is clear and plain enow. A little force — a little strategy. The morrow compline I wed Laura; to the good friar I give warning of a double marriage; as Bess assists at my joining, thou appearest, and, will she nill she, wed her. Thy arms once around her shy neck, and I know — I am certain — that she is thine.’

In this Bonner spoke honestly, and divined with good insight. The sight of Fitzgerald’s haggard cheeks, the sensation of his enfolding arms, could hardly fail to overpower the gentle heart, assuage its terror, and calm its anguish of self-loathing.

Fitz leapt at the suggestion, crying out:

‘Boy, I will!’

“Twere easy as reading Cæsar, or misunderstanding Plato,’ said Bonner.

‘But sure and secret to work, boy! Not a word to her!’

‘Why, no, not a word. Moreover, I shall not see her till the marriage.’

But he did. The next sext he received a message from Calvo, bidding him come to the den to receive new rendezvous with Bessie. He then heard that Laura had taken the whim to be married in velvet brodequins, a stomacher and placard of wrought black velvet, a cap of crimson velvet, and a surcoat of murrey sarcenet: nor could all the eloquence in the world dissuade her. The woman of the house had undertaken to procure them for Bessie, who had come to the den on leaving Bonner the previous night. But all this could not be done in a day.

At compline, therefore, Bessie and Bonner met again in the Botolph Wharf lane. Bessie told him that the marriage should be for the next night: but this he knew from Calvo: and now it was not clear why she had summoned him to meet her. She herself knew as little as he.

The deeper vague purpose in her poor heart may have been to hear him speak, if for the last time, of her adored.

And presently Bonner, after a silence, said:

‘Bess, I told Fitz....’

‘Prithee,’ she answered with her scared look, ‘speak not to me of this man: I have naught with him....’

‘To see him now were to pity him, Bess!’

‘What hath he?’

‘Sure, the poor man is blighted and undone; anon he paces the room with mutterings; anon he tumbles prone, and groans; or he would be ripping his breast for very woe...

‘Is he so low?’

‘That is he. To see him were sure to pity him. Wilt see him?’

‘That will I never.’

‘Oh, do!’

‘Didst tell him explicitly of my fall, Mark?’

‘Why, sure. But that to him were equal, if thee he hath—’

‘Said he that?’

‘Why, sure.’

‘Art certain sure?’

‘Why, sure. Many, many, many times he said it.’

‘Yet me he cannot have, shall not have, as I loved, and love, him!’

She said it in a cry.

‘There ’twas a Bess that spake!’ exclaimed Mark—’ “ as I loved, and love, him!” Now hast thou openly betrayed thyself! And shall I tell thee a secret, Bess? — he means to have thee, willy, nilly.’

‘How?’ She started back in affright.

‘The morrow compline he will be even at the altar with ready ring to wed thee! He swears it. Escape thou canst not, Bess, Bess, unless thou would’st not see thy Laura wedded!’

At these words, Bessie Ford was as one stricken into stone, and she made no answer, till, suddenly covering her face, she wailed:

‘Oh, he hath not the right, he hath not the right!’

But that night Bonner told Fitzgerald, with just confidence in his divination, that Bessie had consented to be won by force: though perhaps unable to read the secret of her own consenting heart.

Fitzgerald paced the chamber like a pauper to whom the morrow will bring Golconda.

At about ten, Bonner descended and went out, bearing a platter. Near by, at the south end of King’s Mews, almost opposite Charing Cross Tower, a famous fat old woman, known though London as Madame Dessaulx, sold dimly by rush-light at a booth both soused pig’s-feet and cowheel-and-bacon. And to visit her for their supper, Bonner sallied out with his platter.

But Fitz ate no shipper that night. Bonner was returning with his mess, when a charre bearing a couple of ladies passed close by him under a lamp. They were ladies-of-honour returning to Bridewell from attendance upon the Queen, who, in turn, attended at the Westminster Palace upon the wounded King. One of them was Anne Boleyn.

Seeing a bevy of three tip-staves marching westward, she alighted, ran to them, and whispered:

‘You know me — the Lady Anne. That youth yonder — look! you can see him go there — I charge for being mixed in the late wounding of your King. Haste, now, — arrest!’

They were gone, and in a couple of minutes scared and protesting Bonner was in their clutches en route for the Marshalsea.

For again Bessie was lost to Anne, and Anne reasoned that Bonner would know, and, were it by means of the rack, could be made to tell.

Fitzgerald waited unquiet as the time passed: but no boy came. Toward midnight he went out to seek without clue. Many hours he searched and roamed, now languid with weariness, now wild with distraction; and only returned to brief sleep when the day broke.

During the day he visited Calvo in vain: the boy was not there. His great strength seemed to fail beneath his load. He visited Bruno in the friary-parlour, and arranged for the double wedlock that night; he bought in the Jewry a ring for his bride’s finger: but languidly — with a boding heavy upon his heart.

After vespers, he was strolling by the Marshalsea, and bethought him to enter. He passed under the great archway into the paved court-yard. Here all was still, save that from two door-ways on the right of the quadrangle came sounds of voices. He walked toward them. Here, he knew, was the room called the Common Room, open to any stroller, where prisoners summarily-arrested were kept. He walked in, and as he walked in, he heard the glad cry of Bonner.

It was a vast, low room, divided into two equal parts by an iron railing forming a series of arches at the top, which nearly reached the ceiling. Everything else was unhewn and window-less stone, so that the light was very dim.

Behind the grille were six or seven prisoners, one with feet in the stocks, and before it quite fifteen or twenty persons, gossips, relatives, warders and tipstaves. Two prisoners had their faces squeezed between the bars, shouting ribaldries; and now, also, Bonner was there, ecstatic.

‘Oh, boysie, boysie,’ said Fitz with sad smile, ‘how do I find thee? — a prisoner, save for thy nose—’

‘Oh, Fitz, bitter, bitter have been my agonies!’ cried Bonner, taking himself in deadly serious: ‘here have I been all a night and day, and now ’tis sure already the hour for my wedding.’

‘But how earnest thou here?’

‘Little, God wot, I know of it. Some tip-staves chased me, and the pig’s-feet were spilled, and the platter lost. Oh! ’tis sorer this constraint than the wound I had at Maddox! How is my evil star ascendant! Yet sure, Fitz, I knew thou wouldst come in time to deliver me—’

‘Boysie, boysie, deliver thee! — and how?’

‘Canst thou not, then? Oh, say not that! the hour of my wedding must sure be so poignantly nigh now—’

His face was puckered with anxious care. Fitz gazed up, and round, and down, examining the room. He suddenly whispered:

‘An thou standest on the shoulders of one of thy fellow prisoners, meseems thou couldst reach the railing-top, and leap; and run. Sure, thou couldst! Try it! — consult them — bribe them with this.’

He put the four broad-pieces in his pouch into Bonner’s hand, and for ten minutes strolled unconcernedly about.

Then again he saw the woeful face at the grille, and went.

‘They will not hear of it,’ whispered Bonner, ‘not one: for, say they, ’twill bring upon them the public stocks, sure. Oh, Fitz! canst do nothing for thy poor boy?’

Fitz looked upon Bonner long, with mournful eyes, smiling faintly.

Some voice within him seemed to howl warningly:

‘If thou miss her to-night, Fitz — ! if thou miss her to-night — !’

But his heart was entrapped by this beautiful, weak boy: and shaking his head mournfully, he said:

‘Oh, boysie Bonner! What a thing it is I do for thee...!’

Then, without hesitation, he strode away, singled out a tip-staff, and brought his palm smartly down upon the man’s face.

There arose an outcry — a shout of ‘Clubs!’ Fitz was seized by six hands, and hustled toward the railing-gate; it opened and jangled upon him on the other side.

He signalled Bonner to hold no speech with him, and for ten minutes lay in a far corner. Then, at the dimmest end of the grille, when he was unobserved, he stood, and in a jiffy had Bonner flung to his high firm shoulders.

‘Tell Bess why I came not,’ he whispered loud, ‘and run hard, run hard —’

Bonner’s drop startled the whole room, but he was out of the door before he was sighted, and half-way to the great gate before he was chased. Terror and hope were his wings, and his escape was soon assured.

The western portal of the Crutched Church was only separated from the street by the breadth of the Cellarer’s Buildings and the convent-wall, whose north-western gate lay now open: so that even as Mark doubled breathless into the grounds, he could see a party stand in dim perspective before him at the nave-altar. He was late.

There, leaning backward on the credence-table, book in hand, was thick Brother Bruno, looking more widespread in rochet and stole, and there was the sacrist by the bride, and there Calvo with protruding corpse-brow in skull-cap, and Bessie in her plain garb, but cleaned, and the resplendent bride.

Sure, never was noon-day sun so shudderingly ablaze as Laura that night in the eyes of Bessie Ford. Queen ten times crowned and enthroned was she. Bonner, entering, looked too mean for her valet Bessie, hearing that foot-fall come, looked round in a panic, expecting another with it, and missing it, her brain swam in a dizzy and dark universe.

The service was gabbled, Bonner giving his responses pantingly. He had the very ring which once in Calvo's den he would have used, and did not. And still as the ceremony went forward, Bessie Ford, white as the dead, expected that footfall with panic — perhaps with hope.

But when at last she saw her Queen verily wedded wife before her, then she forgot herself, Fitzgerald, and all: and falling to her knees, she clasped Laura round the legs, wailing thin: 'O Laura...', with stretched-back mouth, and free-flowing tears.

CHAPTER XLVI

THE FLEET

‘THEY PARTED — ne’er to meet again!

And never either found another

To free the hollow heart from paining.’

COLERIDGE.

WEDDED Laura went close-veiled with her husband, in the charre which had brought her close-veiled, to a lodging, engaged for them by Calvo’s house-woman, outside the city-wall, eastward, near St. Mary’s Spittal; and Bessie went home in dark loneliness to the watchman’s house by Billingsgate.

Bonner, in his haste, had forgotten to mention to her the cause of Fitzgerald’s absence... the name even of Fitzgerald....

That night there dawned upon her, for the first time, a baleful suspicion....

In two days it was fairly confirmed in her mind. In the course of time she would be a mother....

Meanwhile, Fitzgerald had been taken before the Southwark justice, charged with ‘striking’: for his complicity with Bonner had not been observed. Professing sorrow, he received a sentence of only two hours in the stocks: and before the prison-wall during that time sat in bulky ignominy in the sun — he, Garrett Oge of Kildare.

Thence he went direct to Calvo, who was jaunty on the subject of the recent wedding, promising that his should be the next, his should be the next. As to Bessie's place of lodging he could say nothing, but he had his plan.

'Her notion,' said he, 'is that the married couple shall sail hence with Francis of France for security from Henry. Now, I know in what house Francis abides, and she knows that I know. She will therefore come to me one night soon to be posted; and on that night shall I make her rendezvous here for another night, when Bruno shall come with book and ring, and yourself also. Never fear, never fear. All shall be well.'

'Now, may God bless you, Master Alchymist, for that word?' cried Fitz.

'Meantime, I feel certain she hides in some nook round about Billingsgate, and 'twere no harm an you search and run her down. What is wrong with her I cannot divine.'

All this while Calvo had communicated no word to Francis of his discovery, by the stars, of the sisters: for the fact that Laura was in his house had a sub-lunar look; and Bessie's lodging he did not know. He cherished a vain and obstinate reluctance to be detected in charlatanry by Francis, his ancient dupe.

Francis, meantime, waiting for Calvo's word, desisted not from roaming London through the night, mostly alone, and chiefly in the neighbourhood of the river, though he well divined that now his life must be in considerable danger. Now, too, all through the East-river region Fitz dallied and roamed by night.

Once, having made her way with elaborate secrecy to the married-couple's lodging, Bessie heard that earlier in the evening Fitzgerald had been there. She rose scared at once, shying now at the mere sound of his name.

Sure, Something was against her! Fitz now was too late. The material reason of motherhood, added to the moral of shame, was not less overwhelming than Fate itself.

Once, he chased a skirt which he fancied might be hers, and was, in fact, hers. She had stolen from her lodgings about midnight to crouch, and pore, and gloat at what was now to her a loved spot: the tressy piles and rotten beams beneath Botolph's Wharf. On her returning he spied her from far, and gave chase: but she doubled, and slipped into her doorway, leaving him without trace.

Three days after the wedding she came to Calvo by night to discover Francis. He did not tell her the house; he appointed two nights thence for the second coming, and on that night the trap of marriage was laid for her.

But that Something which was against her relented not. As she turned on the east side to enter London Bridge, she saw across the street in the dim off-shine of a lamp the great form which she loved. He was turning to enter the Bridge on the west side.

And as though flying from pestilence and hunting ruin, she was gone — instinctly eastward toward her home. And Fitzgerald, calling piteously, was after her.

'Oh, this time I have you, Bess — this time, by God!' he groaned, with ground teeth.

He had an unhealed gash in the right thigh which impeded him, and mixed a limping gait with his run.

Past St Magnus Church she flew, pelted down some steps to a lower street, then back of Botolph's Wharf; and a little beyond, conscious that his footsteps grew upon her, she spurted down a lane to the right, into an open yard-gate, and, mad with terrors, hearing the footsteps come, instantly spurted out again, hissing venomously:

‘Christ! how this man is for following me...!’

Now again he saw her, and passionately called. She was running direct upon the river, where it washed a warehouse flush; and she must have been caught, for no alley opened eastward, had she been unwitted by her instinct of reaching home. But an opening westward presenting itself, she darted into this, running close at the back of Botolph’s Wharf, this time toward London Bridge.

Between the wharf and St. Magnus there lay a very narrow court, closed both north and south, and broken into a higher and lower level by three steps. And she, not knowing the cul-de-sac, ran up the steps northward. For the moment the sound of his footsteps was lost; but even as she shocked against the blind wall, she heard him enter the court and run southward. The lampless court was dark, and she stood there, still but for her labouring chest, ignorant that the south end was blind also. Soon, with wildest panic she heard his echoes turn and come — she heard him gasp some oath or prayer — and his feet stumble up the steps. Distraction urged her, and she ran to meet him. To stand still would have been to rend her heart in a shriek.

Close to the wall on her right she ran, in the mad hope of dashing past him; but her flight brought her into impact with an open-swung door; she halted sharp, bolted into a passage, ran, and immediately stumbled and fell.

Here was a smell of tar and ropes, stale odours, fishy brines, and osmæ of the sea. On the further side she could see an arched door, framing vague lamp-light. And stumbling her impassioned way among kegs, coils, nets, and tackle, she came out upon paved street, and saw St. Magnus near.

Now again she ran, with hope, always onward, past the church, past the Bridge, to the back of Fishmongers’ Hall, still westward. And here, as she doubled river-ward for Cold Harbour, she heard again the echoing steps, and that raucous, lamentable call.

‘This man...’ she went, with intense breath.

Their love now was touched with venom, and rather resembled hate. For why, he dimly thought, did she not abide, and face, and brave him, with yea or nay? Why divined she not that were she shame clad in rags, King’s-mistress, as the lying slanderer had said, or other horror, instead of the exceeding brightness that she was, still were she to him his soul’s very breath? Sure a man must needs care for his own life! and ’twas for his life he chased her. And why, she dimly thought, divined he not that she could not abide, and face, and brave him with a nay; and that ’twas even for his sake that she so fled him, and was being hunted down to death, the bitter-sweet.

Round the curve of strand called Cold Harbour she ran, and at its further end came upon a cyclopean wall running north-and-south, where the Steel Yard began. Here, though death were behind her, she could no more fly, and leaning her forehead on a ledge where the wall broadened to its base, began to vomit, with coughs and retches of nausea. Suddenly her eyes, stretched sideways like a wary rabbit’s, saw the long shadow of his head sweep over the strand into the lapping river, and with a groan she was gone.

There was some sort of diffused light in the night from a moon, mostly hidden behind low clouds. But the air was sombrous and stagnant.

Past the Steel Yard westward down a steep paved street, on which the feet slipped, to the Cranes, she ran; and he, blood trickling down his right leg, ran after her.

At the bottom of this street he saw her, only ten yards before him, double riverward again down the alley-bank of the little stream which flowed to Broken Wharf. At that moment two river-men and a night-watchman, passing southward in company, ran into his path to stop him, with a ‘What ho, for a disturber of the King’s peace!’ He, horrified at possible delay, shouted: ‘O’ God’s name, avaunt...!’ and such a tempest of energy scattered them, two being felled by his fist, that in some seconds he was free again, and prone in chase.

After the Cranes, whose arms stretched sheer over deepish river, the river had strand all along by Broken Wharf to Queen Hythe, where the building again bluffed into the water, till one came to Baynard Castle and the Fleet, where again was a little strand.

At Broken Wharf he heard her feet run on sounding boards, and himself coming out on the shore, could discern her twist northward at Queen Hythe, her passage there along the river being blocked. And now, for some time, he lost both her and her foot-falls. For very breathlessness he slackened pace, inhaling, as it were, through ears and pores. Her wind was as good as his, her body as tough and vital.

Up by Queen Hythe he, too, went, but did not see her. She, with strange fascination, hoping, perhaps, for some wharf such as Botolph’s, beneath which to hide, had once more bolted riverward.

Beneath the rough and frowning roundel-towers of Baynard Castle she dashed out upon a narrow stubbly strand, not knowing the river-side, nor why she came. But she had not run ten yards when she stopped with a cry: before her was only water, where the Fleet, washing flush the west wall of the Castle, hurried down to its meeting with the Thames; she had hasted, like a bird to the snare, into a trap.

Back she ran, and as she ran, with a terror now ecstatic and boundless, she saw him come. Back again she twisted toward the Fleet, some few steps, then back again toward him, then back again toward the Fleet, with steady, headlong run. And now, all suddenly, a shivering fear pierced him, and ‘Stop! I hold...!’ he called — too late. Deaf and blind she ran, she plunged. He heard the splash; and some half-minute afterwards, he, too, splashed after her.

They were swept out into the near main-stream, where, after some random gropings of whimpering madness, Fitzgerald, who could swim well, discovered her as she rose. But even in the drenched drowse of that Elysium where the half-drowned linger, she fought hard for death, wrestling against him with a venom, and a force, which seemed miraculous. When at last he rose with her on the shore in front of Baynard Castle, he had somewhere in him a consciousness that she was dead.

Up he emerged from the river, bubbling a lugubrious ‘Oh...! Oh...!’ of Tartarus and bleared-eyed Titans damned; she burdening his left shoulder, caught at last. And since he could no further bear her little weight, he went to lay her in the black embrasure of the castle-portal, when he felt his back touched, and heard a high voice cry mincingly:

‘La, rascal, draw for thy life...!’

Francis, straying down hither, had discerned by stealthy peering the face of his little friend, but knew not that she was dead, nor knew of any relation between Fitz and her.

Fitz drew, hesitated, rushed with his burden to the near arch, and ran out again, and fought.

His mind was benumbed — all whelmed, orbless, deaf. Why he fought, with whom, he realized not; he dreamed only that someone would take her from him: and the sword was his habit.

With chink, chink, in the dim night plied the steels, but during half a minute only. For the delicate sword of Francis, Fitz, winded and drowned in tragedy, was that night no match. He made, after some passes, a wild and rash cut over-head, which Francis negligently knocked away. ‘Thy chance, knave... kill, kill...' muttered Fitzgerald; and Francis ran him through the body.

Even as Fitzgerald fell, and the red sword dropped back to sheath, Francis ran to the archway; peered over her on a knee; and quickly discovered that she was dead.

There a long time he sat by her; and 'O Minerva, Minerva,' quoth he, 'and is it so with thee at the last? And to this have they indeed brought thee down? Oh, I could weep upon thee, Bessie, thou gent and valorous little heart!... How high-born was she in all her works, choosing a royal highway for her little life, and tussling it there with hard stubbornness, to make kings seem serfs and fustian-clad. La! I see it! I see! — now that she lies dead and finished, I seem to see it clear: that Well-doing, though seeming common in the doing, is an illustrious linen garment, smelling of camphor, old cedared chests, and spices, and the furred robes of kings and ladies but wormy rags. Yet to what end thy little hard strivings, O Minerva, Minerva? There now thou liest low enow under baleful star: so weird, so dark, this life of men!—"And ill," quoth she, "were it to me to die, by my credit!"

"Ill, by my credit" — the little thing! La, Henry of England!— 'twas he that brought thee hither, girl! Then, by Criss-cross, would Francis not change places in Hell with him! And what this wit and arm can do to avenge thee, Bessie Ford — La! but she hath, 'twas said, some papers in her bosom—'

He searched, found, and kept them. Afterwards he bore her tenderly on his shoulder through the now desert streets to London Bridge, and Calvo's den.

There on the settee, lately brought down for Calvo's bed, they laid her out; and Calvo, kneeling with the working jaw and showing tongue-tip of grief, at last dropped his head upon her bosom, and gave himself to sobs.

‘You abandon me, Master Calvo!’ she had cried....

During silent hours they sat there, King and Alchymist, poring upon her, the horn-lanthorn shining mournfully at her head. Till Francis whispered:

“Tis clear you knew her, Signior.’

Calvo bowed assent.

‘You told me not that.’

‘Because I would not, Sire.’

There was silence again.

Then Calvo, lifting his bleared red eyes, said with hushed voice:

‘But where found you her?’

‘In the arms of a man — a great fighter named Fitzgerald, one of her sister’s seekers, which I slew.’

‘Slew?’

‘Why, yes.’

‘But he is Bessie’s lover; and Bessie, I’ll swear, was taken with him, too.’

‘Then here is tragedy, Signior, fourfold; for I who loved her slew her lover.’

‘Was she dead when you met him?’

‘Dead in his arms.’

‘Then— ’tis strange! She must even have run from him into the river. And an she did it, then, sure, what you told me, Sire, of an outrage by Henry of England upon her is most true. Aye — here — here was her motive—’

‘Oh, outrage there was — I never doubted it.’

Calvo lifted his fist After some minutes he turned upon the King an earnest gaze.

‘And, King Francis, in the name of God and of Chivalry, will you let this crime pass unavenged? — you, a great King—’

‘Not unavenged, I swear, Signior. Wait, you shall see.’

They spoke low, and long silences followed few words.

The night waxed old apace toward morning. Calvo took two tapers from a table-drawer and stuck them, lighted, in their own grease in a nitch near her head. The ooze from her drenching soaked into the straw beneath her, and through it, dripping slow. Upon her, leaning forward on stools, they pored, seeking ever to comprehend, and ever baffled, her calm eternal lids, and popped brow.

The silence was awful there in the depths of the river.

Calvo said low:

‘A spirit, I thought, of uncommon chemistry....’

‘She appears to have been a simple country maiden,’ said Francis. ‘If the country maidens of England are like this, England anon must shine forth as the glory of Christendom.’

‘Many in England are like her, meseems, and yet not she,’ answered Calvo. ‘She was infinitely rare.’

She was in no way disfigured, though all the carmine had left her cheek-bones, and her eyelids vaulted. She seemed taller, neither smiling nor frowning, hands folded on breast, stretched in regal sleep. Regal — though her broken buskins were there to see, and the simple little string of rowan-tree berries round her low-clad neck.

Near daybreak Calvo, with lips venomously compressed, said:

‘Ah! I will settle my score with Henry of England yet!’

‘Ah?’ said Francis.

‘I will sit me down, your Majesty, and compose this man a letter frankly writ, were I thereby to resign all — elaboratory, patronage, head, and all—’

‘Under what patronage bide you now, Signior?’

‘Under my Lord Wolsey’s, Sire.’

‘La — rotten! Wolsey will fall — soon, sir. Little malice bear I that great man: yet fall he must whose greatness now bangs upon the friendship of Spain and Pope with England. Take my hint, Signior: I have this very night resolved within me to nip that friendship at any sacrifice, and win to myself alliance with my brother of Spain; and I have here papers, taken from that poor girl’s bosom, which will furnish the very blade I need to the hilt of my intent. La! trust not to Wolsey, man!’

‘Understand I rightly your Majesty to hint me offer of herbergage in French land?’

‘Most heartily, an you will,’

‘Most heartily I accept, and thank your Majesty. The morrow night, after the burial of this martyred saint, I were ready to start—’

‘And I! But Laura — ?’

‘Laura, Sire, is wedded wife.’

‘By Criss-cross!’

‘Wedded some nights since to a youth chosen for her by Bessie. It was the defunct’s will that they should sail with you to France, they having now a great fortune of seventy thousand gold rose-nobles. I may tell you, Sire, that Bessie Ford’s confidence in you, as though she had known you long, was absoute—’

‘Was it, Calvo? Say you?’

‘Absolute, Sire—’

Francis passionately kissed her lips.

‘An, then, you consent, Sire, to their sailing—’

‘La, consent! Why, even gladly, as to that But where, then, is this wedded pair?’

‘I wot where, Sire.’

‘You wot all, Signior. Now, I pose you a query frankly, Calvo, as man to man: were you verily led to acquaintance with these maidens, and knowledge of them, by any aid of thy star-gazing, yea or nay?’

‘Nay, Sire. Lie to you I could not in the presence of that sainted corpse. Nay, nay, not by any aid of the stars, sir. O King Francis, I tell you, the stars give not any guidance to us poor mortal men! To the mariner’s bark on her watery way the Polar-star is compass, and to the Arabian herdsman, halted at mid-night by the solitary desert-pool, the constellations speak. But ah, Sir King, upon the darkling generations that pressing gaze, and gazing founder, in all this lonely Deep and Desert of Time, they wink their lidless eyes in vain, and do seem to strive to tell, yet tell not! Never a word, sir — never, never one word! Their shout across the inter-space — an shout they do — is swallowed in the Wind of the million-distanced Gulf, and hardly a wistful echo, as of sea-shell murmuring, comes to haunt the ear. Oh, Sire, look but upon this poor dead girl, and ask me why; or wither your eyeballs with one life-long upward gaze, asking why; or cry question to the raving North-wind that with dumb and shuddering tongue doth seem to strive to tell, yet tells not, and ask it why. Answer anywhere is none, none: and, for himself, poor Mauro Calvo begins to feel that we beat in vain against these prison-walls. Well, well. Ah, well. Faith, I believe ’tis wide day above already—’

He absently wiped a moisture from his worn and goggle eyes: and Francis, having stooped to lay his lips upon the snowy brow, made rendezvous for the evening, and went away.

CHAPTER XLVII

THE CIRCLES SPREAD

‘AH, MARK THAT potter’s wheel — that metaphor!’
BROWNING.

‘Un son nous fait désirer celui qui doit lui répondre, et quand le second rétentit, il nous rappelle celui qui vient de nous échapper.’ — MADAME DE STAËL.

SOME four weeks afterwards, the brow of Henry of England was wrinkled, and anxious Care sat there.

He was like a man driven into a corner, faced by enemies, who has no resource but to fight, or sink.

The strong influence of Bessie Ford, and her Fate, had reached and caught him; and her coils were about him with strangling twine. He had heard of her death: and as he had spared not, so he hoped for no sparing. His heart hardened. With defiance and chafing rage it was that he heard the Voice say: ‘There are Crimes for whose pardon Time is too short: only in Eternity, after the period of many aeons, can they be washed.’ Therefore, with the outward strain and calamity of his circumstances was mixed an inward condition of intolerant, bitter, and arrogant spleen. And each increased and intensified the other.

That day, as always, he woke early: and as he stood between two gentlemen of the bed-chamber, who kneeled assiduous with buckling and with buttoning, the Lord Chamberlain was admitted. He bore urgent letter from the High Sheriff of Norfolk, which Henry, standing, read. It said that the late disturbances in the Eastern Counties had swelled beyond bounds, and bore now the name of Insurrection, a brigade of the rioters having filled King's Lynn and Fakenham with fire and sword.

To cry 'Ha!' royally quenches no fire: and he swaggered aggressively to levée that morning with a heat in his brow, which was destined to grow hotter.

It was at the Westminster Palace. He sat in a square bare oak-chamber on a raised chair-throne canopied with Utrecht velvet, red and stamped; and in his train stood there Gardiner, Norfolk, Sir Thomas Lovell, and a scattering of yeoman-guards.

There was a calling at the door:

'His Grace the Bishop of Bayonne, to have audience!'

Henry started: he knew that the weekly paquebot from Calais had arrived the previous noon.

Du Ballay, his face lit up, advanced with homages.

'Well, my lord Bishop, and what of thy master's news?' asked Henry bluffly, though the pink of his cheek mottled, and his under-look was piercingly anxious.

'I bear no letters this time for your Majesty,' said Du Ballay.

'Well, my lord Bishop, out with it, out with it, man, for my day is short. What news?'

'I have instructions to acquaint your Majesty—'

'Aye, instructions to acquaint your Majesty, and the rest of it! Then acquaint him straightway and have it off thy stomach, man!'

'Francis, my master, and the Emperor Charles have signed a Convention of Alliance at Bagnères de Luchon, Sire—'

‘Ha I ha! ha! my good friends and brothers of France and Spain! A Convention of Alliance, have they! I’ll ally them, by the Splendour of God — ! I say, you, Norfolk, where the pestilence is Wolsey?’

‘At the White-hall, Sire.’

‘Have him here, have him here!’

Henry rose, and began to stalk and perambulate: with rough fan vented the breath from his nostrils that day.

But Wolsey, after matins, had taken horse for Hampton. It was not till two hours after the King’s nooning that he arrived.

And while Henry awaited him, from an entrance-door there rose the cry:

‘The Condé Ferondo of Spain to have audience!’

It was the Spanish Ambassador: and he bore to Henry a letter from Charles.

It was a scathing letter, Charles averring openly that he had seen Henry’s letter to Wolsey containing that word ‘Divorce,’ and the Alvarada and Katherine documents taken from the bosom of Bessie Ford by Francis. Charles fulminated threats that read like threats of war; and he fulminated something more — the announcement that an Order in Council had been already promulgated for inhibiting the English wool-trade with Flanders.

Here was something vital, and it touched deep. And the news, new to Henry, had five days since been guessed in the City of London, where it created something like panic. Laden ships had returned unladen; expected ships had not come in. At that very hour, an angry mob, swelling as it advanced, and sending before it a gathering roar, was marching westward from the City upon the Palace.

Henry’s frown and flush deepened as he read. And ‘Ha!’ went he, and again ‘Ha!’ But royal ‘Ha’s’ efface no past, and wash no crime.

At last came Wolsey trotting to his presence.

‘My lord, hast heard the news?’ said Henry, glowering.

‘Sire, I have had letters... Sire, Sire....’

‘Well, my lord, you must throw your Spain over! I mean to ruffle it with this Charles, by God! Mark me, my lord, no paltering!’

To and fro stalked Henry, passionately settling his elbows in his sleeves.

‘Sire, what would you do?’

‘Divorce! Divorce! By God’s light, my lord, I’m a dangerous man to drive into a corner! Divorce! He defies me, I defy him! And I wager you my crown that the mere senous threat of it, backed with the Pope’s sanction, shatters this new League to Hell! Henry for ever, by God!’

‘But the Pope’s sanction, Sire? That were difficult, impossible now, he having the strength of Charles with Francis at his back.’

‘Wolsey, Wolsey, you palter! Believe me, you palter, man! By Heaven, ’tis an ill sign when a man palters! Pope’s sanction, quotha? Have I not it already, secretly given, locked fast in yon cabinet?’

(Clement VII. had, in truth, under pressure of some other political juncture, given virtual consent to the divorce four months previously.)

Before Wolsey could answer, Thomas Howard, with scared face, looked in, and urgently craved to speak.

He came with the hot news of the advancing City mob.

‘Let the foul tykes come!’ cried Henry. ‘Ha! there lies worse in store for them than this! My Lord Wolsey, summon me a Council! And, without delay, call me a Parliament!’

He strode from the chamber, and crossing a corridor, was handed a letter, which bore the seal of Francis: and he broke it eagerly open. But it was from Mauro Calvo.

Calvo wrote freely, heading his letter with the words:

‘Concerning Bessie Ford.

‘... Thou God-forsaken wretch.... This the stars say concerning you. Well, you believe not in stars, and you have reason — verily, they tell us nothing. Yet inner twinklings of light there are by which the wise be not wholly left without horoscope and augury. And hear this curse and prophesy of Mauro Calvo against thee... thou shalt be hunted by the Avengers of Blood through all thy filthy and corrupted years... from crime to crime shalt thou advance... the fair promise of thy life shall turn to a shame of bloated and ignominious misery... them thou lovest shall hate thee, and in turn be hated of thee... thou shalt stir in thy sleep and curse God every hour, and every hour be cursed by Him... thou shalt die of rottenness...’

As Henry crushed the letter in his fist, the Palace was surrounded by a roar.

But he was not done with the slaps of Fate that day. By far the most momentous came, when a Papal Legate, but new-arrived from France, ushered in by Wolsey, presented the King a letter. It was from Clement.

Under pressure of Charles, Clement now made a complete volte face: for no reason, he wrote, could he countenance Divorce, were he even driven to employ in threat such words as Interdict and Excommunication: though he might consent to issue a Commission to try the case.

Seeing himself thus beset at every point, Henry, pricked to ecstasy by the sting of the moment, broke into apoplectic fury, and stalking quick, he poured forth a foaming passion of invective.

‘The Pope!’ cried he. ‘The Pope! Oh, just, impartial, and kind Father of Christendom! Not trembling in his holy aloofness at the becks and grins of Charles of Spain! Oh no! Not licking the stale and stinking spittle of Francis of France! Oh no! The Pope, eh? The Pope? God! and do I bow, and cringe, and stoop to this? I? Oh so? Aha? I’ll toss my crown into the nearest gargoyle-gutter first! You hear me, Wolsey? You, sirrah, Pope’s-legate, or Whate'er you call yourself — you hear me? Then bear me, you two, witness to the four winds of Christendom: I defy the lousy Pope....'

Now, for the first time since the death of the Messiah, were such words, in such tone, uttered by human tongue.

King Henry of England furiously stamped the foot.

And with that stamp Mediæval England ended: and Modern England sprang.

It is probable that as the general Salvation of the whole world needed, and had, its great Martyr, so every lesser epochic movement and salvation, needs, and has, its lesser Martyr, often unknown. If, then, we call little Bessie Ford the Martyr of the English Renaissance...?

For the way of things is so. The Shadowy Hand is never less novel and mysterious than it is awful. As it is said: 'The way of God is in the sea, and His path in the great waters, and His foot-steps are not known.'

Or as a modern writer, rising once in a grave moment beyond all limit, even to psalmist-prophetic strain, has it written down:

'He steadfast drifts,
and rudderless steers,
an Argonaut blind,
his Bark.'

THE END

The Man-Stealers (1900)

The Man-Stealers was first published by Hutchinson and Co in England in 1900. Hutchinson was established in 1887 by George Hutchinson and later run by his son Walter Hutchinson, who became known for publishing propaganda during the war that designed to generate jingoism and support for the government.

It was between the late nineteenth century and the early 1910's that Shiel experienced his greatest success as a writer. The Man-Stealers is a historical fiction novel that is set in 1816, shortly after Napoleon has been defeated for the final time and exiled to St. Helena. The defeat came at the hands of the Duke of Wellington, Arthur Wellesley, at the Battle of Waterloo in 1815. It ended a period of French expansion and dominance in Europe and marked the start of long turbulent period for the country as it underwent a series of constitutional change. In The Man-Stealers, Shiel imagines a group of French Sociétés planning to avenge Napoleon's exile by devising a plot to kidnap the Duke of Wellington.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I. THE CONFEDERATES
CHAPTER II. THE PLOT
CHAPTER III. THE DESPATCHES
CHAPTER IV. THE BUSY BEE
CHAPTER V. MR. GOLDE
CHAPTER VI. MARGARET FERRIS
CHAPTER VII. THE FRIGATE
CHAPTER VIII. THE SIEGE
CHAPTER IX. THE “BUSY BEE”
CHAPTER X. THE SNUFF-BOX
CHAPTER XI. “THE MISTRESS OF THE HOUSE”
CHAPTER XII. THE COFFIN
CHAPTER XIII. EN ROUTE
CHAPTER XIV. CASTLE DEBONAIRE
CHAPTER XV. THE IRON MAN
CHAPTER XVI. THE TWO ROADS
CHAPTER XVII. IN THE COURT-YARD
CHAPTER XVIII. MARGARET’S GUIDANCE
CHAPTER XIX. THE FOOT-FALL
CHAPTER XX. THE TRUNK
CHAPTER XXI. THE HOOFS
CHAPTER XXII. THE BOAT
CHAPTER XXIII. TO SEACOMBE
CHAPTER XXIV. THE ALARM
CHAPTER XXV. THREE CHEERS
CHAPTER XXVI. THE CLIFFS
CHAPTER XXVII. SCOBLE’S CAVE

CHAPTER XXVIII. THE SHORE

CHAPTER XXIX. HOMICIDE

CHAPTER XXX. “HAIL, HOLY LIGHT!”

CHAPTER XXXI. THE BARQUE

CHAPTER I. THE CONFEDERATES

AFTER WATERLOO, BUONAPARTE hurried back to Paris, and the next morning was virtually asked to abdicate by a deputation of the Chamber. This he did; and retired to Malmaison: but the Provisional Government, embarrassed by his proximity, sent General Becker to “accompany” him away to Rochefort and here the trapped little Titan, after a brief vain hope of running the blockade of English ships to America, trusted himself to his enemies, and embarked with his suite of forty on the Bellerophon, having first written to the Prince Regent these words:

“I come, like Themistocles, to cast myself upon the hospitality of the British people” — though, of course, Themistocles had never done that: but it was the day of large phrase, and reference to the classics.

Napoleon’s hope, apparently, was some English country-seat, where he might lord and luxuriate a space, till the next lion-spring to France, and upheaval of the world.

What really happened we know: he was not allowed to land: but on the responsibility of the British Ministry was transferred, near Plymouth, to the Northumberland, and, with only three adherents, packed off to St. Helena.

Certainly, this was as high-handed a piece of business as possible; it was coarse, it was treacherous, it was savage — and it was wonderfully wise.

At all events, Bony raved largely: “I hereby solemnly protest in the face of Heaven and mankind,” wrote he, “against the violence that is done me. I voluntarily came on board the Bellerophon: — I am not the prisoner, I am the guest, of England. I came at the invitation of the Captain himself (this was true!) to place myself under the protection of England, with full trust in the sacred rights of hospitality. If the Government only wished to lay a snare for me, it has forfeited its honour, and disgraced its flag. An enemy who made war for twenty years against the English people has come spontaneously, in the hour of misfortune, to seek an asylum under their laws; what greater proof could he give of his esteem and confidence? And how has England replied? She pretended to hold out a hospitable hand: but when this enemy gave himself up, he was immolated! I appeal to History!” — and so on.

All this had not the least effect upon the British people, into whose soul the iron of Bony had well entered.

But what he said was quite true: and upon the French people it had an effect!

The Northumberland was not half-way to St. Helena when Buonaparte, throughout the length and breadth of France, acquired a glamour which was partly that of Romulus, the god, and partly that of Stephen, the martyr.

The Hero, murdered, becomes a Saint; then admiration rises into Awe, and veneration kindles into Religion.

Men said: “How has he been sacrificed — for us!” With this realisation of the sacrificial, the mind has reached out into the transcendent, and is in a state of Piety. There was instituted, indeed, no public worship and apotheosis of Buonaparte, as in the case Buddha, Mahomet, etc.:

but only because he was the god of a modern, western nation: and there was private worship and apotheosis enough.

By the time he reached St. Helena, at least seven Secret Societies had sprung into existence in Paris, at which the members, on entrance and exit, knelt uncovered before a statue of the hero.

The aim of all these associations was either the practical one of getting Napoleon out of St. Helena, or the vaguer one of revenge: and in both cases the mind turned naturally to one man: the Duke of Wellington.

The practical ones said in effect: "Hostage for hostage! let us seize their leader as they have seized ours: then, perhaps, we can exchange." The vague ones said: "Man for man! let us seize their darling as they have seized ours: then, perhaps, we shall be comforted."

For it was true that the Duke at that moment was as profoundly venerated (though less wildly adored) in England, as Napoleon in France.

Associated with those Secret Societies, or members of them, were, it is said, five members of the Provisional Government, six hundred and seventy-four ladies of the monde and Court, with old hands like Savary, Bertrand, Las Cases, Lallemand, the Duc de Rovigo, Gourgand, and Jacquiers of the Clarendon in London — Marshals, men with the Grand Cross, naval men, generals, old bed-chamber grooms, men-about-town, aristocrats, ouvriers, old Guards, the demimonde, every type of France.

It was the age of rough-and-ready "violence to the person": in England, Sayer, the Bow Street officer, and the St. James' Watch House, knew well the 'prentice-kidnapping chimney-sweep; at Bartholomew Fair, wives were formally sold for seven-shilling pieces, with a wind-up of Blue Ruin and the cotillon; the Resurrection Men struck openly for higher pay, and "burked" (suffocated) to procure corpses; women abducted young boys and married them; the Prince Regent was playfully stoned in his phaeton, and had his eyes blacked by Lord Yarmouth; Buonaparte was kidnapped by the British Ministry. This conception, therefore, of the French Societies came naturally, was in the spirit of the air. And from the first they set about its execution with fanatic zeal.

In the end nothing of national importance came of it — unless we call “national” the destruction of Raddon Lighthouse. But because the whole incident so illustrates the seven-times tempered spirit of the Duke in that most awfully ticklish ordeal through which he had to pass, we give the details in fresh form.

One of these sworn enemies of the Duke was a young man of twenty-five, named Camille de Verdier, son of the Marquis de la Terville-Rochefoucauld, an émigré. The son, a fellow of iron grit, took to Republican views, and after seven years of exile in England, broke with his father, returned to France, and attaching himself to Court, was territorially reinstated. He dropped the de of his name, took part in the march to Moscow, was captured at Vittoria, brought to England, refused to be free on parole, escaped from the Medway hulk, was in the Staff at Waterloo, and accompanied Napoleon to Malmaison and Rochefort.

He was of strong character, but given to spasmodic passions. During his London life he had flamed for a fellow-exile, one Mdlle. d’Arblay, of Mansfield Street, a young lady of great beauty, once referred to in the Morning Chronicle as “that fair female of Family and Fashion whose genteel figure and elegant Paris deportment so adorn the magic Circle in which she shines.” This fair female had a head which thought, and a cold and ruthless heart, which yet could adore: her adoration being first Verdier, and secondly Napoleon, and that Republican France which had chased her parents: indeed, from her lips Verdier had caught a fiercer enthusiasm for the new Religion. She loved him: and on the death of her last parent, followed him to France. But when she yielded to his passion, the restless fellow almost ceased to pretend adoration; and they rather drifted apart.

On the 3rd February, 1816, he visited her at her house in the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré. She came to him in the heavy salon Henri IV., stooping through a protracted curtsy; she being then a large, beautiful woman of twenty-seven years; Roman-profiled, with a flat forehead, lined from hair to nose with delicate frown; skin dead white; and blackest lax hair; and a plenteous figure of long-legged grace in her bosom-waisted robe.

She was all in black.

Verdier, who had not seen her for two months, kissed her perfunctorily, even while he said:

“Why the deuce are you in mourning, pretty Lise?”

They often talked together in English. “Why are you?” she replied.

He glanced at a brassard of crape on his left arm — a singular addition to a dandy attire of cut-away demi-surtout, tight pantaloons of stockinette, and splendid shoe-buckles; he being a rather small fellow, knit and agile, firm-lipped, with a wealth of wheaten hair, seraphically pretty, but with a sardonic stare of blue eye, and a habit of breathing a Jew’s-harp whistle through white teeth-edges in a silent moment; and walking, his coat-tails swung freely from side to side.

In some minutes he had learned that Lise was a member of a Society called “Société du Sacrifice,” whose members bound themselves to wear mourning till “a certain illustrious Personage” had paid the forfeit of England’s treachery.

He was surprised: for the same reason he wore mourning: and deeply as he knew the Parisian under-currents, he was not aware of any other Société than his own.

And he had this thought: if there are more than one, there may be more than two! For two months he worked hard, from La Villette to St. Cloud, with a grand idea, and a persistent industry: by the end of that time he was a member of seven Societies: there might be more, but he could glean no hint of them in casino, bureau, salon, cabaret, club, or Montmartre den. Now, however, he was satisfied. His dream was to amalgamate all those unearthed into a single force which would not fail.

The necessary formalities and precautions were, of course, innumerable, but the task not otherwise difficult; and at midnight of the 17th May, 1816, the first Chapter of the amalgamated bodies, present 1,217, at last took place in the caves of a lonely château at Garenne-Bezons, then country, now a Paris suburb. The members bore printed Notice Papers; a Board consisting of Presidents of the old Sociétés presided; the Society was named; a Roll read; Resolutions, Statutes, Agenda passed; and Officers elected. In the tangled old walled garden, before the portal, had been placed a stone statue of Napoleon, and in the dark cellar also, at the back of a rough-board estrade serving as platform, stood a gaunt crucifixion in wood of the Emperor on a black cross. The walls were draped in black. It illustrates the inherent crassness of the times, that members, in swearing, sipped from a chalice containing mixed blood and wine — a fit Napoleonic Sacrament, certainly; and after each subsequent meeting — they usually lasted till foreday — a veritable Black Sabbath of license appears to have transacted itself throughout the château (it was called Château Beconles-Giroflets, and still partly stands in the grounds behind an auberge). The President elected was M. Tombarelle, under the title of “Master” (he had been “Master” of two of the small Sociétés, and was a powerful Member of the Chamber); the Master Associate was the historic Lallemand; the Duc de Monflanquin was named Treasurer; Verdier’s reward for his organising energies was the post of “Administrator”; the Secretary’s name is somehow lost, but M. Albert Dupin, a gigantic naval man, who had been sub-lieutenant at Trafalgar, was made Sub-secretary and “Recruteur” (Recruiter?); Lise d’Arblay, with two others, were elected Soeurs Supérieures (the whole thing having a semi-religious character); while at the third Chapter, a man called Danda, a half-Spaniard, with a good deal of madness in his composition, was named Ship's-Captain.

By the end of June the Society was exceedingly wealthy; it had acquired the bleak Château Durand, seven miles from the Norman Coast near Montreuil, for its St. Helena; also, by secret purchase from the Government, it owned a splendid frigate-built two-decker of 1,080 tons, carrying 50 guns of 2 to 5,000 lbs. on spar and main deck, with a 500 lbs. weight of broad-side, and a twelve-knot speed. All the while, a Committee of Management was selling to members "Relics" of Napoleon — a piece of soap, a shoe, a brush, fetching prices like 25 to 40,000 francs — and funds accumulated beyond the possibility of use.

On the midnight of the 5th of August occurred the most sensational of the Chapters of the Society. In the midst of a speech by the Master, Verdier rushed with flushed brow into the room, leapt to the estrade, brushed the speaker aside, and waved before the members an English- printed sheet.

It was the Court Circular, and had been sent over by Jacquiers of the Clarendon. It contained the gossip that the Duke of Wellington meant to "escape from the no inconsiderable turmoil of the Life and Fashion of the Town during the whole month of September next, and had accepted an invitation of the Marquis and Marchioness of Elwell to pass four se'ennights in the placid and elegant Seclusion of Grandcourt."

Grandcourt, Verdier said, was only twelve or fourteen kilometres from the South Coast! This was the awaited opportunity: and a scene of wild excitement ensued, till the assembly broke up on the Motion for an extraordinary Synod that day se'ennight, when drawings and plans would be submitted, and Resolutions adopted.

This was accordingly done; and by the end of the month, Verdier, Lise d'Arblay, big Dupin, the Marquis d'Artois, and three others, had chartered at Calais one of those sea-blue luggerprivateers used in the war, and passing through Dover, had installed themselves in London. They were the delegates of the Society: and to the brains of Verdier and Lise d'Arblay, in particular, the minuter planning of the undertaking seems to have been committed.

CHAPTER II. THE PLOT

IN THE MORNING Post of the 9th September appeared these words:

“ — the amiable youth of Quality and Fashion, who has lately took the town by storm — who already has been satirised by a Rowlandson, and oded by a Walcot — whom Mr. Creaton, the auctioneer, must needs bless, Wigley’s extol, and Tattersall’s laud — the patron both of Cordiality and the Arts, etc.”

This panegyric referred to Verdier, who by this time was everywhere, and knew everyone. Long since, in London, he had acquired the knack of drink, and at the fifth of hock or port, with his sardonic smile, would see his man under the table. This alone made him something of a King. It was an age of notorieties, little social rags and alarums, easily gulled and dazzled. Verdier had set up for the Prince of Dandies (great Brummell had just gone under). He had £6 dinners at the Clarendon or Stephen’s, followed by largesses of £1 bank-tokens for “perquisites” to waiters. He readopted his father’s titles. He had denny, curricule, tilbury and chaise, and largely trotted his milk-white Hanoverian four-in-hand. He lounged at Owen’s, the Bond Street pastry-cook, and danced at Almack’s, and played macao at Brooke’s, and whist in “the charmed circle of White’s.” In three weeks he had fought two duels, and each time gallantly spared his man. One day he spurted, the admiration of the beau monde, on a gilt hobby-horse from Johnson’s Repository in Long Acre to Bayswater, and back again to his rooms in Bolton Street, next door to Whattier's. Twice he did the 104 miles to Brighton and back in eight hours, breaking seven whips: and to what he did he took care to have witnesses. In the "Squeeze" at Rotton Row he went meteoric, siffling through his teeth-edges, amid the salutation of the crème de la crème. He was a man-about-town, to be met in the print-shops, at the Academy in Somerset Place, and where the new bibliomaniacs bid high, and at Miss Linwood's Leicester Square Exhibition of Needle-work, and at the Panoramas, and at Mrs. Salmon's the wax-works, and at the cock-pit, and the bull-baiting, and the prize-fight.

After three weeks, little transpired in the upper life of London which he did not hear; and into what friendship he chose he could enter.

His French associates, too, made a figure in the town, but not on the same scale; and Verdier appeared not to know them. As for Lise d'Arblay, she lay low in a house in Sweeting Alley near the Royal Exchange, only venturing out deep-veiled in the shade of an Oldenburg poke.

On the 4th September, at 9 a.m., the Duke of Wellington left Apsley house in his own travelling-coach and four, bound westward. London, then a large family (there were twelve millions in all Britain), knew, and came to howl: 'prentice and yoked milk-woman, the prevalent gipsy and the little coster-cart dog-drawn, Covent Garden basket-woman, wigged doctor, wigged parson, and the dandy who meant to return to bed till two, and an escort of light horse. And these, at the first sight of the curving beaver, roared and roared. He tipped a dry nod at the crowd, spoke some last words, foot on step, to a certain Lieutenant Opie, and, accompanied only by his host, Lord Elwell, was away, to be left by his escort-of-ceremony near Chiswick, but to be met at every station by the gentry and yeomanry of counties.

In the crowd, close by the berlin-door, was Verdier. They had not met, for the Duke was one of a set, of very high rank, who never frequented the Clubs, but would congregate in crony-circles at hotels, like naval Fladong's, military Stephen's, clerical Ibbetson's, and so on; and his habits were so regular, that a man in his "world" could readily avoid "knowing" him. So that, when the berlin rattled off, Verdier, with deep reverence, and out-waved hat, muttered: "To our better acquaintance, your Grace."

But he was secretly uneasy: plans remained unmaterialised: and the time was at hand. However, that night, late, he knocked over a City beadle, lanthorn and all, with his racing curricule; and on a Sweeting Alley first-floor, solid with bourgeois mahogany, rushed, rather tipsy, into the presence of Lise d'Arblay.

"Victory, Lise," he said, covering her face in his cocked hat where she sat at an old Antwerp harpsichord: "we have the whole."

"You stifle me!" cried she, "I thought you never got fuddled."

"In the legs, Lise, in the legs: never, damn me, in the head. I have been at that vile turfy hole of Limner's, and had three of port, two of negus, and four of gin-punch — give us a kiss, girl—"

"Faugh! you deteriorate in London," said Lise: "could the Marquise de la Terville- Rochefoucauld hear her once chaste Camille, her most pious and intact Camille, recounting his gin-punches, what an ejaculation she'd let!"

"Be good enough to let the Marquise de la Terville-Rochefoucauld sleep sound in her grave, Lise. 'Tis all part of the game, is it not? Hark you, we've got this same illustrious Personage."

"Real news?"

"Why, yes. The man who will take down to him the War Office despatches I now know."

"Good, good," went Lise softly.

“With him I have been tippling, and playing Under and Over Seven half the night.”

“Well, thank the good God, then! Who is he?”

“Lieutenant James Wootton Opie, of the Guards Artillery, Companion of the Bath, though never you’d dream it, Lise, Lise, I swear; a lout of lubberly demeanour replete with rodomontade and ‘Odd Zookers!’; drinks purl and Sampson by the bumper as you water, my adored, and wears a tousled wig, and breeches-and-leg-boots, and a long face, and a big nose: so you have his portrait. I left him sitting in Limner’s coffee-room, one leg sprawled to the devil in the air, his mouth bawling, his tongue lolling—”

“How did you discover — ?”

“He was the last man the illustrious Personage spoke to on departing this morning: that gave me the thought, and at the Marchioness of Hertford’s ball to-night, I pumped Lord Sidmouth and he told me; then I unearthed the fellow himself at the London Tavern and ‘Dash my wig! ‘cried he, when I slapped his back, ‘I thought I had killed you some years ago. By Goles, aren’t you my friend Thingumbob, what’s-his-name? eh, by Goles, damn me?’ Well, I took him in tow, and he himself; told me he is despatch-officer to you know who. If once we get those despatches from him, you have the introduction you need.”

“But would this Opie be easily knocked on the head?”

“If necessary, I suppose. Is it necessary? We might get the papers from him somehow, and then lock him away somewhere till all is over. ”

“But what a useless risk for no reason!” said Lise, with surprised eyes. “Locked away men escape, write, do a thousand things, I suppose? Dead men tell no tales.”

Her needle clicked in embroidery during a silence. “Ah, well, I suppose you are right,” said Verdier. “Knock the man on the head.”

“Never that, you know. We are not assassins, pretty. We can kill him in a duel, if necessary. The first thing, of course, is to know the day and even hour of his departure. Lise, you must make him your slave. Use the face and the smile, and twist the eyes about, eh? No need lying low any more: the great Personage is gone. Come out and shine for a week, my sibyl, and make the town talk. By the way, let’s see the Grandcourt map: suppose we pass the night over it? time is going, going, Lise! You will need spend at least a se’en-night down there, before our men dare land. I want you to know every pebble from Grandcourt to the sea. The nights of the 19th and 20th will be moonless, one or other of those should be our night, without fault. Lise, Lise, those fair brows of thine have need to knit now to some purpose, and be wise as serpents and harmful as tigers, my Egypt Queen. All depends upon the lovely head — France — History — I. A French planet — how is that to your dainty liking? A Gallic Hindoostan — a Parisian Cathay. Come, there is something worth working for! And you and I can do it, if we like, I swear! Bring the drawing, then, and a tumbler of Jamaica—”

She sailed out, he tossing off a coat à la guillotine, low-collared to show stock and collar behind, drew gloves, loosened stays: and he sat siffling through his teeth-edges.

“Now,” said he, when she reappeared with coffee and plan, “we set to thinking, Lise, till our foreheads bladder out like Lord Derby’s. Here is Grand-court Abbey, like a Maltese Cross: this drawing of Dupin’s is certainly not exact, but it will do: here’s the lake washing the south wing; here’s the avenue of sycamores running south from the lake; here, twelve miles south, is the coast. Looking over the lake is the library. Two or three miles from the avenue lies the martellotower. As agreed, our men do not approach nearer the Abbey than the martello-tower, inside which they lie hid, till you bring the prisoner to them. Your idea of seizing him boldly in the Abbey, and killing every living thing is Napoleonic, Lise: but we must not be blind to the tremendous risk that some servant might escape to the villages, and have us overpowered before you reach the coast. There must be no risk. Not the least reason exists why the whole thing should not be certain as arithmetic beforehand: it is my will: I must have it so. Our problem, then, is to get the illustrious man from the Abbey to the martello at the right moment.”

“That’s easy done as lighting the gas lights,” said Lise. “Provided you supply me with the Means, I have the whole schemed out in my head, and can have him like a mouse.”

“Say a trapped lion, audacious female. Give me kisses for that cruel, wanton heart. Do you love me still with the old flames, jade?”

“Ah, Camille — no, no. As if you merited such adoration—”

“Don’t I love it, then, the love-sick soul? By Heavens, I saw a little dandyess this morning in the Mall — ! There is something in the English type, after all — But to the business — the Means, you say. What means?”

After a silence she said: “Is this Lieutenant Opie married?”

“Then I go down as his wife, privately married; and as his wife I take the despatches which you obtain from him; my entrée, for a definite reason, on a definite business, into the Abbey is the first End: and the despatches are the first Means.”

“That I understand: go on.”

“Has he any relatives, this Opie?”

“One, that I know of; ha, ha! and such an one, Lise!”

“Who, then?”

“Pon my word, I only found it out this afternoon: tis exquisite: look here, Lise.” He reached for his coat, and drew one of Ackermann’s prints from a pocket. It was a drawing by Woodforde of a girl in an Oldenburg poke: but beneath the poke was no human face, but the gross face of a pig. At the bottom appeared the words: “A Pig in a Poke.”

Lise uttered a dainty exclamation, half hypocritical, for the drawing was not new to her. It, and others like it, was then the rage in all the print-shops: and there ran a persistent rumour, and belief; in London that an actual pig-faced lady was then existing in some hidden nook of the town. Two or three even knew that in the rumour was truth.

“That lady,” said Verdier, “is the niece of Opie.”

Lise cried out: “Good, good! That is, if you can find her—”

“Oh, I know where she is. Of course, the drawing is an exaggeration: she is more like a rat than a pig, poor girl, and a good little soul, I’m told. I had it in great confidence from Willis, the old King’s physician, at Whattier’s. He has seen her. She is well-made, he avers, but has no chin, and is an imbecile—”

“Excellent! Where is she?”

“At Opie’s house, No. 11 Bedford Square, next door to Lord Eldon’s.”

“Oh, she is in Opie’s keeping?”

‘He is her only relative, and tenderly attached to her, Willis swears. He had her hidden in the country till the war was over, and then brought her here.’”

“Could you kidnap her?”

“Easy enough. But why?”

“Don’t you perceive what a Providence is in this creature? I have to get the vir illustrissimus from the Abbey to the martello: well and good; but that distance is no short one: I could not ask him to accompany me to the martello. I can ask him to accompany me into the long avenue, perhaps: his known gallantry makes that easy done. But from the avenue I could only get him further by evoking some passion of his mind: and I have long decided that that passion should be something in the nature of chivalry: how if he saw a cruelty in the doing and ran out to stop it, and the people committing it ran towards the martello? That is my general conception: the minutiae can be planned as we proceed. But to make certain, the cruelty should be a shocking one, done by people of established ill-fame: and I have had the thought of gipsies, bearing a living person in a coffin to bury. But what living person? The best would be a relative of Opie's: for if I told the Duke, from the first, that a relative of Opie's had been kidnapped by gipsies, that would furnish a good reason for Opie's having entrusted the dispatches to me, his wife, since Opie would have gone hunting this lost relative; and also, if that relative had a striking peculiarity of person, and the peculiar coffined form was described before-hand to the Duke by, say, one of the gipsies disgusted with his tribe, then that would furnish an irresistible motive to the Duke to follow the miscreants; since, I suppose, the Duke and Opie are more or less friends—"

"Lise, you are Reason itself! See, hussy, I kiss your hand with kneeling: ah, that pleases her, then! 'Fore God, I do love you, Lise. But my head is full of. great affairs, my dear girl — you can't expect me to play the love-sick swain at such a juncture. It will do, that scheme of yours! I feel and perceive that it will. But the gipsies! — can they be trusted? and how would they behave to that poor afflicted female?"

"Oh, as to that, we cannot afford the luxury of qualms and compunctions, 'tis sure. She takes her chances. Charming, your considerateness, Camille, for all the world — and strange your mercilessness to one. What, you are not going? I am having some milk-punch brewed below stairs—”

“No! I am off. Quick and sure, girl! I have served under a man, Lise, who struck, when he struck, like Heaven’s own Hammer: and I have his trick of Thunder, be Gad! Au r’voir!”

“But whither would you be flying at such an hour of the night?”

“Hounslow Heath—”

“The gipsies! But not now—”

“Yes — Oh, by the way, instal yourself to-morrow at the Foreign Hotel in Leicester Square, will you? At three I wait upon you there with Opie and some others to drink a dish of tea. Here — three signed cheques on Coutts’. Be sure retain the most genteel suite, with an apartment for carding: everything high-toned and elegant, no silver-plate — gold — and you in your gowns and ostrich-and-diamond headdress. And twist the eyes about, and let ’em see the white bust — au r’voir!”

Down he swaggered three steps at a time, and off he set, using the whip and siffling, flicking at everything, oil-lamp and belated staggerer, ward-constable, watchman, and darkling street-brawl. Soon he was careering in open country, and at about three in the morning sat on Hounslow Heath in one of those four-wheeled waggons, with tyres a foot wide, in which the poor, and the gipsy, travelled England. Around him spread a camp of fifty asses, panniers, dying fires, little carts and whiskies, mysterious sheeted masses, glints and streaks of romantic light, a baby-cry, and the free simplicity of the Bedouin. Here, at all times, were to be found three or four gipsy-camps.

Even with forty million inhabitants England is practically an uninhabited land. With twelve, there was “room for wandering.”

Before Verdier a man sat on a box, a sleeping child on each knee, a slipper and stocking on one leg, an ankle-jack and bandage on the other: a broad-faced, dark-bearded clown, whose wild black eyes had yet seen star-visions of which Fox and Selwyn, making yonder for Howard and Gibbs, the Jews, after a hard night at Brooke's, never once dreamed.

He and Verdier concocted and confabulated two whole fore-day hours: till Verdier, rising, said:

"You are certain, then, that you could handle a boat eight or ten miles on the sea?"

"Sure and certain, guv'nor: and done it oft and oft in the Cornwall reaches," said the man. "So it is a bargain?"

"It is, guv'nor."

"You'll be gentle, fellow, with that poor girl?"

"We will, guv'nor, we will."

"Your name, sir?"

"Corrie Lovell, guv'nor."

"Well, I take you, Lovell, for an honest fellow."

"Not much honesty about us poor folk, guv'nor: but faithful enough are we to those that cross our hand with the yellow stuff."

"Very well said: you are an honest fellow. And now, the price of the whole."

"Ah, that's it: the price, guv'nor—"

"Name a sum."

"Well, 'cod! taking all into consideration, I say — fifty golden guineas!"

"Tush! you have not to do with a St. Giles's pauper, fellow. Be somewhat less modest, sir."

"Well, 'cod! you talk like a King, every inch: cod! I say a hundred and — twenty golden guineas!"

“You are mighty modest, friend! Well, say three hundred golden guineas for the whole, exquisitely done. You see, I am liberal. Here, meantime, are ten for earnest. The rest I hand you the moment that we step from the martello-tower and seize the gentleman: you can have one of your men hiding there, with mine, to receive it. Meantime, day and night from tomorrow, you have a man in waiting at Leicester Square near the Foreign Hotel.”

“Right! Only — here — a word in your ear: our tribe’s been in this lair over a se’ennight, and the younger colts getting frisky to be away moorlanding. The wild blood, you know, and the straying itch, ‘cod! Don’t you keep ’em waiting too long—”

“You cat them into order. Three hundred golden guineas, sir. Zounds, I am sleepy. Till we meet again, Lovell—”

As he went away, he saw the scheme blossoming fair: nor could now even conceive of mishap. It was grey morning. Half-way towards his waiting curricule, he heard a singular sound — the roar of a lion; and turning, saw the square of a travelling-menagerie pitched close by the road.

It was so near him, that, at some spur of curiosity, he went and peered between two tarpaulin- flaps, to spy the animals.

Right before him, in a lion’s cage, he saw a girl stand, whip in hand, evidently training the creature to do something: a darkly-flushed girl, hardly clad, with splendid golden eyes.

Had he not been stumbling drowsy, he would certainly have been adventurous: but he only muttered:

“Beauteous creature,” and went off nodding.

Two days afterwards (she so haunted him), he returned: but the menagerie was gone. It was his lot, however, to meet both menagerie and girl again.

CHAPTER III. THE DESPATCHES

WITHIN THREE DAYS Opie was as much under the spell of Lise d'Arblay as it was the duty of a Man of Fashion to be.

For when a pretty woman shows her ring, what can a poor man do?

Twice daily he visited "the Foreign" — before "the Squeeze," and at night. At the Guards', on his entry now, his cheek-bones, new-rouged, drew from men the groan of "O Lord God!", and the down-turned lips of comic nausea. It was as though rude old Blücher should smell sal- ammoniac, or an elephant wear ball-slippers. Opie's cheek-bones were no longer part of himself — his real self of dislocated teeth, all yellow, and rough exterior. He was nothing but a born soldier. After a wound at Salamanca, he had killed seven men, and then dropped. He could use his sword, he could drink, he could swear and be loud. Under his slashed bosom was, however, a kind and simple heart, and he would shower largesses upon the poor with vociferations, damn me, and curses. The Duke of Wellington secretly liked him, which proves that Opie was a gentleman somewhere inside. Each morning, with perfect tenderness, he would kiss a cheek which never, never received other kiss — his afflicted niece, that puckered, pink rat- face. He considered' it the duty of man to love, and win the heart, of every dashing female, ecod. Lise d'Arblay woke in his brain the lust of Cumberland corsets: but in this matter he achieved nothing: he had too much drunk. However, the lady was clearly his slave: for ogle she gave back ogle: a certain levity in her giggle no old campaigner could mistake: she intended to be adorable. Pity only that, after out-works and escarpment carried, he had to abandon the citadel for a time. On the 9th of the month, at a tête-à-tête in the afternoon, he said as much to her.

“My goodness, you are not leaving the town?” said Lise near him on a settee, splendid in tissue gown bordered with silver jonquils, and jewelled stomacher, a painting on satin before her which anon she bent to touch and finish.

“Alas! ’tis Fate’s Decree, madam.”

“Then we part! Well, ’tis ever so—”

“For a time—” he touched her arm comfortingly— “for a time only: a se’ennight, ten days. madam, ’twill but add sauce to the goose when I have the honour to behold you again!”

“I also shall take myself off,” said Lise, weary and woe-begone: “I am sickened of the town.”

“Fie, fie. You wait — a se’ennight — ten days. Whither would you be going, flow?”

“To Bath — Brighton — Margate—”

“Why, damn me — begging pardon before a lady — dull as stale porter, all of them! There you will find nothing just now agreeable to your inclinations. Have you seen the fashionable Brighton Herald, poking fun at the new gilt blocks of the Regent’s yacht?”

“Oh — but — there is always the elegant Masquerade at the theatre, the novels, the gardens at Dandelion, the Assembly at the Rooms, the sprightly misses and beaux on the Cliffs, Parades, and Piers; at Bath, the pump-room, — “And in town! what have you! Ecod! The Satirical Prints! The Panharmonicon at Spring Gardens, and the Papyruseum at Soho! Vauxhall! why, Vauxhall alone, with its illuminations, bands, fire-works, and dancing — and the Park, odd Zookers! and the Clubs! and the fine writing, and the fine feeling, damn me; and the Rank, Fashion, Dash and Style of the town!

— don't you go, now: zounds, you lose all, I swear, and gain nothing, madam."

"I am firmly resolved, sir."

"Then for how long? Madam, the question concerns my most intimate feelings."

"Why, sir, you do me too much honour. I may be away a se'ennight — ten days—"

"Aha! And when do you go, now?"

"When do you go?"

"I go post the day after to-morrow morning at five by my private coach —" Lise panted.

"Dear me, so soon?" said she: "the day after to-morrow morning at five? That is to say, on Thursday morning, the eleventh instant — at five? Is't so?"

"You have it! 'Tis so."

"Must you go, sir? Heigh-ho!"

"I must, madam, damn me — begging pardon before a lady. You see, I am taking down some Departmental Despatches to my Chief at Grandcourt in Devon—"

"Then, sir, I shall certainly not be here to witness your departure. I bid adieu to London tomorrow morning, without fault."

"Dash my wig!" thought Opie, "the female's love-sick as a mermaid. Why shouldn't I attack now?"

He attacked: but was interrupted by the announcement at the door of Lord Archibald Ingram: and soon Opie left the field to the new-coiner.

Ingram, of the Guards, was a fresh, tall, beardless youth, with a lung affection, and a stoop, and protective silk wrappings about the throat and chest. He was the brother of Lady Elwell, the hostess of the Duke of Wellington.

He had already been present at three of Verdier's choice dinners and all-night card-parties, and his young head and tongue were full of his new friendship with the Marquis de la Terville- Rochefoucauld, and the condescending amiable charms of Mdlle. d'Arblay — the Marquis's aunt.

Lord Archibald's "place" happened to be only twenty-three miles from Grandcourt; and the same hour that Verdier learned that fact, he had himself presented to the Guardsman, though without definite object.

But when he told Lise, she had said at once:

"That might be neatly turned to our account, surely. Would it not be a most desirable circumstance if the Duke were quite alone at Grandcourt, without host or hostess, on the 19th and 20th? It is well worth the trying for, at least."

"Yes — proceed — I don't see—" said Verdier.

"If the Guardsman fell sick unto death at — what is the place? — Market Graddon — about the 17th, only twenty-three miles from Grandcourt, surely his sister, Lady Elwell, would go to him: and her husband might escort her for a day or two, leaving the illustrious guest alone. She at least would go, sure. We should be big boobies if we do not accomplish it."

"Lise, Lise — but how have him sick, there and then?"

"D'Artois understands physic."

Well?"

"Set d'Artois up as a Harley Street quack — nothing is necessary save a wig, and a gold-top stick, for the cow-leech who attended my father had not even an Apothecary's Hall certificate. The Guardsman falls ill while drinking here; we put him to bed and call in d'Artois, who peremptorily orders him to the country, and is prevailed upon to accompany him to Market Graddon. D'Artois may then be trusted to have him at death's door by the 16th or 17th, and pack a messenger post to summon relatives at Grandcourt. 'Tis too easy to be resisted, and too safe to be neglected."

Verdier sprang up: with a smile not untinctured disgust, he said, bowing:

'Lise, you would be a Richelieu, if you were not a Borgia. It shall be done."

Guardsmen were accordingly inveigled into the Circle at the Foreign Hotel, and played high, and won. After putting Opie to flight on the afternoon of the 9th, the boy dawdled long by the side of Lise, led by her through all the temperatures of passion, and was at last all one glow at the favour of a hardwon kiss, when a rowdy band of dandies, headed by Verdier, noisy, with wit, came up. Five, including Ingram and big Dupin, dined at the hotel, en famille; and about eleven, after supper, when Lise was ballad-singing to the new-fashioned Guitar, amid fumes of the new-fashioned Cigarro, some fourteen, all fuddled and gorged, including Opie and Lord Castlereagh, arrived to "spend the evening." Then ensued Cordiality. On the central card-room table was a chased silver urn, with ladle, containing five gallons of Regent's Punch. Thither the men repaired to play through the night whist, faro, chicken hazard, rouge et noir, nap, Opie and Verdier being croupiers, while many and many a rouleau of Portugal gold changed hands, and the soft-footed waiters came and went, screwing and drawing with suavest pop. It was the Symposium.

About one, Opie, with waved glass and shut eyes, was bawling: "Sing Old Rose, and burn the Bellows."

At three, young Ingram, with a start of soberness, cried out: "Oh, my heart!" and dropped forward upon his table, well drugged.

He was borne in the arms of Dupin to a bedroom, and Verdier himself drove to call a doctor. He returned with his accomplice, the Marquis d'Artois.

At five the Symposium broke up. By eight Lise d'Arblay was in the Exeter Coach, and away westward, her object being a knowledge of the country round Grandcourt, to be gained during the week before the 19th, and communicated to the frigate already cruising in those waters.

At five p.m. on the day of her departure, the Marquis d'Artois stood, watch in hand, over Lord Archibald Ingram, where he lay tossing under white dimity; the doctor had been bleeding and physicking him most of the day, and he said with truth:

“Your lordship is truly sick: and I now perceive that the disorder must end fatally, unless you promptly decide to leave the foetid atmosphere of the town.”

His lordship groaned.

“Why, I have no whither to go,” said he, “if it be not to my little place in Devon—”

“Then repair thither,” said the physician, “the journey will help to dislodge the disorder. If your lordship’s seat is near Plymouth, I know a venerable and estimable practitioner in that town (though, I admit, uncertificated), to whose skilful hands I could recommend you with confidence.”

Verdier, sitting at the bed-head, whispered the sick lad:

“Try to get the fellow to accompany you himself: sound him first as to his fees, and then see. He is a Frenchman, with a certificate from the Faculty of Paris, and more expert than those lubberly country quacks.”

“Well, and what might be your fee to attend me to my little place, doctor?” asked Ingram. “What! and leave a lucrative practice — !” exclaimed d'Artois.

But he was prevailed upon: and the same evening went post westward, with the patient. Three hours later the Symposium reassembled at the Foreign. Opie, who had faithfully promised to spend with Verdier his last night in town, was there. There also, for the first time, were six Frenchmen in addition to Verdier, viz., Dupin, the Sub-secretary and Recruteur of the Société, an ex-officer of Cuirrassiers named Albert Corot, the artist Tissot, and a grizzled Grande Armée Adjutant, named Richepin; also the Duc de Bassano, and Caulaincourt.

The movements of Opie had been watched that day by the gipsy, Lovell. He had been seen to attend the War Office, and come out with a sealed packet, which he had taken home.

The Symposium raged. It struck midnight.

At that moment, some fifteen or twenty gipsies were about Opie's house, No. 11 Bedford Square. A broad-wheeled covered waggon, with four horses yoked in pairs by the collar-hames, and belied, waited round the corner in Charlotte Street. In Tottenham Court Road a watchman's rattle passed. But in the square not a soul but the gipsies; and no sound: only from Lord Edon's first-floor near a drunken solo: also, from between the two white-painted pillars with massive pediments before No. 11, went a low sound of picking and prising. Lovell was there, forcing the lock.

When the door flew back, he whistled, and the band entered and struck light. In a second-floor room they found a slatternly old woman in drunken sleep across a bed, and in the same bed the object of their search. One gipsy struck the woman into deeper sleep with a spiked bludgeon — a blow of which she died after some months. The twinkling rat-eyes regarded them without fear, and the mouth of that aged-young visage wrinkled back in a smile. She rose at their bidding, they flurriedly dressed her, carried her down, closed the door, hurried her to the waggon, and drove away westward.

Meantime, the Symposium raged. Here was every device for gambling, the E.O. table, black- and-white-cocks, te-to-tum, wheel-of-fortune, dice, cards, prick-the-garter; there was champagne, port, hock, sparkling old punch. Opie, who proposed no sleep on that last night of good company and the upper circles, having the morrow for the coach-corner snooze, was at a faro table with Richepin, the Adjutant, ready for departure, in his pockets being pill-box, flask, light-blue Sèvres snuff-box — and the Despatches. Yonder, at the Mews in Little James Street, his sleepy guard, driver, and postillions were busied about the coach. The china clock on the mantelpiece pointed to half-past three.

Suddenly there pierced through thick layers of punch to the inmost core of Lieutenant Opie's brain, the sense of these words:

“Why, damn me, the fellow is cheating! I say it!

It was Richepin who spoke.

So momentous were the words, that to every fuddled brain reached the shock: and all play ceased.

Opie stared a full minute at the face of his accuser, his eyes all filmed with the vague rheums of fuddlement; then he smiled crookedly, while his freckled right hand slowly moved — toward the table; he grasped a pack of cards; and with strong directness sent them a flighty cloud into the face of Richepin.

Richepin bowed. The others stumbled round. “Had I not to be away in an hour,” said Opie, with a majestic deliberateness of staggering tongue, “I'd carve that rascal like a baron of beef—”

“Yes, you go without fighting me,” vociferated Richepin with strong French accent, “and I have you posted over the town for a base coward before sun-up —

“Gentlemen, gentlemen—” went Verdier.

“What’s o’clock?” muttered Opie, with cool frowning peer at the clock.
“Oh, damn me, I have time—”

“Can nothing be done, gentlemen?” said Verdier. “Nothing, sir,” answered Opie.

“Well, take your own way. I have the good fortune to be able to supply you with an excellent pair of swords.”

Below, the square was well packed with waiting phaetons and curricles. The party, after a babel of talk, trooped down. Verdier and Kier, a young beau of the East India College, were Opie’s seconds, Bassano and Corot were Richepin’s.

Richepin, a war-veteran, had besides acquired a Parisian fame for duelling; while Opie was no delicate imbiber of orgeat and forced-fruit at Owen’s, and many a stout fellow who had proved him at boxing or quarter-staff, back-sword or wrestling-match, might have whispered the Frenchman:

“Beware!”

The vehicles set off. The morning was without characteristic, save darkness; clouds, with a vague local smear of moonlight, covering the sky. The fresh air caught Opie’s half-sobered head, and set him singing “Anthony Rowly.”

At tearing rate they went through the quiet streets, most making homewards, unenticed by so commonplace a thing as an affair of honour. Only the seven Frenchmen, Keir, Opie, and another Englishman, went together southwards and eastwards in five vehicles.

Down the Strand — through Blackfriars.

Opie, his head thrown back, his left leg in air, chortled deep and solemn:

“The Prince he would a-raking go,
Heigh-ho! said Rowly;
Whether the people would have him or no,
With a rowly-powly gammon and spinach:
Heigh-ho! said Anthony Rowly.”

They came to St. George’s Fields, about where the New Kent Road now is; and they placed the carriage-lanterns in a ring. Opie pulled himself well together. He handed his coat to his driver, and said:

“In the pocket are some papers for the Duke: if I fall insensible you take them early in the morning to the War Office.”

Then the fighters stood with rolled shirt-sleeves on stubble. Opie was sober and cool, shook his sword testingly, swept a finger round the inside of his shirt-collar, spat on his palm, settled his chin, and with tentative plantings got a firm cock of the leg. The suggestion to drug him before the fight had been mooted among the French, but Verdier had refused.

The two measured swords, and fought, Richepin with great brusquerie, Opie with the cautious blade of a very old hand, who had learned to wait. The swords plied with brisk interaction for a space of perhaps three minutes; then they locked and jostled to edge, slipping, grinding, during ten intense and breathless seconds, till Richepin’s wrist jerked aside, and with brisk passado Opie ran him through the heart.

“Oh, foul! foul!” cried six French throats, and at the same time Opie was surrounded by drawn blades.

For a moment he stood recoiled, infinitely startled, with averting hands: there was nothing foul about it! But with quick insight, he muttered, gasping:

“What, a conspiracy, you French curs?”

And fiercely bringing down his knuckles upon the eyes of Corot, he broke through, and was gone, the others after him. He reached his phaeton, and galloping off tossed to the ground Dupin, who had caught the reins.

Away he flew northward, to Theobald's Road, to Little James Street, where his coach was making ready; and with eager dispatch he was rattling westward through Piccadilly before 4.30.

"What could they have been after?" he sat wondering, singularly subdued now, and trembling like a frightened horse, he knew not why.

In reality this agitation was a presentiment of death. The Frenchmen had anticipated him on his road, and a little beyond Chiswick, five blackened faces — Verdier being absent — rushed from a hedge into the path of his galloping four-in-hand.

The "gentle thief" — both mounted highwayman and foot-pad — was so common, that when the coachman and two horses dropped shot, and the postillions ran yelling, Opie's first impulse was toward his pocket: but as he popped his head out of window, he received some slugs in his brain. The morning light was just then struggling with a rank and misty fore-day gloom. The lieutenant dropped backward with the sigh: "Well, my God, I am done for—"

They at once rifled his pockets, and one went riding hard to Hounslow Heath, where they handed the despatches to the gipsy, Lovell, for delivery into the hands of Mdlle. Lise d'Arblay at Wyemouth; and the same hour the gipsy-caravan started westward, having with them the despatches, and the lieutenant's afflicted niece.

CHAPTER IV. THE BUSY BEE

EITHER THE 19TH or 20th was the day decided upon for the French attempt, and by the 13th Mdle. d'Arblay had reached Wyemouth, the nearest town to Grandcourt.

On the left bank of the Wye stood the "Busy Bee" inn, which, however, was never busy: a roomy old house, having a large garden-lawn, provided with swings, and material for skittles, bowls, quoits, knock-'em-downs, and gaming. At the south end the lawn overlooked the sea; and in the south-east corner was a grotto of rough stones among tamarisk trees.

To the "Busy Bee" Mdle. d'Arblay, as previously arranged, brought her portmanteau, and took a room; she then hired a stables' horse for a week, and for four days haunted the moor, the villages, the canal, and took note of everything which seemed of interest.

On the 17th Lovell's gipsy-band arrived tardy, and camped in a field a mile north of Grandcourt. Lovell and another at once hurried to the "Busy Bee" with despatches. Lise d'Arblay, anxiously on the look-out, ran down to the bar parlour, and took them to the grotto, where she heard the London news, and bow all had gone well, save the death of Richepin. She at once provided Lovell with money to hire a small sail-boat, giving him the notes she had made of the locality to take to the frigate, which, by arrangement, lay-to each day at three p.m. eight miles southwest of Wyemouth. Lise sent also a letter to Verdier, now on board, in which she definitely fixed the 20th as the Day, advising that on the 18th or 19th the seizing party should land at night to make themselves familiar with the ground in darkness, and adding that on the 20th, as soon as she had seen the Duke, she would send Lovell with a letter to tell them that all was well on her side, and would await the answer that they, too, were all ready, before proceeding to act.

On the afternoon of the 19th she ran from a back door to the grotto to meet Lovell for the last time, and give final directions. Through a little green door she passed into a hut of stones, opened another beyond, and there sitting on an ass under an arbour was the gipsy, his saddle being a wooden hurdle over straw, two bars of the hurdle serving as stirrups, so that his bent-up knees gave him the grotesqueness of a grasshopper bestriding a mouse. Over the animal's quarters were two wicker panniers secured by straps, one stuffed with cloth, trinkets, cutlery, and small- wares; in the other lived a child, sucking gingerbread.

Corrie Lovell pulled a reverent lock of hair beneath his ragged soft felt hat; while Lise d'Arblay took a watch from her bosom, and handed it to him.

"There, sir," said she, "is a recognition of your services, which I give now, because you will have good use for it to-morrow. But first, is everything ready?"

"Everything, lady."

"The two gipsies well drilled in their little comedy?"

"Trust me for that. Everything, in fact."

"The coffin ready?"

"Everything, I tell you, lady, and our people only anxious to have it over."

"And the girl is docile? Does she always begin to pound the coffin — lid when she hears the three taps above her head?"

"Oh, she's a glory, lady. You just teach her anything, and she does it. She's just like a little dog or a mouse. She's weak, weak in the head, lady."

Lovell was amused.

“Well, that is all excellent,” said Lise. “Now, listen. To-morrow morning I go to Grandcourt: in the early afternoon I wish to send you with a letter to the frigate, and that letter I will place in a hollow where a stone is missing inside the martello-tower: you will be there to seek it, Lovell, precisely at one p.m. Now, supposing you take six hours at the most to reach the frigate and return to Grandcourt, that makes that you bring me an answer at seven at the latest. Now tell me the hours when you go for my letter, and when you bring the answer.”

“At One, lady; and at Seven.”

“Precise. Now, there are still two more hours to remember. At Nine, sir, your band passes the end of the avenue with the coffined form; at Nine. And at Half after Eight the two gipsies are in the avenue. ou comprehend? Now, what are the four hours appointed?”

“At One I go to the martello for your letter, lady,” said Lovell; “at Seven I bring you answer from the ship; at Half after Eight them two are in the avenue; at Nine the false funeral passes, lady.”

“Precise! And you have a watch, sir. You cannot fail.”

They then parted.

Meantime, the whole country-side was full of the consciousness that the great Duke was in it.

CHAPTER V. MR. GOLDE

THAT NIGHT, THE 19th, was excessively dark. A certain Mr. Godfrey Golde, travelling near eleven from Newton to Seacombe, could not see his hand. Not only was there no moon nor stars, but there was no sky. The interspace seemed stuffed with a blackness like black cotton.

There was sound, however, if not sight: the continuous murmur of the near sea, chasing itself in long-drawn shallow surfs over a shelly bottom. The interwoven fugue and roundelay of their monotone filled the abyss of darkness with a primeval noising. There seemed nothing in the universe save a roar, and an ear.

Mr Golde was alone: and it was the last probability in the world that he should meet anyone. He was a thick-set man of twenty-eight years, with a pale, broad face, round which and the throat ran a bandage of short whisker and beard, the space between bottom lip and chin being nude of hair: a “sympathetic” face — but his grey eyes were prominent, heavy-lidded and phlegmatic, his walk heavy. He wore a snuff-coloured coat with brass buttons, and small-clothes, and “breeches,” with woollen stockings, and buckled shoes.

He was a person of rather timid temperament, and when he received a sudden slap in the face, three paces he recoiled, striking away something that tore his face with claws; till a seaward whirring of wings told of some belated and erring sea-fowl, foundered in the night.

“I wish I was well out of it,” Golde muttered, “if the very birds can’t see, it isn’t likely—” Suddenly this thought struck him: had not he, too, lost his way? For surely now the sea-roar was nearer than it should be. He stood still, stooped to feel if he stood on path or grass, then looked about, questioning the vanished world.

Seacombe Moor, lying between the villages of Newton and Seacombe and the town of Wyemouth, has the same general characteristics of the great West-of-England moors: treeless, almost pathless, desolate, choked with thistle, bracken, charlock, blue bugloss, the sparse grass near the shore showing interspaces of barren earth. Four miles north of the shore runs the Portland Canal, bisecting the moor.

But that Mr. Golde, a Newton miller, should lose the familiar foot-path to Seacombe, even in the densest night, was singular: he knit his brows, peering: this was not as it should be. Hobgoblins? He believed in them: for witches were still in England, and evil things of the air had been known to entice many a poor wight to baleful dooms on such weird nights — aye, in that very neighbourhood, too. If Golde had seen a ridden broomstick pitch sulphurous athwart the Erebus dark, leaving a trail and lingering sparks, his timorous awe could hardly have intensified. He cleared his throat with nervous effort.

But suddenly his heart lightened, and he resumed his plodding way: he had recognised what had led him astray.

It was the lights! Soon after setting out he had observed two far gleams, and though thinking it singular that he should see Seacombe lights from that point, and at such an hour, he had been mechanically steering his way towards them.

Only now he observed that their relative positions had changed, and as he looked afresh, one disappeared a minute, reappeared, and now was certainly in motion. It was not long before he decided that one was the light of a moving ship far out, and one of a stationary boat probably no farther than the line where the sea began to break into in-trooping surf. Golde said to himself: "They will be smugglers."

He had to be at Seacombe very early in the morning for rendezvous with two farmers, and, already doubtful of a bed, struck off north-eastward with a will, guessing his way.

All at once, the night-airs seemed to bring to his ears from far a sound like laughing in another world, and immediately, a mixture of human voices, jargoning vague as the messages from Heaven heard in sea-shells.

The next moment he stumbled over some obstacle, fell upon his hands, heard a groan; and his hand, groping, encountered a face — all wet. Yet the night was dry.

He bent low. "Can you speak? Who are you?"

A groan. He crouched, and raised a man's head. He felt a beard — then a guernsey — then pantaloons wet to the waist, having apparently passed through the surf.

"How have you got into this, friend?" said Golde with half-a-thought of elf-king, and malign carnivals of mischief in the dark air: "I am afraid I can do little for you, whoever you are. Can't you speak at then?"

"Yes," replied a voice, "soon — a little breath. I am dying, I have something — to say — do not leave me—"

Golde patted his head, saying:

"Very good — take your time, and do not excite yourself. There is no fear of my leaving you.

"Talk low. O God, I do feel bad. Listen — you are an Englishman. Your ear: — there is a French scheme to seize the Duke of Wellington to-morrow, and carry him off. I was in it. Yonder's the frigate, see. I am a Savoyard, I; my name is Dejoie. I have lived in England four years — about this part, too — a groom I was. Before then I was at the storming of Badajoz, where General Walker fell at the head of his brigade; I found him wounded in the breach, and carried him to our French hospital. He thanked me — gave me his address. Soon after, I was taken at Salamafica, and brought prisoner to Dartmoor. I wrote to Walker, and he got me free. Then I came to Wyemouth — here four years groom to a Mr. Onslow—”

“What, you are not Mr. Onslow’s Jean Dejoie — ?”

“That’s it — yes — damn me, I do feel so bad—”

Golde lifted higher the heavy head. “Is that better?”

“Oh, yes — aha. Talk low. Aha — feel a bit easier that way. Well, it is a secret Society in Paris, to seize the Duke: I joined: and the thing is sure — it cannot fail — can’t explain why, now: ah, I’m going, going, going. . . . I got disgusted, I had rows with Danda, and I said I’d betray. I owe much, much to England. We landed to-night to go over the ground, and I thought to escape in the dark: but they suspected, they suspected: as I ran, God! I was shot—”

“I see, I see, poor lad. And are you the only soul who knows — ?” asked Golde.

“And you, now. Another minute — it will be you alone. If they find out that, your life—” Golde felt a chill.

“Well, but they can’t guess — I am revenged. You will be at Grandcourt: let it be before morning, and they are dished. Pah! now I am bleeding in the mouth: that’s damned droll—”

He uttered not one other word, but after a stark throe lay still in Golde’s arms.

“Ah dear, here is trouble come to meet folk,” thought Golde, “the poor man’s dead, I suppose.” This momentous burden of tidings packed now upon his shoulders, his personal peril, and the dark presence of death, all dismayed him: and mixed with all, was the irksome sense of hurry and bother natural to an indolent fellow to whom comfort and slow routine were matters of importance. He was pale, flurried: and, to ascertain if the man were really dead, he fumbled among his small-clothes, found flint-and-steel box, and, without reflection, dashed them together.

A red wink cut the dark.

And instantly there answered it a shout of several voices not far off. For the French, chary of striking flashes, hiding their presence from the very air, and, of course, without visible lanthorn, were silently seeking the body of Dejoie in the neighbourhood of his fall, which they had seen. They had, however, considerably strayed, till Golde's flash revealed him bending over the body.

And the mere fact that, realising himself as doomed, Golde hurriedly dropped the body, and took, as they soon discovered, to his heels, was enough to assure them that he had the secret from the traitor, Dejoie.

And, first, they halted in a body to make sure that Dejoie was well dead.

Meantime, Mr Golde, who was no runner, ran that night, striking north-eastwards across the open; till at last, after some four hours of panting toil, he saw a line of faintly-twinkling lights, which could be only Seacombe. Surprised at Seacombe awake till now, he guessed some wake or fête in connection with the local pillow-lace making and straw-plaiting. He observed, however, that the line of lights was broken by a long gap of darkness in its centre — three lights, then the gap, then four lights; and the reason was soon explained, when he suddenly struck against some obstruction — a waggon which had blocked his field of vision.

He felt the wheels, moved laterally to avoid it, but came upon another, and another — a line of waggons. To make short work, he lifted a hanging canvas-flap, dived under a waggon, lifted another, and came out on the other side. And now, when he looked for the Seacombe lights, they all, to his mystification, had vanished.

He went groping, but felt nothing: by an indefinable sensation, however, he knew himself no longer in the open air, and noticed, too, an unusual odour. Then he had a shock: on a level with his own he saw two eyes, lambent amber with sable centres, suspended apparently in the darkness; their luminous gaze held him fascinated, till a sudden innovating voice shocked the silence, pouring forth in waves, shaking the black air with reverberations, while still, with never a blink, the great eyes regarded Golde. The miller cleared a nervous throat. And in a moment his ears were overwhelmed: for that pealing solo was joined by another, and another, and a fourth, till the contagion of thunder, caught from throat to throat, swelled into a chorus — before, behind, around — of roars, yells, voices of maniac laughter, maniac screams, and chuckled jabbering. Mr. Golde should have crossed himself: but was no Papist. In two minutes, however, the Babel subsided into silence, as a child is hushed to sleep; only a tormented howl, like the last sobs, would grow and wail itself away.

And in a flash the darkness was abolished, and Golde found himself in the hollow square of a travelling menagerie, while in the cage of the lion, whose eyes had frightened him, he saw a girl stand, torch in hand. She had entered from behind.

She was dressed in the most frivolous gauze, all spangled, showing white slippers, and a velvet cap with green feather: this to accustom the lion to a special garb during special feats. She fascinated Golde's gaze not less than had the lion; while, her hand on the tawny flank, she said, with firm lips:

“Come, Pol.”

Apollyon yawned a red cavern with stalactites, stretched, and rose. The girl drew forth an ebony flageolet, and blew two sharp notes. The lion ramped, and took the torch between his forepaws: he began to dance, while she, leaning, blew a soft, slow horn-pipe, he holding the torch-light like a flag, throwing fantastic shadows, and marking the close of every phrase of the melody by a sharp roar, like a shout. He towered two feet above her, round his enormous head floating and flapping a cloud of mane.

Two minutes it lasted, and then, suddenly, the lion, still ramping, stood motionless, like one struck into listening. For from the outer dark and distance of the moor a sound arose and grew. It resembled successive sharp strokes of the bow on the strings of the bass viol: it was the bay of a bloodhound: and the knees of Golde shook.

His hands were red with the blood of murdered Dejoie.

The lion, dropping the torch, fell to his fore-feet, and dashed to his bars. The girl's eyes, following, lighted for the first time upon the dim figure of Golde, standing there. She thought at first that the lion's rage was due to him, and catching up the torch was about to run out behind; but now the near voice of the blood-hound arrested her, and immediately the canvas flap where Golde had entered was thrust aside, the fierce-eyed head of the dog filled the aperture, and Apollyon shook his bars, sending forth a roar of menace that went quivering through the night.

Golde was all wonder at the sight of the bloodhound: for, even in that vague light, he knew it for "Ritter," a dog of Mr. Onslow of Newton: and its presence in the hands of the Frenchmen on such a night produced upon his nerves a sense of the mysterious powers of evil.

As a matter of fact, the dog had been given by Mr. Onslow, about to go up to London, into the charge of a dog-keeper at Seacombe. Ritter had suffered a day of imprisonment, tied to a kennel, and as night drew on had filled the place with howlings, bounding from his string like a thing possessed.

By eleven he was galloping through the darkness, trailing a string, with sideward-glaring eyes, back to Newton.

Golde had just struck flint and steel over Dejoie, when the dog's pace slackened suddenly, and stopped. He uttered a yelp; stood sniffing; and started again, but in a changed direction.

By this time Golde was off over the moor.

The dog, on the other hand, made straight for the body: for that hand, now cold, had fed him. And when the French rushed towards the body, they found Ritter yelping, with thrown-back throat, over the dead man. A glint of flint and steel showed them their chance, and dragging away the reluctant dog, they were soon in its eager tow, it scenting the blood of its old friend on Golde's hand, with the instinct now that it was hunting down his murderer.

The lion-tamer stuck the torch in a scone, and looked wonderingly forth between the bars at Golde and at the hound's head.

"What is it?" she cried, in a shouted whisper. "Oh! I am hunted by the very fiends!"

Golde's hands clasped. At that moment, a third face was added to the group, near the ground, where the hound was, beneath the waggon-flap. Both the lion-tamer and Golde glanced and saw it in the leaping flare.

Those eyes glared; the upper lip was long and perfectly pallid, fitting the inward-slanting teeth; a long chin-beard; greasy-black hair very thick, curled about the ears, in which hung ear-rings. From the shoulders, which now appeared, he was small-sized. This was Danda, the captain.

What happened was instantaneous. The girl beckoned vigorously, slid back the door of bars, and stood aside for Golde to spring within.

The blood-hound was straining at the string; Danda picking himself up preparatory to letting it free. Five other faces meanwhile had appeared beneath the waggon-flaps.

Golde flew toward the asylum; and Danda, now on his legs, released the hound. The race was furious as it was short. Golde had reached the waggon-stair, when he was aware of something rushing past him — over him — like a shadow — something huge, winged with swiftness — not towards the cage, but away from it: a cloud of bristling mane; a murmur of expectant joy.

Apollyon had slipped through the opening made for Golde.

There was a roar. The blood-hound, cowering in mortal fear, was face to face with the lion. Danda had shrunk back.

Ritter did not attempt to run, but stood whimpering, fascinated. In three perfectly-curved springs the lion had reached him, brooling boastfully. Then its loud glee gave place to a gurgle of vicious anticipation. For fully half a minute he stopped before the hound, without touching him.

Then he lifted, with perfect deliberation his thick paw, holding it over, still without touching. This action had in it something of the meaning of a smile.

Perhaps it inspired the dog with some touch of intolerable horror, perhaps with a spasm of hope — at any rate, he uttered a growl. And the growl brought on his swift doom. Apollyon was upon him.

Bones popped; and the delicious slush of the lion's sideward munch was heard in the stillness; and again the exploding bones.

CHAPTER VI. MARGARET FERRIS

APOLLYON DID NOT stop to finish: but guiltily slid through an opening between waggons, and went roaming the moor.

“You see what you have done now,” said the girl, with a resigned shrug, “this comes of being good to people.”

Her coolness astonished Golde.

She was of beautiful shape in close-clinging dress, and looked foreign, with black hair, and richly-flushed face, and full lips, and golden eyes. Her name was Margaret Ferris.

“Ah, miss,” whispered Golde, “hide a poor man! These men are acting like demons — they would be killing me—”

Margaret had thrown her back against the cage, looking at her slippered toes.

“Where is one to hide you?” said she, “I don’t see what I can do. There are only two men in the menagerie now, and they are asleep down yonder, drunk.”

The men rushed back, the captain foremost. Full in the torch-light stood Margaret and Golde; she leaning half-crossly, half-resignedly, he wringing hands.

Danda, his white upper lip intensely set, and two fellows near him, took aim. “Shoot the girl!” cried the captain.

Margaret apparently understood French, for she muttered a hurried “Oh, no, thank you!” and seized Golde’s hand, crying, “Come on, then.”

Golde uttered a cry of pain: a shot had grazed his right arm; but two bullets aimed at the girl smashed against the bars.

She drew the back panel, and dragged Golde through. “A race then!” she cried, hilariously; and hand in hand they went running. Golde, a man with a good deal of flesh, was panting.

“Haven’t you a weapon?” she asked.

“No,” he said between two breaths.

“We need not care for them. The night is as black as an Arab mare. They can’t see us — and their blood-hound is gone.”

“My God!” the white-lipped captain was shrieking, “you have let them go!”

“’Twas the vile bars!” said Dupin, with a gesture of despair.

“You see the torch,” Verdier said, coolly touching his moustache with shapely forefinger. “Why lose time in raving?”

“What torch?”

Verdier nodded toward the lion’s cage. “What about it?”

“You want light, I suppose?”

“That’s no good!” shrieked Danda; “that’ll show us to them, not them to us.” Verdier, with a light spring, entered the cage, and held the flame to the woodwork. The boarding blackened, crackled, flamed.

“Fire — fire the whole!” cried the captain, his brain grasping the other’s idea. “Let it burn!” Two minutes later Margaret and Golde noticed a glimmering, looked backward, and in the midst of a flare saw three shapes following hotly upon their track.

The woodwork was old, and in ten minutes the quadrangle was an undulating sea, sending out from its vivid focus a dusky glare over the moor. The night was rolled back, and every step of Golde and Margaret was now seen.

“It is a question of running, you see,” said she, dragging Golde’s hand. “I could beat them I know.”

“They have weapons,” he panted. “They will shoot us, however fast we run.”

“They are not such very good shots, I think. Two of them hit the bars instead of me, as if one was not big and ugly enough to be hit.”

“But — where are you going?”

“Can’t you guess?”

“To Seacombe?”

“No. They’d have you long before you got to Seacombe, anyway. You are blowing like an elephant. Poor old Jumbo — he’ll be burned to death!”

They were now a long distance off: but even here the accumulated roar of the whole hecatomb reached them. The cage-fronts being barred, the French had fired them from the back. The animals, seeking to escape the fire behind, raged against the bars in front, and soon succumbed to the heat and fumes, except two tigresses. These were caged with a tiger, and as there was not room for all in front, a mêlée of spitting and tearing teeth ensued, the tigresses at length rushing through the flames at the back from the fangs of the ravening male. They ran different ways over the plain, and, with Apollyon, now made of Seacombe Moor a roaming-ground of the wild creatures of the wilderness.

“But where are we going to?” repeated Golde presently. “Are they gaining upon us?”

“They are six — we are two. Oh, and it seems a frightful distance, too! They will catch us, miss. Over hill and dale they went, and grass and gorse, hand in hand, with slackening trot.

“If that fire would only die down!” said Margaret, glancing behind. “It looks as if it were, I think. We should escape then, sure.”

“They are gaining on us, I know,” panted Golde. “As soon as they gain a little more, they will fire.”

“I should fire now, if I were in their place. We will beat them yet.”

“But that lion — suppose it meets us?”

“Pol wouldn’t hurt me. He might make a short meal of them, if he came across them, once. I wonder if those two drunken brutes got burned in the fire, then?”

“I feel confident they are gaining, miss. I don’t know at all where we are either. Seacombe should be over yonder.”

“We are not going to Seacombe, I tell you.”

“Well, I leave it to you. Where are we going to?”

“The canal.”

“The canal, miss?”

“I’m hoping that the fire may die down, you see. If it does, we’re sure of a barge on the banks somewhere about: then we’re pretty safe, I should think.”

“They will swim in after us! They will get another barge!”

“Yes — you are always fearing something, aren’t you? I’ve had worse things behind me than those men, you see. They won’t swim after us if they don’t see us go into the barge. Look! The fire’s dying down.”

And over bill and dale they went, and grass and gorse, hand in hand, with slackening trot.

The sea of flame had died into a mere glow of embers, and the great gloom again lowered with sullen gradualness. Looking, the fugitives could still see the band steadily running them down; but they showed now like shadowy shapes, ready to pass away.

“There’s water!” cried Margaret.

In a minute they were on the shelving, muddy bank, ran laterally, and presently saw in the dark a yet darker mass on the black water — a barge, covered with a tarpaulin, like some sheeted dead giant.

The canal hereabouts is a mere huge, deep ditch, its banks being the shelving ground itself. They heard tramping feet, and a voice give some order.

Margaret entered the water to the breast, and stood waiting.

“They are here!” hissed Golde, shrinking. “You go on, miss! “But aren’t you coming, then?” she wailed. “Will you get me caught?” He tripped down the slush to her. In a moment they were swimming. The French were on the hillock which formed the south bank, and rushed downward, not knowing their nearness to water. One, well in advance, splashed into the stream, uttering a cry. The others halted short. The menagerie fire was dead.

“It is the canal!” said one. “They are going along the banks,” said Danda: some of you to right — some to left!

“If they are not in the middle of the canal now, on a barge or something — or swum across,” suggested Verdier.

But he was unheeded. Three ran right, two left. Verdier alone, uncertain, walked leisurely to the right.

“Don’t blow so hard!” whispered Margaret.

The barge was low, laden with tin boxes closely packed. They found themselves on a deck almost flush, near the stern. Through the piled-up boxes a lane ran, ending at a trap-door, which they were able to see, because a light from some source beneath made of the opening a square of glimmer.

“That is all right,” whispered Margaret: “there are people on board. Let us go down and see.” They crept down by four steps, and found themselves in a space six feet square, the walls being formed by tin boxes, in a brazier in the centre a few embers, nearly dead, showed cracks of redness under coatings of fluff. Here lay a man on his face, beside him an empty bottle.

Margaret stirred him with her foot. He did not move. She bent to him, her wet hair trickling upon his face, she said: "I thought so. He is stone drunk, like those two louts at the menagerie. There's a 'benefit' at a public in Seacombe, where all our people are gone; and this man's mates, too, I suppose. Those left behind take it out in drink, you see."

Golde, taking his breath, leant against the wall of tins.

"I wonder if we are safe now?" he said. "Unless they sight the barge."

"I've brought you into a fine mess, haven't I?"

"You have. Jumbo's dead, certain. He cost 750 guineas in Provence, in France."

"You take it coolly, too. Jumbo's the least of it, isn't he? The whole menagerie's gone — your living's gone. What are you going to do? Your life—"

"Don't tease," she said, one hand at her hip, her feet crossed, she leaning; "where's the use of talking? The thing's done. I have been in escapades equal to this before now."

"You are a brave lass — did you hear something?"

"A brave lass, and a kind one, and a taking one. If ever I get out of this —"

"If ever you do, I advise you to learn to swim faster."

"Well, as for that — pah!"

Golde began sputtering something which, having fallen, drop by drop, to his ear, had collected and trickled into his mouth.

"What is it?" asked Margaret. "Oil — from one of these boxes, I should think."

“How long are we to keep shivering here?” she said, after a minute. Beneath them had formed two lakes, sending out tentative rivulets. From the sleeping man came a snore.

“Those confounded men!” sighed Golde. “Who are they?” asked Margaret.

“They are Frenchmen.”

“I know that. I heard them speak. But what are they after you for?”

“They have a secret. They’re bent upon something.”

“What?”

“I don’t see the good of telling you. They killed the man who told it me, and now want my life, and don’t mean to rest till they get it, too. If I tell you, then you will be doomed — hark!”

“I am going to hear it, all the same.”

“Hark! Hark!”

Golde’s breast began heaving again. Verdier was running by, calling after the others in a shouted whisper. A cur’s bark, too, was heard from the bow. He had been lying asleep, and was aroused now by the shouting of Verdier. The other five, who had separated east and west, hearing the persistent staccato of the dog, halted, listened, and started back. Midway they came upon Verdier, who, in disgust, had ceased to call.

“What’s the matter?” said Danda.

“I hope you liked your run,” answered Verdier. “That dog is on board a barge. If they have not swum to the other side, that is where the man and woman are.”

“Into the water!” went Danda, in loud whisper; “board the barge! Dupin and Corot, to the other side.”

Margaret was now leaning over the starboard port-last hearkening. At the first sounds she had rushed upon deck. She heard Danda’s order to board, and flew to the companion-way.

“Come,” she whispered with hurried breath, “we must get to the other side before them.” By some sense the cur now became aware of strangers on board, and ran aft, filling the darkness with noise. Golde laboured after her along the lane of boxes.

“We couldn’t move some of these boxes, and hide among them?” he panted. “Oh, but that is nonsense. We haven’t a year—”

They reached the bulwarks, but Margaret stopped, hearing a close splash. In fact, Dupin and Corot were near the other side to block escape. Verdier remained on the south bank, shirking the plunge. Three swam to board. All the time the cur, perched on the highest point of cargo, continued his querulous barking.

“Oh, they are before us !” — she put her mouth to Golde’s ear. “What are we to do?”

“If we could hide—”

“Never mind — come on. We will risk it. They can’t see in the dark—”

But now a roar was heard on the north bank, and eight hearts stopped an instant still. Margaret, however, quickly recovered herself.

“Don’t be frightened,” she whispered, “it’s only Pol. Come along.”

“No, miss, no, I’d rather not,” said Golde.

Now the voice of Danda was heard. “On board the barge! Every man!”

The lion had been wandering over the moor, returned to his burned cage, roamed again, and been attracted by the yelps of the cur. But the hearts which quailed at the first outbreak of his voice, quickly understood his impotence on the further shore. The five began to swim towards the barge.

“I hope you are satisfied,” said Margaret, calmly. “It is only a matter of moments now. I feel that they are coming.”

“I should go alone in your place, as you don’t mind the lion,” answered Golde, all agues; “don’t stop for me!”

She said nothing.

There was silence. The lion had ceased to roar the dog had slunk quiet. “Hark — a splash!” The whisper came from Golde’s chest:

“But what are we to do? We can’t stand like children, and be caught! We must do something.”

“What can we? The game seems up, miss!”

“I know! Have you a knife?”

She rushed down the companion-way, and from the belt of the sleeper drew a knife, and up again she flew.

“Quick, now,” she hissed, “help me with one of these boxes: they are full of oil! you tasted it, didn’t you — ?”

She began to tug out a projecting box: Golde, clasping the other end, whispered: “What are we up to now?”

“Come on — they’ve got the wrong ones to deal with—”

Struggling, they stepped and shuffled along the lane, laid the firkin on the bulwark; she stabbed the soft tin, ripped downward, prising open the rent. The fluid welled gurgling down upon the canal, where it ran far with nimble feet.

“Another!”

The men began to sputter, wondering in what strange stream they found themselves. In wild activity the two seized upon another firkin, bore it, stabbed, ripped. Golde now grasped her meaning, and toiled like a maniac. Another — in mad haste. Flop went gurgling the sobbing and buxom oil. Another! And plenteous grew the surface with superfluous grease.

“Now,” panted Margaret.

She flew down. There in the little brazier lay the cinders. She lifted the whole, ran up again, and cast cinders and brazier far.

Instantly the canal cried “Ho!” — an exclamation of shocked surprise — and burst — far and wide — into flame. From bank to bank, to east, to west, the nimble oil had run, and now lit the night with one vast lamp.

At the shock Margaret and Golde were thrown back; but recovered themselves, and stood looking.

Apollyon turned tail at the explosion, ran up the bank, and there halted, glaring back in half- defiant wonder. On the other bank stood Verdier — siffling.

The five had been swimming with one arm, the left holding aloft a pistol, and through the exclamation of the canal was heard, with telling clearness, the detonating pistols, as one after another banged at random in the fire, four harmlessly: but the fifth shot Corot, who sank.

“Down!,” cried Margaret. In the clear lamplight, Verdier, on the bank, was taking steady aim; but the bullet passed over their heads.

By now a gaudy spectacle presented itself on the water. The yellow flare-up, having lasted only an instant, subsided into an ethereal low conflagration of languidly curling and coiling gases, presenting a vast ball-room and carnival of fairy: zephyrs of fire, auroral sprites, rainbows, moving dreamily in infinite minuet, purple and rose, emerald and azure: and in the midst of phantom flames and volatile tints, four black heads, whose eyes must have been eaten away by the lazy lick of fiery tongues, but that by diving to the cool, and swimming, then rising for a hot breath, and diving, they reached the bank with burned and blistered faces.

Verdier hardly glanced at them, as, one by one, they came dripping up in dejected defeat, hands over faces, his eyes being fixed on the head of Margaret peeping, in the coloured lights, over the taffrail. He could see distinctly the broad arch of pencilled eyebrow, richly-flushed face, and alert eyes.

“She is a mighty clever girl, surely,” he said under his breath: “my beauty I saw on Hounslow Heath. I am not going to have her killed by these fellows. I take her back with me—”

Suddenly everyone uttered an exclamation; the fugitives sprang up.

For the flames, licking round the tar-seamed sides, had set the barge alight; and a fire, encompassing her shape, flared from the water’s edge, looking a perfect ship of flame risen out of the lake of flame. Only, the ship burned a murky red, the lake melted into ever-varying visions of aquamarine and vivid green, vermilion and gold.

On the north bank Apollyon, who had run, and then stood glaring proud surprise, caught sight of Margaret as she sprang when the barge began to crackle. He uttered a cry like joy, ran, and commenced to trot backward and forward a little way, near the flame, whimpering, ducking his hairy head, looking always at her, longing to be near her again.

It was now a question of minutes before the fire should eat through the wood, and reach the barge-load of liquid conflagration.

Margaret’s wide eyes flashed round: she rather pale, and scared. Golde was white as dough. They ran along the lane, she first.

“We must swim through the fire, that’s all,” she said hurriedly, looking back. “We can. They did it.”

“Yes — get on — for God’s sake, miss!” panted Golde. “My face will be ruined, though. My hair—”

An exclamation from Golde: “Oh, but there’s that poor man down there —”

They had nearly reached the port bulwarks.

“We can’t stop!” cried she. “He is drunk — we shall be blown up—”

“Wait — wait. We can hardly leave the poor man to die in that way.” Golde rushed, the breath wheezing through his short throat. He plunged down: there in smoky glare lay the sleeper.

Golde shook, lifted him. The head dropped back. The man was more dead than alive.

“So much for you!” panted Golde, and rushed up once more.

“Quick!” cried Margaret, as he hove in sight. “Here’s luck!”

The flames were now visible above the bulwarks; the air grew dingy with reek. Golde believed that he had parted with “luck.” But she pointed: there, floating for’ard, lay a boat, her rope burned away, almost as high as the laden barge, around the boat also being a boat of flame.

To run over the cargo, and leap the fire-rim was not difficult. Margaret went first, having handed to Golde the knife of the drunken man, alighting clear in the centre. Then Golde’s weight dropped clumsily, making the boat crank steeply. She righted herself with one scorched side almost quenched.

They rowed towards the north bank, every stroke sending the flaming water wheeling in a fairy dance of hues.

“Only look at Poll” cried Margaret gaily: “he’s mad with joy!”

The lion was trotting by the water’s edge, backward and forward a little way, whimpering like a dog, seeing her come. The nearer she came, the quicker, the shorter the runs, the thinner his whimpering cry.

Golde said nothing. He glanced at the lion, uncertain which was better, to be blown to the sky, or eaten by the wild beasts of the desert.

The French stood waiting the event. They had seen the leap of the fugitives, but thought it a leap into the water, the barge hiding the boat.

“It is useless to wait,” said Verdier; “they will gain the other side as you gained this. What you should do is to run along until you come to where the flame ceases, and there swim, and intercept them. You have plenty of light, at any rate. Stop — oh, they are in a boat! That girl — !”

He had drawn back, and seen the boat about to arrive. “Quick!” he cried, “they will escape you yet.”

“Fiends!” went Danda, his white upper lip set, chin-beard singed to stubble— “this way!”

“That lion—” muttered Dupin.

All started eastward along the hillock which formed the bank.

Apollyon, seeing Margaret near, dipped a thick paw into the water, and drew it back quicker than he put it in.

“Poor Pol!” she said, looking backward all the time at him.

Now a hole appeared in the bottom, and in reeled singing the inflamed water; Golde’s oar parted, burned away at the thole-pin: but immediately the bow struck. Apollyon was frantically stepping above Margaret’s head.

She leapt, knelt, an arm round his neck, head buried in his mane. Springing up, she remarked coolly.

“That barge hasn’t gone off yet, then.”

But Golde did not hear, having already run some distance up the hill. “He is queer,” said Margaret to herself: “is he a coward, or what? Ah, but he ran back to save that drunken man at the risk of his own life, all the same. I can’t make out — Come along, you—”

She grasped a lump of mane, and started after Golde, the lion trotting meekly by her. But Golde, with that tender regard for his skin, kept his distance, ever and again glancing backward.

The French had now swum across, only Verdier remaining on the south bank.

The fugitives ran, conscious of a good start, believing that the French would wait till the canal- fire burned out. They struck at random over the moor, by ill-luck, somewhat easterly.

Golde was therefore amazed, on glancing sideways, to see four men running to intercept them. He waved, pointing them out, and pricked his run off to about north-west, she following.

The race recommenced: the French now without the power of shooting, their faces burned, one of their number dead, and the fugitives with an auxiliary worth ten men.

It was four to three: and the odds seemed in favour of the three.

But now something happened which changed the situation.

A chariot of flame was seen to rise and ride towards the sky; and immediately there burst, in heart-appalling detonation, a bang which caught and shook the earth of Seacombe Moor. The barge had gone to heaven.

Apollyon wrenched his mane free, and scuttled, his tail between his legs.

But while the ghost of that hubbub still hummed in the shocked ear, he stopped, looking back toward the source of sound, with lifted head; and doing so, saw the four French, standing paralysed by the shock.

All at once they moved; and as they moved, he roared.

“My goodness!” said Margaret to herself, “Pol is going to eat those men, as sure—” The lion, with beautifully-curved bounds, was at them, they showing vague in light now like a lamp which has watched all night, and smoulders dim toward morning.

At his approach the four scattered, like a globe of glass which receives a blow. The biggest was Dupin, and him the lion singled out Dupin ran his utmost The lion’s blood was up. He sent out roar on roar.

The sight was too much for Margaret’s high-strung inquisitiveness. She ran towards the scene a little way, forgetful of everything; ran, stopped, ran, holding her chin high to look. Golde halted, wondering at her rash approach to the French.

Apollyon was in a valley, Dupin on the top of a hillock about to descend. Lion and man were near now. The race had lasted five minutes. The lion bounded up the rising ground.

When he reached the top, he stopped baffled. Dupin had disappeared.

He thrilled the air with roars, ran this way and that after new prey, scouring a limited area, attracted first by one, then by another. At last he fixed upon Danda.

Margaret, excited, ran nearer to look.

Danda flew toward the canal: but the lion was at his heels: he turned, with wild eyes, with drawn sword; and a fierce fight ensued.

An "Oh!" burst from Margaret. The man was on his back. She ran nearer to look, stopping, and running. But before Apollyon could even scratch, he fell back with languid yelp. A bullet had entered his neck: for Verdier, at the first roar, had at last plunged from the further bank, knowing that his friends' pistols were useless.

"Oh, Poll" cried Margaret, woe-begone.

There, not twenty paces off, was she. Instantly, with intensely rapid run, Verdier was after her, and she flying. Golde, a longish distance off, also began to run slowly, looking over his shoulder.

"Stop! or I fire!" cried Verdier.

He had still one loaded pistol. But she did not stop: and he did not fire. Yet, swiftly as the light-limbed fellow covered the ground, she was surely stealing from him, when — suddenly — she stopped. Right before her she saw standing, as if waiting to receive her, Dupin.

Dupin had just picked himself out of the gorsy hollow into which he had plunged from Apollyon. He rushed to seize her.

But Verdier's arms were around her. He just touched her cheek with his lips, and laughed a little through panting breath, with the word:

“Caught!”

The others ran round. Danda, in his white-hot impetuosity, without even stopping to kill Apollyon outright, had run to join the hunt.

She faced round, hot and defiant. “What is it you want me for?” Danda’s scorched face wore a smile. Verdier whispered:

“No one will hurt you, you know.”

“But the man! After him!” cried Danda. Golde, a good distance off, stood looking. His face was sad.

“What’ll they do with her, I wonder?” he mused. “Foolish woman. It is her own fault—” He added: “Still, I can hardly allow her to be taken away — alone—”

Now he saw three men running toward him, and ran, too, but tentatively, in a backward- hankering trot.

“I could hardly be expected to let myself be caught,” he murmured.

Verdier had handed his remaining pistol to Danda, saying:

“You and two others shoot the man; I’ll remain by the girl.”

The pistol was heard; but Danda, shooting as he ran, fired wide, and Golde guessed that the shot represented the last of their dry powder. He changed direction, bearing round nearer to Margaret.

“A man’s first duty is to himself” he thought. And then again: “O dear me, I could hardly leave her like that.”

He fingered the knife taken from the drunken man. As he neared her, he saw her wave him away deprecatingly. He was then steering his run on a hillock-top indirectly towards her.

Had she implored his assistance with cries, Golde would have debated the risking of his skin; as it was, he made a bolt with a suddenness which startled himself straight upon girl and captors, knife in hand.

“Don’t mind! Go back!” cried Margaret.

But Golde, in steady career, bore down upon the group. His knife slashed Verdier's shoulder, but his heel slipped at the arrest of his impetus, and in a moment Dupin was kneeling on his wheezing chest.

"Your sword into his throat!" cried Danda, running up.

But Verdier touched Dupin, saying, "Do not kill."

"I should not have him killed here," he said to Danda aside. "There is already one body on the moor, and there is the burned menagerie. Our ship, if seen from the coast, will be thought to be connected with all this, and the more so the more mischief we leave behind."

"But—" began Danda. "Listen to me. We must not leave a dead body so far inland. Our secret may be scented. We must take them on board, and throw the man into the sea."

"And not the girl?"

"I do not see the necessity."

"As much as the man — as much as the man."

"Oh, the man! he would be simply a year-long danger and burden. But the girl might act as attendant to the Duke on the voyage—"

Danda, always subservient to the cunning of Verdier, turned, saying: "Do not kill. To the ship. All forward!"

A man held Golde by each sleeve; another Margaret by the left arm, whilst Verdier walked by her right, arm around her waist. In front marched Danda with measured rhythmic step, as to sound of timbrel and flute. The canal flickered its last.

There was a stoppage — a protest from Margaret.

"I will not go," she said, in fairly good French, "if this man does not take his hand from my waist."

Verdier withdrew his hand, bowed, and smiled.

They came in a few minutes to the north bank. Some miles farther east was a canal-bridge, but in their scurry across the moor they had lost the whereabouts of everything.

They therefore swam across: and the march recommenced, the tramp of four miles over grass and gorse, with steady plod. Every now and again Verdier said something in English: but Margaret did not answer.

Suddenly there was an outcry in the night: a “Hi! Hi!” of several voices. The French stopped in alarm. Margaret understood, and sent out her voice, screaming:

“Help! Help! Help!”

“That cursed woman! Run!” hissed Danda.

Verdier covered her mouth. With the abandon of a naughty child, she let herself down on the ground saying:

“I will go no farther! Help! Help!”

“Hi! Hi!” came faintly, as if in answer.

It was the bargemen returned from the “benefit,” hailing their mate for the barge-boat. But boat, and barge, and mate had long since reached the land of No-Return.

Margaret shrieked. But the bargemen, after leaving Seacombe, had crossed the canal-bridge: the canal therefore intervened. They were, moreover, drunk, and did not even hear.

Verdier, though hardly taller than she, took the girl strongly in his arms. She struggled, but his grip was iron.

They set off at a trot. In less than an hour the lights of boat and ship appeared. At the water’s edge they three times struck flint and steel — a signal. A faint grey of morning mingled with the east.

CHAPTER VII. THE FRIGATE

BEYOND THE REACH of shallow surf the boat lay. Again Margaret resisted Verdier's attempt to lift her, and all forded through the swarming and loudly-rumouring froth.

In twenty minutes the boat reached the frigate, which barely forged through the water under jib and fore-topsail: a long raky craft, low amidships, two-decked and three-masted, port-holed for a battery of thirty-six guns on the main-deck, four in the stern, ten in the spar-deck; sharp in the bows and beam-sheer; built for speed. Up from her nose shot the steep bowsprit, like a boar-tusk. Under full spread of plain sail and courses she had the overcrowded look of a little girl who has put on a man's jacket.

The two-sailed pinnace ran alongside, and they stepped up the black-and-white side. Some fifty men leant on the long line of bulwark, looking. Danda sprang up, calling:

"Give her the sails, Anciaux. Must be well out by day-break. In half-an-hour hands to the Culte Napoléanique."

Trumpeted shouts began to sound. From flying jib to spanker, from top-gallant to deck, she put on her array of whiteness, and began tripping briskly through the dark. Verdier had charge of the prisoners.

Here all were equals, all fanatics, not a quarter real sailors. Only so much discipline existed as was necessary for working the ship.

Verdier conducted Margaret down to the main deck, others bringing Golde. "What are we going to do with them?" asked one.

"Shoot them."

“Drown them.”

“Make them walk the plank.”

This suggestion met applause. It was the age of Avignon Massacres and Peterloos, a cruel age.

“The girl is to be saved,” said Dupin, winking; someone who knows a pretty face—”

The hint was shrugged at, Verdier here being the first among equals.

The cabin was very large, divided into apartments on both sides of the main corridor. Verdier pointed down a side-corridor:

“I should take the man down there. I caught the girl, you know, and shall look to her. All right, laugh, then. . . . Make the man walk the plank, if you like — if you have the sack. . . . I suppose it is wisest to kill him, if you decide so, poor wight. Personally — well, do as you choose!”

He bowed before Margaret, indicating the opposite passage, and she walked down it with him, the others calling “ Bonne chance!” while Dupin said:

“You, Faguelin, run and look for a sack.”

Verdier led her to an apartment with couches and rugs, a swing-lamp creaking in the centre. Her brows were knit. To “walk the plank” — What was that? It had something to do with “a sack.” Some kind of death, blind-folded, without air. She sat on a couch, her buxom perfection of form obviously fitted to and filling the stuck wet gauze, he beside her.

“Now, I want to be your friend,” he said, in English. “I am glad of that,” she answered, her manner changed almost to gentleness. “Did the man tell you our secret?”

“Is that true?”

“I very seldom tell lies. ”

“Have you a sweetheart?”

“What is ‘walking the plank’?”

“Have you a sweetheart?”

“Tell me first.”

“No, I sha’n’t tell you. Are you going to have me for a sweetheart?”

“I don’t know you. That depends.”

“You are adorable, and I adore you.”

“Why should you be cruel to that poor man?”

“Are you fond of him?”

“I hardly know him. He isn’t my sort, I think. But why should you kill him?”

“I will tell you. We are patriots, devoted to France: and the man has a secret which, if divulged, would hurt France.”

“You can keep him a prisoner, as you keep me.”

“We keep you because you are adorable, and we like you. But in the case of the man, we have reasons.”

“You say you like me. Well, I am not what you take me for. But I will think over it — if you spare his life.”

“You are fond of him, then?”

“No, I tell you! No!” she said angrily. I don’t know the man!”

“Well, but I can’t spare him. You must be reasonable. The other gentlemen would not hear of it. I am not the master of the expedition.”

“Do spare him!”

“Don’t be unkind. I can’t.”

“Then, you do not really want—”

“Don’t I? But I do. I am devilishly love-sick — those eyes, eh? — gold-coloured, with the wild look, eh . . . ?”

He was sitting sideways, bent forward, gazing at her face; she somewhat averted, with modest eyelids drooped, a faint smile concealing her absolute cunning.

A bell sounded through the ship. "I must go," he said, "to prayers," and laughed. "To what?"

"To prayers! We have a kind of worship here, you see. Our religion is a hero-worship, and—"

"I care nothing about your prayers."

"Then, an revoir. I sha'n't be ten minutes gone. But I must lock you in, you know."

She leapt like lightning. "You talk about being sick for me — !" her lips curling. "Well, aren't I, then?"

"You do not show it. You do everything to prove that you are telling lies."

"Mustn't I lock you in, then?"

"You can, if you like. I don't care. But do it once — only once — and I never talk to you again."

"What will you do, if I leave you at liberty?"

"What can I do? Except I jump into the sea! And I have had enough cold baths for one night, thank you."

"Very well: I am your slave. Will you remember that?"

He took her hand, and kissed it; and overcame, and kissed her mouth: and she did not resist. He ran then, leaving the door ajar.

She peeped after him. From a door in the opposite side-corridor she saw men troop. The last turned the key. There, then, was Golde.

She began to walk distractedly. There was a port-hole in the apartment: she might jump through: the shore could not be far. But Golde?

She resolved, peeped out. The corridor was deserted. She stole along it swiftly. The men meanwhile had assembled in a good-sized round room, having a raised recess opposite the door. Danda was kneeling on one of the steps which led to this, a rapt stare in his eyes.

Here was the — Apotheosis. Daily, near sunrise, the frigate-crew, with the lack of humour characteristic of Frenchmen, celebrated the Prime or Matins instituted by the Paris Society called Culte Napoléanique.

Around hung “relics”: a spur, a gold epaulette, a handkerchief, a green uniform with red facings; in the shrine, most precious of all — the Waterloo coat, with the stains of the bitter flight. In the centre of the room stood a wooden crucifixion; and back against the boards, a bed. It was intended that here the Duke should sleep, under the stern and anguished brows.

The rite was simple. Danda, on the steps, intoned in a rapid guttural a kind of psalm, of which little more than the ever-recurring Name could be heard. The crowd stood with bent, uncovered heads, till, the canticle ended, every sword flashed from its scabbard. Instantly they fell into a procession two deep, taking up the refrain of the dirge, their tramp keeping time with the rhythm. Three times round they marched, then the inner file debouched inward, the outer outward; each of the inner, as he passed, placed his sword at the crucifix-foot; each of the outer put the coat in the shrine to his lips. Then, with perfectly-timed evolutions, singing the refrain, the files changed places, each repeating the action of the other; till, one by one, they filed out by the door.

Meantime, “Quick!” whispered Margaret, as she opened the door, “we can escape—” But where was Golde? The room was dim. Not there! Her hands met, wringing. There was a cupboard or store-room at a corner. She flew to it; looked in. Not there! Then — all at once — she knew: that was he — in the sack: a sack, reaching far below the feet, with running-string.

“It’s me!” she panted, drawing the sack-mouth open: “we can escape!”

Golde stood before her bewildered.

“Come!” She took him by the hand.

Footsteps, voices were heard outside — the men returning. Retreat was cut off by sounds of laughter, bets as to whether Golde would reach the end of the plank before he fell.

Margaret glanced at the cupboard, pointed crazily, pushed Golde toward it. “I—” he stammered— “you go in!”

“You shall be saved! — when they are gone — the opposite passage — last door — a port-hole — jump into the sea. You have their secret — I — it doesn’t matter—”

He hardly knew anything — his wits all gone — only he had a consciousness that some heroic drama was being enacted before his eyes: suddenly he was in darkness; the cupboard-door closed upon him.

As the men trooped in, Margaret settled to stillness within the sack. “Get it over quickly, sirs,” said Verdier.

“Tie up below his feet,” said Dupin.

One, not noticing the running-string now looser, drew it, tied it many times round the mouth. The sack, thus considerably shortened, yet remained longer than the body.

“Make him walk to the deck,” said one. “Lift him,” said Verdier; “get it over.”

“Hurry him away!” was heard the voice of Danda.

On deck, raw twilight preceding day was come. Things near were light, distance dark. The frigate walked steadily through smooth sea from the lessening coast.

About 10 ft. of a plank rested on the gangway, about 8 ft. projected over the sea. Here was the sport of the old buccaneers, flibustiers, marooners, and caravaleros, of Mansvelt, François l’Olonnois, Montbars, Morgan, Kidd, Avery. The sack was laid at the inner end of the plank, its inmate on her feet, without notion where she was, what was to happen: she knew that it was death. The French crowded round, chattering, two on the plank to steady it.

“Now — this way — walk, sir—”

Verdier guided her a few steps, and let her go. She continued to walk with cramped, staggering steps, thinking herself on the deck. There was hushed silence. Midway she stepped slant-wise on air, and fell with muffled cry.

Golde, on the main-deck below, had crept from his hiding-place, out into the corridor, and now crouched, looking through the port-hole of which she had told.

And the cry had hardly died, when his shoes and outer garments were tossed through the hole, and himself in the midst of the sea.

The sack sank far in the impetus of the fall. The ship forged forward in the twilight. Golde swam about in the region of the splash, with a wild sense of bereavement, of terror, and utter loneliness.

The weight of sack and occupant proved precisely the same as that of the water, and diving, he saw a vague wobbling five feet below the surface. He tore after it. Frantic were the struggles within the agitated bag: it rose a little, sank, rose, jerking and bulging in a hundred swift convulsions. Golde dived to the foot-end, and pushed it upward, gnawing wildly at the tense string; till he had to ascend, all gasps. It was now, however, or never. Another dive, and again he raised her; and selecting now one whorl of twine, with patient rabid gnaw of the dog-teeth, while the death-struggle above went on, he severed it. By now he had the crazy consciousness that the struggle was over, and again he was pumped: but with his last bursting effort, he tore wide the mouth, and shot up, rending the bag from her. He saw her sink from him, bluish face, and shut eyes: but in a moment had her at his breast.

By now Verdier, returned to Margaret, had found her vanished. The noise went abroad in the ship that she was hiding, and a search began.

They were ten knots from land; the morning of the 20th June — the Day — grew clear; the ship, crowded with sail, yet hardly leaning, moved through brindled water south-west.

The lay of the land hereabouts is, in general, also in this direction. Bounding Seacombe Moor on the west rises a chain of cliffs, which also forms the sea-front of Wyemouth, and overlooks the striking scenery of Wyemouth Sound. St Jude's Island, now fortified, lies in front; beyond, rising green from the water's edge, is Mount Eton Park, with masses of noble wood. Here and there along the coast the land juts in rocky points, some capped with forts and batteries; whilst, beyond all, lies the magnificent breakwater, midway between the bluffs of Spedding and Raddon Points, boldly interposing between the swell of Wyemouth Sound and the long ocean waves rolling in from the Atlantic. Ten miles out from Wyemouth, stands — on its black and jagged ridge of foam-frequented rock — Raddon Lighthouse.

This series of gneiss crags is the very home of tempest. Sometimes the sea shoots white up the lighthouse column, to leap over the lantern-cupola; more often than not the lower half of the shaft is buried in a chaos of surf.

But that morning the sea's motion in the neighbourhood of the rocks was a mere sway and swing.

Margaret lived, opened her eyes on Golde's breast, looked into his face, saw yonder the grey ship steal away in mist — and understood. She glanced land-ward, saw St. Jude's Island, and knew that they could not swim half so far; though the water was warm.

She rapidly recovered. There, half-floating on the heave of the gently-breathing sea, lay the sack. She glanced at it, and again into his face, and smiled.

“You got away, then?” she said.

“I have to thank you for that, miss, as for one or two other little things,” answered Golde. “We must try for the lighthouse.”

The rocks were three hundred yards away. The two struck out, side by side, breasting the lazy effort of the swell, while Golde’s chest laboured. Suddenly the sun was up, flooding the sea, and almost immediately Margaret, glancing sideward, saw a regiment of oars stalking over the water.

“Look — !” she cried out.

From the tops spy-glasses had detected the two heads toiling at the bigness of the sea, and a yawl was flurriedly lowered. As she dropped astern, Danda called orders that the frigate should continue her course, but not lose sight of the lighthouse.

The long oars went out, and it seemed a question of minutes before the fugitives sank riddled with shot.

The sky was a great spread of azure; but on the south-western horizon appeared a coppery cloud: and, as it were, a whisper of darkness ran round the world.

To the straining fugitives the distance seemed not less than infinite: there came a moment when shots began to hiss about them; but they reached a rock, clambered, ran upon slimy green, and had a moment’s breath, where a ridge hid them. Then round a curve, and up the side of a sloping plateau of rock, on which stood the lighthouse. Here, once more, they were exposed, but the men, still at some distance, spent most of the shots upon the reef.

“This way,” panted Golde, and dashed up some little iron steps that led ten feet up the solid base of the lighthouse.

They came then to a trellis-work landing before a door, made like Egyptian doors, narrower at top.

They tried it by the handle. It was locked. A bullet smashed against its casing.

They began to bawl for help, beating madly. At the same time, they could not but be surprised, even in their dismay, at the sinister appearance of the sea: with perfect suddenness it began to swirl, and fret, and whiten among the rocks; the boat, near now, was pitching with quick agitations; and the shots went all over the rocks and lighthouse. That brazen cloud in the south had spread amazingly, and was now flying wide-winged. The day darkened.

From a window, seventy feet up, a face looked.

A minute later the door opened: the fugitives rushed in, and the man who had opened fell back, shot.

Golde banged the door. They were in a narrow, short passage, just high enough to admit them, made of oaken blocks, with courses of Cornish moor-stone, dove-tailed, and joggled, and cramped with iron. Two yards inwards, they came to a dark well, rising twenty-two feet, four feet in diameter. Up this ran steps, scelled into the well, and leading into the lowest of the four stories.

These stories consisted of the lower store-room, the upper store-room, the living, and the sleeping-room.

The lighthouse had the form of a long truncated cone; the period of its erection was 1760, a time when one or two stone lighthouses, like Smeaton’s, had been built; but when men still shook the head, believing that nothing but wood could withstand wind and wave.

At such a time compromise was natural: and Raddon Lighthouse was, in fact, like Rudyard's at the Eddystone, a composition of both wood and stone. The solid base was formed of squared oak balks, firmly fixed to a series of iron branches which were keyed into the rock of the reef; but to increase the weight and vertical pressure, numerous courses of stone were introduced.

Outside these solid timber-and-stone courses, strong upright timbers, scarfed together — i.e., with sides overlapping — were fixed, and continued to the roof. Outside these again, came another layer of stone from foundation to corona, constructed of circles of hewn blocks, all joggled and cramped together. The lighthouse had, therefore, the appearance of a stone structure from without, though it was lined with wood, and, in reality, contained more wood than stone in its make-up.

The place was perfectly still. They two seemed alone in it with the dead man. They mounted the well-steps, holding to a hand-rope. Half-way they heard bangings at the outer door.

The French were besieging.

Two now held the boat beyond the region of the eddies and sea-dash. The others clamoured round the door, and crowded on the outer iron stairs.

A storm was brewing. The sky grew busy and dark with clouds; the sea began to lash and sound; some leaden rain-drops fell.

CHAPTER VIII. THE SIEGE

THE LIGHTHOUSE DOOR was cased with iron: iron panels, iron bolts. All the force of many Frenchmen could not avail to break it in.

“Back to the ship!” cried Danda; “batter the hole with cannon!”

But the frigate had vanished in gloom, and the yawl they could hardly still discern far from the white circle of reef, which now resounded to the thumps of the sea; spray, struck high, smartly stung the face.

Verdier said to one who was a mariner: “What of this storm?”

“It looks bad,” the sailor said. “You see the moon there, looking out . . . ghastly! — and the tide is rising. We shall have it — but I don’t think for long. How about this door?”

“The lock: you will never get through by banging and violence: pick the lock.”

Danda, hearing the suggestion, flew to his knees, digging with his sword. The point broke off. “Let me try,” said Verdier, and knelt with a thick dirk inserted, probing and prising.

“Now push — hard!” he cried, scarlet-coloured.

Danda and Dupin urged, and they, with the portal, tumbled inward.

A “Bon, bon!” was answered by a clap of thunder, a lightning-wink. They trooped inward, Danda first, with drawn sword, and began to climb the well-hole steps.

Golde and Margaret were in the lower store-room, kneeling, peering over the edge. They could hardly see down the dark depth, but knew that the French were there, and coming. No light from the darkened day, though the outer door clapped to and fro. A wind came souging up the well.

The flooring of the lower store-room, on which knelt Golde and Margaret, was 32 ft. above the rock; the bottom of the well about 'o ft. above it; the part below the well being the fundamental solid, outside which ran up the iron steps to the door. In the lower store-room the full shock of the billows was not felt, and there, usually, a dim light filtered through the thick red glass of two square little windows. Now it would have been quite dark, but for a lantern deposited by the dead light-keeper on the floor, by which Verdier, climbing, saw the head of Golde, and leaning aside to avoid Danda, who was before, fired in awkward pose. The bullet embedded itself in the upper store-room flooring.

The two leapt from their fascinated gaze of terror. Danda was not 6 ft. below; his left hand held his pointless sword.

“What shall we do?” she whispered. “Up — the stairs—”

“The slab!”

It was a circular trap-door of iron, near the great hinges being an interval between slab and flooring large enough to admit the fingers. One on each side, they strained at the weight. As it yielded with reluctant shrieks, the wild eyes of Danda loomed above the darkness. Slowly up and up, then faster, it rose at the tugging jerks. It reached the perpendicular — there was a second's poise and uncertainty — they had too soon let go; but a quick touch slapped it above the ducking head of Danda upon his twice-snapped blade.

They looked at each other, trembling at recovered life. Then she, arm akimbo: “You will know me again when you see me!”

“It was a narrow shave, lass.”

“Somebody or other has got that slab on his head! I saw the eyes.”

“And a good thing, too,” remarked Golde. “But what is that — cannon?”

“I felt it before. I shouldn’t wonder if the men on the ship are at the place with cannon-balls.”

“But, stop! listen! that can’t be it.”

It was the shock of waves, hurling themselves upon the lighthouse, as if with malice. Above, a door slammed, windows rattled; the structure vibrated to its base.

Then a rumbling was heard above, like Titans moving furniture about for a house-flitting.

“That’s thunder,” said Golde. “There is a big storm outside, if we could only see it. I wonder what those men will do next?”

“What can they do? They can’t move this slab from those steps, with us standing on it. We are safe!”

“There is a staple, I see,” said Golde, “and a hasp. We should fasten it, I think.” He went away to look for some small object to place in the staple, and now Margaret felt the slab jerk up a little.

“They are trying to lift it,” she called.

Golde ran back.

“Why trouble?” she said; “they are only wasting their strength—”

“You are very brave and confident,” he said, looking about again. “I shouldn’t mind if I had your pluck and go.”

“You are brave, too,” she answered, dropping her eyes; “but you have lived all your life in a house, I should think: you never had any call to show it. And you think too much of yourself, I daresay. I, now, have lived among lions, tigers—”

“I am a miller by trade, and my name is Golde.”

“Well, one does not require much pluck to grind the golden corn — Just listen!”

“It’s the sea, I firmly believe,” said Golde.

“I like thunder: just hear how it rages a little, like Pol, and then goes muttering things in its throat”

“I can’t help thinking of that poor man,” said Golde, returning with a long nail, found among square parcels piled to the ceiling, containing huge candles for the lantern.

“What poor man?” she asked.

“That light-keeper down there. He came to an untimely end, too.”

“Well, we were nearly as bad, you see. Isn’t there more than one of them?”

“It’s funny: there are usually three on a lighthouse, I believe. But the others haven’t put in an appearance.

There had, in fact, been three: but the second had gone ashore to procure a doctor for the third, who now lay dying in the top room.

Verdier, eyes flashing, with long hair whiffed, was calling: “Who has more to spare? Pile it up!”

In his mind was this thought: “To outwit me! Well, we shall see—”

Two more flasks poured gunpowder upon a heap already made in the well. “Now, some string,” said Verdier.

One handed him twine. He laid a bit on the powder-heap.

The rest hurried away over the dead light-keeper. Verdier struck a flash, and saw an end of twine well lighted: as the other end was on higher level, the hemp burned rapidly upward. He rushed, slammed the door after him, and fled down to the rocks, where all stood clinging and drenched.

The picked lock was not ruined, and still fastened firmly. A small space, hermetically closed, was thus created. Either the walls must burst, or the slab at one end of the space, and the door at the other, must fly.

And presently the lighthouse shuddered, and the men saw the door dart from its fastenings, knock away the railings of the trellis-work landing, and plunge.

They hastened up the outer stairs, rushed into the passage, stumbling over the blackened light-keeper, looked up the well. The slab was gone.

They went — Verdier foremost, sword in hand — climbing the ladder-stair.

Yonder in the ceiling was a nearly circular dent where the iron disc had bumped into the wood. But little could now be seen: the slab had fallen back upon the lantern. From below they had been able to see the slab gone, only because the room was less utterly dark than the well.

They looked around, with swords ready to kill: but the fugitives had escaped to the upper storeroom.

“Let us pull up the stairs after us!” Margaret had said.

They, too, were a mere ladder, broad rungs slanting in broad uprights. Golde, kneeling, saw that they were fastened to a beam by hook-and-eye, knocked out the two hooks, and pulled. But they were also fastened to the flooring below.

“Stop, I will go down,” he panted.

He slid down. Voices and hurrying feet came up on hoarse soughs of the tempest fuming vehemently up the well. He groped on the floor. Ever and again the heavy ordnance of the sea shocked the lighthouse to its base.

To his intense relief he found the stair-foot not clamped, but fastened with hooks-and-eyes. He knocked out one hook, but the other was fixed in rust. On his back he kicked at it.

“Quick!” he heard Margaret’s loud whisper.

The hook yielded. He scrambled up, and the two were able to draw it, step by step. The alarm which had widened Margaret’s eyes while he was below alone died out. They closed the hinging, oblong, wooden trap, and while they fastened the hasp, the besiegers swarmed into the room below.

The storm was now, perhaps, at its climax, and, without and within, day was turned to night. An octagonal ship's clock hung in the sleeping-room above, but the dying man there could not see it. Its hands pointed to eight.

The pursuers went striking flint-and-steel, searching among the candles, searching for the stairs, searching the ceiling. Golde and Margaret crouched near the trap-door listening.

"If we only had two pistols," she whispered. "It would be a good thing," assented Golde. "Let us go and look."

They crept away. The room was divided by a partition, in which banged a door at every blow of the swinging sea. They butted against it in the dark. From far away reached them the wails of the dismal wind — lamentation and a voice in Ramah. This, and the rattling windows, and the banging door broke the perfect silence of the lighthouse. The men below spoke no word in intentness of search; the click of clashing steels was lost in the whoops of the wind tumbling up the flute of the well. Dupin had torn the wrapping from a parcel, seen candles, and lit one; but it was at once extinguished.

Verdier called: "There is the trap-door. Ah, they are above, then; they have drawn up the steps."

"What shall we do?" bellowed Danda from the other end, above the organ-voices of the hurricane.

"Storm the door," sang out Verdier's tenor.

"But how?"

"Splinter it with shot."

"With shot!" cried Danda like an echo. "Hands this way." They had reserved powder from the explosion to serve in case of need. Flint-and-steel struck until all had noted the position of the trap, and detonating pistols began to punctuate the cannonade of the sea and sobs of the wind.

“You, Dupin,” cried Danda through the din; “try to reach with your sword.”

Dupin, the tallest, made a sweep on tiptoe: but the sword cut a free curve, drawing him as it came down. The ceiling was 14 ft high. Meanwhile, the door was being riddled: but the wood was thick, though old. Ball and slug sank into, without ripping, it.

“Here, Huguenin, get upon Dupin’s back,” called Verdier, “and hack the thing away. Danda snatched Huguenin’s sword, mounted upon Dupin, and began hewing and driving. But his fury defeated itself: Dupin was now a quivering water-carrier, and now plunged and staggered: the under-surface splintered, but no more.

Verdier had meanwhile gone running, and returned burdened with a parcel of candles wrapped in thick blue paper, and tied.

“Come, help me,” he sang out, and to and fro they ran, piling parcels beneath the trap. Standing on the pile, they were now able to hack with ease. But only at first: for wrappings and candles began to break beneath their tramps, and soon they were slipping in a slushy bog of tallow, the separate candles stamped into a mere filth of fat, with hard base. It bore, yet did not bear: they floundering, picking themselves up, bumping together, but hacking with desperate steadfastness.

From without, the lighthouse at this time would have been seen deep-planted, like a tree, to half its height, in a steady bank of dashing foam.

Golde still carried the flint-and-steel by which he had seen the dying man on Seacombe Moor, and the two went searching the upper store-room. Here, once more, were piles of candles, with coils of rope, odds and ends of ship-tackle, biscuits, and tinned meats, and bags of vegetables; leaning in the inner room, the figure-head of some craft wrecked upon the rocks; there a fragment of spar; a pile of firewood. The place had a stale and settled stench, like the holds of rank old ships, redolent of bilge-water and fishy odours of the deep. A washing-tub contained clothes, but no water; bones, and the debris of fish, and empty cans, and cauldrons of pitch, and blocks, and casks, and lumps of putty, and kegs. In a cupboard at a corner of the inner room, Golde found three long knives; and, on a shelf Margaret two coils of twine, ending in copper-wire and large fish-hooks.

She put her mouth to Golde's ear with the word: "Fisk-hooks!"

And she handed him a coil of twine; he handed her a knife. They stole back with a certain glad and meaningful guiltiness to their station by the trap.

The clock in the sleeping-room above pointed to nine. The dying man listened to the tempest, to the noise below, and wondered placidly, with musing eyes.

The battery of the door grew slack, and ceased, a round splintered cavity in its under substance, but the upper surface intact.

"This is no use!" cried Danda. "A carronade of round-shot and canister would have banged the whole building to hell an hour ago — but for this cursed storm."

Verdier smiled. He had in his mind a far more effective method than round-shot: but he feared danger to the Scheme; and, secondly, his Will was set that Margaret Ferris should acknowledge him, Camille, Marquis de la Terville-Rouchefoucauld, and be his slave.

"Some of you lay that slab there on the grease," he cried. "The grease!" shouted Danda, like an echo.

Some ran and bore the blasted slab, which dropped with thick flop upon the slush. This, and the candles, were the only things in the room: yet with good generalship, Verdier had converted them into a perfectly-adapted engine.

“Now off with the shoes!” he called, that sweet tenor making chorus with the piping winds. Above knelt Margaret, with fishing-line and knife. The contest was resolving itself into a contest between the girl and Verdier for the life of Golde.

The men toiled, dogged, in silence, with stroke on stroke. On the upper side, some splinters cracked; and through a hole a sword-point stuck.

“This door will soon be gone,” said Golde, who heard the splinter crack: “hadn’t we better try the room above?”

“We have time,” whispered Margaret: “we will fight them inch by inch, if it comes to that. But how do they do it? They must be on one another’s backs.”

Thick fell the blows, and rapidly did the circular hole gape wider.

“Keep your eyes close,” whispered Margaret, “and make short work of their fingers.” This part of the upper store-room was not all blank darkness, like its inner chamber: for a crack in the trap-door above was filled with a light burning in the living-room, diffusing a glimmer: fingers, therefore, could be seen by the two, provided they looked close.

The hacking ceased. The middle piece of the door had dropped splintered; the remaining two pieces, fastened by hasp in front, and hinges behind, were narrow.

A clap on the floor told that fingers were there. Golde chopped tentatively: the hand vanished; a sound from the slab announced the backward drop.

“Sapristi!” said a voice, “they are slashing with knives.”

Golde, however, not a man of blood, had cut with reluctant nervousness. She, as if she divined, sidled to him, and loudly whispered:

“You must cut hard! Get their fingers off!”

Her heart was now hardened against these men to a perfect cold cruelty. Through the new opening, the wind came up vocal from the outer door, bearing all the noises of the storm, peals of thunder. Ever and anon the lighthouse swayed and trembled to the bombardment of the sea.

“Up!” sang the high voice of Verdier: “scale in a body — all together!”

“Together!” echoed Danda.

But in vain: they became aware, nearly all, that some diabolical thing was among them, a spiteful witch, with nails of steel — tearing at scalp, lips, cheeks. It came and went, bloodily, remorselessly, in mystery. The room was full of oaths, flights, hissing breaths, deep groans. Margaret was fishing — apostolically.

She knelt like boys who kneel with thread-and-pin for sprats, her body held backwards from reach of shot: and to every swing-out of the wire she had her catch of flesh or cloth, and in, with strong tug, she drew the prize, and out flew the pitiless hook again.

Once, as it went seeking, it met the palm of Verdier, who was wondering at the confusion, and came back ripping from thumb-root to middle finger.

He, a man intensely high-strung, could ill bear pain. He ran shrieking. But at once he understood.

“Back!” he called— “can’t you see? they are fishing at you!”

They rushed back, rent hands, nostrils, lips, and gathered round him.

“Now, listen to me, sirs,” said he, speaking only just above the tumult of the elements, “one, or both, of them has a fishing-hook flying there; one, or both, a knife. Well, if we scale in a body, one of us will have his eyes torn, one his fingers cut. But the rest will be perfectly safe, if we be quick. We have them, then. When I say One — then rush.”

There was a pause. “Ready?”

“A moment,” said Huguenin, fingering a half-ear. “Ready now? — then — One!”

There was a swift, silent dash, and five pairs of hands on each side caught the flooring. The space would hardly admit of more, and Danda, niad with impatience, found himself jostled out with others. The ten heads rose above the planking.

But Verdier had miscalculated, or else been purposely optimistic. Margaret dropped line, took knife. Two on her side, in quick succession, dropped back, stabbed through the temple, dead. The men had no foothold for the swinging feet — little enough hand-hold. They heaved with curved back, feet struggling upon emptiness — while Golde’s knife chopped the fingers, ending in horizontal sweep like the guillotine, and Margaret’s merciless blade sought the temples.

It was done in some instants: six dropped, with wounded hand, or dying groan. Of the ten, four only were left; but now, on a sudden, four new men, Danda among them, appeared at the edge.

Margaret’s knife at that moment was in prone career for the head of Verdier. He already had one knee on the brink. . . . Down came the knife: but he caught her wrist with his bleeding hand. The others, on that side, were almost landed.

An intense agony of struggle ensued between man and girl. She writhed like an eel. “Beast! let me go!” came in the faintest hiss, like a snake’s, from her lips. They swayed, she on both knees seeking to thrust him back; he, with one knee sideways on the edge, the other leg dangling in the void, the other hand clinging convulsively.

Thrice, with frantic vigour, she jerked him backwards, and still he held her like fate: then she tugged upward the hand that gripped the floor, jerked at him again, and now felt him going, and herself going with him.

But her outward thrusts affected the direction of fall; the opening was not wide; and her clutching hand caught Dupin's shoulder, just appearing above the opposite side.

A man less powerful than Dupin must have been wrenched away, or a grip less fierce than Verdier's: but Dupin clung struggling, Verdier, with grinning teeth, maintained his grasp, and the three wriggled a chaotic bundle, till Dupin's hold began to give, when Golde, stooping near with busy knife, realised the situation, and quick as instinct had his blade in Verdier's wrist: whereupon there was a cry of pain, and Margaret's hand was free.

And now that agility, by which she could leap to her toe upon a racing circus-horse, came to light. Like cat-o'-mountain, she nimbly scaled the struggling body of Dupin, skipped above his head, stabbed his shoulder, and he dropped.

"Come . . . !"

High rang her cry: for now several had gained the flooring, she almost among them: but the fugitives were nearest the stair; and up they flew, Margaret first, then Golde, then, in a moment, the French.

"Shoot!" shrieked Danda.

One only had ready pistol, and fired: but he stumbled in the dark over the steps of the lower room drawn up by the fugitives, and his slug buried itself in the floor. A moment afterwards there was dusky light, for Margaret had lifted the trap above: she gained the higher room; and Golde threw himself after her, the pursuers being still hardly half-way up.

The repinings of the storm came up, augmented now in fervent sighs and fluted voices, through the well-hole of the lighthouse.

The trap banged down. Golde fastened it. They looked long into each other's eyes. "You are hurt, I see," he said, taking her hand.

It was covered with blood. "I don't feel hurt," she answered, looking at it. It was blood from Verdier's torn palm. "That was a narrow—"

"Well, yes, it was. But some of them have got their sleeping-draught this time."

"It is what they deserve, too," remarked Golde.

"Listen! They are hacking at this door, now. And they've got the stairs to stand on this time." All had now come up from lower to upper storeroom, save five dead. All were wounded. But now, through a crack above, they had a glimmer. The stairs, however, were narrow, making it necessary to recline in file in awkward poses, away from the trapdoor: nevertheless, the siege recommenced.

This trap seemed less massive, and soon began to feel the assault of stroke on stroke; but, being smaller, it was more awkward to get at. The clock in the sleeping-room above pointed to ten.

"That is where the light downstairs came from," said Margaret, pointing to an open ship's-stove, whose smoke a tin tube carried away. On the fire stood a kettle, placed there by the dead light-keeper. This room was not divided by any partition. It contained a table covered with black oil-cloth, three canvas stools, a canvas easy-chair, a little shelf with the Bible, Prayer-book, Defoe, Bunyan. There were two telescopes, odd boots, a tin of biscuits, a hanging fitch, a pan of egg-shells, pipes, and stains of tobacco. All in the air was still the odour of old ships, and bitter old yeast, and the inveterate sea. A red-painted ship's-bucket, with coals, stood by the lowglowering stove, and two little pokers. The sills of the four deep, small windows were lined with peeling lead.

Margaret went looking about, while below Verdier, too, left the assault, and striking flashes, rummaged through the two apartments.

In the inner he found two fragments of spars, and running back, handed them to the two strongest Frenchmen, calling:

“Leave off swords!”

The two, half-reclining, began to pound upwards, steadying themselves with one arm. But their posture was so inconvenient, that the trap merely bounced to each bump.

Verdier stood contemplative. “Is it going?” he queried.

“Can’t get at it,” answered one.

“Come down, then. Remove the steps!”

“The steps!” echoed Danda, like swift-responding Echo. Down ran the men, struck out the bottom hooks, and lifted the stairs., trying to get the top hooks clear: but failed. Danda ran up to free them, forgetting that, if he succeeded, he would fall fourteen feet. But he could not: between the two side-pieces at the stair-top was a board at right angles to the steps, back of which were the hooks; and as the board nearly touched the trap-door, the band could not get at them from above; on trying, by placing the hand under, Danda could only touch the hooks with straining finger-tips, but not move them.

“The door is in the way!” he cried.

They were now in an impasse, unable to remove the stairs while the door was there; or to batter the door while the stairs were there.

Now, at the first sound of the club-blows, Margaret had started.

“They have got something besides swords now,” she said. “I thought they wouldn’t keep on. But what shall we do?”

“We have knives,” answered Golde. “The knives nearly got us caught. Have you your fish-hook still?”

“No, I left it below: which was a forgetful thing, too.”

“Yes, stupid. I left mine, too, in the flurry. That door will soon be gone.”

“These men seem more like devils than humans.”

“Look! the kettle—”

“What of it?”

“Oh, you do ask . . . we pour the boiling water upon them!”

She ran, took the kettle, and looked in — with an exclamation of disgust.

“It is dry!”

Some flat lime-stones rattled in the bottom. “Here’s a bucket of water,” said Golde.

She looked round, ran to him, and, mouth at ear, whispered: “Boiling lead!”

Golde did not answer: but as she hurried to a window, muttered:

Well, all’s fair in love and war, they say.”

She, meanwhile, reached up, feeling, but the window was beyond her height. “Please — lift me up,” she panted.

Golde ran, ponderously embracing the waist, holding her before him, face to window. “Wait — I am too heavy that way,” she said: “some girls have got no limbs, but I have, you see. I will get on your back.”

And riding him, she cut two squares of peeling lead, ripped them from the tacks, slid down then, cut them into slips, put them, in the kettle, on the fire. And the two pokers, too, she put into the fire.

Below, the voice of the tempest still came tumbling up the flute in wails and volleys of sighs; but the sounds of thunder had ceased; and the lighthouse seemed to tremble less to the massive swing of the sea: the climax had passed. In the room above the clock pointed to half-past ten.

“Take hold of the stairs!” called Verdier.

His own ripped palm and stabbed wrist were wrapped in his stock. They lifted the stair-foot. “Now, move! — that way, towards the window.”

They strained with the stair at right angles to its length. There was a creaking, a silent moment, then a pop, another, and the upper end fell in tumult.

“That’s easy done,” muttered Dupin, fingering the spot where blood trickled and thickened on his woollen tunic.

“Fichtre! what’s that?” someone called suddenly.

Chancing to look up, he had noticed a glowing something, big as a thumb-end, hang in the ceiling, and vanish.

“Place the two stairs one over the other,” called Verdier; “then stand on them, and batter up with the clubs!”

But one stair was hardly in position, when again that cry, “There it is!”

Under another spot the thumb had made its appearance, and vanished, having shed a momentary glow through the dark. All now stood agape, to look: and again they saw it come, and vanish, and yonder again, and vanish; at three spots in the ceiling, at two in the trap: a disappearing visitant, a finger of flame.

This will-o’-the-wisp was produced by the ends of two hot pokers, with which Margaret and Golde were burning holes. A “Quick!” from Verdier sent the French hurrying back to work; but while bent at the task of placing the second ladder evenly over the first, flame shot out of the middle of a man’s back, lighting up the room, and a howl burst from his breast. He was followed by another, and another, the kettle of Margaret pouring a brew of inebriation, yet not of cheer. They scampered with howls, questions, curses.

Their headlong cries were audible above: when they scuttled the hot trickle ceased. Verdier, at flying speed, had rushed into the inner room. A flint-flash revealed part of a ship’s figurehead lying there — a flat wooden mass, boldly curved on one of its three edges.

He heaved it up, and ran toward the ladders, now in position. His footfalls made no sound, for all shoes, slippery with tallow, had been taken off below. A glow from the stove made faintly visible the five holes, and sticking his sword into the figure-head, he held it flat against the ceiling, under the holes.

“Now!” he sang out— “all together! Charge! with club and sword!”

The contest had resolved itself into a contest between this fellow and the girl for the life of Golde.

They rushed thundering upon the trap. But for two of the holes the shape of the figure-head did not afford covering. In three, as Margaret poured her murderous tea, the shining fluid rose, scummed with dross, throwing out little flame-jets; so at the free holes, kettle in hand, she knelt, in graceful pose, pouring — not as a matron freely pours, in the afternoon, for her guests, but as a nurse measures out, lest she overcharge the dose, and hurt her care. As bang on bang raged upon the shuddering door, so howl on howl burst from the men beneath. With every drip — a flame; with every drip — a howl of bitterness: so sore the galling bouillon rankled, ravening like a lion, trenching and eating, with stench and smoke, the yeanling flesh.

As the door shattered upward, Margaret cried:

“Come! let’s go in time, this time!”

And they were not too soon. The tortured French leapt with the agility of cats over the splintered wood, rabid for vengeance. But they saw the sleeping-room trap-door close upon them above, Margaret still with kettle in hand.

“Name of a dog! how many more of these doors and stairs?” cried Dupin, twisting.

“Get at them!” shouted Danda, a brand of red scar and blister on his cheek, “wrench the stairs away!”

They swarmed round the stair-foot, looking a ragged, defeated mob, most naked, all spotted and scarred by that plague of heat. But in the wild eyes of all was resolve. In a minute, they had the stairs from its fastenings, then piled chairs, and whatever they could find, upon it; and on these, recommenced the battery, with club and sword. It was eleven o'clock.

The fugitives stood by the dying man — a long-faced, pallid man, with long red beard, and cavernous eyes. Stooping, they could make out his features. He lay watching with wide and languid eyes, beholding Heaven open.

There were two more bedsteads like his — iron truckle-beds, without head-pieces, on castors, covered with rumpled bed-clothes.

Golde said at the man's ear: "Are you ill?"

He did not answer: his wide, placid eyes looked afar at the Vision.

Golde turned to Margaret.

"Look here, lass, how long is this going to last? Here is this poor man dying, you know. It wouldn't do for us to have him killed, would it?"

His voice had decision. He spoke pretty loudly. The thickly-battering clubs thundered upon the door.

At first Margaret did not answer: then she said: "I don't know what you are talking about."

"This is my meaning," said Golde: "there can't be many more steps for us to climb: my belief is, there is only one more. We've got to be taken, any way. And there is this poor man, dying here—"

"What about him?" said Margaret, pale and panting. "It's me they're after, you know, it isn't you they want. I'm going to put a stop to this." She did not answer. But she laughed a little low laugh, bitter and scornful.

Golde dropped to his knees, took the long, wasted hand.

“Look here,” he said, “I want you to try and understand what I am going to say. That noise you hear there is made by some French devils who are storming the lighthouse, because they are after me. Can you understand? Try and let me know, now.”

The man nodded assent.

“The reason they are after me, is because I have found out a secret of theirs. And the secret is like this: they have a scheme on hand to get hold of the Duke of Wellington, and carry him away to France as a hostage. Can you hear me?”

The man nodded. “Very well,” said Golde, “you have the secret now: and if you get a chance, you will give warning of the matter to those on shore. The Frenchmen are not likely to hurt you, if they don’t suspect that you know. So be careful, in case they find you. I do hope you will get strong and hearty again. Good-bye.”

He rose: but Margaret confronted him with clenched fists drawn threateningly back by her side.

“I am going to give myself up, miss—”

“You sha’n’t!”

Her face was all inflamed, eyes ablaze. “Be reasonable, now,” he said: “you have no right to prevent me—”

“I have! Why have I suffered all this — ?”

She began suddenly to cry into her hands.

“I shouldn’t cry: though it’s good of you, too,” said Golde, “and a touching thing. But as we ye got to be caught, anyway—”

“We haven’t! I have thought of it. On a dark day like this there ought to be a light on the lighthouse: but there hasn’t been anyone to light it, you see. The people on shore will know there is something wrong, and come off. We needn’t be caught, if we only gain time—”

“But no one could land on the rock—” began Golde.

There was a sharp crack in the wood-work.

She caught his arm. “Promise me — see, there are the two beds! we can keep them back — for an age—” She ran toward a bed, dragging Golde. Her intensity — her quick reasonableness — thawed his decision. He helped her trundle a bed to the trap, castors upward, then the other, so that two sides of the beds met over the middle of the trap, the two outer resting on the floor. The sounds of battery came up muffled.

Blow on blow: but when the door was partly shattered, they came upon thicknesses of cloth, which the swords could merely pierce. They had, however, the stove-light: and Verdier, after an upward peer, leapt and seized a sheet, which came down. Soon others were leaping: the bare mattresses appeared: and they set to piercing them, straw whirling about.

“Fire the straw!” cried Danda. “No — stop!” sang out Verdier; “batter away the whole door Stroke on stroke. It was half-past eleven. The mattresses thinned and disappeared, leaving squares of laths, and two iron sides.

They hacked at the laths with shrill janglings, but no other result. The squares were too small for the swords to play within. Margaret tried the kettle, but the lead had solidified. One man leapt, seized an iron side, pushed the other away, and got his rash head between. But he fell back convulsed, Margaret having smitten the two about his skull.

The jangling ceased then, and the French stood round Verdier near the fire.

“Every man off with his sword-belt,” he said; “when I give the word, everyone throw his belt over one lath, and hang his weight upon it — only let it be together: they have knives.”

The assault was soon over: at the weight, the laths bulged downward, and split from their fastenings, so that the two had only time to cut three sword-belts, when the bedsteads clashed into one chaos of shrilly jangling and vibratory laths. The next moment they were hasting up a narrow iron ladder, and the French clambering hotly over the opening. Margaret pushed at the door above: it would not yield: it was of metal; but when Golde helped, a light-ray came in, and they were on the other side before Verdier had dashed to the ladder's foot.

They fastened the trap, and found themselves in the lantern: an octagon eight feet high, stinking of the burnt candles of half a century. The roof, made of beams and massive planking, was covered with a crust of soot, and the whole was sere with the old heat of the lantern.

Margaret looking over the blue and white sea, said:

“We are at the top.”

Then beneath, and cried suddenly: “We are safe! That door — an army of Frenchmen couldn't beat it away.” Verdier, lying back on the stairs, had his head close beneath the door, tapping it with his knuckles.

“We can do nothing with that,” he muttered. Well, let her die then!”

And down with free swing he swaggered in haste crying in high rollicking tenor: “Back, sirs, we can do nothing with that! Fire the lighthouse!”

A cheer arose: the long up-hill task was over: and down pell-mell they leapt from sleeping to living-room, where was the stove.

Verdier, the last to leave, dimly discerned the light-keeper, stooped, and was met by the wide eyes. He was both annoyed, and touched with compunction. As he stood uncertain, his flushed face bent low, up trickled a streamlet of smoke. He put his arms under the man's, and running, lowered his feet, singing out:

“Hi! some of you take this man.”

Two received and dropped him in careless haste, the long-haired head bumping audibly. Verdier dropped into a smothered room, full of coughs and tears, the grey reek stained at three points with flame-jets. The hacked beds and straw had been piled near the wooden lining, with table and canvas-chairs, and kindled.

The tempest was practically over: but the viols of the winds, finding now free vogue through the four open valves came vehemently vapouring up the long flute in fervent voices and votive sighs, routing the smoke up and down and about. It needed only the opening of the summit trap-door for the draught to go pealing like an organ through the chimney, carrying with it the steady roar of the upward-bickering flames in which all was soon to welter.

Verdier cast flinching eyes around, surprised at the spread of the fire. “Better hurry down!” he called.

The whole interior was nothing more than a skilful piece of ship’s-carpentry; the wood-work, moreover, was seasoned, and, toward the top, mere touchwood, on account of the nightly heat. The fire was no sooner kindled than it was raging, and the roof hot before the flames were near it.

Danda was heard through smoke and confusion: “Block up the trap-door! They will try to descend!”

“Absurd!” shouted Verdier: “look round you—”

Already the frantic fire had enveloped the room, climbing like a frightened monkey; and downwards too, with deliberate step, it walked.

Verdier, about to leap, once more noticed the light-keeper’s face, now in brilliant light, and stooped to him. But something in the way in which the weight lay upon his effort caused him to glance: and now, with a low exclamation, he deposited the body. It was dead. He dropped hurriedly: the floor was crackling.

Already in the upper store-room they could see flame at the top of its tarred sides; and as the last man dropped to the lower store-room, down upon the floor of the upper tumbled the floor of the living-room.

And now was swift destruction, and noise, and trickling lead, and crackling glass, and dropping bolts, and holocausts of tallow, and the huge crash and downfall of flaring timbers. The body of the light-keeper was seen to come tumbling, and hang like a guy half-over the doorway of the upper store-room; again it had to fall; and again, as calcined bones, down the well.

Into the mouth of a Frenchman waiting his turn to descend the well, fell broth of pewter; and yelling he ran. And now an upward rage of draught proved the roof pierced, and down on a sudden tumbled roof and iron slab, lantern, and sleeping-room floor, one mass of ruin, upon the upper store-room floor; and down immediately fell this upon the lower store-room floor, filling the well with flame. But the last of the French had passed out to the exterior.

The fallen flames quickly kindled the casing at the bottom, while the upper flames stole downward with steady step. The rapturous meeting of the two was speedily accomplished, and immediately the whole tall interior was one furnace of liquid conflagration, uproariously brawling skyward at the blast of the thundering draught.

The gale, however, was over, and the lighthouse no longer half-planted in a mound of foam. But it remained far too rough for approach, and the French were prisoners.

They did not even trouble to look if any vestige remained of Golde and Margaret, their whole anxiety being now about themselves, for their boat could not be seen.

Up through the lighthouse top a clear column, plumed with smoke, flamed high. It shed a far glow through the sombrous day, its hot breath drying the clothes of the two fugitives.

When they had felt the roof hot they had understood, and looked into each other's faces, realising that now, at least, they were doomed, not knowing of any egress; till Margaret, running about, discovered a hook in the lantern-woodwork: outside ran a two-foot balcony, bounded by a railing in the massive corona: and instantly she was on it, Golde after her, the heat being now intolerable to him, who had only stockings.

Round the open space they ran, looking down the outer slope; as a jet shot up within the lantern, Margaret uttered the high cry:

“Come!”

To Golde's ineffable wonder, she legged over the railing, and vanished, seeming to hurl herself into the sea.

But running he saw her seated on a cornice-beading four feet down, hardly five inches wide, where to his flurried senses it seemed impossible that any creature could remain one second. The crackling lantern, however, was contributory to comprehension, and another glance showed that Margaret's weight hung chiefly, not upon the cornice, but upon a rod: the lightning-conductor.

It ran through staples, admitting an arm between it and the wall. Golde, hunted from behind, stepped over the edge, trusted his weight to the rod, reached the cornice, and with his arm above Margaret's, on the other side, clung on, sitting. But the rod, feeling unusual weight, bent its free top slightly outward. They felt it yield with a chill of intensest horror. Neither spoke. By this undecided stay they were held from the abyss of foaming rocks: and they avoided each other's eyes. Above them roared the stammering tongue of flame.

Unmeasured hours, full of shivering Hopelessness, like an Arctic Hell, passed over them. Afterwards, they were aware of voices, men hooting up through arched hands, shouts which the vague vogue of the wind through the gutted lighthouse would not let them discern. Margaret, vaguely conscious, heard Golde shouting in answer: but he, too, was incomprehensible to those he answered.

By now the interior of the wall was ink-black, dead, without a spark. The sea was almost as calm as it ever is round Raddon, and the French had long since reached the frigate.

The men who shouted had come from the shore, as soon as they considered that the falling tide would permit a landing. Among them was the light-keeper who had gone to procure a doctor.

But the shouting ceased; and the two despairing hearts saw the boat make again for shore. Hope, which had sprung at this human neighbourhood — though formless and unconscious how help could reach them pinnacled there so dizzily — died now.

“Well, my friend—” said Margaret with pale smile. “Ah, lass,” answered Golde.

More and more the lightning-conductor had given to their weight, the bend being obvious now. Their limbs, moreover, could not long hold on for very torpor. To be able to move but a muscle — this was their longing. But, as time passed, all longing resolved itself into a growing drowsiness. Though sleep were death, yet must they sleep: and for a long time their whole souls were centred upon a slumbrous effort to restrain the leaden weight of their eyelids, and cling on still.

But after two hours a strange wakefulness of hope revived in them. There again was — the boat. They saw it, unless it were the last sweet dream. And this time there was no shouting. The men landed quietly, and entered the lighthouse.

The two waited, wondering, till they were startled by a whizzing hubbub which went fussing up, up, through the lighthouse-top. There was an aspiring light in the air — a silent burst of fire — a cascade of hues: it was a rocket. Its flight ended, it curved upon itself in the height, and plunged downward, to smite upon the lighthouse side. The stick-rope struck, in its slap against the wall, upon the cheek of Golde.

It was Margaret who, with slow trepidations, made the first descent, the men paying out to her weight. Her hands could just sustain her: and she, and then Golde, arrived at the ledge where the conductor met the reef.

To the hundred questions of their rescuers, they could return no answer. The muttered word “Frenchmen” was, however, at that day, almost an explanation. Some brown-brandy was poured down their throats, and they leaned foredone with drooped head upon the gunwale.

At four in the afternoon they were landed at Wyemouth.

CHAPTER IX. THE "BUSY BEE"

ON THE WYE-BANK was an embankment, through which three steps led into the garden of the "Busy Bee."

Here the boat shipped oars, and one shook Golde, another Margaret. Their heads rested upon their arms: and they slept deep.

By much coaxing and shouting, they were got through the bowling green to the inn, moving with closed eyes, dragged feet, and hanging heads, each supported by two men, while some midnight murmurs came from a corner of Golde's mouth.

"Now, Mother Higgins, get us two beds for this lot," said one of the men, arrived in the parlour. Mother Higgins, a stout old widow, asthmatic, with a redundant wealth of buxom chins, put a hand behind an ear, and said:

"Two what?"

"Two beds!" shouted the waterman. "Oh, two beds. Who are they?"

"They are from the burnt lighthouse."

"The what?"

"The lighthouse!"

"Oh, the lighthouse. They will pay for themselves, I suppose."

"Now, Mother — is that a question, now? You know Mr. Golde, the miller, at Newton, don't you?"

"Mr. Who?"

"Golde! Golde!"

"Oh, Golde. Well, Sarah, give the girl the back room on the first story, and put Golde into the empty a-top."

Sarah led the way, and the two sleepers were pushed and manoeuvred up the stairs behind the bar. To Mrs. Higgins a stair was a feat not lightly to be undertaken; but Sarah did the kindly office of undressing Margaret of her still damp flimsies, and put her naked to bed like a sleepy child. Above, as the boatmen did the like for Golde, another murmur, like chloroform mumblings, came from his lips: but without articulation. In two minutes the pair, who, through a night and day had braved together a host of perils, together slept peacefully.

But not for long. The vitality of the girl arose. A thought, deep in her consciousness, shook her slumber. At about six in the afternoon her eyes opened. She lay in a state of vacuous languor. Her arms went up, her hands clasped over her head, and a while she lay so, profoundly meditating upon nothing. Then a stark jerk of the body; and a coarse free yawn: and a swift twist; and she lay now sideways, lithe as a panther, a perfect animal. One of her arms, dropping in lassitude from the stiff stretch, fell over the bed-side, and the palm met a chair. On the chair was a paper; and upon this her fingers unconsciously closed.

She was restless. Thought, as yet unborn in her, was working to birth. She stiffened arrantly again, and up went the paper in her out-shot fist. As she again relaxed, the fist fell into her left breast, grasping the leaf. Soon she became conscious that she held something. She looked at the crumpled ball, smoothed it out, and listlessly lifted it before imbecile eyes.

In a moment she was awake. Thought, recollection, rushed back upon her. She sat up. The paper was a leaf ruled in red, torn out of an account-book: and on it a bill for a week's board to someone called Lise d'Arblay: and it was the French name which had so acted as a shock.

She set to shouting. The housemaid, Sarah, a tall wench, came in. "Oh, I am famished!" said Margaret.

“So I should suppose, too, by accounts,” said Sarah. “What will you have? We have turkey poult, murinade pork, some mutton casserole, some turbot-and-smelts, an apple-tart, green peas, brocoli, endive, and potatoes.”

“I’ll have all. Oh, do get it to me “Sha’n’t be a minute,” said Sarah. “What is to become of Mr.—” called Margaret. “Golde?”

“Yes.”

“He’s upstairs asleep.”

Sarah presently returned with a heaped mixed platter. Margaret began to gorge, everything together, as was the fashion, plate on legs.

“You had a French female staying here, I think?” she said with full mouth.

“We had a female,” answered Sarah, “I don’t know if she was a French one.”

“She spoke English?”

“Oh, yes! such a dandizette, clearly of the upper circles, more like a princess, my dear: her gowns, her worked pelisses, and the magnificent way she dispensed the regents! And for supper, seven-and-six port, dear me! And withal a most condescending polite lady of fashion, I’m sure—”

Margaret guttled industriously, silent. Then, across pork, mutton, turbot, peas, pickles, brocoli and potatoes:

“What was she doing here?”

“Don’t know, I’m sure.”

“How long was she here?”

“Just a se’ennight.”

“When did she go?”

“This very morning.”

“In the storm?”

“Yes; but she is coming back: she left a portmanteau behind.”

“What did she do with herself while she was here?”

“She went a considerable deal on horseback. Would go about the moor every day; she frequented the neighbourhood, in fact.”

“But what for? Did she talk to anyone?”

“Not a creature hardly. Some mornings, at a certain hour, she used to go to the grotto down the garden, and—”

“Well?”

“You know the gipsy-men: two of them called once to see her; and in the grotto, after that, she used to talk to one—”

“A dandizette of fortune talking with gipsies — ?”

“She told me she was taken with gipsies, they being such interesting poor creatures.”

“Did you know that the Duke of Wellington is at Grandcourt Abbey?”

“Oh, everybody knows that. A deputation of the Rank and Fortune of the County, with the Sheriff, a detachment of the S. Devon Militia, and the Plymouth Volunteer Cavalry waited upon him yesterday.”

“How far is it away?”

About a seven mile from here.”

“Was that the way the lady went this morning?”

“Was that the way? I think so — yes.”

At the last word, Margaret in one leap, was out of bed. “Quick!” she cried, “you have to lend me some clothes.” Sarah stared, but once pushed away, quickly returned with a bundle — shoes, linen, and a brown gown, ankle-long.

“What’s it — ?” she began.

Margaret was at once breathlessly at work. “Didn’t Mr. Golde say anything to anybody about the Duke when he landed?” she panted.

“Oh, he! — he was fast asleep. No, he said naught. We do not even know the history of your escapades, or anything—”

“Then run — quick — and call the post-master for me!”

“She— ’tis a female — can’t come up — you oughtn’t to exert yourself like that: you haven’t had any rest to speak of—”

“Can’t you do as I tell you? Call her! Stop — where is it Mr. Golde has his Mill?”

“At Newton.”

“Is that nearer Grandcourt than here?”

“About a three mile nearer, I should say.”

Margaret caught up the bill, rushed half-dressed to pen-and-ink on a table inside the big fireplace, and wrote:

“If I want you, I will come to your Mill for you. — Margaret Ferris.”

“Don’t wake him,” she said, “his hunger will wake him. Put this on his pillow, so that he will see it. And now — quick — the post-mistress.”

Another push sent Sarah through the door. But Margaret was dressed and flying down the stairs, before Mother Higgins, all sighs, had toiled in uphill travail half their height.

“Are you the hostess?” cried she, with hurried breath, hardly stopping— “then you’ve got to tell everybody that some Frenchmen are trying to kidnap the Duke of Wellington, in as mean a way as possible.”

And down she flew through a side-door, across the fields, running.

Mother Higgins, on the stairs, stood staring where the phantom of the girl had been, quite bewildered.

“The Duke of Wellington?” she murmured: “trying to entrap the Frenchmen — as many as possible? — what in the world has that to do with me? The young female's crazy!"

He that hath ears to hear, let him hear! — Mother Higgins was deaf. She descended the steps in calculated detail, hoping that Mr. Golde was prepared to bear the charges of the fugitive girl.

CHAPTER X. THE SNUFF-BOX

BY NOON OF that same day, the 20th, at a time when Golde and Margaret felt the lighthouse-top heating beneath their soles, Lise d'Arblay was at Grandcourt, it being still very dark, though the climax of the storm was passed.

News ran then so slow, that when it was heard, as it were from nowhere, it seemed to proceed, in Homeric phrase, Ὡς ἅετις — from God. Post-chaise, mail-coach, stage-coach jingled merrily between inn-station and inn-station; but at the stations themselves, guard, driver, and “boys” took life leisurely, fortifying against the next bit of road. The poor outside passenger mingled democratically with the four or six inside fares in the parlours, and only when all had attained to glairy eyes and hot joy in the stomach, was the journey resumed.

The Duke of Wellington was hourly expecting Opie and the despatches: for no part of England, except the London region, had heard anything of the murder of the officer, and the disappearance of his niece, when the band of gipsies, with forced travel, were already at Seacombe Moor.

The Abbey lies twelve miles from the coast, seven from Wyemouth, in a garden of fertility, contrasting with the barren Moor three miles off. The sombre pile, cross-shaped, stands on a terraced lawn of artificial waters and flower-beds; the horizon being park and upland forest. The South wing, looking towards moor and sea, closely approaches the park, between the two being a tarn whose wavelets lap the darkly-mossed old stones, and from its south bank an avenue of sycamores leads away and away, directly southward through the park, the procession of trunks meeting at a far vanishing-point.

The Duke was alone with the servants: for Lord Elwell, his host, had two days previously accompanied his wife over the hills to Market Graddon, she having been summoned to the deathbed of her brother, the young guardsman, Lord Archibald, who was under the care of a French physician, D'Artois. When Lord Elwell demurred to go, the Duke had said:

“Very well, if you stay here on my account, I shall have to run off.”

And since those lips never uttered words which they did not mean, this threat settled the matter. His lordship went, and was not expected back for yet two days.

The Abbey Library overlooks the lake; and there, amid the double procession of busts and stained old glass, the Duke sat reading by lamplight when, at noon, “Mrs. Opie” was announced.

He ordered her to be admitted. When she appeared, he rose, with bows.

Now glints of silver, though few, mixed with his light hair: but he was never in fuller vigour, erect, without an ounce of flesh on that aquiline visage of blue hawk-eyes, which retained a singular boyishness. He had on a blue cut-away coat with silver buttons, light “trowsers,” a throat-wrapping of brown stock.

“I have the honour to be the bearer to your Grace of despatches on behalf of Lieutenant James Wootton Opie,” said Lise, seated near him, she in very telling Kendal bonnet, and rolloed travelling-gown, gold-clasped, which she held up, and patted with a riding-whip.

As she made her announcement, the steely eyes of the Duke, and the bold eyes of the woman met.

“So, then, what is become of poor Opie?” said he.

“Lieutenant Opie is in the greatest distress, your Grace. Your Grace may possibly have heard of his poor niece, who has the misfortune of a disfigurement of face?”

“Well, I have heard something. I thought it was rather a hoax of those newspaper-fellows.”

“A hoax? Why, no. It has been my pious task to watch over this interesting girl, in her seclusion, for some years. Lieutenant Opie, I may say, is devoted to his relative, in spite of the misfortune, or, perhaps, because of it. She has, alas, lately disappeared.”

“Is that so?”

“I had only left the house for an hour. When I returned, she was gone. So far, all search has been useless. It is credibly supposed that she has been kidnapped by a band of gipsies, for the purposes of exhibition about the country.”

“I am very sorry. Opie is a gallant fellow. So, then, he is looking about for the lady?”

“He is run wild, your Grace, with grief and rage, and has gone tearing harum-scarum into Bedford-shire, which is the chief haunt of the gipsies. He has asked me to present a thousand apologies at your Grace’s feet for his incapacity to bear the despatches in person. With me, he felt, they were safe as with himself.”

The Duke was wondering what was the relation between Opie and the lady before him. She had called herself “Mrs. Opie”: she might be Opie’s brother’s wife, or something. He would not ask. But she volunteered:

“I should have informed your Grace that I am Lieutenant Opie’s wife.”

The Duke bowed, but his eyes twinkled. A gold snuff-box came from his waist-coat pocket, and a pinch went up.

“So, then,” he said to himself “Opie had a wife hidden away somewhere, unknown to all of us. Or else, for some reason or other, the woman is lying like the devil to me.”

He said aloud:

“You and I may have met somewhere, then. I am getting rather an old fellow now, and the memory almost looks as if it wanted to be off. Still, I have a way of keeping a lovely face in my head, when I see it.”

That made her throw the head sideways, coquettishly, saying: “H’m. Your Grace is too indulgent to my poor face.” Then, in serious tone: “I should perhaps tell your Grace that I have been married some five years: but there are reasons — family reasons — which make it desirable that Lieutenant Opie’s marriage should not, for the present, be known beyond a strictly limited circle.”

“Do not mention it,” said he. “Opie is by so much a luckier fellow than we all thought him. Well, now, but tell me — how did you get here?”

“I arrived by coach at Wyemouth this morning, and have rode to Grandcourt.”

“Then you must be very tired.” He pulled a bellrope. “I am rather in a difficulty, however. They have all gone away, and left me by myself: so you will have to put up with me for host.”

“I return, your Grace, to Wyemouth, at once.”

“I cannot let you do that, you know. I know those shabby coaches too well: they knock one up more than a day’s march. I shall keep you here at least three days, then. Or since they will not let a man be host to a lady, why not let me instal you as hostess for the time being, and then you can consider me your guest. How would that do?”

He said it playfully. Lise smiled. A lackey entered.

“This lady will be here as mistress of the house for some days,” said the Duke: “just put her in the right hands, will you?” Then to Lise: “What I should do, would be to take a good big tumbler of mulled port — you will find an excellent cellar here — and then turn in, and have a good siesta.”

Lise sank and curved into a profound curtsy; handed him the despatches; and went after the lackey.

“She is French” — he tapped the snuff-box bottom— “the cut of the face, and something or other in the accent. So that fellow Opie had a wife hidden away from everybody.” He applied the aroma to one sideward nostril, then to the other. It was a mixture moistened and mixed by Fribourg & Treyer of the Haymarket, invented by that connoisseur, Lord Petersham, an exquisite secret, a breath from Arabia: and the box was most choice, of fretted gold: at this point the iron man and duke tended to luxury. “And a wife in rather good taste, too,” he said disjointedly between two inhalations. “Well, now—” He broke the Government Seals, and commenced a long study.

Outside Lise said: “Do not have my horse unsaddled for the present. I shall ride him presently.”

She made a pretence of eating, but took no siesta that day. At One, she was a-horse again, galloping for the martello-tower, two miles from Grandcourt. There she placed in the dark niche agreed upon with Lovell, the gipsy, this note:

“In the martello-tower this night (Wednesday), at half after nine. I must receive word not later than seven that all is ready on your side. — d’Arblay.”

She returned to the Abbey, and spent the interval between two and six at a bedroom window looking upon the lawn, and the sombre, windy day. Quiet, patient, she sat, hatted. Her cream- white was tinted now with yellow. Fear was at her — a Doubt huge as Being; at about six she became restless, and began to pace furiously, kicking her skirt before.

At about six, too, Margaret Ferris, in wild haste, started out from the “Busy Bee” across fields, big with her momentous warning. Lightly sped the swift limbs on their errand of good-will, her feet beautiful as the feet of him that bringeth glad tidings. She guessed that no attempt would be made, save under cover of night: and had hope. Besides, she had left the great news behind — the country-side would rise. She did not dream that the precious words, dropped into Mother Higgin’s ears, were as lost as though shouted into some vague well.

But she would be in time! Unless some scheme, more subtle than she could conceive, were even then in working. “That man they call Verdier—” she muttered, panting. Verdier’s cunning loomed terrible now in her eyes — she had felt it.

As she ran, a galloping ass passed her: on its back two panniers, and, with grasshopper knees, the gipsy, Lovell. He was making for Grandcourt, returned from the frigate, with Danda’s notice to Lise that all was ready: and he was in haste, being late.

“A gipsy in a hurry?” thought Margaret: “who ever saw that? But a giptsy — !” She remembered the French lady’s intimacy with gipsies. And this one took the way to Grandcourt — in a hurry. A fervent eagerness to reach the place before him arose in her. She dashed forward. She cried, “Stop!”

The man, perfectly stolid, did not turn his head, though presently his gallop slackened into a shuffling amble. She, running hard, could hold her own; but her splendid wind began to fail.

The road wound near Newton village, half-way between Weymouth and the Abbey: and just here she saw patient under a tree a raw-boned butcher-boy's horse, a commonplace of that time, with meat-tray strapped to the one-stirrugged saddle. The boy had alighted for some purpose: and she, instantly on its back, urged forward the hack. The ass began to gallop again, but she, plying the stick, gained slowly, though it became evident that not much of a victory could result for either. The gipsy seemed to have become aware, without once looking back, that he was pursued, and the little ass went clattering into its bravest gallop. After about a mile they were nearly abreast, when she saw a bright something stick from a stuffing of cloth in the pannier nearest her. With quick wit, and circus-agility, she stooped and drew it — a knife.

She slackened pace; the ass forged ahead; and now, keeping to the other side of the path, she dashed once more into full speed. Catching up the ass again, she stooped, and with a slash, cut through the three pannier-straps on that side of the haunch: as it dropped, she caught it by a strap, and let it gently down. With an adroitness so swift was it accomplished behind the gipsy's back, that he had no notion of anything: and they had galloped a mile onward before Margaret, looking back, called out:

“You have dropped the basket with the child in it — behind!”

The gipsy, glancing at his haunch, uttered a mad exclamation. He turned, and flew backward, belabouring his animal, screaming a gibberish of imprecations, fist in air.

Margaret now counted that she would reach Grandcourt twenty minutes before him. But she had hardly started into fresh gallop when two roads opened before her; and down the one which did not lead to Grandcourt bolted the butcher-horse. She tore at his mouth of brass; she fought and whispered, flogged and coaxed: but in headlong career the old nag held his dogged course. This was his way home; and this his hour of rest from the day's toil.

CHAPTER XI. "THE MISTRESS OF THE HOUSE"

CONSCIOUS OF HER influence over animals, Margaret clung on in the desperate hope of getting that stubborn mouth round: and in one final effort she pulled with hard backward strain: but now the old reins snapped.

Whereupon the wheezy nag, in free career, went scattering the muddy road homewards. No device could now check him: and in a great leap she alighted with elastic ease on the grass.

Backward she hurried to the Grandcourt road. The gipsy was still behind, and already late for the rendezvous at seven. Her feet grew light with the joy and rage of contest: if he beat, he would not beat by much, perhaps! She knew how to run, at any rate!

She was not, however, far gone, when the rotatory, clattery, spattery tramp of the donkey behind her was heard on the roadway. The gipsy drove straight to ride her down, and as he dashed past, leant back, shaking his fist and jargoning. A bend of hill hid him; but soon there rose before her the woods of Grandcourt.

The Duke had sent to ask Lise d'Arblay if she would join him (everyone dined early, about six), but she had declined on the ground of migraine. As the hour for Lovell's arrival drew on, her feverish solitude became intolerable; she descended into the grounds; when he was late she knew the anguish of the rack. It was twenty minutes to eight before, on the agreed west side, she saw him come galloping. At that moment Margaret was running up the avenue; but she had a longish detour round the lake.

Lovell handed to Lise Danda's note, and at the same time said:

“Is there anybody has any suspicion of this matter of yours, lady?” She glanced quick surprise. “No, I hope not Why so?”

“A woman gave me chase on the road, you see. She isn’t far off, either. She’s coming here certain. She cut off my basket with the brat, and made me late, you see. ‘Cod! you should be careful, lady.’”

Lise turned upon him a blanched face. “There must be some mistake. . . . No one knows—”

“Well, I tell you what I saw, lady. Is everything right for to-night?”

“Everything: Lovell, be punctual, I charge you, Lovell. You are sure she is coming here?”

“Sure, lady.”

“Well, we shall see. At half after eight, remember, — and nine. How does she look, this woman?”

“A young woman she is, active on the legs, and a brune, lady.”

Lise turned one way, Lovell the other. She walked across the lawn, and spoke to a footman in the hall.

“If a young woman comes, wanting to see the Duke, or having any message, send her into that room yonder to me. He will be unwilling, I think, to see anyone to-night, being busy with Government affairs.”

“Very good, madam.”

Lise was the mistress of the house. “Has the Duke returned to the library since dinner?” she asked. “Yes, madam.”

Lise, in a little arrased music-room near, touched a harpsichord, an oboe, then a little piccolo, her own, brought from London, and played a bar. She then laid a book upon her placid lap, and waited ten minutes: and now before her appeared the face of Margaret, its hot damask flush parching three half-dried streamlets of sweat, the golden eyes, and wild.

In contrast, her own creamy face lay in profiled repose on the red-cushioned chair.

“You have been exerting yourself,” said she, “one sees that. Sit down, will you? Something is the matter.”

“Are you Lady Grandcourt?”

“There is no such person. There was a Lady Elwell, who is dead. Tell me —”

“Are you the mistress of the house?”

“Yes.”

“Can I see — the Duke of Wellington?”

“I am afraid not”

“Oh, don’t say that, pray, pray. I do so want to see himself.”

“He is busy. But he might see you, if the matter is important. Tell me—”

“I am foolish, you see. I suspect everybody and everything, just as if — But that man is so artful! That is why I want to see himself—”

“To which man do you refer? Tell me.”

“Some Frenchmen, who have a plot to kidnap the Duke—” A slim cry escaped Lise. Her lower lip trembled a little. But in a moment she was herself. “But that is rather a wild story, is it not? Whereabouts are these Frenchmen?”

“I don’t know where they are now, but I know that they were on shore last night, because I’ve good cause to remember them! And I know that they mean to do what they are trying for.”

“You encountered them, then, last night?”

She told her whole story in outline, ending with the “Busy Bee,” the name “Lise d’Arblay,” the gipsy.

“There certainly seems something in what you say,” mused Lise. “You shall see the Duke and recount him all this — if I can persuade him to see you, that is. He is so careless of himself, you know. But we shall see. What is your name?"

"Margaret Ferris."

"Well, will you wait here? I shall go straight now, and see. Meantime, be sure to say nothing to the servants, till you see the Duke — he would not, I know, like the house to be thrown into a state of alarm. You may have to wait some time, you know — an hour — two. It is quite an undertaking — Margaret — to put the wheels of that great machine into action. Meanwhile, I am going to send you some cake and wine!"

With friendly condescending nods she stepped away, holding the travelling-skirt. Margaret sat waiting. Something troubled her, something. With the first glance at Lise, a mistrust which had vanished, an instinctive enmity which had passed, had arisen in her. And now that she was alone, a feeling remained as if she were losing ground — and time. Something was awry, disturbing.

This something was the French accent of Lise, a thing so fugitive that one might hear it, and not know that one had heard it.

A footman entered with wine: and she, hardly knowing why, said:

"What is the name of the lady who was speaking to me just now?"

"Mrs. Opie," said the man.

"Thank you. She is the mistress here?"

"No — well, yes; just for the time being, you know."

"All right. I thank you."

She waited at a window, looking out upon the lawn northwards. The evening grew from greys to browns: the day of summer storm was over; and the definite premonition of night was here.

CHAPTER XII. THE COFFIN

BUT AWAY IN the West the sky was still tawny with lights and paints; and there in outspread, changing spectacle, as in some world-theatre, was enacted a great drama of colours and tragedy of hues. It was the one place of tints in the drab, and dun, and utterly still evening, in which not the pipe of a bird, or the breath of a wind, was heard.

The Duke had spent the day in reading the despatches, and making notes, less one half-hour in the great groined dining-hall over Regent cutlets and port. Soon after eight the coloured light in the vast cedared duskiness of the library failed. He laid down the magnifying-glass through which he had been tracking the words. At the same time his strong lips curved into a smile of pleasure.

He was fond of music: and a piccolo had begun to warble the Spanish Palama just beneath the library-window nearest him.

“Well, that is rather handsomely done,” he said to himself; and he took the snuff-box; and he tapped it; and he inhaled through alternate large holes of satisfaction; and the spice mingled with the melody in a charm.

He went presently to one of the narrow gothic mullions, and opened a half, peeping out. The lake lay beneath, lapping the wall. Among the cushions of a skiff he saw Lise reclining, flute at lips. He took his oak stick, and his curving low beaver, and through a corridor outside passed on to a marble platform in the lake.

This was even better than the hope of Lise d’Arblay. Far yonder, in another wing, Margaret waited, watching the darkening day.

Lise ceased her music, and laughed. Her paddle touched the water, and the shallop came grazing the landing-place.

“I had no idea that I was overheard, your Grace,” she said; “I have been spying about, and found this elegant lake, and this adorable wherry, too tempting. So I brought my piccolo.”

“You have brought me as well, you see: and I have heard both Mrs. Billington and Catalani, too, in my time; but that is siren-music.”

“Ah, your Grace, Ulysses did not listen to the sirens. He stopped his ears.”

“Well, but I am not Ulysses. And, besides, the fellow only managed to escape because the sirens did not play with piccolos.”

She threw back her head:

“I owe your Grace, then, to my piccolo: I must overlay it with gold.”

“Well, shall I step in?”

He stepped in. Lise had the paddle. The wherry glided out, curved languidly about, then almost reached the other side, near the avenue. A lazy species of flirtation went on meanwhile within it.

“I have been adoring the avenue,” said Lise. “I do not think I ever saw one so sumptuous.”

“Yes, it is supposed to be rather fine,” said he.

“But so bare! On a French chateau, from every opening would peep white nymph and faun, Pan and Sylvanus, satyr and hamadryad. Here, except the file of tree-trunks, there is — nothing!”

“There you are wrong,” he answered. “My friend, Elwell, has in quality what he lacks in quantity, you will find. A little way down one comes upon a rather fine thing by Turnerelli; then, farther on, there are some Graces by Nollekens; and if you keep on, you get to a thing by Chantry—”

A little cry . . . “Chantry, your Grace?”

He nodded. "He is my ideal! — my darling! I should like to see it"

"Well, the only way is to go to it, then. That is easily done, too." Is it far down?"

"Not too far. We will go."

So they stepped out upon the south shore, and Lise furtively looked at her watch; and there was the leisurely walk down; and the halt before the Turnerelli; and the halt before the Nollekens; and the adoration of the Chantry. And out from the West faded the tragedy of hues, leaving only burnt-out emptiness and grey oblivion, as when a tragedy is past The night was nearly come.

It was before the Chantry that Lise remarked:

"Your Grace — I found this morning, on arriving at Wyemouth, that your Grace is quite the subject of gossip among the cronies.

"So? What is it about?"

"It appears that a wonderful rumour has got abroad that your Grace is to be kidnapped by a club of Frenchmen, who are connived at by their Government, and then kept as hostage for the release of Hero."

"Ah, it would be rather a gallant thing for them to do," answered he: "I wonder some of them have not their thought of that."

She glanced at the angular face, admiring that perfection of sang-froid. "But they seem so monstrous serious!" she said. "They even forked out details, — and names! I heard that the plot is already in full go — the Frenchmen being in a ship off the coast — and assisted on shore by two English people: one, a female, called Margaret Ferris—"

"Ah, I had a Commissary General in the Peninsular called Ferris. It is really an Italian name, which they have turned into Scotch."

"Remember it, your Grace," she said, and laughed— "Margaret — Ferris. If ever you meet her, you will know your sworn enemy."

Lise all the time was full of secret trouble at the thought of the girl waiting, waiting yonder: for who could tell what Margaret might take it into her head to do?

Suddenly, as if springing from the ground, two gipsies, a man and a woman, appeared a little farther down the avenue. They were very ragged, the man's clothes wet with blood. The woman, half-crouching to her knees, held out a supplicating palm.

"Oh, they are gipsies," said Lise.

"Well, and how came you here?" asked the Duke. He took a listless step in their direction. The gipsies ran a little way, as if in fear.

"Don't run away," he called, seeing their distress: but as he approached, they kept backing diffidently, slowly, half-crouchingly.

"The rascal is afraid of my stick, that is clear," said he, taking a groat from his purse.

"Do you want to tell our fortunes?" called Lise. The gipsy-woman nodded enthusiastically, but kept backing. They were not far now from the end of the sombre avenue.

"Do you know," said he, "they say that Buonaparte has great faith in the sayings of these rascals?"

Crow's-feet, just beginning to gather at his eye-corners, wrinkled up into amusement.

"Some people consider that one of the marks of his greatness," said Lise.

"Ah yes, a great man," he answered musingly: "but the charge I bring against him is that the fellow is not a gentleman. Here, you — what is it you want?"

The gipsy pointed to his belly, meaning hunger: to his blood-stained clothes. "Well, then, here is a fuppenny."

The gipsy, leaning far forward, gingerly took the coin: then backed away. “And what is all the blood about?” asked the Duke.

The man began to pour out a voluble tale of wrong, keeping his leisurely-advancing from camp by the old woman; he had been beaten, robbed, and pursued by them nearly to the avenue.

And what was it all about?

It was because he would not consent to the burying alive of a poor weak-headed lady whom the tribe had stolen in London — a poor thing with the face of a rat —

The Duke glanced at Lise with concern. She was feeling, with tingling pleasures, the perfection of the gipsies’ acting.

A few steps more, and they would be at the avenue-end.

Suddenly a perfect hullabaloo of jabbering gibberish, tongues contending in volubility, burst upon the ear: and immediately there passed by the avenue-end, along the open road, a crowd of apparently excited gipsies, evidently carrying some burden like a coffin, for in their midst was a longish space.

“There are they!” cried the gipsy-man to the Duke— “those are them, guv’nor! They are carrying her now to bury!”

He, with stick grasped tight, trotted prone at once. He raised his voice, calling “Stop!” At the sound a silence fell; every gipsy glanced backward: and distance all the while before the couple. He had been driven gipsies of his tribe, he and his in a body, they took to their heels. The Duke was after them.

Lise and the two gipsies came running after, she holding up her habit-skirt.

The band, either with design, or because of their burden, did not run fast. The Duke, hat pushed back on head, with uplifted stick, gained slowly upon them. But his run, too, was more leisurely than intense; and the road was winding. When the crowd was still twenty yards ahead, he was clean hidden from Grandcourt by a cliff-side. All the time he could hear a beating and kicking against boards, and divined the death-struggle in the coffin. When at last he was within striking distance, he had run a good way, and the noises in the coffin had ceased. As he was about to drop a blow, suddenly the whole band scattered like chaff, in swift flight over ditches, fields, hedges, dropping the melancholy burden at his feet.

He bent over a coffin of rough boards, at a loss what to do. The noises had ceased! And he had no means of opening the lid.

While he stood in doubt, Lise and the two gipsies came running. The male gipsy, marvellously well prepared for the exigency, held out a short poker.

The Duke with unexpected ease prised up the lid, threw it off, and saw death before him. There lay a young woman, absolutely chinless. He realised at once that this could only be the stolen niece of Opie; and a strong emotion of pity and indignation stirred his heart. In the gathering darkness he bent over the dead face, silently.

The girl had been taught to make a noise at a sound of three taps above her head: but the taps were never given: for, before the signal, the frail creature had begun to pound the boards, stifling, and had quickly died.

Lise d'Arblay put her hand on the poor slanting forehead, smoothing back the hair. But not a film dimmed her eye.

"And they've all her jewels and things in camp, and a pile of money and papers which they stole with her," remarked the gipsy-man.

"Is that so?" said the Duke. "Yes, guv'nor."

"How far is the camp?"

"About a two mile off — on the yon side of the martello-tower."

“Then we will go.”

“They be many, guv’nor — we but two.”

“Well, but you are a host in yourself, sir. We will go.”

He bent once more over the body, replaced the lid, and pushed the coffin from the path, “I must look into this matter,” he said to Lise. “I think I should return to the house, if I were you, and get them to remove the body. You, sir, lead the way.”

The gipsy-man and he went on together, followed by the gipsy-woman. Lise stood there, her hands clasped cold and tight before her.

The Duke and his guide advanced through country which was a complete solitude. He might have been bound or murdered anywhere hereabouts with perfect security: but it was too near the Abbey for the cautious plans of the French.

After a time the gipsy said: “Yonder is the martello-tower.”

He pointed to a black truncated cone of masonry.

“Ah,” said the Duke.

It was nine-thirty o’clock. And down came brooding a night dark as the raven’s wing.

CHAPTER XIII. EN ROUTE

THE DUKE BENT over his watch. Something disquieted him, a vague trouble: for it was nine-thirty, and precisely then it was his way to take a twenty-minutes' arm-chair snooze, a kind of horsd'oeuvre to the night's sleep. He hated all departure from the routine of things.

"You say the gipsy-camp is on the other side of the tower?"

He spoke over his shoulder.

But he received no answer: he looked round: gipsy and gipsy-woman had vanished. A foreboding of something strange came to him then. He under-tapped the snuff-box with the middle-finger nail, and held the pinch suspended, thinking.

"Ah, I might have guessed that the fellow meant to be off," he said. "Well, then, I must tackle the other rascals alone."

He walked forward. The martello-tower lay some yards from the roadway, a squat rough-hewn chimney, black and scabrous and old, with Norman slits for windows and door. It stood the very symbol of ancient solitude on a heath sparse-grown with stubble. Around it, in the long past, had been a palisade festooned by chains, and three of the posts still stood, black with rot, to one hanging four eaten red links; beyond the posts a fosse, shallowed up almost to the level ground, and choked with bracken, bramble, furze. A shelving hill-brow met the heath thirty yards beyond. It was between hill and tower that the Duke supposed the camp to lie.

He left the path, and commenced to traverse the stone-encumbered stretch of stubble. On loneliest Pyrennees, among wilds of Assaye, he had not imagined himself in solitude more complete: yet eyes regarded his every step; and on his appearance at the turn of the path, twelve men had crept out of the tower, crawling on the belly, into the shrub-choked fosse.

In his passage across, he walked quite near the ambush: and, in a moment, was surrounded. Up leapt the stick, and backward poised his body, and out cocked a leg; and, for a moment, the wild and gallant stare of the war-horse in action flashed round terrific upon the Frenchmen.

But only for a moment. The men had kept respectful distance. The stick dropped; his eyes resumed their calm. He said:

“Well now, what is it you men are after?”

All in a circle uncovered. Verdier stepped forward, bowing, polished, fashionably-dressed, hat in neatly-bandaged hand.

“Your Grace,” he said, and stopped, and began again: “your Grace — we are Frenchmen, members of a Society which might be called national, originally formed some twelve months since in Paris, with the chief object of securing your Grace’s person as a hostage for the safety, and the release, of our Sovereign, Napoleon I. Your Grace’s presence among us here and now represents the initial success of that enterprise. We need hardly point out to your Grace that resistance would be useless, in face of the numbers around your Grace; nor do we think it necessary to assure your Grace that your Grace has nothing but homage and consideration to expect from us, if your Grace will deign to accompany us. We are all your Grace’s servants.”

“Well, and where is it you mean to take me to?”

“We have a frigate off the coast, and a boat near the shore. The only serious inconvenience to which we shall be compelled to subject your Grace will be a short ride through the surf on the back of one of our men.”

“Ah, and how far is it?”

Something over twelve miles, your Grace.”

“Well, then, let us be going.”

He stepped forward, pulling his hat a little over the eyes. The men formed in pre-arranged order about him, Verdier by his side, a head shorter than he. Before all marched little Danda with scorched beard, blistered face, stepping rhythmic, triumphal, as to sound of flute and tambour. Already the night was very black.

The road did not lead directly southwards, but east-and-south. And along it, in silence, with steady tramp, they went — with here a stumble, there a splash. One man behind carried a hamper of eatables, with which it had been thought that it might be proper to refresh the Duke, should opportunity offer on the road; another carried a half-veiled lanthorn, which hardly shed light.

In the Duke worked the resentful consciousness that the hour of his snooze was past. After a time, he said to Verdier:

“So, then, this is the gipsy-camp?”

“Your Grace will pardon the little ruse,” said Verdier, smiling in the dark.

“Ah, I was warned of you fellows, and should have looked out. But I do not say that it was not rather gallantly done. I must now set about and see how I am to get away from you.”

“No doubt your Grace will find that difficult.”

“Well, then, so much the better for your side.”

There was silence; and thinking that, in truth, he had been warned, he thought next of the warner, and frowned.

“Do you know a Mrs. Opie?” he said. “No, your Grace.”

“On your honour, sir?”

“Mrs. Opie, your Grace? No, sir.”

And now he was a little self-angry for suspecting a lady: and concluded that her presence with him in the avenue must have been mere coincidence.

As for Lise d'Arblay, sure of his capture, she had hurried back to the Abbey; made for the line of stables northward; found the crib where she had seen her horse stalled, left saddled by her directions. The livery-men were at supper. All was still. Soon she went cantering the lawn, making the detour for the avenue. She had to embark with the party, having followed on horseback behind: for, till the shore was reached, it was not judged prudent that she should be known to the Duke in her true character, so that, in case of mischance on the twelve-mile journey, she might be useful.

But as she went cantering the lawn, Margaret watching in growing weariness, saw her pass dimly, like a shadow, athwart the deepening night. Two hours she had waited. Most solemnly still the vast house was I — soundless within, soundless without. The world seemed mere uninhabited gloom, the haunt of ghosts. She had peeped into the corridor, but now not even a footman was visible. She stood her sentry-guard at the window, looking out, waiting. All of a sudden, she saw the shadow canter — and started. She could discern that it was a woman — and she knew what woman — she had no doubt. All her vague suspicion leapt now into rage. That woman had kept her waiting these hours, was supposed to be arranging an interview for her, and was out riding, away from the Abbey, in haste. A train of doubt, of thought, flashed through her: and she had an impulse, and was away — along the corridor — to the hall, spying about, meantime, for a servant: but the mansion seemed desolate as some enchanted castle. She flew after the horse, bent upon following. Her legs were still good for a run, anyway. She tracked the hoof- tramp to the avenue; and quite half-way down it her excellent powers availed her to run at utmost speed.

Hence she could discern that the horse, now at the end, turned to the left: but when she too, reached the open road, Lise was lost to both eye and ear. Margaret, still running, panting, but without conscious aim now, followed to the left.

As Lise cantered near the coffin, she pulled short, stricken with surprise. There, bending over the body, stood a man, a lanthorn-shine on his face.

He was very old, but stalwart, large-boned, tall; a mist of white hair floated from his uncovered head; his beard reached his middle. He looked like a prophet, or a madman. He had on nothing but a blanket, fastened over the left shoulder, from which a lank arm hung out.

Wondering at what produced upon her the impression of a vision, Lise galloped past, while two pipes of blunderbuss-slug, shot at her head, whizzed over the horse's haunches.

When Margaret, twenty minutes later, reached the spot, no aged man, and no dead body, were there.

CHAPTER XIV. CASTLE DEBONAIRE

THERE ARE TWO roads which, between them, clasp the domain of Grandcourt like two arms. By one, the southern, the Duke had gone to the martello; the other, the northern, runs round the north of Grand-court Park: and these two meet in a single road, half a mile beyond the tower. Along this single road the party walked a mile, and here the road again split into two, one of the branches being a mere footpath. This perhaps was why, on coming to that point, not noticing the footpath (their right way), they walked along the other some fifteen minutes.

Then the voice of Danda was heard: "Stop! we have come wrong somehow."

A mass of masonry had confronted him at a turning. No such building, he knew, should be met on the right way.

A halt was made. The man with the lanthorn ran forward, and came back crying:

"It is some old castle."

"What has happened is this," said Verdier, "at the meeting of two paths we have taken the wrong one."

"Back!" cried Danda.

"We might use the castle," said Verdier; "it is the 'Castle' in the Report sent us: it has been deserted for centuries. Your Grace, we have taken the precaution to bring for your Grace's refreshment, and our own, some victuals. Might I ask — ?"

"Very Well, if that is so. I am rather hungry," said the Duke.

It was the day of impossible “suppers” after dinner, and heavy ones. The party moved forward. “That is, if we can get in, your Grace,” said Verdier.

But there was no difficulty, both bridges being down over bush-rank ditches. The building was baronial Norman, mostly ruins. One portcullis hung yet in the inner-curtain arch, but all trace of portals was gone. They traversed a courtyard of dislocated flags, then the donjon-gate into a corridor littered with debris of fallen walls, floorless rafters above, then a complexity of decay, seeking some table, or bench, or block, for the meal. The extent seemed specially vast for an ordinary castle: but after some minutes of ascents, descents, and wandering, they stood on some flat marble steps before the west-looking nave of an Abbey-chapel, a long-drawn lane of broken groins and compound-columns. It was now clear that they were in one of those religious establishments whose priors had been first barons, and ecclesiastics after: in which case the way to the frater was obvious. They therefore picked their way east to the chancel, then through the remains of the south transept, then by the east cloister across the standing walls of calefactory, slype, chapter-house and parlour, all well defined, and finally turned west into a large room which must have been the refectory: and here, certainly, in the centre, was a small table.

But the table was surprising: it did not seem old, and was made of rough logs; and as the lanthorn was deposited upon it, it was impossible to doubt — those were crumbs between the logs!

The French exchanged glances. One, with the lanthorn, examined the chamber. It bore unmistakable evidence of an occupant. Here and there hung carcasses — rat or rabbit, dog or cat. Along one wall, near the ceiling, ran a gallery of short stone balusters bellying almost into mutual contact: and over the balustrade hung — a blanket!

They saw, too, that the walls had been pierced by several holes, within which lay rusty muzzles of fowling-piece, musket, or blunderbuss, while from three larger orifices near the floor protruded a 24-pounder saker, a 17-pounder culverin, and a 33-pounder demi-cannon.

A clang — a click — a bolt pushed into its socket — and the blood went rushing to every heart. They had entered by a doorway still fitted with a door of old iron bars, facing which, in the opposite wall, was another similar door. It was this opposite door that now clanged.

And instantly, from the other door (of their entrance), a rich voice sang out: “Hands up! And out with your purses, or you are dead men all!”

Prompt upon this cry, from the opposite door a very different voice, a deep bass, shouted: “Up draw-bridge! Down portcullis! The castle is invested with tents! At them, my merry men! Harry — harry — the foe!”

“Well now, we are in for it,” said the Duke of Wellington.

Wild confusion ensued. One of the French fell dead; the Duke’s hat went flying, shot away; and the man at the grating who had cried, “Out with your purses!” dropped a corpse.

These three shots came all from behind the door opposite the party’s entrance, and were fired by an old man clad in a blanket, from which the lank arm stuck.

The man shot behind the other grating was a leader of highwaymen, who, passing over the desolate country-side towards Wyemouth, had happened upon the castle, and, some time before the French, had entered it to “spend the evening. Highwaymen” proper they were not, being without horses: they were called “foot-pads” or “wolf’s-heads,” and were common in the country.

There was a quarter of a minute’s silence, while everyone in the smoke and half-darkness wondered what was toward: when forth again from that bare arm flashed a pistol, of which some dozen lay loaded at his feet. And out again he cried:

“Harry, harry the foe!”

The minuter facts about any locality can only be acquired by residence in it: so that when Lise d’Arblay reported the situation of Castle Debonaire, she had stated that it had been long deserted: yet few residents in the country-side were ignorant of the hermit of the castle. He was said to be the last of the Debonaire race, and, from youth, had been deranged. For sixty years the castle had been his home, and for sixty years he had lived in the belief that it was in a state of siege, and his garrison suffering famine. The rock-boulders round represented to his frenzied eye the camp of a leaguering host. The old muzzles which pointed upon the refectory were parts of the battery which threatened invaders. Daily he sallied forth at the head of foraging party, or flying squadron, in search of provisions, and the carcass of rat or dog on the walls each represented the triumph of some sortie in the teeth of overwhelming odds. Woe to the peasant who encountered the hermit on these excursions: the shot which he had fired at Lise d’Arblay being his habit. He lived from a plot of potatoes and another of rye inside the outer curtain, and had laid up stores of unleavened cakes.

His shot at the foot-pads was supposed by them to be the Frenchmen’s answer to the demand for money, and when out cracked the hermit’s fourth shot, wounding another foot-pad, they, with rage in their shout, threw open the grated door, and rushed into the refectory, resolved upon war.

They were fifteen.

And at once the chamber was a hubbub of detonating pistols, smoky confusion, clashing swords, contending shouts: above all, the brazen-lunged bellow:

“White are the fields with tents! Harry, my merry men! — batter! — slay!”

Round the Duke had gathered a number of French, partly to protect, partly to guard him, Verdier among them. He, in their centre, stood, hatless, his gossamer hair lifting a little at the agitated air, eyes campaigning round, taking the measure of every detail, a certain light in them — like the light of battle.

“Well, we shall all soon be done for, if we do not look out,” he said.

Danda, in white-lipped intensity, was hacking furiously with others among the foot-pads. Bang, bang, the fire-arms before, and bang, behind, rang the hermit-shot.

And it was well for the Frenchmen that at that moment the leader of armies definitely ranged himself on their side.

“I sha’n’t run off you know,” he said, “at least not just now. I will tell you what to do, if you like.”

Out above the tumult sang Verdier’s tenor: “Follow the Duke’s orders!”

And out like an echo the cry of Danda: “Duke’s orders!”

CHAPTER XV. THE IRON MAN

AND AT ONCE, where dismay and random ecstasy had reigned in the heads of the French, orderly obedience to a dominant mind supervened. The Duke was in command, leading, for the first time, a French brigade into action.

He stooped, and speaking low to two, said in French:

“You see the table: just lay it against the wall yonder on its side, and get behind it with your pistols.” And before they could move, he said to two others whose pistols his remarking eye had noted still undischarged: “Those two fellows at the end there — just cover them with your pistols, and pick them down the moment I give the word.” And before these could stir, he said to a fifth: “Just toss your coat over the lantern.”

At once the room was in darkness: for the foot-pads’ light was in the dorter where they had been carousing, they having stolen down in the dark, on hearing sounds; nor had the hermit his lanthorn; for, arriving in his room, which opened on the gallery, he had spied the party over the balustrade, and descended in quivering haste to riddle them.

And quick, to the two commanded to level pistols, the Duke said:

“Now take me off those two rogues.”

He had calculated that the effect of the sudden darkness would be a momentary motionlessness of shock: and, in fact, the two targets marked to die fell together.

Meantime, two were able to drag the table unharmed, and crouch behind it.

A knowing eye, measuring the chances, would have discerned that already the few words of the Duke had rendered the battle hopeless for the foot-pads.

“Now,” he said, in confidential whisper to Verdier near, “just get quickly and quietly to the door there, and run your sword into that old man’s belly.”

The shots had again begun to detonate at random from hermit and foot-pad. But a fearful shriek quickly announced that Verdier had done his work, and the long war of the hermit’s life was warred.

“Three of you,” said the Duke, laying fingers on three shoulders in quick succession; but, as he touched the last, the man dropped shot. “You, then” — he touched another — “creep up yonder on the left ten paces toward the door, and get out your swords till I give the word. And you,” he said to another, “stand near the lantern till I say ‘uncover,’ then uncover, and run away behind the table.”

Three of the nine French were left. To these he cried, raising his voice:

“Well, now, you three, follow me up the right-hand steps to the gallery! And mind you don’t break your necks.”

There were two narrow stone stairs against opposite walls, but in such ruin, that it would hardly have occurred to another to attempt their scaling. But the sagacious eye had seen, not only the possibility, but that the right flight, as one faced the gallery, was the better preserved. Up, then, they climbed, hands, knees, and feet, the brittle stone falling in powdery masses, shots whistling.

They had nearly reached the balcony, when he called: “Now then, the lantern: uncover!”

A man snatched the coat and scurried behind the table; the room burst into light; and now the foot-pads, if they had eyes, must have seen the position untenable: for there, for frontal attack, were three in entrenched post behind the table, muzzles pointed; outflanking their right, a light-brigade with swords; above, behind the bellied balusters, three threatened their left flank.

“Well, now, I think we may begin,” said the Duke.

But the robbers, twelve to nine, were disposed to fight like Britons: and four dashed upon the three swordsmen, with knives, with butt-ends, urgently, meaning business.

“Pick me that fellow down,” said the Duke to Danda, indicating one: but the fellow had spattered a French brain before ever Danda had fired, and missed.

Meanwhile, the men behind the table were not idle, and the foot-pads fell fast. Three, observing the other ruined stairway near, climbed with such frantic agility, that they nearly reached the top unnoticed: till the Duke said to his own three:

“You see those three: send them to the devil.”

They ran to the gallery-end to obey; and in a fierce conflict the French, being uppermost, played havoc with the scalers. Meanwhile, below, a general mélée took place, the other foot-pads having made a rush for the table; but they were now outnumbered, five to three, and swordless. The contest was short. The bodies of the scalers dropped. Below, the last two foot-pads took to their heels, covered with wounds.

But the fact of the situation was this: that the Duke stood alone near that gallery-end at which he had climbed, behind him an open door — that through which the hermit had seen the party. It was partly with an eye to it that the Duke had climbed the gallery.

Stealthily, unnoticed in the heat of fight, he felt behind the door-post, up and down; then behind the door. There was staple, there was socket. He examined the door: it was fairly stout and new: the handiwork of the hermit.

He waited till the last foot-pad scuttled. Then he lifted his voice, and spoke.

“Well, now,” he said, “I have saved the lives of some of you fellows. I think it would be only fair if I get off.”

Before they could recover from that stupor of amazement, he was gone.

“Shoot — shoot his legs!” shrieked Danda, but he was a century late.

“Sot!” went Verdier, his lips curling. At the same time the men below, running in confusion, happened to overturn the lantern on the floor, and tread it into darkness. The Duke bolted the door.

“It ought to take them half an hour to get through that,” he said, his eyes twinkling with mischief. The door was of logs, round on one side, flat on the other.

His arms went up in a stretch; his mouth opened in a sleepy yawn.

Whither to go? Already the battery had commenced. A few steps over some very shaky flooring, and he came to a doorway on his right, opening into a kind of alcove in faint light, shed partly from a lanthorn’s wick, turned low, and partly from dying embers in a grate. He entered, and to his delight discovered the form of a mattress, heaped with blankets. The hour of his nap being long past, he was desperately drowsy.

In furious haste hacked the swords.

“The fellows cannot get in for half an hour, let them beat about as they like,” he said. “Well, then, I think I will turn in, and get some sleep.”

He took off his coat, and spread it before the fireplace, propping it with his stick and some firewood twigs there, his object being to hide the light, should his time-estimate prove inaccurate.

He came to the bed. To his chagrin, in the middle lay in stiff sleep a body, which, peering, he instantly recognised — the afflicted girl, which the hermit had brought as rich trophy-of-war and laid upon his bed.

In furious haste hacked the swords.

“Well, then,” said he, “we must be bed-fellows my poor girl. You have had worse, I think, and I also.”

So he lifted her to the farther edge, and he extinguished the lanthorn, and he lay by her side, covering himself. And in an instant, he murmuring:

“Twenty minutes,” they were asleep together, quick and dead.

But his estimate proved wrong. Before half an hour, in little, more than a quarter, the French had gained entrance. As they fell in, with shouts, with clamour and heat, a nasal sound of midnight slumber came long-drawn from the living sleeper.

CHAPTER XVI. THE TWO ROADS

IN RUSHED THE French in the rayless dark, past the alcove-door, without suspecting its existence. Their whole effort, indeed, was to get upon the road again, to put swiftness and the ecstasy of chase into their legs, not dreaming that he could be hardy enough to linger there an instant, supposing him already hasting to Grandcourt.

Hasting or sauntering: for they remembered his coolness, his contemptuous way, with hope: and the way was long: one impassioned chase, and again he might be theirs.

But they were now fearfully handicapped, since their lanthorn lay shapeless in the refectory. With occasional flashes they made to some broken stairs, down which they stumbled. In the complexity of the ruins, they had lost the direction of the drawbridge, and now wandered at random in a wilderness of stone, just managing to keep together. At last Verdier, in advance, emerged upon a lane between guesten-hall and donjon leading to the courtyard. It was then seen that the abbey-garth must run at right angles to the court, whereas they had imagined the two in the same straight line.

Verdier sang out: and over the draw-bridge, and away along the road they dashed. The night outside was about as dark as within the ruins.

To the point where road and footpath met they ran, and thence along the single road, before it splits into the two roads embracing Grandcourt.

At that time, coming along this single road was Margaret Ferris, breathless, hasting she knew not whither, sure only that this way Lise had galloped. She running, and they running, in a minute she must have butted amongst them, but her light ears detected a multiple sound of feet on wet road, and immediately heard some words — in French!

They were these: “What if the Duke is in the castle all the time — behind us!”

That tenor — she knew it. She had only time to swerve, and stand still, when the men rushed by; but one, near the hedge, brushed her, and before she could start into flight, pulled up, and caught her arm.

“Here is someone,” he called— “halt!”

They came, surrounding her. The man said: “It is a woman.”

“Let me go! Let me go, will you?” cried she, struggling. Something in the voice caused Verdier to start.

But the bones of Margaret, he was certain, were among the lighthouse ashes. “Be quiet, you! no one is going to hurt you,” panted her custodian. Someone struck steel-and-flint, and she stood lit: but at the first sound of preparation, she had half-turned, and with swift wit, thrown skirt over head with her free hand. Her dress now was different to the gauze and spangles worn on the frigate, nor, in the momentary glint, was she recognised.

“Where are you from?” asked Verdier, in English. “The way you are going,” she answered, sullenly.

“Did you meet anyone?”

She had not. The glad possibility of misleading them occurred to her. “Someone passed me,” she said; “I think it was a man. He had a man’s voice.”

“He spoke, then?”

“Yes.”

“What did he say?”

“He asked if he was on the right road to Grandcourt.”

“How far back was that?”

“Not far. About five minutes before I met you.”

“Come on!”

Off they darted, leaving her there.

So, then, they had had him, and he had escaped! this she gathered from the words overheard: “What if he is in the castle all the time — behind!” That, then, was where he really was! for if on that road, she must have met him. But where was “the castle”? She knew not: she had been only three days in the country-side. She had to find out, however, meet him, guide him from them: else they would lurk on the road, and retake him. At all events, she was going right, the castle being “behind” the French. She must trust to her luck, her wit. She had gathered herself to set off, when — a galloping tramp. She thought of Lise— “that Mrs. Opie” — as the invisible sounds galloped past. She started in the opposite direction.

As for Lise, she had made no mistake, like her friends, where the road divided into footpath and castle-road, but galloped along the footpath with keen outlook for the lanthorn, till surprise grew in her at their incredible rate of travel; finally she reached a point impossible to them on foot. By some unspeakable chance, she reasoned, she must have passed them, or they gone wrong, or — something. She had then turned back in headlong urgency, eyes wide in apprehension.

The French had nearly come to where the road splits into two to embrace Grandcourt, when her hoof-sounds overtook them.

“Lise, Lise, don’t ride us down,” called Verdier.

“In the good God’s name, what are you doing here?” she gasped, drawing up among them.

“My dear, raving will not help,” said Verdier. “Still, the news is not cheering. The prisoner has escaped, that is all.”

“Then, O my good God, I pity you! Nothing will ever wipe out your shame! You have betrayed France!”

“So I say, too!” cried Danda, “so I say, too!”

“But I say,” retorted Verdier, “that it is not a question of raving, but of recapturing the man.”

“That you will never do!” said Lise.

“A feminine view,” he answered. “We may. He is certainly not far ahead now, if he is ahead at all. The only question is—”

Without pause they had been trotting on, and came now to the point when the two Grandcourt roads meet.

“Halt!” said Verdier. “Well, what is the question?” said Lise. “This: supposing him to be on ahead, which of these two roads has he taken?”

“Divide your men, and send one party along each road.”

“A brilliant idea, Lise, but impossible. Six of our best fellows are gone. There has been a row — a fight. There are only six of us left.”

“If three go the north road, and three the south—” said Lise. “Three are no good. The Duke of Wellington is not going to allow himself to be ordered about for ten miles by three men. And we have no lantern: it was smashed in the fight. One party would never find the other, if we separate. We must stake all on one chance.”

“But you are losing time! Try the north road, then! As you came by the south, he is more likely to take the north now — I, meanwhile, will go by the south—”

“Good! I agree with you. The north, then! Come on — this way!”

Off, then, they rushed, Lise taking the southern road, past the martello, on to the avenue, then up it, all ears, head held low on her mane: no sound but the hoof-falls: back then she turned, galloping hot, scouring the road, past the martello, past the meeting of the ways, on by the single road.

Margaret now was not far from the meeting of footpath and castle-road, when again she heard the sounds of the on-coming horse behind.

“What does the woman mean?” she said to herself. And this time she felt absolutely that she must speak, must know more.

“Is that you, Mrs. Opie?” she shrilly called. Lise’s horse reared, so sharply she reined — with alarm more than surprise: for she recognised the voice.

“Yes, it is Mrs. Opie,” she said— “and you, Margaret?”

“I waited for you, but you did not come.”

“My dear girl, a dreadful thing has happened—”

“Oh, I dare say!”

That tone of scornful rancour was convincing. “So, then, Margaret suspects, suspects me,” Lise thought: “let me remember that.”

“I suppose you know that your story of the Frenchmen has come true, Margaret, and that the Duke has been got away by them?”

“Yes, I know. I met the Frenchmen, you see. Haven’t you sent any of the servants of the Abbey out looking for him?”

“I? No — I haven’t had time.”

“I see.”

“But I, too, met the Frenchmen, Margaret, and overheard some of their talk. It appears that the Duke has escaped.”

“Everything you tell me I know already.”

“Then do you tell me something which I do not know. Where is the Duke now?”

“I can’t say, I’m sure.”

“Are you out looking for him?”

“Are you?”

“But yes, Margaret. Why else? other of us may find him.”

“I hope one of us may, yes.”

“Well, if you do, let me give you a hint. You know where the two roads meet near the martello- tower?”

“Well?”

“Well, the Frenchmen have gone by the north one, and there are lying in wait for him. So if you meet him, be certain to take him the south way, in order to cheat them.”

Lise, with absolute cunning, argued that Margaret, suspecting her now, would do the opposite, and, if she discovered the Duke, would not fail to lead him by the north road into the arms of the French.

And, in truth, Margaret only needed this counsel to be convinced that the north was, in fact, the road of safety: and said at once to herself:

“I would make him go the north road, all the same.”

“And where are you going now, Margaret?” said Lise. “I don’t know, I’m sure.”

Where she was going to was— “the castle.” She had this knowledge which Lise had not: that the Duke had been to some “castle”; for in the galloping dialogue between Lise and Verdier had been no mention of the castle, whereas Margaret had overheard those words: “the castle behind.”

“I am going to turn back, Margaret,” said Lise. “Further on this way seems useless.” She started back in the direction of the martello; Margaret the other way, at a run. When she came to footpath and castle-road, not seeing the footpath, she kept still the wide road, and rapidly approached the castle.

CHAPTER XVII. IN THE COURT-YARD

PUNCTUALLY AT THE end of the twenty minutes assigned himself the Duke opened his eyes, expecting to hear the French still hacking: but all was silence.

He lay for a time, then rose, and put on his coat. A draft in the coat-covered grate had blown the embers into a babbling whip of flame. With this he lit the hermit's lanthorn, covered the dead girl, went warily, and descended some stairs.

The French were still in the ruins, fumbling for an exit. Sounds reached him. He found a space between two walls, piled with debris at either end; over one pile he climbed, and crouched waiting, the lanthorn under his coat.

He knew exactly where lay court-yard and drawbridge, for he had noted all the changes of direction in the passage through castle and abbey, and summing up these, concluded that the chapel and frater would lie at about right angles to the castle.

He did not know that the French had been less observant, and having waited and heard nothing, he climbed from his hiding-place, and set out, steering his feet toward the court-yard. A little sooner, and he must have been caught: for, when he emerged, they had hardly run down the outer escarpment, and from the roadway some ordering voice came up faintly.

"Ah, they think I am off before them," he said. "They have more zeal than discretion, I see: good soldiers, but bad generals. Well, then, I must only wait here till they get away."

On a block of masonry near the donjon-portal he sat with bare head, hiding for a time the lanthorn between his legs.

He could wait as greatly as act. He sat elbow on knee, thumb and forefinger holding his chin, smiling a little, while thirty minutes passed. The lanthorn stood now before him, its light on his face.

“They will not come back,” he reasoned: “when they do not find me on the road, the natural thing for them to think will be that I have got home; then they will run off to their ship in a sweat, lest I have them taken up.”

Another fifteen minutes, and in, with feet of pelting swiftness, came Margaret.

With infinite surprise she saw him, open to any eye, the light on his lean visage. “My lord—” she panted— “are you the Duke?”

He dropped hand from chin, sat up leisurely, looked at her. He never forgot a face: and, as he did not know her, had never seen her. But he knew her name! This was that Margaret Ferris, the English auxiliary of the French, against whom he had been warned by Mrs. Opie.

“Well, now, Margaret,” he said, “what is it you are after?”

She started.

“I am glad you know my name, my lord,” she answered— “you have got to come with me at once!”

“Is that so? And where is it you want to take me to?”

“The Frenchmen — the Frenchmen — are on the south road — there is a north and a south road — and they are on the south road, going after you! You have got to come — quick — to the north road, and get home, before they come back.”

“Well, but suppose I like to remain here instead?”

“You mus’n’t! They will come back and take you!”

His face, his heart, hardened against her. He had just reasoned that the French would not return.

“You know all about them, then?” he said. “I know, yes, my lord! They passed me on the road! I heard one of them — the most artful one, too — doubt whether you were ahead of them at all! He said that perhaps, all the while, you were hiding in the castle! It was that made me come here. They will be back and take you sure, if you do not hurry!”

“Ah, and who is that ‘most artful one’ you tell me about?”

“He is a man they call Verdier. They do everything he tells them.”

“Is that so? You know them all personally, then?”

“Haven’t I cause, my lord? Didn’t they chase me all over Seacombe Moor last night, and take me on board their ship with a man named Mr. Golde, and drive us up in the lighthouse, and burn the lighthouse down?”

“Is that so? Which lighthouse?”

“Raddon Lighthouse, my lord.”

This was categorical statement, chapter and verse. He disliked to have to doubt a woman’s word.

“So Raddon Lighthouse is burnt down, then. I have not heard that.”

“You have not had time. And we are losing time now, sir.”

He looked at her, almost with admiration. “Well, now,” he said, “you are a very bold young woman.”

“I don’t understand what you mean, sir.”

“Why not desert the enemy and come over to my side, Margaret?”

“I don’t understand what you mean, my lord.”

“I knew your name, you see.”

“Yes, sir.”

“And what does that imply to your mind?”

“I don’t know, sir.”

“Well, it implies this, you know: that I have been told all about you.” Still she had no notion what he was driving at. She said: “Won’t you come now, my lord?”

“No, Margaret, certainly, I won’t come now. It looks as if you were rather wasting powder and shot. And what is more, I won’t let you go, either.”

What did he mean? Her hands met wringing. “Well, now, you see, you are distressed,” he said: “but it is your own doing. You have over-run into the enemy’s lines. Sit down here.”

This he said with some sternness. She sat down at once by him, mouse-quiet “I do not call you a good actress, you know,” he went on after a minute. “You are very bold, but you show too much distress and eagerness.”

“I can’t help it!”

“Well, that is an open confession. I like you; but then, when I had once told you that I had been warned against you—”

Now she understood —

“Oh, my lord! my lord!” she cried.

Surely in that cry was sincerity! It had the true ring of pang, of reproach, of wounded loyalty. “Have I pained you?” he asked, with sudden gentleness.

“My lord, my lord, who has been doing this?”

“Well, but I cannot tell you that.”

“But I know! It is that Mrs. Opie!”

“You know her, then?”

“Didn’t I go to the Abbey, my lord, and tell her of the plot this evening? And didn’t she leave rue waiting while she went to get you to see me? And while I was waiting, didn’t I see her out riding on the lawn? And didn’t I just meet her on the road, riding about?”

“You don’t mean to say that she is against me, and on the side of the Frenchmen?”

“Yes, my lord, that is just what I do mean!”

“Ah, I thought there was something,” said the Duke.

He had to choose between the two women, and his mind was swinging round to faith in Margaret, and something like distrust in Lise.

“Well, now, Margaret, I am in a fix, you see,” said he. “That lady, a guest in the house where I am staying, tells me that you are a naughty girl, and you tell me that she is naughty. I am afraid I shall have to disbelieve one or other of you. And it is rather difficult to choose. There are points that look black against you both.”

“But, my lord — look at me!” — her eyes filled with innocent tears — “do I look like one—” She could not go on. The words perished in her throat. She turned aside her head. He patted her on the shoulder.

“Never mind. We shall see. Suppose I cast in my lot with you, and say I will trust you?” She jumped up. “Oh, thank you, sir!”

“You won’t betray me, then?”

“Oh, my lord — !”

“Well, then, let us go.”

He rose. Margaret brushed a sleeve across her eyes, and in a moment was all activity. She caught up the lanthorn. They moved towards the drawbridge.

“Well, now,” he said, “I am in your hands. You shall do with me whatever you like.”

“You are good, my lord. I always heard that you were good.”

“You are very likely good, too. I am sorry now that we quarrelled. You know why I did it, and you will forgive me.”

“Oh yes, sir!”

“And you are a mighty pretty girl, Margaret. Will you give the Duke a kiss?”

“I don’t like to,” said she, pouting, with a reluctant movement of one shoulder. “Well, then, I must go without. But we will hold hands, if you like. The road is rough and wet.”

And very lovingly they went, hand in hand, she slightly in advance, dragging him a little in her greed, swinging the lanthorn over the receding path.

“You remind of a very pretty French girl I once met near Toulouse. There was rather a flirtation between us, I can tell you, Margaret. You are not French, are you?”

“Oh, my lord — !”

“No — don’t be angry. I never do things by halves: I trust you entirely, having trusted you. The question was only accidental.”

On, over receding puddle and rough road, they went, to where castle-road met footpath, and on by the single road to where the two Grandcourt roads meet.

“And about these two roads?” said he. “You say the Frenchmen are on the south one.”

“Yes, sir.”

“You are quite sure?”

“Oh yes, sir.”

“How do you know?”

She knew that they were on the south, because Lise had told her that they were on the north: she had perfect moral certainty. But she felt that the reason that convinced her might not convince him: and it was urgently necessary that he should be convinced. The French by this time must be hasting back. She feared delay — and told a lie.

“I know, sir,” she said. “I saw them on the south road.”

“Very well, then. We will take the north.”

And along the north they proceeded.

CHAPTER XVIII. MARGARET'S GUIDANCE

THE FRENCH HAD gone in eager hunt right to the north park-gates, four miles. They halted fatigued. Since four that afternoon, they had travelled over twenty miles.

“He is behind us, then,” said Verdier.

“But what of the man, who, according to the woman on the road, was ahead of us?” said Danda: “we should have met him.”

“He must have gone the south road: in which case, Lise will be able to tell us something of him.”

“Ah, but where is she? Back! we search the country till we find him! We burn and sack the Abbey — !”

As they set off again, there sounded approaching hoofs — Lise, who, after parting from Margaret, had taken, this time, the north road.

They warned her, and she drew up among them. “O my good God, he is nowhere on the south road,” she said. “Did you meet a man?”

“That is strange. A woman on the road told us there was a man.”

“Oh, that was Margaret Ferris. She lied.”

“Margaret Ferris. You ought to have killed that girl. She will ruin everything yet — if everything is not already ruined.”

“But we have no idea what girl you are talking about.”

“Oh, nonsense! the girl you took on board the frigate last night.”

“But — are you in earnest? It is impossible that she is not dead!”

“She would be dead if I had had a pistol a short while ago.” The men were stricken silent. Verdier bit his lip. “Come on! let us be on the move!”

said Danda. The others went on. Verdier stood with hand on the horse's wet neck.

Lise," he said, " I cannot think that he has reached home. He had only some fifteen minutes' start, and unless he ran hard, we must have overtaken him. He is on the road now — or in the castle—"

"What castle?"

"The old castle — we were there—"

"My good God, you did not tell me that! I might have gone there! What a mess a set of men, if left alone—"

"Do not rave, my dear girl. I think it is you who have now gone wrong in leaving the south road. He may go that way."

"I am going back. I was so sure that you had him—"

"Better stay about here, and keep guard; we are now going into the south to wait. And don't go galloping about in that way: the hoofs make a row."

He went running to join the others.

At that time Margaret, her right hand in the Duke's left, her left swinging the lanthorn, said "Stop! I thought I heard something, my lord!"

He glanced at her.

Your ears are light, in that case."

"They have got to be. Didn't you hear anything, sir?"

"No. What was it like?"

"I don't know. It was something."

"Well, we must not allow ourselves to be frightened by 'something.' There is nothing to fear, if your story is correct."

But the whole of her story, she knew, was not correct. She was a little doubtful, frightened. "They may have split up their men into two lots," she said, "and posted one lot on each road."

“No, they won’t do that. There are only six of the fellows left. And they very likely guess that I won’t go with three without some fisticuffs. They are all, therefore, on the south road where you saw them.”

She was guiltily silent; then said:

“Suppose they have come over to this road, sir?” Again he glanced at her. She was pallid. Her hand trembled in his.

“You must not be afraid,” he said. “They would not do that, you know, without some reason. And if they were far gone on the south road when you saw them there, I think they would not have time to be here by now. Were they far gone?”

“Pretty far,” she said, and threw up her eye-whites in demure appeal, thinking: “Lord help me with this man this night!”

“Well now,” remarked he, “ I think we are getting on very well for the Abbey.”

“I don’t like this lantern alight,” said Margaret irrelevantly.

“There again you are not yourself, Margaret. This now is the third time you have said that. If there is nobody to see us, by all means let us see ourselves.”

“You are very obstinate, sir,” she said with a sigh.

And through his mind, for one instant, passed the shadow of a questioning whether all these timidities were not mere cloaks to cover some hidden intent. Yet they had the look of genuineness. The half-thought passed. His pressure tightened in friendship on her hand a moment.

And on they went, approaching the approaching French: till Verdier, with intense hiss of exultation, whispered:

“There he comes!”

In the lanthorn-shine they saw him plod with calm deliberate step. The five flocked round Verdier, hanging breathlessly upon his whispers.

“Quick! Dupin, Carhaix, and Huguenin, on that side, under the hedge, well apart — twenty paces. When I whistle, run out and close. Come, Danda and Carnot — you and I on this side.”

They went crouching. And the lanthorn swung nearer; and nearer grew the wet squelch of feet. The Duke walked silent. He had trusted all to her, confident only in her tones, her frank glance. Yet he was a born aristocrat, with faith first in his own class; and in trusting the work-girl he had given a lady the lie, one against whom he could allege nothing, who had actually warned him against the guide he was blindly following.

Yet, in spite of inbred instincts, the simply human was strong in him, too, the frank good-fellowship of the hour, and broad trust in the heartiness of man. He struck a compromise within himself: and without distinctly charging Lise, contrived to rest confidently in Margaret.

Suddenly, the whole slow-built fabric of his trust collapsed. She had snatched her hand from his: a fatal movement. He could not but think it predestined. Yet was perfectly involuntary — a gesture of panic, of frenzied terror.

Verdier’s whistle had sounded — a quick succession of shrills.

They ran out, closing round the Duke. Up went the stick some inches, but dropped. He stood still in their midst, faint night airs musing among his uncovered hair.

She, in her fright, by an impulse of self-preservation, had stepped backward beyond the circle, and stood peering, the lifted lanthorn-shine luridly illustrating a face of distorted pallor.

For a minute intense silence. Then the Duke: “Well, I was behind you all the time, you see. You were after the deer before he broke cover: and gave yourself, and me, a walk.”

But now a low sobbing and lamentation was heard in the night, as Babylonish maidens, with dole and plaint, lamented upon the dead. Margaret's hands were over her face, the lanthorn hanging by a finger. And bitterly she sobbed:

“Oh, my dear lord, forgive me, sir! Oh, what shall I do, my lord, my lord? Forgive a poor girl, sir — Oh, I wish I had never laid eyes on you this night, my lord, my lord!”

But the face of the Duke was like white iron, and the granite rock.

>

CHAPTER XIX. THE FOOT-FALL

THE FIRST MOVEMENT was by Verdier. After a minute's tense suspension of silence, broken by Margaret's lament, he spurted at the girl, she not four yards from him. But prompt, with the alacrity of startled roes, she was off, having sighted him between her fingers. In an instant the source of her tears was dry, the streams paused on her cheek, and her soul was in her racing legs. Away they flew, on tip-toe, in impassioned run, a whirlwind of straining effort, Verdier intensely resolved, she desperate. Long it could not last: he felt himself fail, and her getting away from him, in spite of her quarrelling and flapping skirts and wildly-swinging lanthorn: he put hand to belt: a shot in the leg, low, in the calf. He steadied himself, ready to fire; but to her, too, thought by this time had come: away over the hedge, tossed awkwardly askew from the left hand, went the lanthorn into darkness. And she was ten yards ahead, lost to him now. He did not even fire.

The Duke was puzzled. Was it genuine, the race: and Margaret, after all, true? Crudely practical, he judged by results, and the results of her guidance were enough for him: he would never have given her the privilege of a second thought in his brain for ever, would have blotted her from his book of life, but for the race. It looked genuine: and there were the hearty sobs of the girl, her vivid grief . . . yet it seemed incredible that Verdier, if in earnest, should not shoot. The girl, if against them, would be a constant peril on the long tramp. Verdier's lovesick hesitation to shoot he could not divine: and when Margaret flung away the lanthorn, he decided that the object might be to keep the march dark, without insult to him, by a natural-looking ruse; when Verdier returned alone, without having once fired, the Duke smiled. Before the judgment-seat of his severity the girl stood damned. He banished her quickly from his thoughts.

It was dark, the Frenchmen few. Verdier therefore whispered two men to hold the prisoner's sleeves. The Duke felt the grips, and for a minute walked on so. Then he said:

“Well, you will have to behave like gentlemen, you know; or I shall knock some of you on the head.”

“Can we do anything for your Grace?” asked Verdier. “These fellows will have to let me go.”

“But, your Grace—”

“Let me go. I won't run off.”

“We have your Grace's promise?”

“No, I won't run off.”

“Let go his Grace's arms,” said Verdier.

But Danda grumbled in his throat, doubtful and ill-content.

On they went, the Duke in the middle, three on each side, with respectful interval. Nothing could be seen. They only knew his presence by the steady sound of his tread, and the ear grew to recognise its accustomed beat among the other sounds. No one spoke.

In this way they tramped to the meeting of north and south roads, and on, eastward, by the single road.

Margaret had stopped her flight, and stood uncertain, wild-eyed, listening. She heard the on-coming march, and drew back breathlessly against the hedge. When they passed her, she followed timorously, keeping the sounds of the march within her ears.

Lise, too, from behind had seen the lanthorn-light, the capture, the short chase. She followed a good way behind Margaret, lest her hoof-sounds might reach the party.

Near castle-road and foot-path, the French began to strike flashes to avoid a second mistake. The foot-path went winding south a considerable distance between alternations of meadow-grass, cliff, hill-slope, and swamp. And along it, with steady tramp, went the party.

It was too narrow for triple file: so now three went first, then the Duke, then three, in single file, Danda leading, his short legs stepping in the dark their rhythmic, triumphal step. Behind Margaret came Lise, with lax bridle.

The brain of the walking girl grew busy. What was she to do? what could she? To walk tamely, with tears and weakness, to the shore, and see them accomplish their work, would help nothing. When she remembered that this was her doing, up she flung her hands, and let them drop, in an agony.

She wondered if Golde still stupidly slept: if not, he would have read her note, and be at his mill, awaiting her. She could very well guess the direction of Newton, but not how far it might be. The wonder was that the Abbey servants had not missed the Duke — but even so, they could guess nothing: they might even suppose him sitting up, writing, maybe. Her hope was, that parties of men, without knowing of the seizure, had taken gratuitous interest in the matter, spurred on by Golde, perhaps, or deaf Mother Higgins, and were out doing something.

But, meantime, her necessity was to act, she herself, Margaret. If she could retard their progress, that might be something: some delay, somehow — her thoughts began to centre upon this: it was well past midnight: if she could keep them on the move some hours. A morning which found them far from the shore would dawn full of hope.

But to keep them? That could only be done by making them wander, by turning them somehow from their path.

It looked impossible: but, in contradiction to this conclusion, just then the party actually did miscarry, and go tramping over marsh.

“We are off the path!” called Danda; “it is just there to the left. Follow the sound of my steps.” In a minute they were back.

But this opened her mind to the means by which the troop was guiding itself. She tingled with discovery. Here was no question of sight: the night was too confirmed. Each, except the foremost, walked by the sounds of the man before; the foremost by a species of instinct, the indefinite sensations of the ground, of bordering cliff or hillside. And he, too, was unconsciously influenced by the sounds behind.

Another sound, therefore, introduced among the tramp, continually tempting false, would surely prove a distracting factor, a misleading lure, in the ensemble of the foot-falls.

This thought struck her pallid. To introduce herself and mingle as one of them among them! and a stretched-out hand, a flutter of the skirt, would spoil her! And there was Yerdier —

She once caught, she doubted if any hope would remain. But she felt out on either hand, though her will still hung in suspension: two hill-sides shelved to the path; as yet she could do nothing. But she quickened her pace.

At this point Verdier called out:

“It would be better, I think, if each took hold of the man in front for guidance. If your Grace does not object—”

Verdier was behind Danda, separated by a man from the Duke. Margaret, now near enough to hear, was stepping with strained ears, throbbing heart, and at Verdier’s proposal her face had a look of scare: it was just like a counter-answer to her thoughts.

“If your Grace does not object—” he repeated.

“Let us get on,” said the Duke, piercing the thought, without troubling to accuse it, “I told you that I would not run off.”

Verdier had the whim that this would be an inoffensive excuse for making doubly-sure of the prisoner, though, in fact, he had no doubt of the Duke’s word; and at the penetration of his motive, and the refusal, his face screwed into a laughing grimace of self-conscious defeat, as who should say:

“He’s done me!”

The march continued as before. And suddenly, Margaret, without knowing that she had resolved, found herself, with a pang of terror, in the thick of the act which she had only conceived.

Here, on one side, ran hill; on the other, a spread of wet land, half-moor, but sparsely tree-grown, lay dark. Over this she was now hasting, with cat-like care, stalking on intense tip-toe, yet quickly. And now she was abreast of the hindermost; and now of the Duke; and now of Danda, skirt picked high to thighs, her eyes wide with bigness of purpose.

Nearer! — her difficulty being the exact position of the foremost, and the slipping between him and the next. Had she known that the next was Verdier, her daring will might have failed. But by the concentrating of her whole soul, by ears ardent for accuracy, by nerves high-strung, trained to exact achievement, steadily sure, on the acme of alacrity, she did successfully slide between Danda and Verdier. And now, boldly, with strong manly step, outstriding like a soldier, she went marching between.

CHAPTER XX. THE TRUNK

LITTLE BY LITTLE worked the sorcery of that seducing foot-fall, like the “beginning of sin.” There was a mere deviation from the path; then, could it have been seen, a most gradual curve and trend to the right; then, always to the right, a definite excursive drift from the original direction of march; then blank delusion, and complex vagrancy, and mazy error.

Twenty minutes, and beyond redemption they were lost — no real idea of direction left in them, like a stray flock, the pied-piper’s rats flute-led to their drowning, believing in a lie.

She stepped from the curving file which they still formed; and, falling to the rear, no longer cautious, made a dark sound in a puddle. The result was marvellous. The man near heard, and followed it. And his sounds were followed by others, and theirs by others. And in an instant, the very spirit of delusion had them, playing with them, leading them by the nose, they no longer walking in file, but in a disorganised confusion, separated by varying intervals, each misled by the nearest sound, and misleading in turn through all the permutations of error; yet believing themselves all the while walking in file along the foot-path, southward.

The Duke was still in their midst, himself deluded. But it presently happened that none of the French were very near him; and it was then that he suddenly came, with a shock, to a standstill, striking an obstruction.

His hand felt up and down, meeting a substance damp, and smooth, and somewhat slimy; too smooth for bark, too soft for a hut-door. He moved a step aside, thinking to get clear, but there it still was; tried again, but it was there. With hand sliding along the substance, he began to step tentatively. Whatever the thing was, it was pretty extensive; and from the manner in which he was compelled to step, he concluded something circular. At last his sliding hand fell upon emptiness, and immediately struck something which yielded to the touch.

His hand, again put out, met nothing; but the arm, moved from side to side, was stopped by two edges. He now concluded that he had walked into a circular building, was at the door-way, and that what had yielded to the weight of his out-falling hand was the door.

A forward step, and he had this door, which came readily to his pull. Feeling along its surfaces, he found that the inner was soft, and damp, like the surface which had obstructed him, but the outer rough and gnarled.

And now he knew: he had walked into the interior of some colossal and hollow tree. It was an elm, the fame of the county, old as the Druids, and large as a small room, with a door made of its own bark, narrower a-top. It was a recognised resort of pic-nic parties in the neighbourhood.

“Well, now,” said he, “this comes in rather well. Here, I think, we shall be pretty safe.” He pulled the door upon himself. The closure was complete.

Lise had seen the giant trunk, but sent no report of it, it lay so remotely beyond the route; nor did she even know that it was hollow. For the French, without lanthorn, to refind the prisoner in this perfect retreat was impossible, even should they return striking flashes.

But they were now far away, having butted in a body against a stone hedge, before suspecting that anything was wrong. Then, like men awaking out of a dream, they felt that all was lost. A succession of flashes convinced them that the Duke was no longer among them.

“Where are we?” cried Danda, stamping furiously.

“We are where you have led us,” answered Verdier. I congratulate you, m’sieur.” He struck a flash, looking at a pocket compass.

“We have been travelling due west instead of due south, that is all,” he said.

“But the prisoner! the prisoner!”

“The prisoner is probably sleepy, m’sieur, and going home to his bed.”

Danda’s white lip set. “Then it is your fault! it is you who believed an Englishman’s word! it is you who said he was not to be held! Does he call himself a man of honour?”

“You are an idiot,” said Verdier coolly, “Something or other has happened. Gentlemen, whether they are Englishmen or not, do not break faith. He has not run away. He has missed us somehow in the dark. While we have been doubling about, he has perhaps gone straight. Something must have happened. He can hardly be such a cur — !”

He stopped: his brows knit: it was hard to conceive what could have happened. “But what are we to do now?” said Danda.

“We are to go back, at a swift run, till we find the foot-path again, then run northward. it is there, if anywhere, that we will meet him.”

And at a run they started back, but obliquely, passing some distance from the elm: the Duke, within it, did not hear their foot-steps.

Margaret at the first flash of steel-and-flint, had fled beyond ear-shot of their talk, and believed the Duke still in their midst. When they started back, she followed, thinking that her ruse had not kept them long astray, after all.

In fifteen minutes, stopped by a hill-side, they recognised the foot-path: and away northward they sped, silent and swift. Lise d’Arblay, meanwhile, was stepping contentedly southward on her nag, not suspecting the deviation.

The Duke fastened the door with a hook-and-eye, more secure here than in his Grandcourt bedroom. He leant, his legs crossed, tired, listening, smiling.

So he reclined a longish time. The French had already run back past the tree, before he started violently upright. Suddenly he remembered. . . . He had promised. . . .

“Well, this will never do,” he said.

He made at once two steps towards the door. But stopped. What had he promised? He remembered the very words:

“Let me go. I won’t run off.”

The question which confounded him a moment was whether his accidental entrance into the tree, and the mere act of remaining there, could be called “running off.”

“Running” it certainly was not, nor was it even “off”: if he stayed, therefore, he would be well within the letter of his promise.

And the character of the persons to whom the promise was made did not escape his reflection. While half-recognising their gallantry, he judged them with all the severity of his austere mind. They were outrageous, they were criminal, they deserved to be hanged. In reality, they were a mere low rabble, vulgar brigands.

But his hesitation, his reflection, were only momentary. Soon he was at the door, and out, and away. . . .

He was rather scared, rather frightened. Suppose he could not find them? He called aloud. His memory, surely, had played him an odd trick: he must, in truth, be getting an old fellow. His perfect calm forsook him. Perhaps for the first time in his life — he was agitated.

There was a spirit as well as a letter: a man should be honest. . .

He ran calling, with bare head, in the same direction as his approach to the tree, thinking the French must be there, in advance. Finally, he, too, butted upon the stone hedge which had stopped them.

“This will never do,” he said again, severely.

He was wholly lost. How he had come to enter the tree at all, they travelling in single file along a foot-path, was more than he could comprehend. And where now was the foot-path was all a mystery. He had no compass, no flint-and-steel. He stood shut in, in the close prison of the darkness, his great heart anxious, wrinkles of trouble across his brow.

“The only way, then,” he said, “will be to run about and make a noise. These fellows will think . . .”

Again he started into a trot, calling, backward towards tree and foot-path. When he reached this, he was stopped by the hill on its further side, and understood: this then, was it. By a wise guess he determined which was north, which south, and southward he turned, not dreaming that they were making rapid paces northward on his imagined track.

Now he quickened his trot, stick out-held obliquely in hand; and ever as he went, he called: “Hi, there! Hi! Hi! Hi!”

CHAPTER XXI. THE HOOFS

NOW, LISE, AFTER a time wishing to have some guiding sound, had quickened pace; then, hearing nothing, had gone yet faster; and now had arrived at the certainty of some calamity. She reined and sat troubled, and terrified, and angry, and puzzled.

Suddenly — behind her — she heard afar the dark Hi! Hi!

Of all the crazy improbabilities and distracting surprises of topsy-turvydom this, to her mind, was the most crazy. She knew the voice! Here was the Duke of Wellington, evidently alone, hurrying after his captors, calling anxiously for them!

Nearer grew the dark voice, with a “Hi, Frenchmen, Hi!” and a “Hi! Hi! Hi!”

Before this paradox reason succumbed. But one thing was clear: he believed them before, and she had decided that they must be behind.

It remained to her, either to reveal herself and tell him to change his course, or to hurry after her friends. Upon this latter she resolved, and, making a detour with noiseless slowness, re-found the footpath, and set off galloping northward.

The French were again near the meeting of footpath and castle-road, when Margaret, hanging behind them, all wonderment at this northward flight, drew out of the way of the cantering hoofs.

“That woman again,” she muttered: “now, anyway, he’ll know the beast in her true colours, I should think!”

The French hailed: Lise drew up. “What has happened?” she asked.

“Happened!” replied Danda. “Your friend here let go hold of the man on his parole, and the English fox—”

Lise,” said Verdier, “ I think I told you not to make a row with your horse’s hoofs.”

“Nonsense!” she cried angrily— “turn back — and fly, fly — he is on the road behind you — calling for you — !”

They were off southward, brushing past Margaret, unsuspecting, came to the point of their deviation, and on, with continuous sharp trot, beyond. From this point the path curves to the right, and loses itself in Seacombe Moor. The Duke had gone to its termination, then, meeting untracked bush, turned back, walking now, tired, hopeless of finding them. Occasionally still he lifted his voice in a ‘Hi!’

“Well, then,” he muttered at last, “if not to-night — to-morrow.”

But presently afterwards on-coming feet reached his ears. He smiled. “Ah, I thought they would be looking up again somewhere,” he said. They were quite near before he said coolly:

“I am here, you see.”

Verdier stepped forward with invisible bows.

“We are most sorry, your Grace, if, by any blundering of ours, we have caused your Grace anxiety.”

“Well, now,” the Duke said to himself, “this fellow is a gentleman.”

He added:

“No, it was rather my own fault. I got into a hollow tree somewhere, and stayed in it too long.” He was among them again. But as the march reformed, he said:

“But my promise no longer holds good. Understand that I mean to run off, if I can.”

“Then may we now take hold of your Grace’s arm?” said Verdier.

“No. I mean to say, if an extraordinary chance happens, as happened just now. Otherwise I shall stay with you. Let us be going.”

The march recommenced: three, then the Duke, then three; then, behind, Lise; then Margaret. They reached the Moor, and now the Duke walked in the middle of a narrow circle. Anon Verdier would strike a flash, and look at his compass. The course was south; eight miles, then the shore, then the boat, the frigate, and victory.

Abreast went Lise and Margaret. Anon a sound, dark and ghostly, broke the silence. The Duke faintly heard it, and wondered; Verdier heard it, and was angry; Margaret heard it, and it became intolerable to her.

It was the strike of a walking hoof against some stone, an occasional tramp on hard earth. Lise now kept nearer, resolved not to lose them again, guided by rare glints of Verdier’s flint; and her hoof-sounds were heard, — always singly, and most vaguely, seeming to come from the depths of space, the bosom of nowhere.

Margaret they affected with irritation and a growing rancour; broke in upon her agonised effort to think; molested and embarrassed her. For now again the thought, “What am I to do?” tormented her. All the old hopes, of Golde, of rescue-parties, recurred, and turned to despairs. It was well on in the small hours: but long, long, before a ray pierced the blackness, the party would be on board the frigate. The shore couldn’t be far off, and the boat: for here was Seacombe Moor. And she was following just like a little child, or an old woman, feeble, without wits in her. But something she would do, she vowed: straightway would run and do it. Only what? The possibility of again misleading them, in the then order of march, was gone. There was the boat — if something could be done to that! This was her thought, when again the hoof-sound from nowhere threw her into confusion.

“If I could only find out where you are, I would soon do for you!” she said, with shaken menace of head.

The boat! Again she began to think of this — And again a hoof-sound: but this time she knew where and how to make it cease for ever. The nag had neighed. The previous ghosts of sound were a different matter to this definite whinny: and Margaret turned to the left.

Lise had no idea that Margaret was now near the party. The cracking of a twig would have aroused all her suspicion: but Margaret approached with absolute caution, lifted skirts, dainty step. Soon the regular hoof-sounds were in her ears, a snort, then the laboured breathing. He passed close before her. Her warily-stretched hand touched his haunch.

And Lise only saved herself from a backward fall by a clutch of the lax reins: the horse, in a spasm, had reared straight, Margaret having buried in his haunch the knife from the gipsy’s pannier.

Where her blow fell, whether into Lise or the horse, she did not care, nor know. But she was not long in doubt: out, as the nag dropped from the curvet, went its hind-legs in a kick of agony; and away went Margaret with them, and lay sprawling, moaning low.

CHAPTER XXII. THE BOAT

WHAT CAUSED THE curvet Lise did not know: the nag settled into its former walk, and she went unconscious that thick gore oozed from a profuse wound behind her.

Onward, over grass and gorse, with steady tramp, went the men.

They crossed the canal by a bridge perilously near Seacombe: but Seacombe lay in nepenthe profound as the last sleep.

A long way behind sprawled Margaret, half on her face, a hand on her hip, where the kick had fallen like a swung club. She was crying, but it was rather from rage, and soon the tears dried, and she began to think again, reverting to the boat: but it lay motiveless in her brain; then to Golde, and he lay motive-less in her brain; then to the boat, in vain. Suddenly she sat straight with a cry of pain, of joy: she had connected the boat and Golde, and had invented.

She blessed herself for having written to him that night. It would be impossible, she knew, to reach Wyemouth before the French the shore. Even of Newton she was not sure — how far it was, how far the shore was. But she sprang up, tried to estimate directions, and determined upon a course. She set out slowly, with limping difficulty, started into a forced run, had to stop, ran again, and found it now less painful. Finally, in virtue of that natural power of mind and body to rise to the necessity of the case, she was able to run continuously, though with distress.

Now, Golde, about midnight, had awoke ravening. A lamp burned in the room, and the first thing he spied was Margaret's note: he was to be at his mill. But a stronger reason urged Golde: the vacuous hole within him. The inn was silent: and though Newton meant a yearning trudge of three miles, yet a certain oyster-patty, neat's tongue, and veal-surprise at the mill offered speedier satisfaction than the process of rousing the inn. With the lamp he crept down, undid a back door, and went across fields. The mill stood well outside Newton on a very steep ground, timber-framed Elizabethan, dark with age, and had the look of madly struggling to keep its perpendicular, as a man tripping too fast downhill, tries to stop, projecting a leg. It had been added to, altered, and added to again; and salient bits and gables, oriels and tiny turrets with finials, made it an eccentricity almost droll. Within, the rooms were antic as possible, triangular, pentagonal, numerous, comically tiny; everything seemed to slant; things hung askew; door-bottoms did not run level with the flooring, nor either with the ceiling. At the back the old green wheel, and the works.

Golde uttered an "Ah!" after a crowded meal, and sat back lazily throeing with digestion. He had known how to enter and provide himself with light, food and porter, without waking his old housekeeper. When Margaret, guided by his light, began pounding at the door, he sat thus alone; and down he went.

Now her sustained fight against the sprain collapsed; and she almost fell upon him. He bore her up the inconsequent, crochety stairs, laid her in an easy-chair.

"I am sorry, miss," he said, "to see you in that way."

"The Duke — is taken" — her nose and forehead screwed together for pain.

"You don't say that, miss."

"He is! By now he is not far from the sea. There isn't any hope left, unless you get there at once, as fast as ever a horse can take you."

“There is no horse,” he said, “there’s a little ass—”

“Oh, don’t say you haven’t a horse! An ass can’t carry us both!”

“Wouldn’t it be better if you stayed still, and rested, miss, a bit? You seem in pain enough, too.”

“That is nothing at all! A wretched nag kicked me. Can’t you get a horse — ?”

“We could, yes, by going into the village and knocking it up. Let me see — it is near two o’clock—”

“That’s no use! we haven’t an age to spare! You must go alone on the ass, then”

“I tell you what we might do,” said Golde, whose slow mind now hit upon the right thought: “do you know those new-fangled hobby-horses that’ve come up?”

“Yes! have you one?”

“I have, miss.”

She jumped up. “Can it carry two?”

“Just what it was made for,” said Golde. “I bought it a bargain at the sale at Wyemouth two months since. And warmish exercise I have found it, too.”

“Be quick, then, Mr. Golde, do!” said Margaret. “Can it go as fast as an ass?”

“Equally, I should say. But what is it we are going to do when we do get there?”

“I will tell you. Bring a lantern, that’s all.”

Golde got a lanthorn, descended to an old cellar, and came dragging the hobby-horse. He settled Margaret on the saddle in front, holding it upright, swung the lanthorn to the handle-bar, and sprang astride to his seat, making a backward dab at the ground with his toes. They were off, in long spurts of motion, Golde leaning far forward to the handlebar, spurning the ground with alternate feet, his legs going at a terrifically wide angle of urgency.

The light of the boat came into view, steady, and dainty, and clean. “Try and hide the lantern,” said Margaret.

Golde threw over it a red handkerchief.

“And how do you take to this kind of travelling, miss?” he said on heaving breaths. “It does jerk,” she answered.

For the bicycle — without crank, pedal, chain, or rubber tyre — was devoid of undulancy, and with every backward thrust of Golde’s toes at the scrubby ground, the sudden spurt and spasm of the hobbyhorse shook them with strong jolt, like rowing on very rough sea with oars that ply, not together, but alternately. A faint light, however, from the covered lanthorn revealed the rudest spots, and guided a career of some six miles an hour.

Margaret said: “I did not think you took to sports and fashion, Mr. Golde.”

“It isn’t so much that, miss,” Golde panted, “but when a man lives all alone by himself—”

“You don’t mean you are not married?”

“No, miss, strange to say. It never happened to me, somehow. I suppose it is that no one ever took a fancy to me.”

“They will now, when they hear all you have gone through, and how you saved the Duke with your hobby — horse.”

“Ah, now you are joking!”

“No. A woman likes a man who has been through things, and seen adventures. You will have all the girls at Wyemouth and Newton wanting to live at the mill, Mr. Golde.”

Golde was intimately tickled.

“And much good they’ll get of their wanting, too,” he said sheepishly. “The chances are that the one I should like won’t have me.”

“Oh, but that’s faint heart. Send me to her, and let me tell her of the lighthouse, and how you saved me out of the sack, and see.”

“You wouldn’t have to go very far, then, miss.”

“Stop it, Mr. Golde! There is no need for that, you know.”

“I am serious, miss.”

“You are like all the men! The first thing that comes to the tongue.”

“Well, I don’t know. I look upon you as a most brave lass, and a shrewd one, and a taking one. I should be a happy man to-morrow—”

“Hark! I hear the sea!”

“We are not far from it now.”

“Keep straight for the light, will you?”

“And what is it you propose to do when we get there?”

“Don’t you see?” she said. “It is very late, isn’t it? The Frenchmen have been wandering: they lost the Duke twice. The men in the boat must have expected them hours ago; they must think that something very bad has happened. If they see a false light in-shore now, going one way and another, like a boat tacking, and getting always nearer to him, what will they think?”

“Well, and a good plan, too,” said Golde. “They will think that a craft of some kind is coming to take them. Is that your meaning, miss?”

“Yes — and they will think that they must be a long way farther out than they supposed, and a long way nearer their ship. There can’t be many in the boat, because a lot have already landed. And they won’t know how many are coming to take them. It will be madness if they don’t put out their light, and take a short cut to their ship.”

Now the frigate’s port-light, too, very small, like red Mars, appeared; the hobby-horse was in the midst of the loud rumour of the frothy surf; and opposite burned the steady boat-light.

The strategy began: Margaret, in one hand, held high the uncovered lanthorn, that the vessel feigned might seem bigger; and Golde, spurning with alternate toes, sent the hobby-horse running obliquely eastward; then, with large-curving tack, westward; then eastwards, approaching always the shore. Before they reached the region of dry sand, the boat-light vanished. But they continued the alternate career till Golde's toes sank into wet sand, and Margaret quenched the lanthorn under her woollen shawl.

She had estimated with some accuracy the mind of the boatmen. They were only three: they had long been anxious: and they could not doubt that the tacking, growing light, which infinitely puzzled them, was hostile. Her estimate of their courage alone was at fault: they did, indeed, make for the frigate, but only in order to return with another boatful of armed and desperate men.

A mile inland with steady tramp, the Duke in their midst, came on the belated Frenchmen.

CHAPTER XXIII. TO SEACOMBE

THE LIGHT WHICH the French saw, and thought their boat-light, was the lanthorn held high by Margaret.

Danda cried out: "We are there at last!" A moment after, they noticed the movement with amazement, their boat being sailless. Then the light tacked! and, their stupor at climax, — vanished!

"They can't be far off now," Margaret said: "we had better get out of their way. We have done for them now, anyway."

Golde rode towards the moor. "Hark!" whispered she. Then, with certainty: "Yes! here they come. We must get off this thing, Mr. Golde: it makes a noise."

They dismounted and stood still. On came the sounds, and passed them close in voiceless tramp. Then from the shore vague words came up to them rolled in the noise of the waters.

There is nothing for them to do," said she, not careful to whisper, since the surf filled the French ears, "even if the boat is there, the men in it would hardly hear a hail in the noise. And they're afraid to hail; and the boat, I think, isn't there."

"There I agree with you, miss," said Golde. "They are in a bad way, certainly. I could almost pity the poor brutes."

Yes, I'd pity them!"

"I pity the poor Duke, anyway. He'll have a poor night's rest of it. They'll simply keep him a prisoner till the boat puts in an appearance again."

“If we let them, you mean!” cried she, exultant and flushed: “just let them wait there an hour, and see if they don’t get some bullets in their head!”

“It would be what they deserve, too,” remarked Golde. “And there is no doubt, miss, you have no lack of schemes passing in your head. What may the next be, if I might ask? I am ready for it, whatever it is.”

“How far is Seacombe from here, Mr. Golde?”

“I should say about a four mile.”

“It is the nearest town, isn’t it?”

“Yes, much.”

“Has it got a church in it?”

“A church and a chapel.”

“Well, then, let us go and ring up Seacombe quick, and bring it out upon these French beasts!”

“I am with you, miss. That is, if the boat doesn’t put in an appearance while we are gone, and take them off.”

“But if it did, we couldn’t do any good by standing about here. Let us go at once.”

“I don’t know,” said Golde, “but it looks to me as if I saw a light out yonder a moment since. “I don’t see any.”

“No, nor I now.”

“Come on, then — make your hobby-horse go, Mr. Golde! It’s a race: and they’ll have to look sharp, or we have them sure!”

Golde helped her up, mounted, and went rocking and toeing in the direction of Seacombe. But it was a race in an unsuspected sense. For, some feet off sitting stock still, Lise d’Arblay had heard every word, and, hearing, understood the cause of the boat’s disappearance. Margaret had done this. Margaret had been with them all through, the secret cause of all their woes!

Margaret was with them still, alert, hardened against them, bent upon their ruin! And she would succeed, too: only she had Lise to reckon with! Down upon the horse's haunch dashed her whip, and the panting nag was away.

Horse, then, against hobby-horse: and Seacombe was the goal. From the lanthorn Margaret soon took off her cloak, and the light was a guide to Lise behind. With quick invention, Lise had already decided what to say, what do, if she could reach the village three minutes in advance. Bitterly now she reproached herself for lacking some weapon, for the possession of which she would have forfeited her fortune, or a limb.

Upon the toiling bicyclists stole the galloping hoofs.

"It is clear, miss, that someone is after us on horseback," panted Golde's labouring chest.

"Yes — I know who it is," answered Margaret. "It is a beast of a woman who is the cause of all."

"Well — a woman!"

"Yes. It is her horse that kicked me. She is the wife or mistress to that Verdier. He calls her Lise. The Duke thinks her name is Mrs. Opie, but it is D'Arblay."

"It looks, miss, as if she will be beating us."

"You mustn't let her! Do, pray, Mr. Golde!"

"I don't seem to see what she could do at Seacombe, even if she does put us behind a bit."

"She is a vile woman, that. She will do something! She must have heard what we were saying in the dark!"

"Mightn't it be a good thing to cover over that lantern, miss?"

"It might. Why?"

"We offer a very fair target for a pistol, don't we?"

"But would you be able to see?"

“No, you are in the right there. Still, I think I should cover over that lantern, miss.” She covered it.

On came the spattering hoofs. Five minutes from the start Lise was two hundred yards behind; in seven they were abreast, and Seacombe three miles ahead. Side by side, ten yards apart they sped, Lise’s whip plying, Golde spurting with all his careering legs, each a constant unconquerable presence with the other.

“Don’t let her beat us!” Margaret tossed the hiss behind her.

A moment, and she was rolling on the ground, Golde with her: he had run into a gorsy depression. Ahead, as they lay, they heard the lessening hoof-beats.

She leapt up. “If we had had a light, you see — !”

Her first care was the lanthorn: it had been jerked some distance, but still burned.

“Ah, that was a nasty bit, miss,” said Golde. “I hope you have not met with an injury. We might still be able to get there within four or five minutes of her.”

“Come, then!”

And again they were up and off, this time lit, Lise being a thousand yards ahead. But something was wrong with the horse: she felt that. He no longer answered to the whip, save on his left haunch, when a throe beneath her, a slight kick-out, was the response. She began to know that her speed was slackening: there was a sense of failure, as if he yielded beneath her weight: she was not strongly and bravely borne. Yet he could not be so tired! she whipped and whipped. Once there was a tottering gait an instant; later he stumbled, nearly lifting her over his head. But he continued to run: and always the whip went.

It became clear to Margaret that they were rapidly gaining upon her. Never was Golde so in earnest: in his unconscious eagerness to gain her smile, his short power of wind seemed to multiply itself; and with widely-careering legs, in alternate rock and rush, navigating the encumbered heath, he went toiling on the toiling hobby-horse: toiling — for ominous creaks, and presently, as they stole near Lise, a singular clack of metal upon metal, were heard at every backward toe-thrust, the machine swaying in the middle at the jerk of each repeated impetus, like a thing protesting against the work demanded of it. But they were well within a mile of Seacombe. Golde, conscious of some weakness, did not relax, but even, with a certain merciless vehemency, put forth his last reserve of vigour; and while on this pitch of effort, once more heard the galloping hoofs abreast, heard them struggle an unconquerable presence, heard them yield defeated behind. He found breath to say:

“We shall leave her out on the moor yet, miss!”

And farther receded the hoof-beats during three minutes, till the hobby-horse quietly parted into a front and a back wheel, the front lying over Margaret. And Golde was at her side, lifting her, and she, with bruised arm, was saying: “It cannot be far off now; on foot, then!”

And before Lise reached them they were off the lanthorn with them. And when Lise dashed past, Golde knew that Seacombe could not be half a mile, and panted:

“We shall be there within five minutes of her yet!”

But even this final estimate proved wrong: for Lise had hardly cantered by, when her horse shivered through a horrible long heave of the flanks, tottered, dropped dead. He had been bleeding through the wound of Margaret’s knife for nearly two hours. When the race began his eyes were glazed; his head hung low. It had hastened the end.

He fell upon Lise, who for some time lay shocked and fettered. The two ran by, believing her well on towards Seacombe. But three minutes after they began to run down the long street, Lise was still out on the moor.

So Golde and Margaret won the race of horse against hobby-horse from Wyemouth coast to Seacombe village.

CHAPTER XXIV. THE ALARM

BUT THEY DID not know their victory: and with prone run down the silent street, made paces for the church.

It stood in meadow at the end, small but rich, Edward II. Decorated. Golde knew its position exactly. They passed through a gate up the steps of a frontage pierced by a rich and deeply- recessed Norman arch under a gable-niche containing a statue of St. John. Here Golde hoped for entrance. But, holding the lanthorn, saw only the brass knocker by which criminal fugitives gained sanctuary, and the locked keyless door, though the short iron bar hung unsecured.

“We shall have to knock up the sexton, ” said Margaret.

“No, this way, miss, please,” answered Golde. “There is a door around there in the vestry, which it is more likely—”

Round they ran through old slant tomb-stones.

The vestry stuck out sideways, a cubical box against the church-wall. Golde found a small door, secured by a hook and eye, ran through a little north chantry of dainty Perpendicular, past a pulpit of corbel and crocket, and over storied grave-slabs in the nave floor. By an inner handle they opened and flung wide the portal for the entrance of Seacombe.

Not a sound in the village: it was past three; and the faintest breeze arose, premonitory of day. “This way, miss, for the steeple,” panted Golde.

It was square, battlemented, at the south corner of the façade, the only thing crudely modern in St. John’s. One entered by a door within the church. They looked about for the ropes, and not seeing any, climbed a ladder-stair to the stage above; and here, through holes in a higher floor, came three ropes. They deposited the lanthorn near the door, and took each a rope. Suddenly Seacombe was awake, staring scare. Loud went jargoning the turbulent bells in affrighted clamour through the night. Fire! And out looked a thousand wondering heads, the savour of snoring beatitudes still fresh in the nostrils, to find for answer only darkness and the insistent alarum of the bells.

High through the reverberations, cried Margaret:

“I wonder what that woman is doing flow!”

“It remains to be seen!” bawled Golde.

It remained not long: before the first sound Lise was hasting down the street. She had visited it before, but was uncertain of the position of the church, when forth clashed the innovating clangour upon the timid silence. She flew, entered, passed the font, the line of blue mosaic beyond which women once might not advance, looking, spied the turret-door, peeped in. Light streamed down. She hurried up, not even careful to go soft in the tumultuous verberations which brayed through the narrow tower. She was at the door; looked in; the backs of both were toward her. She introduced an arm, straining to reach the lanthorn: it was too far; she entered, stood there with them an instant; and they did not see her.

Suddenly Margaret cried, “Look!” — but too late.

Lise was gone; they were in darkness. The door was closed upon them, and fastened outside. The turret was littered with rubbish, dust, ancient refuse. On the lowest floor stood in a corner a dust-heap of old torn documents, shavings of repairs, bits of cloth and wood. When Lise saw this, she smiled: it was what she needed. By armfuls she heaped it at the stair-foot, then held the lanthorn-dip steadily to the pile. A flame shot up. Outside were remote sounds of a crowd. The bells had ceased. She threw the lanthorn upon the burning heap and slipped out quickly, locking the door by a bang behind her. Into the church now streamed old and young, slovenly women half-nude, children. No fire, certainly, was in the village, and none knew what to make of the reveille. In some minutes the building was the thronged focus of the village: Babel reigned — a tempest of tongues. In rushed a plump rector, red-faced from his winey slumber, with one stocking, his night-dress bagging at the breeches-waist under small-clothes. Who had rung the bells, and for what, became the question. When the sexton entered, belated and dazed, and could give no account of things, it began to seem as if Beelzebub himself was abroad. Women screamed guesses across the church-breadth one to another. Parson and bell-man, apothecary and “post- master,” dignitaries all, assembled near the altar-screen. The object of Lise was time: a minute more or less might be everything. Only when the ferment grew superlative, and there was a movement of investigation towards the steeple, did she run up the pulpit-stairs, and in the circle of lonely marble stood.

Clustered pillars of Purbeck and carved bosses, fan-traceried roof and panel walls, all was a vagueness in the ruddy clair-obscuré of chance lanthorns snatched by hurried hands. Only half observed Lise, till the parson roared “Silence!” and there was silence, and vacant mouths.

“My friends!” she began, filling the church. “It was I who rang the bells!”

Here was light, the beginning of light. The murmur hushed; she proceeded. It was essential, my friends, that I should arouse you. You know, don’t you, that a menagerie has been on the moor, and was burnt down last night by some accident?”

“Aye! ’tis so! go on!”

“You think perhaps that all the men in it perished in the flames, or are gone where their business calls them—”

“No! no! — three of ’em are here now!”

This was a nonplus. She hesitated: but proceeded: “At any rate, there are two others of them, to my knowledge, not only alive, but near you now. I happened to be passing over the moor a while since, my friends, as I have to be at Lessing, nine miles hence, by early cock-crow; as I came along, I heard two people in the dark; I stole toward them, and heard their talk — a woman and a man they were. They averred that the menagerie had been set fire to by you Seacombe folk, and they were coming straight here to give you tit-for-tat, by burning down Seacombe while you were in your beds, friends, beginning, they said, with the church. They found out that I was listening, and chased me, friends. I know they can’t be far off, if they have not already set fire to something while I was ringing—”

At this point there was sensation, commotion: for now, in truth, the church was perceived to be full of a thin smoke.

Again arose the outcry of fire. Through the uproar screamed the voice of Lise:

“Friends! you see I told you true! and the incendiaries are in the village still! The only way to secure them is to form a cordon round the village, all of you, and wait for hours — till morning — to block their escape—”

But this suggestion was mostly unheard, the people now being turned toward the turret- door, where fast came oozing dark smoke from every cranny; when some rushed to open it, they found it locked and keyless; the sexton was impotent: the key had stood there for years, nor was there a duplicate that he knew of. The air thickened every moment to a darker grey, the lights showing lurid, the crowd jostling between and over the pew-backs, shoes falling off women fainting. Now a stout farrier shouted above the din, bidding some follow him: these crushed their way to the frontage, and ran down to the smithy, seizing upon crow-bars and sledges; hastened back then, made to the turret-door, and a vigorous bombardment began.

Lise, seeing this, and fearing the rescue of the two, coolly doomed the whole village, and hasted out.

And soon strange panic was added to the turmoil by a crush at the front, by a heart-startling rumour: the portal had been barred on the outside, and now a man came bellowing from the vestry that there, too, escape was barred, while above the turmoil and short-winded mêlée of the blinded people out clanged once more, with mystifying unexpectedness, the noisy bells, adding to distraction sound. For a real fire this time rang Golde and Margaret: for, as the sledge-men with unlooked-for quickness crushed a hole through the turret-door, the interior sent forth a belch of sparks and redundant smoke, hurling the crowd into a backward jam: and immediately it was seen that the inner surface of the door was well alight, and the steeple in flames.

Now it was the turn of the portal, blows thundering upon lock and wood-work, and at the vestry-door a thunder of blows; and above, the quarrelling bells; and within a hubbub of voices, gasps and screams. When the pent-up crowd at length streamed forth, a great mouth of flame had opened within between church and turret.

Outside, they assembled before the façade, filling the churchyard, spreading up the street, gaping at an up-gliding cloud of flushed smoke, through which thronged processions of sparks and flashes from turret-top and window-slit. Far it disparded the solemn dark with a scintillating mist, till a tongue of bright flame shot, and the fire-dawn was turned to red day.

Some talk had been going on about forming the recommended cordon: but before any movement could be made, two shapes appeared to the astounded crowd scampering round the turret-top. (Lise had long since disappeared, no one knew or asked whither.)

The man, seeming to stretch down arms of appeal, was answered by a shout of execration. The eyes of both were wide in panic. It was impossible to misunderstand the nature of the shouts below.

“It does look, miss, as if we were down for this time, and no mistake either,” heaved from Golde’s short breast.

She was running round, he behind her, looking for the lightning-conductor, remembering the lighthouse. But lightning-conductors were not common: here was none. The turret was, however, covered from top to bottom with ivy, and this fact occurred to the girl’s swift mind.

“Down by the ivy, ” she panted, “it will break our fall.”

“Our necks, I think, you mean, miss,” answered Golde; “and a very safe way of doing it, too. Do, pray, don’t think of that!”

“’Tis better than burning!”

“’Tis quicker, yes; and just as sure.”

Golde, as always, clung to life for as great a number of seconds as the heavens would grant it him: the turret was nearly eighty feet high.

“I am going — !” she called. “Oh, miss, miss—” cried Golde.

Her leg was actually over the top, but she stopped: for she had chosen the shortest side, separated from the church by a platform low down seven feet wide, but just beneath her was a Gothic window pouring out processions of sparks, and these had thinned the ivy above. At the sheer precipice her heart failed: and as she paused, she noticed what caused her to tingle: the window was on a level with the church-coping. If she could leap from one to the other — but the window was too small to admit a standing body the only possibility seemed to lie in the placing of a bar or a beam across, so to furnish a bridge.

With this thought, without a word, she flew down scorched stairs into thick smoke brightly lit by a streak of flame, which had even shot through the roof on one side. There hung the three bells.

The moment when the bell nearest the flaring side would drop to the very bottom was not far. In the burning room she looked wildly around: but no bar or beam met her sight: only the doomed and silent bells, waiting. She saw a ladder, indeed, but its three steps were only four feet long. Foiled, she ran back, to be met by a stone from below which cut her temple.

In the heart of the mob was not one gentle throe. A dramatic Providence, it seemed, was here at work, burning those who had thought to burn. And when humorous old Steve, the fiddler, he of the sharp face, bright eyes, and fumbling toothless mouth, hit upon the idea that Providence was weak alone, and threw a stone, this inspiration caught the whole mob. It chanced that a conical heap of broken stone for paving lay near, and this, once discovered by another genius, began to grow less, and went showering upwards, falling mostly short.

But a few reached, one cutting Margaret, and immediately another gave out a clang, striking on metal: and this sound drew her interest, and inspired her invention.

“Mr. Golde, here!” she cried: “let us see if we can move this—”

It was a rod, round above, square at bottom, ten feet high, at its summit a weather-cock glancing now with creaks at the gadding of the morning breeze.

Golde, without question, set to work at her bidding. They laid hold of the rod with desperate wrestle. It did not budge, being embedded in the masonry, and clamped to it by two rectangular cramps.

They desisted. The fire spread. Now a stone flew by.

“Well, miss, there is nothing in that,” panted Golde. “It is the only thing left,” she wept. Suddenly she vanished again, flew down, placed the ladder-steps beside the smallest of the bells, and with cheeks hot from the near flame, was about to mount, when the mass of metal disengaged itself from the eaten roof, and down with huge clatter tumbled, rending with it all the flame and burnt flooring in that corner. Back she leapt, dismayed by the bigness of the downfall; but in a moment was under another, mounted, and with furious effort disengaged the tongue from its socket. Faltering under the 85 lbs. weight, she again reached the top.

“Now, drive at that thing, Mr. Golde!” she cried, “and drop the bell-tongue on these people when you’ve done.”

Whereupon Golde, with this ponderous sledge, did drive, and the mason-work began to spatter, and the flaky old iron to fly, crack, and writhe and presently there were no cramps there worth mentioning, and the bar was nodding in a dusty hole.

“Now, miss, I think it will come to a pull,” gasped Golde, winded.

At their upward strain it yielded, and, one at either end, went rapidly down, and out at the Gothic window. The farther it went, the greater the strain to keep its outer end, though the lighter, up to the coping-level; but by the bell-tongue and their own hung weight, the other end rose and rose with jerks, and fell, with a push, upon the coping, a bridge secure.

The flooring was half consumed, three sides aflame, and as Margaret clambered to the sill, down crashed bellowing another of the bells. She let herself down at full length, and commenced a hand-walk across, a hollow space of fifty feet below. But now the mob, missing them, had edged round, and a rain of cruel missiles surrounded her, striking her back, her head, or flopping spent in her skirts, amid hoots and ribald jeers. Now Golde, too, trusted his weight over emptiness, going astride, clasping with the arms, winning himself along with slowest caution. When he was half-way across, Margaret stood waiting on the leads behind the coping. He reached her with bleeding jaw.

And now was the run, no longer from the fire, but the stones, round the coping, in search of descent. There were buttresses, but without foothold. They went balancing in close flight along the coping-top, making for the chancel-end, where it was dimmer, till Margaret cried:

“The vestry!”

Its flat roof lay thirty feet below — a deep drop: but here, too, covering vestry-roof and church-wall, grew thicknesses of ivy and white briony.

“Just let me try first, miss,” said Golde, “and see how it treats me. If it wasn’t for those foolish men and women down there—”

“I may as well go first, Mr. Golde—”

“No, lass — remember your sprained leg. Just let me go, and receive you as you come.” He stepped hesitantly over the edge, and in a moment went clutching and tearing at the yielding masses of tendrils, bumping to a seat astounded as a fat monk from beneath whom, about to sit, the chair is pulled. And now came Margaret, all a disarray of wild skirts, and Golde, as he caught her impetus, fell with her, and together they rolled a little in the ivy there, tightly held, and lingeringly. Here they were secure from pebbles, and for some minutes sat so among exuberance and leaves, watching the square flame-pyramid at the turret-top.

“That boat must have come back by this, lass,” said Golde, and laid his hand on hers: “I have an idea that this is a bad business.”

For answer she jumped up, and at once went down the vestry-wall, tearing at the tendrils, in a drop of twenty-five feet. She alighted upon soft ivy-grown mould; and looked up to discern Golde hesitating: and soon he, too, was with her, a much-bumped man. They found themselves in the midst of the rough-handed and noisily-vengeful villagers of Seacombe.

CHAPTER XXV. THREE CHEERS

“DRIVE UN BACK into the turret — let un burn!” cried the snuff-man.

“Take ’em round to my shop, let’s gi’ ’em a pill a-piece!” said the apothecary. “Under the pump with them, and quench some of their fire!” cried the rough-nosed rector. “You silly fools!” shrilled Margaret.

“No, no, lass,” said Golde, who, meanwhile, was being roughly hustled, “listen to me, folks, please. You have got on the wrong track somehow—” he backed towards the vestry-door, and lifted himself on the step. The dusky light of lanthorns shone here and there on a rude visage, leaving vague interspaces of heads; while in buttress-recess, in the shadow of oak, or church, was the very blackness of darkness, though broad overhead the sparkling fume solemnly informed the night. “On the wrong track somehow — We are two perfectly innocent people—”

“Oh, aye — us’ll show ye innocent soon!”

“Well, but you will give a man a chance to talk, I hope,” proceeded Golde: “violence is not likely to help you to the truth, and it’s the truth you want, I daresay. You are thinking, I shouldn’t wonder, some of you, that it was we who set fire to the church: and nice people were they that did it, and much luck may they expect, too—”

This was too ponderous for the occasion. The mob would not stand it.

“Oh, come on, ye it wur right enough: under the pump with ’em, as passon says!” cried some. But Margaret had no taste for the pump. She leapt to Golde’s side. Her tongue went flying.

“I haven’t got any patience with silly fools like you!” she screamed—
“to believe the first lying Frenchwoman that comes and stuffs your head with a lot of lies, as if you oughtn’t to have more sense! Whatever it was the woman told you wasn’t true, can’t you understand, not a word of it! She chased us across the moor because she heard us saying we were coming to get you to rescue the Duke, before the boat came back, and it was she who stole our lantern, and set fire to the church, and you have got to get ready now, the whole of you, and come with me and Mr. Golde to the shore to catch the Frenchmen who have kidnapped the Duke, that is, if we are not too late already, after all this time, just through your silliness in believing a lot of lies of a lying Frenchwoman, Englishmen like you — !”

But she spoke to brains already captured and prejudiced by Lise. There was a burst of derision, a movement of menace, shouts of contemptuous query:

“Which Duke?”

“Which boat?”

“What about the menagerie?”

“Which menagerie?” screamed Margaret. “What has the menagerie to do with it? The Frenchmen—”

“Ben’t ye two from the menagerie?”

“No!” cried one of the menagerie-men staying at Seacombe: “the girl is, but I don’t think she’d set fire to a church. The man don’t belong to us.”

“The man is Mr. Golde of Newton Mill!” cried a woman, who, having heard Golde’s name, had peered and recognised him.

Well, here was contradiction, and no knowing what to believe. But the minds of the boors were hopelessly preoccupied by Lise’s nicely-plausible story.

